THE GENERALL HISTORIE OF THE MAGNIFICENT STATE OF VENICE.

FROM THE FIRST FOVNDATION THEREOF VNTILL THIS PRESENT.

Collected by Thomas de Fougaſſes, Gentleman of Auignon, out of all Authors, both Ancient and Moderne, that haue written of that ſubiect.

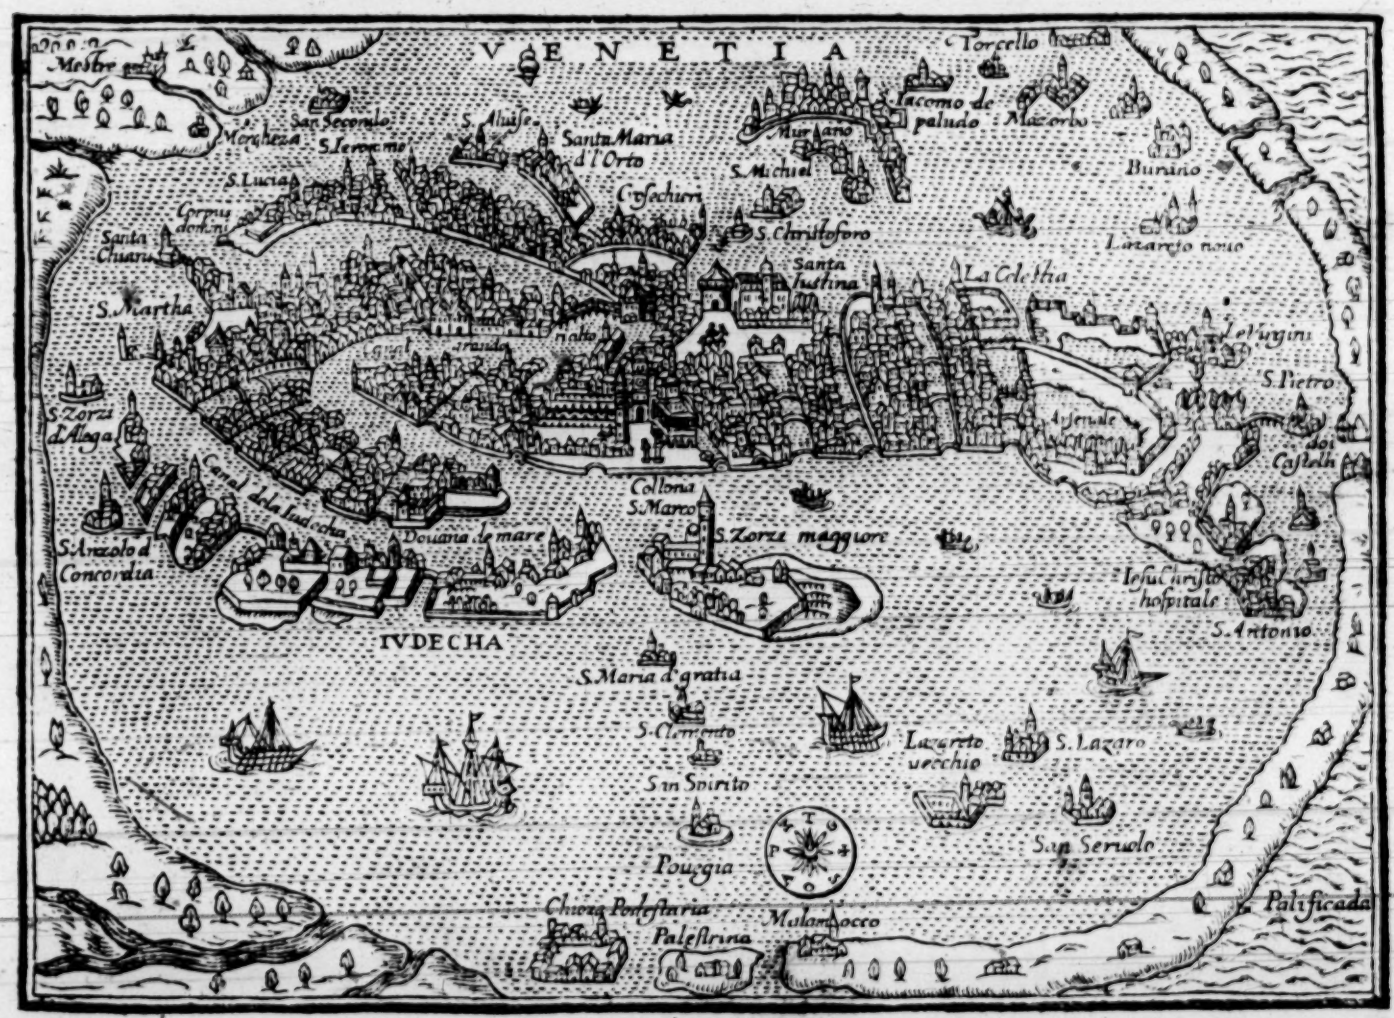
Engliſhed by VV. SHVTE. Gent.



LONDON

Printed by G. Eld, and W. Stansby. 1612.

TO THE TRVLY NOBLE, AND WORTHIE OF ALL HONOVRS,

WILLIAM, Earle of Pembrooke, &c. and PHILIP, Earle of Montgomerie.

Knights of the Honourable Order of the GARTER.

MY most honoured LORDS; The desire to know, and to be knowne, are equally predominant. There is in both a kinde of infiniteneſſe, which Nature comes ſhort off, and can not fill. Bookes, including matter ſupernaturall, better ſatisfie it: They extend Fame as farre as the vtmoſt limit of Time, and Knowledge beyond; being the cleareſt Oracles to the liuing, and faithfulleſt Heralds to the dead: All other Inuentions are lame. Touching Fame, how barren a ſhift was he driuen to, that was faine to adopt a Pillar? Tombes die like their Tenants, and are buried in their duſt whom they burie. Thoſe Liuing Tombes, and Speaking Epitaphs (Children) are neither built when, nor as wee would. Whereas Bookes (the only iſſue, wherein our Wiues cannot defraude vs) though they be often conceld by Time, yet in euery next impreſsion finde a new being, and haue an artificiall Immortalitie of their owne, ſtill protecting their Protectors from the murther of Obliuion.

Hence I haue extracted a hope, that your Lordſhips might be pleaſed to pardon my gratefull and humble preſumption, in conſecrating my Labours to your Names. The great French Henrie, and the Illuſtrious Leonardo Donato now Duke of Venice, held their greatneſſe no whit leſſened by Patronizing the Originall, neither will your Honours bee much blotted by the Tranſlation. Your Names ſhall ſhine to Poſteritie in the ſame gold, though leſſe curiouſly ſtampt. If my zeale may likewiſe ſhine out to you, I aſpire to no third happineſſe.

Thus wiſhing your Lordſhips
the ſame fulneſſe and maturitie of Honour that yee haue of Vertue.

I
remaine.

Your Lordſhips humble
deuoted.

W. SHVTE.

TO THE READER.

ITALIE is the Face of Europe; Venice the Eie of Italie. It is not only the Faireſt, but the Strongeſt, and Actiueſt part of that Beautifull and Powerfull Nation. In diſmembring of any ſenſitiue Bodie we may obſerue ſome one limbe to out-liue all the reſt, as if all had bequeathed their Motion to that one, and left it ſole Executor of Life. It ſeemes in the diſſolution of the laſt Monarchie, the Genius of it made tranſmigration to Venice. In her the VViſedome, Fortitude, Iuſtice, and Magnanimitie of old Rome doe yet moue and ſtirre. That which now Vſurps that name is not Rome, but her Carkaſſe, or rather Sepulcher. All but her Ruines, and the Cauſe of them, (her Vice) is remoued to Venice; of whome I may truly affirme their VVarres haue ingendred the Peace, and their Peace the plentie of all Chriſtendome. Few States haue performed matter more worthie writing than that; few Hiſtorians compoſed lines more worthy reading than this: I meane not for curioſitie of ſtile, but integritie. Not that they had not, but that this Subject needed not Rhethoricall illuſtration. The nakedneſſe of Truth is her beſt Ornament, and Noble actions are eloquent, not only in any Language, but without any, euen in mute Pictures. Touching my Tranſlation, though I haue not, as ſome that write by Precedent, followed euery letter of my Copie, Copie, nor Ecchoed my Author in euery word, yet I haue not contradicted or denied him in any ſenſe. Touching my ſtile, I haue not made it ſo high, but that the loweſt vnderſtanding may get ouer, nor affected any thing ſo much, as not to affect. For my chiefe ambition was, that my lines might rather be fit to crowne my Readers braine, than hang in his eare, and make him a Man, than a Parrot. To conclude, thoſe bright and tranſlucent iudgments which ſhall ſhine vpon my worke, will ſoone diſſolue, and cleare any miſt of errour that ſhall ariſe before them, and ſo warme and cheriſh my endeuours, that the ſecond crop may bee more worthie taſting. But thoſe which, like the ſpies of Ignorance, come only to finde fault, if they loſe their labour in mee, perhaps may ſaue it in themſelues, and exerciſe that cenſorious humour nearer home.

Fare-well.

W. SHVTE.

THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE FIRST DECAD OF THE GENERALL HISTORIE OF Venice: From the foundation of the CITIE.

The Contents of the first Booke of the first DECAD.

IN this first Booke is contained the originall of the ancient Venetians, with the sundrie opinions of the Cities foundation. In what place, and by whome it was first of all built in the Marishes. The terrible fire whereby it was consumed at her first rising. Her first Officers vnder the Consularie dignitie. Her ancient reuenew, and new increase thereof. The Tribunes Gouernement who succeeded the Consuls. From whence the Lombards are issued, with their progression in Italie. The confines which this Nation had limited to the Venetians. The Venetians first iournie against the Dalmatians. The ancient opinion concerning their Marriages. The Islanders offer succours to NARSES against the Gothes. The forme of the ancient buildings. The Church of Grada declared Metropolitane. A great inundation ouer all the Venetian Territorie. The daylie increase of the Citie. Dissension betwixt the Prelates of Grada and Aquileia. The Creation of the first Duke. The Venetians surprise Rauenna from the Barbarians. The dangerous Warre betwixt the Heraclians and the Iesulans. Prince VRSVS murthered. The Gouernement of the Master or Colonell of the men at Armes newly erected. And lastly, the retreite of the Heraclians and Iesulans to Medoac.

HOR as much as no man doubts, but that the first Venetians were the founders of this Cittie and State, whose Historie wee vndertake: I haue thought it not vnfit (seeing I perceiue the Historians to disagree about their true originall) before wee treat of the beginning of the Cittie, briefly to speake some-what of their Antiquitie. Now these first Venetians had not their beginning from Italie: but were issued, as some thinke, from the Venetians of Gaule, who dwelt on the Coastes of the Ocean Sea. And this opinion was not grounded vpon the name only: but because thoſe which poſſeſſed the Adriaticke Gulphe, were like their neighbours very much adicted to Sea buſineſſe, and they differed from the Gaules in ſpeech only, (as POLIBIVS ſaith) and not in manners nor apparrell.

Whereof the Authors meaning is to treate.

Others, as Titus LIVIVS, doe affirme that they are deſcended from Paphlagonia. Hee ſets downe, how that their Captaine PILEMON beeing dead at Troy, they came with ANTENOR into Italie. CATO following him, did thinke that the Venetians were deſcended from the Troian race. Cornelius NEPOS imagines that the Venetians were ſo named in Italie of the Henetians, which inhabited the towne of Cromna neere to Paphlagonia. There be ſome that haue written, how that this nation was a neighbour to the Cappadocians, and did make warre vpon the Cimmerians, and came afterwards into the Adriaticke Sea.

Others thinke that they poſſeſt a little towne neere to Amaſtra, and that they went ouer all the Countrey to meete with the Henetians, as if they had beene no where to bee found. But all of them doe in a manner affirme, that this nation of whom wee ſpeake, did come from Paphlagonia. The which XENODOTVS did not only maintaine, but thought that the Cittie of Amiſa was the ſame, which was afterward called Heniſa. Howſoeuer, thoſe which thinke ſo, bring in for their proofes, the induſtrious care which both theſe nations had to breede Horſes and Mules: according to the teſtimony of HOMER, who ſaith,

The true original of the firſt Venetians.

And from the Henetians come ſtrong Mules.

And albeit this great Poet ſpake then of thoſe of Aſia; STRABO a very diligent obſeruer of Antiquitie, maintaines that euen almoſt in his time the choiceſt and beſt Mares came from the Venetians, inhabiting a parcell of the Adriaticke Sea, which were highly eſteemed for their ſingular pace and ſwiftneſſe. Theſe things indeed, and diuers others doe cauſe me to follow the opinion of thoſe, which ſay that the Henetians came into Italie with ANTENOR, and were afterward by the altering of a letter called Venetians. ANTENORS comming into the Adriaticke Gulphe is not only proued by the Venetians who were his fellowes; but becauſe the place where they firſt arriued, was called Troy, which name the Burrough hath euer ſince carried. Theſe men hauing firſt of all driuen away the Euganeans, which inhabited this Countrie, which lies betwixt the Sea and the Alpes, did build the Cittie of Padua. After that, they did in proceſſe of time ſo encreaſe, as they did not only make themſelues maſters of that which did belong to the Euganeans (whoſe power in times paſt was ſo great, as it contained, according to the opinion of CATO in his booke of originals, foure and thirtie Citties:) but of diuers places of Breſsia and Furli: which they named Venetian. For what places ſoeuer they conquered, were afterward called Venice. Some haue confined this Countrey, with the Riuers of Po, and Adda; with the lake of La Garda, in old time called Benac; with the Alpes, and the Adriaticke Sea. PLINIE comprehended on the Eaſt ſide thereof Aquileia, and STRABO on the contrary cuts it off.

The ſondation of the Cittie of Padua.

The extent of the Countrie of Venice.

After this ſort did the ancient Venetians extend their Dominion in length and breadth in the pleaſanteſt Countrey of Italie. But the ſcituation of the places, rather then this peoples manner of life, did alwaies procure enuie to the ancient State of the Prouince. For on the one ſide the ordinary thefts of the Liburnians, and the fearefull and continuall roades of cruell nations on the other, did hinder them from enioying any long reſt: ſo as it oftentimes happened, that by how much their publicke and priuate affaires did ſeeme to be increaſed by ſome relaxation from forraine warres, by ſo much the more were they miſerably ouerthrowne by theſe ſodaine ſtormes and alarmes. This nation, without this, had beene moſt happy, in regard it wonne by right of warre the goodlieſt Countrie of Italie for their dwelling: For beſide, that it is enuironed on the ſouth ſide with a moſt calme circuite of the Sea, which makes it capable to receiue all maner of forraine marchandize: it is moreouer watered with moſt pleaſant Riuers, by which, all that comes from the Sea, is eaſily tranſ-

The trouble which the firſt Venetians had to keepe that which they had conquered.

The fruitfulneſſe of the Venetian Countrie.

tranſported into the middeſt of the Prouince: It aboundes in Lakes, Pooles and Forreſts: the territorie being meruailous fertile in Corne, Wine, Oyle, and in all maner of Fruites. It is ſtored beſides, with goodly Houſes in the Countrie, with Townes, Caſtles, and Cities very much recomended for their ſituation, and circuit of their walls, whereof we will heereafter make mention in his place.

But let vs now returne to theſe new inhabitants, who from the time that their affaires grew proſperous, were ſeldome freed from forraine warres. It would bee too long and tedious a labour, orderly to ſet downe in ſo ancient a matter, their paines and trauaile, as alſo it not being my meaning to inſiſt farther on the deedes of the firſt Venetians.

Now after diuers and ſundry roads of the Barbarians, and that by continuall wars the one againſt the other, from their beginning euen to the time of ATTILA, their ſubſtance had beene continually waſted, and were beſides daunted by the fearefull aſſaults of the Gothes: A greater danger than all the reſt, did on a ſodaine aſſaile them. The Huns, conducted by ATTILA ſonne to Mandluc, with a horrible ſpoile did caſt themſelues into the Prouince. This Nation, as ſaith PRISCVS, came from Scithia, and dwelt neere to the Riphean mountaines: After a long ſiege they tooke Aquileia, ſpoiled and wholly burnt it. They deſtroyed after the ſame manner Concorda, Altina, and almoſt the whole Venetian Territorie.

The originall of the Huns, and their comming into Italie.

At the fearefull report of theſe warres, the Venetians, and the reſt of Italy were in alarme long time before: But in this trouble the Venetians were more amazed than any others, as beeing accuſtomed euer to endure the firſt aſſaults of the Barbarians. It is reported that at the ſame time great numbers of men left the firme Land, and retired into the Iſlands where Venice now ſtands: but at the enemies approach, greater numbers ran thither.

Certaine vnknowen Hiſtorians who haue written this Hiſtorie, haue in ſuch ſort ordered the warres of the Huns, as it ſeemeth that Attila did twice enter Italy, the which none of the moſt truſtie haue noted: but all of them ſay that neither at the ſame time, nor yet all together went to dwell in one ſelfe ſame place. The ſame authors doe affirme that diuers of the choiſeſt men of Padua began the retreate, and that vnder their conduct this runaway multitude arriuing at the mouth of the Riuer, which was then very deepe (whereby the name of Riuoalto remained to that place) the firſt foundations of the Cittie were there laid: And that thoſe of the Countrie of Padua who fled, being poſſeſſed with the like feare, began to people Chioggia, Malamoc, and Albiola. They affirme beſides, that diuers of Aquileia withdrew themſelues at the ſame time into the mariſhes of Grada: But ſo ſoone as Attila was gone, they ranne in troopes from the fieldes along the Sea coaſts to the neighbour Iſlands: That the Aquileians put themſelues into Grada, a place neere to the firme land enuironed with water. The runawayes of Concorda poſſeſſed Caorli, and the Altinoes, ſixe ſmall Iſlands neere togeather, which they called by the names of the gates of their loſt Cittie: Tourcella, Maiorba, Buriana, Muriana, Amiana, and Conſtantiaca. This is in a manner all that which thoſe Authors haue left vs in many words of the originall of the Cittie, whom I finde almoſt to agree in euery point with the reſt who haue written the ſame Hiſtorie, except in this, where they are of opinion that the Huns entred twice into Italy. I ſuppoſe that this error proceeded from that they did reade, that in the time of the Huns they did twice retire themſelues from the firme Land to thoſe Iſlands, and that they would not elſe haue done ſo, had not the enemies come vpon them. But wee will heereafter ſet downe what wee thinke thereof: For from thence in a manner proceeded all the diuerſitie in opinions about the originall of the Cittie, ſo as ſome affirme it to bee built at one time, ſome at an other.

Diuers opinion of the Hiſtorians.

The foundation of the Rialto.

How the Iſlands were inhabited.

Diuers doe truely affirme, that the yeare of our Saluation 421, it receiued her firſt foundations, at the ſame time when as at the report of the Huns arriuall, all Italy began to be afraid: For then, or certainly a little before, Attila hauing paſſed 421. Macrin Gouernor of Hungarie ouercome by the Hunnes.

the riuer of Danubie, ouerthrew in battaile Macrin the Gouernor of Hungarie and Macedonia; wherewith beeing puft vp with pride, he promiſed to himſelfe the entire conqueſt of the Weſterne Empire. Others reiect this opinion as erronious, and dare affirme that this Cittie was firſt of all built, about the time that Aquileia, and all the Venetian territorie was deſtroied, which hapned (as it is very credible) certaine yeares after: But nothing hinders vs from beleeuing, that at the firſt motions of this warre, all the nobleſt and richeſt perſons accompanied with troopes of houſhold ſeruants, began the flight, that by their meanes they began to build in thoſe places firſt poſſeſſed, and that afterward in tract of time, ſo ſoone as the enemie was entred Italy, they ranne from all parts in great numbers to thoſe Iſlands, whereby of neceſſity theſe places were heere and there inhabited; that from thence the diuers opinions of the originall of Venice did proceed. But to auoid all confuſion, wee will willingly follow their opinion, which beleeue that the Cittie of Venice was builded before the deſtruction of Aquileia, the which wee will declare in order how it hapned.

The Authors opinion concerning the Cities foundation.

How the original of Venice happned.

The originall of the Cittie of Venice, (as wee haue learned by reading thoſe authors, who haue moſt faithfully written thereof) hapned almoſt in this manner: As the feare of the Hunnes war had already poſſeſſed the people of Italy, and that the Venetians as the foremoſt in the danger, were alſo by meanes thereof greatly mooued (for all men beleeued that the Hunnes would come into Italy) their more than barbarous cruelty towards the Chriſtians, was the cauſe, why the ancient Venetians which dwelt in thoſe pleaſant places neere to the Adriaticke Sea, ſome of them in their flight ſeized on the Iſlands of the Sea next at hand, and others conſequently on the reſt: And thoſe who began the flight were honorable perſons, full of pietie and Religion. I cannot warrant ought of other places: But it is certaine, that from two moſt excellent Citties of the Venetians Countrey, Padua, and Aquileia, there ran thither from the beginning great multitudes: ſo as in this tumult, diuers of Aquileia with their children and richeſt moueables retired themſelues to Grada: diuers of the cheefe of Padua did likewiſe reſorte to Rialto.

Who they were that began to flie.

What thoſe places were, whereon Venice is at this day built.

Thoſe places whereon at this day the Cittie of Venice is ſeated, were in times paſt very ſtrait and narrow Iſlands, and neere to one another, ſeperated by the pleaſant current of riuers, which run turning into the Sea, according to the change of her ebbing and flowing: There was nothing to be ſeene in theſe ſtrait places, but Seafowle, which came thither from the Sea to ſeeke ſhelter; ſometime likewiſe fiſhermen, (but very ſeldome) came thither to reſt themſelues.

Where the firſt foundations of the Cittie were laid.

Now thoſe of Padua which came to the Rialto (this place is now almoſt in the middeſt of the Citty) were the firſt which began to build, and in that place were the firſt foundations of the new City laid. How religiouſly the ſame was done, may bee coniectured, becauſe by how much any one did affect true godlineſſe and religion, by ſo much more for feare of the Hunnes, whom he knew to hate the Chriſtians, and to purſue them with more then a barbarous cruelty, he made himſelfe head of thoſe who by flight ſought a place of ſafety, fortifying it, the better to preſerue themſelues. After then they had giuen thankes to Almighty God, and performed the vowes worthy their piety, and ſuch as was conuenient for ſuch buſineſſe, they began in an happie place to raiſe the happie wals. Diuers dare affirme, that they began to build in the ſame place, where at this day the golden Church of Saint Marke doth ſtand.

On what day the Cittie of Venice was builded.

All authors doe agree together, that the Citie receiued her firſt foundation on the fiue and twentieth of March. If we will curiouſly obſerue certaine exquiſite workes of nature, which are reported to haue beene done on ſuch a day, it will not bee impertinent to ſay, that nothing could on that day be vndertaken, which was not admirable, great, perpetuall, and ſurmounting all humane heigth and excellency. The holy Scriptures doe witneſſe vnto vs, that on ſuch a day the Almighty created our firſt Father, & that the Sonne of God a long time after, was conceiued in the womb of the moſt ſacred Virgin. The greatneſſe of this myſterie is thought to ſurpaſſe mans vnderſtanding, whereby it is hard, not only to declare it by ſpeech (which can not be done) but to conceiue it in minde. But as we doe religiouſly beleeue it, wee doe likewiſe wiſely and conſtantly confeſſe the diuinity to bee ioyned to the humanity, and the Eternall, incomprehenſible, & holy, to be mingled with the corruptible and meaſurable. And we muſt not meruaile wherefore this great God did do it, becauſe it behooued it ſo to be, nor if it were poſſible to be done, in regard it was his pleaſure, for he can do whatſoeuer pleaſeth him. But it may be, that ſome will ſcoffe heereat, as at a vaine and ridiculous obſeruation, and will count it folly to make a difference of daies. Let them thinke what they pleaſe: I thinke it auaileth very much, when we begin any thing, to chooſe ſuch a day, wherein nature hath once or twice wrought excellently.

of

A very curious obſeruation.

Now albeit that for the peopling of this new Citie, all the moſt experienced marriners were called thither from all parts, with promiſe of great reward, to ſuch as could build all manner of Ships: it is neuertheleſſe reported, that they neuer receiued any man of ſeruile condition, nor a murtherer, or of wicked life: whereby it appeares that thoſe good founders of this Cittie would not haue hir birth defiled by the acceſſe of ſuch commers. The which ſome founders of other very renowned Citties tooke no care of, but haue freely called the moſt lewd perſons, and haue receiued them into their Cittie with all freedome and immunity. But thoſe men ſought nothing but how to people them, whereas theſe had regard to the ſincerity of their manners, aud to their ancient Nobility.

What manner of people were receiued into this new City.

This new Citie did daily encreaſe both in people and buildings: When as fire, kindled on a ſuddaine in a Carpenters houſe, did in a moment conſume with continuall burning foure and twenty houſes, and becauſe the matter which maintained this fire, was without order ſcattered heere and there, and that there was no likelihood to quench it by humane ſtrength, all the Cittie betooke themſelues to praiers; and ſo ſoone as they had made a vow to build a Church to the honor of Saint Iames, the Towne was preſerued from that danger. This Church is at this day to be ſeene ſtanding in the middeſt of the Rialto with ſignes of great antiquity. It is to be ſuppoſed that theſe firſt buildings, whereof we ſpeake, were very weake and ſlender, as thoſe which the multitude of the people had rather erected in forme of houſes, then for any ſhew at all: Seeing that diuers had builded houſes of mooriſh ſubſtance to ſerue onely their preſent neede, beeing reſolued to returne into the firme Land, if the Hunnes had not entred into Italie. As alſo becauſe that Attila made no haſt to come for certaine yeares, diuers did returne to their ancient dwellings. For after the firſt report of this great warre, Subthor brother to Mandluch, who was chiefe of the enterpriſe, marched into Germany: where he afterward dying, Attila, who with his brother did ſucceede him, after he had along time runne ouer France, fought a bloudy battaile in the plaines of Tholouſe, with Ætius the Roman, and Theodoric king of the Gothes, and going thence halfe vanquiſhed, hee went into Hungary; where after he had ſtayed fiue yeares to renew his Army, he determined to enter Italy by force. And in the meane time that iourney was not ſhort, nor without great trauaile, for in the ſame hee ſubdued a part of Illiria, Dalmatia, and Hiſtria, ſo as it is ſuppoſed that foure and twentie yeares were expired, from the firſt alarmes of the Hunnes, and their paſſage ouer Danubie, vntill the totall ruine of Aquileia. This new Citie in the meane time began to encreaſe neere to the Rialto, but not very much; yet neuertheleſſe ſuch as it then was, it is certaine that it was gouerned by Conſuls, as ſhall be declared in his place. But ſo ſoone as Attila began with his Armes to moleſt Italie, then did men of all ſortes and conditions, runne in heapes from all places to the Iſlands which were neereſt them, with their wiues, children and houſhold. Euery one beeing enforced by neceſſity, began to build new houſes, and by continuall labour to ioyne one ſtreete to another; ſo as a man would ſay, that they builded as many new Citties, as there were Iſlands and Streets. For they seemed in a small circuit to build sundrie Cities, although both in name and effect it was but one. And this is the most common and frequent opinion of the originall of Venice, approued by diuers moderne writers, who affirme this to haue beene after the totall destruction of Aquileia. But diuers other doe thinke the first foundation of the Rialto to be the true originall and beginning of the Citie, seeing that the buildings since then, ought rather to be called encreasements, as made not only during the troubles with the Hunnes, but by little and little during the tumults of the Gothes and Lombards. And although they came at sundry times into those Islands, (as hath beene said:) Yet notwithstanding, because it hapned in the time that the Hunnes were there, that they ranne thither in greater number then before, by reason that their Countrey beeing taken and burnt, all hope of returne was lost, the common opinion was, that the originall of Venice was after the destruction of Aquileia: albeit that it ought rather to be called an increase than an originall.

Foure and twentie houſes burnt at once.

A wonderfull miracle ſmelling ſome-what of Poetrie.

Attila defeated neere Tholouſe.

What the true Foundations of Venice was.

But we haue sufficiently spoken of the foundation of the Citie. Let vs now come to discourse to take away all doubts, from whence these new Venetians are descended. I will briefly shew vnto whom their true originall is to be referred. I doe certainly know, that if the question be demanded, diuers, yea almost all men will say that they are issued from the Paphlagonian Henetians, which came with Antenor, by reason of the name: but if we search out the matter from farre, we shall vndoubtedly finde, that they least of all came from thence. Antenor was a Troian, so were the Paduans, and all those which followed him, who were in greater number then the Henetians, who beeing arriued in Italy, did suffer themselues neuertheless to be called Henetians, not that they were either in number or dignity inferior to them, but only because they thought it more honorable to haue the kingly authority to remaine to Antenor, and afterwards vnto his, than the title only, esteeming much more the thing it selfe, then the simple shadow of the name. Those which with Æneas came into Latium, did the like, who being victors, did easily endure to be called by the names of those whom they had conquered. Those of Aquileia were afterwards a Colonie of the Latins, and Concordia of the Romans: These beeing mingled with the ancient Venetians, did possesse Grada and Caorli, at what time as the Huns arriued, they changed their dwellings. It is certaine that in processe of time, the inhabitants of these two places went to dwel in the Citie that now is.

From whence the Venetians that now are, be descended.

This beeing so, wee may much more truely say, that the Venetians are descended from the Troians, from the Latins, and from the Romans, rather then from Paphlagonia, or from the Galles. This is it which we haue gathered together the most succinctly that we could, both of their antiquity, and true extraction. I will now set downe what the state of this new Citie was in the beginning, what were hir conditions, hir frugality and Religion, after that I haue called to remembrance, that there are some Historians, who referre the originall of the Citie to the yeare of our Saluation foure hundred fifty sixe, among whom is Blondus the Historian, who hath also followed the opinion of those who did thinke the City to be builded after the taking of Aquileia. But we may easily perceiue how much they deceiue themselues, because that in the yeare of our Saluation foure hundred fifty sixe, Aquileia (as some thinke) was besieged by Attila, and they say that the siege lasted no more then three yeares. But grant that it lasted longer, there is no man so ignorant in humane matters, but may perceiue that they began to flie out of Aquileia vpon the report of the Barbarians arriuall, and not after that all was lost, seeing that the same flight would haue small profited them, and would haue beene to no purpose at all. It is then most certaine that some yeares before the losse of Aquilea, they began the second time to build in the Islands. I will not deny but that the Citie did receiue some beginning in the first troubles of the Goths, who were a little before the Hunnes, at such time as the Venetian State (as hath been said) was shaken. But we will euer hold that Originall of it to be most true, which hapned the yeare of our Saluation foure hundred twenty one.

456. The sundry opinions of the Historians concerning the building of the City.

The true time when the City of Venice was built.

Now

Now what the ancient State and condition of this City was, may be knowne by many euident proofes, but principally by that, that the firſt founders thereof were very honeſt people, noble, and rich. For thoſe ancient Venetians in that change, after they had carried away with them their wiues and children, and the richeſt goods they had, did retire themſelues at leaſure into the places of moſt ſafety: But being hindred by the incurſions of the Hunnes all along the Sea-Coaſts from tilling the Earth; the pooreſt amongſt them gaue themſelues to fiſhing, and to make ſalt, or elſe to tranſport their neighbours Merchandize, eſteeming that gaine more honeſt than to till other mens ground; ſome of the richer ſort gaue themſelues to the traffick of forraine Merchandize; others, keeping their houſes applied their wits to beautifie their Citie with new lawes and cuſtomes: and yet neuertheleſſe ſuch was their care of Iuſtice, and right was ſo maintained amongſt them, as in ſo great a multitude of people, no ſtrife could be perceiued.

What the Venetians exercise was in the beginning.

The firſt and cheefeſt thing they gaue themſelues to was the care of Religion, and by ſo much the more, as they perceiued any great danger towards from the enemy. The preſence of certaine Prelates, did augment in them this common affection to godlineſſe, who for feare of the enemie to Chriſtians, had with their Countriemen retired themſelues thither. Their helpe came in good time, not only concerning the Miniſtery of ſacred things, but to retaine this City as yet ignorant, in ancient pietie and Religion, from being infected with the poiſon of the Arrian hereſie, ſeeing that contagion did no leſſe ouer-runne the whole Prouince, than the Armes of the Hunnes. After that, they did contend and debate among themſelues, not on voluptuous matters, but on pietie and continence. Riches and other things whereof men at this day make ſo much account, made no diſtinction amongſt the Citizens for honor, but wiſedome only. They did not regard mens ſumptuous clothing, but their goodneſſe, and to ſuch (without ſeeking for it) did they freely offer their places of honor. In a word, a man would haue imagined that multitude not to haue beene fugitiue Citizens, but Philoſophers at their quiet ſtudie. And becauſe wee would not haue any man thinke, that wee feigne this matter to embelliſh our Storie: any one that hath the leiſure, may reade that which Caſſiodorus of Rauenna hath written concerning the ancient ſtate of the Citie: The poore (ſaith hee) and the rich liue there peaceably together, vnder one ſelfe-ſame equality of lawes, without any difference of dwelling, not knowing what enuie meaneth; and ordering their liues in this manner, they eſchew the moſt common vice in the World. I paſſe ouer the reſt of his long letter, which Bonitendius hath inſerted in his Commentaries. Such was the beginning of the Citie of Venice, and after ſuch a kind of life, and in ſuch exerciſes did ſhe ſpend hir childhood: afterward by hir virtue, it grew, and waxed ſtrong. And becauſe wee haue (as I thinke) amply and ſufficiently declared what hath beene the beginning of this great State, we will ſpeake ſome-what of hir firſt gouernment. For I perceiue that thoſe who haue written the Venetian Hiſtorie, doe likewiſe varie in this. Some of them ſay that the Common-wealth was firſt gouerned vnder the Conſulary dignity, by thoſe who dwelt at Rialto. They doe more-ouer affirme that Galieno Fontano, Simion Glauco, and Antonio Caluo (who were then Conſuls at Padua at ſuch time as the firſt foundations of the Citie were laid at Rialto) were the firſt that in qualitie of Conſuls did gouerne the Citie at hir birth: Some thinke that theſe men were the Authors of the Paduans flight, and that their firſt arriuall was in that place, and likewiſe the firſt buildings. According to others I finde in theſe mens ſteeds, Alberto Phalerio, Thomaſo Candiano, and Paulo el Conte. The third yeare of the Cities foundation, they created new Conſuls for two yeares, Marino Linio, Hugo Fuſco, and Luciano Graulo. They ſay that theſe men were likewiſe created at Padua, and ſent to Rialto: from whence may be eaſily gathered, that the Cities foundation was altogether before the comming of Attila. Marco Aurelio, Andrea Clodio, and Albino Moro, were Conſuls at the third election for the two yeares following. I doe not finde who ſucceeded them.

The Venetians zeale to Religion.

The Arrian ſect ouer-all Italy.

The Venetians great modeſtie.

The firſt gouernment of Venice vnder Conſuls.

But

But it is credible that this forme of Gouernement lasted till Attilas comming: at which time, all Ilands thereabouts being peopled, in stead of Consuls they created Tribunes. All of them in a maner say, that the same hapned a little after Attilas comming, and that about the sixtie yeare of the Cities foundation, the Tribunarie dignitie began in the Ilands, which were already inhabited.

The Creation of Tribunes.

For the Creation of the Tribunes, the businesse was first of all debated (as the maner is) by a fewe; after that, it was concluded in a generall assembly of the Ilanders, that euery Iland should haue a Tribune, the Magistrate to be yearely, hee should doe Iustice to his fellow Citizens, and punish offences with seueritie. But that which concerned the generall State of the Commonwealth, was referred to the generall assembly of the Ilanders to be determined of.

The partes of mans life compared with cities

That which we haue hitherunto said, if it be narrowly obserued, belongs to the Cities originall. We will hereafter begin to speake of her infancie. For diuers Historians greatly delighted in this kind of writing, (in number of whom is Florus) who haue distinguished the increasing of Cities, according to the seuerall parts of mans life, Infancie, Childhood, and Youth. Now the Tribunarie Gouernment which neerely followed the originall thereof, shall be rightly termed Infancie. Wee will then set downe in order what passed within and without the Citie, during the same, after that we haue acquainted the Reader, how that in the time of the Lombards (which was during this Infancie) the Citie receiued a meruailous increase. For it hapned, that the Venetians hauing scarce time to breathe after the Warres of the Hunnes, did perceiue on a sodaine, the Lombards (so called by reason of their long Beards) to be entred into Italy, vnder Albinus their eleuenth King, who at their arriuall, did possesse and subdue all that which had beene shaken; they did forthwith sease vpon all that which the Venetians held in the firme Land: not daring to assaile them at Sea, because they knew their strength to be great, or else it may bee, they deferred to doe it, till a more conuenient time.

The comming of the Lombards into Italy.

From whence the Lombards are descended.

This Nation (as it is reported) came from Scandinauia, an Iland of the Germane Sea, who hauing often a long time before, entetprised on the Prouince of the Romanes which lies about the Riuer of Danubie, vnder Geodich their King, he being dead, they passed into Hungarie vnder Andouinus his successour: then vnder Albinus, thirtie eight yeares after their arriuall in Hungarie, they came furiously into Italy, where their power did so encrease, as they haue commanded there more then two hundred yeares.

The Lombards giue limits to the Venetians.

At the arriuall then of this people, the whole firme Land belonging to the Venetians lost her libertie, with the name of Venice: and the Venetians State which was in the Ilands, was limited from the Cape of Rising (so named at this day) euen to the Marshes of Grada, as witnesseth Paul Deacon, in his Historie of the Lombards. Now seeing we haue begun to speake of the deedes and maners of the Venetians, we will of set purpose omit the residue of this Nations exploites, except so much as may seeme to belong to our Historie.

I will then declare in order all that which these new Ilanders did in common, during this Infancy, before the comming of the Lombards. The most ancient is (as they say) a happie Voyage which they made at Sea, which gaue beginning to their future Marine Dominion. The Histrians and Dalmatians did disquiet the State of this new Citie, by incursions and robberies, so as the Ilanders could keepe nothing safe from them. I know not whether hatred moued them thereunto, enuying to see so great a power as that was likely to be in time, to encrease so neere them, or else whether it were the ancient disposition of that people, to robbe and spoyle at Sea. Some doe beliue that the same was then done at the intreatie of the Tricstines, who more then any other grew very iealous of the prosperitie of this new Citie. Against these, the Venetians with a common consent Armed themselues, and hauing met them in the maine Sea, they brauely defeated them, and by that losse constrained them wholly to abandon the same.

The Venetians first voyage to Sea.

It

It is reported that at this Battell, certaine games were vowed to the honour of the glorious Virgine Marie; but others ſet downe other occaſions of thoſe games, much differing, and more likely to bee true. For they hold that the Countries cuſtome was to betroth their daughters in the Church, carying their dowries thither to bee publikely ſeene. It hapned by chance, that whileſt they celebrated ſuch a ceremonie in S. Peters Church (which ſtands now in that part of the Citie called the Caſtle) the Trieſtines who had already profeſt themſelues their enemies, came in a night from Sea with two Galleyes, and ambuſht themſelues in certaine places neere vnto the Citie. In the morning about ſuch time as they celebrated the ceremonie, they came into the Church, and caried away the Prieſt of the place, with a great number of people and much wealth. Pietro Candiano who then was Duke, thinking it needfull to vſe diligence in ſo deſperate a matter, did forthwith man the Gallyes with numbers of men of all ſortes, and followed the enemies, whom they ouertooke in the Marſhes of Caorli, as they were parting the ſpoyle. They eaſily defeated them, and hauing reskewed the Prelate, Citizens, and their goods, hee entred the ſecond day of Februarie, two dayes after his departure, into the Citie as it were in triumph. But becauſe the feaſt of the Purification of the bleſſed Virgine hapned vpon that day, it is reported that thoſe games were firſt ordeined for the happie ſucceſſe of that voyage. But being brought in for deuotion ſake, they haue beene ſince depraued and corrupted by the diſſoluteneſſe of thoſe who ſucceeded: who enuying one another, haue brought in for the adorning of them, an exceeding aboundance of Gold and precious ſtones.

The ancient cuſtome of marrying their daughters.

The Trieſtines defeated.

The occaſion of the games dedicated to the glorious Virgin.

Now theſe Pirates being driuen from the Sea-coaſts next vnto the Citie, and the Venetian name becomming famous and eſteemed of all their neighbours, ſoone after, the Eunuch Narſes, Lieuetenant to the Emperor Iuſtinian, but a man valiant and carefull arriued; who being come into Italy in the time of the Gothes, to free it from their bondage, was with the conſent of all men ſuccoured by the Venetians. But we are not certaine whether it were with Armour, Victuals, or Ships, which he greatly needed for the paſſage of the great Armie which hee had brought. For ſo ſoone as he had ſent twelue thouſand Lombards (whom he chiefely truſted) before Aquileia, againſt the forces of Totila, who was by the commandement of the Barbarian, camped vpon the bankes of the Riuer Adice, he reſolued to paſſe along the coaſt to Rauenna by the Adriaticke Sea, which hee could not doe without a great number of hired Ships, in regard all thoſe places were either filled from the Mariſhes which ranne into the Sea, or elſe from the mouthes of great Riuers which held the ſame courſe. It is moſt likely, that this iourney which otherwiſe would haue beene moſt hard and painefull for him, was by the Venetians helpe made eaſie; who were men that very wel knew the places, and skilful in Sea-matters. It is to be noted how that Narſes, for the great ſeruices which the Venetians did him in that Warre, did build in that new Citie with the ſpoyles of the enemies, two Churches; one to S. Theodore the Martyr, (which at this day ioynes to S. Markes Churche) and the other to the Saints, Menez and Germinian, which is right ouer againſt it in the Market place.

Narſes comes into Italie.

Wherein the Venetians aided Narſes.

Churches builded by Narſes.

This is that Narſes, who after he had driuen the Gothes foorth of Italy, valiantly ouercome ſo many barbarous Nations, and ſetled peace and quietneſſe in the Prouince: being iuſtly moued with the Letters of the Empreſſe Sophia (who at the ſame time commanded the Eaſterne Empire, by meanes of her husbands baſeneſſe) reproaching him with his former condition, and calling him home in deriſion, to ſpinne and weaue like an effeminate Eunuch, did ſolicite by great promiſes Albinus King of the Lombards, to march from Hungary, to trouble the affaires of Italy. The which he had ſecretly before then, giuen her to vnderſtand who had wronged him, ſaying, That it would come to paſſe, that he, whome to pleaſe his detractors, ſhee thought fit to be ſent home as a woman to carde and ſpinne, would ſhortly ſpinne her ſuch a threed, as neither her proud ſelfe, nor thoſe who had ſo freely ſlaundered him him should be euer able to vntwist. And wee must not wonder (as hath beene already said) that Narses at his comming into Italie, was aided by the Lombards, who at that time had no power in the Prouince: for hee sent for that aide (such as it was) foorth of Hungarie. Wee haue briefly heretofore declared, from whence this Nation is descended, because our purpose was from the beginning, not to straie farre from the affaires of Venice.

The Empreſſe Sophia reprocheth Narſes.

Narſes anſwere to the Empreſſe.

The Church of Grada made Metropolitane by the Pope.

Now in the time of the Lombards: Paul, Bishop of Aquileia transported all the treasure, reliques, and seruice of his Church to Grada, where in times past the Church of S. Euphemia had beene builded. Pope Pelagius at the request of Helie who succeeded Paul, (or according to Probin following the opinion of some) did decree, that in the generall assemblie of all the Prelats, the Church of Grada should be Metropolitan of all the Churches in the Venetian countrie, and of the Citie called Aquileia the new: which some affirme to haue learned, by the most ancient letters pattents of the Cittie.

Strange prodigies.

About the same time did diuers prodigies appeare: Armies of fire coloured with bloud were seene in the aire; The Earth brought forth a meruailous and incredible aboundance of all manner of fruits. There happened besides ouer all the Venetian countries, and almost ouer all Transalpine Gaule, so great a deluge of waters on a sodaine, as the Riuer Adice which runnes through the Citie of Verona, being miraculously swelled, did almost couer the highest toppe of S. Zenos Church which stands neere to the Riuer in the Citie. Where it was obserued for a miracle, that albeit the windowes thereof were open, yet this violent floud did not enter into the Churche, respecting (as it were) that sacred place. Helie caused a Church to bee built in the honour of the glorious Virgin, called at this day, Barbana.

A great miracle at Verona.

The Paduan fugitiues dwell at Embragola.

Then certaine yeares after: Padua being taken and spoiled by the Lombards, the Citie, which daily encreased, was verie much augmented. They gaue the fugitiues that parte of the Citie to dwell in, which is called Embragola, betwixt the common Ouens and the Arcenall. It is reported that they built two Churches, which at this day are to be seene at that place; the one neere to the other; to S. Iohn Baptist, the one: and the other to S. Martin. And because the Venetians should haue no time to rest, Fortunatus of Aquileia, strengthned with the Lombards forces, came and stole away all the treasure and ornaments of the Church of Grada, which at that time was the Metropolitane: To the which, being by this losse destitute of a Pastor, Pope Honorius at the request of the Emperour Heraclius appointed first fruits: and gaue it afterwards great store of golde and siluer, to buy vessels and ornaments for diuine seruice, with the Shrine of St. Marie brought from Alexandria. This Pope being tolde in a dreame, that the bodies of St. Hermagoras and Fortunatus wete buried in a little field belonging to Alexandra of Aquileia a verie deuout woman: hee transported them to Grada, and did shut them vp there verie religiously in a secret place.

The Church of Grada robbed.

Vision in a dreame.

Vderza ruined by the Lombards

Almost the same time, the Citie of Vderzza was destroyed by Lotharius King of the Lombards. Those who fled from thence, came with their Bishop called Magnus, a man of an holie life, and rested in the territorie of the Iesulans, where they built a Citie which they called Heraclea, in honour of Prince Heraclius; but the Moderns haue called it Villanoua. It is at this day almost ruined to the ground. There are to be seene certaine signes of a verie ancient Church, which those first founders of Heraclea doe say was dedicated to Saint Peter. At the same time also, Paul Bishop of Altina, fearing the Armies of the Lombards, and amazed by the spoile of his neighbours, came with his Reliques and Iewels, being accompanied with a great multitude of people, to Tourcelles.

The foundation of Heraclea.

The Episcopall See of Padua, translated to Malamoc.

The Episcopall See of Padua likewise, was by the authoritie of Pope Seuerine translated to Malamoc. Diuers Churches were built neere to Tourcelles by the inhabitants thereof, who were very deuout people: the which Burrough, some write, was called by the inhabitants Constantiaca, by the name of Constantius, sonne to Heraclius; who going to Rome landed there.

But

But the Citie of Heraclea in the meane time being greatly encreaſed by the concourſe of ſo many people, as the place was not ſufficient to contain them; the Shepheards flying from the incurſions of the Barbarians, did driue away a great heard of oxen & mares euen to thoſe ſhoares, who not being able to dwell in Heraclea, they did neere thereunto fortifie a place for themſelues, which they named Equiline of the thinge it ſelfe, as Bonitendius ſaith. I know that ſome thinke Equiline to be the ſame, which is now called Ieſulune, but the Authors whom wee follow, make diuers mention of them both, as of two ſundrie Cities.

The foundation of Equiline.

This is that we can learne concerning the ancient Venetians their originall, and encreaſe of the Citie; which we haue collected with great labour and trauaile. I will now ſet downe how they created the firſt Duke. For although this manner of gouernment haue beene at times interrupted, yet notwithſtanding it is maintained euen till now, as good and holeſome for the Common-wealth.

The Tribunes of the Iſlands abuſing their office, had ſo troubled the State by ciuill diſſenſion, as there was ſome likelyhood, that the bodie of this new Citie would be ſoone diſſolued, vnleſſe a remedie were applied. Luitprand who with title of Duke commaunded the Prouince of the Carnons, (called now thoſe of Forli) perceiuing this diſcorde, and ſuppoſing (as it came to paſſe) that this Venetian State, might through ciuill diuiſion be eaſily ouerthrowne, (the encreaſe whereof he thought would bee ouer-dangerous for him and his neighbours) did reſolue to aſſaile them; I knowe not vpon what ground. It is certaine that at the ſame time the Lombards did verie much trouble their Countrie: whereat the Ilanders grew angrie, hauing found out the cauſe; which was their owne diſſenſion, for which their neighbours contemned them, & wherby it would vndoubtedly ſoon come to paſſe, without ſpeedy remedy, that the Common-wealth would receaue a notable loſſe by this enemie, who did daily ſeeke occaſion to diſquiet the peace of this new Citie. All men thus complaining: the generall aſſemblie of all the Iſlands was publiſhed at Heraclea.

Luitprand Duke of Forleini.

What moued the Venetians to change the gouernment.

The generall aſſemblie held at Heraclea.

Chriſtopher Biſhop of Grada held the cheife place there, being accompanied with great numbers of the Clergie: and there after the celebration of diuine ſeruice, at the firſt propoſition which was made concerning the Common-wealth, euery man beganne to murmure: and ſome ſaid, That there was no more hope to be had of the Venetian Common-wealth, nor yet of their libertie, which had beene purchaſed and maintained by their Anceſtors with ſuch generoſitie, vnleſſe the furie of the Tribunes might haue an end. That their ſelfe-ſame Anceſtors had in times paſt for the ſweetneſſe of libertie, abandoned their moſt pleaſant Countrie, their houſes, and all other matters, which men commonly hold moſt deare, and were come into barraine Iſlands, where they found nothing that might inuite them to dwell there. That if they could haue diſpenſed with their libertie, they might haue remained in all ſafety in the Cities where they were firſt borne and brought vp, and with this loſſe alone, haue liued peaceably vnder the dominion of the Barbarians: But being full of courage, they ſuppoſed that they ought not to looſe their libertie, but with their liues. Wherefore did diuers of thoſe that were there preſent, following the example of their Predeceſſors come into thoſe places the precedent yeares but onely to liue at libertie? To what purpoſe then was their deſignes? what profit by their ſodaine diſlodging? why had they ſo many buildings, Churches, and ſo many publicke and priuate houſes? why did they leaue the firme land to eſchewe bondage, and yet meete it in the middeſt of the waters by the inſolencie of a fevve? Whether it was likely, that this barbarous enemie would take any reſt, till he had found ſome meanes to ruinate this new dvvelling place of Libertie? Seeing that Tyrants hate nothing ſo much, as that name; That vndoubtedly it vvas his wiſhe; that all his deſire vvas to ſee the Venetian State ouerthrovvne by ciuill diſcorde; vvhich he could not by any other meanes ſhake. Whereupon, thoſe vvhich deſired the good and profit of the Common-wealth did reſolue ſodainely to elect a nevve Complaint in the aſſemblie againſt the Tribunes.

Duke

Duke who should represent the whole honour and maiestie of the State, and haue power to assemble the generall Councell, at such time as the important affaires of the Common-wealth should be in question; to choose yearely Tribunes in euery Island, from whence the appeales should come before him: and moreouer if any man had obtained any dignitie, Prelatship, or benefice, by the suffrages of the Clergie, or of the people, hee should not enioy the same without the pleasure of the Duke.

¶ Paulutio of Heraclea, the first Duke of Venice.

THis thus concluded: Paulutio of Heraclea, a man of singular iustice, was by the consent of all men declared Duke; the yeare (according to some) of the Cities foundation 282. or as others write, 297. and yet as some others affirme 276. They all agree, that the Tribunarie power did gouerne more, than two hundred and thirtie yeares.

What forme they obserued at the first Dukes election.

But in this first Dukes election, they did not keepe this manner of choosing, as wee see to bee at this day obserued in the creation of Princes, but they then proceeded therein more simply. For, ambition being not as yet crept into so religious a Citie; no bribing for honors; they had not in those elections respect to wealth, nobilitie, and other such like matters, but onely to the vertue of the person: by which meanes they obtained it, and not by cunning. But although vertue and wisedome was respected aboue any thing, yet neuertheless, because men beleeue that wee can be neuer sure enough of that which is deerest vnto vs, it is reported, that the new Duke was constrained to sweare, well and faithfully to prouide for whatsoeuer should be fit for the honour of the Common-wealth and the Venetian name.

The Duke takes his oath.

After he had taken his oath, this new Magistrate was honoured with diuers noble ensignes, whereby that soueraigne dignitie was made more illustrious: and yet for all that I will not affirme, that all the magnificence which at this day the Prince enioyeth was giuen him at the same time: for it is certaine that part of them was giuen him a long time after, and taken from else-where.

A league made with Luitprand.

Now so soone as this new Duke was fully installed, hee determined to free the Common-wealth from this warre. And the better to effect it, hee entred league with Luitprand. (some say he ouercame him in fight) He extended the limits of Heraclea from the Riuer of Piauo, vnto the little streame called Piauicolle. By his authoritie rather then by force, he brought the Equilines vnder his dominion, (some name the Iesulans for the Equilines, which makes me to beleeue their opinion in some ſome ſort to bee true who thinke Equiline and Ieſulan to be one ſelfe-ſame place, though different in name) who at the ſame time had forſaken the Venetians. Thoſe of Tourcelles in the meane ſpace builded a ſumptuous Temple to the glorious Virgin, where they placed the bodie of Saint Heliodore of Altina with diuers other Reliques.

¶ MARCELLO of Heraclea, the ſecond Duke of Venice.

THeſe things effected, Paulutio dyed, after hee had reigned twenty yeares and ſix moneths. Marcello of Heraclea was by the common voyce choſen in his ſted. Wee doe not finde in all the time of his gouernment, which laſted nine yeares, any memorable matter to haue hapned. Which in my opinion cauſed diuers Hiſtorians to leaue him out in the Catalogue of the Dukes, naming Horteo Hipates, ſurnamed Vrſus, next after Paulutio. Howſoeuer, they ſay that he was a vertuous man, wiſe, and reaſonably well inclined to Armes, though his hap was to dye, after he had gotten more reputation by peace, than by warre.

¶ HORTEO called VRSVS, the third Duke of Venice.

Orteo, whom we ſay was ſurnamed Vrſus, ſucceeded Marcello. The Lombards at the ſame time tooke Rauenna a verie ancient Citie. The Exarch who commanded therein fled for ſuccour to the Venetians. Pope Gregorie did likewiſe by letters entreate them to aide the Exarch againſt thoſe inſolent Barbarians. The Venetians, much affecting the Pope, willingly graunted thereunto, and comming before Rauenna with a mightie Armie, did forthwith take it, and being taken gaue it to the Exarch. It is reported that the name of this newe Magiſtrate was inſtituted at the ſame time by one named Longinus, whom the Emperour Iuſtinian ſent into Italie in Narſes ſted, to commaund with ſoueraine authoritie. Prodeus of Vincenza, a valiant man and of great reputation among the Garriſon of the Citie, died in that warre. Paulus Diaconus in his Hiſtorie of the Lombards ſets downe this exploit, & ſo doth Bonitendius the Secretarie, who hath inſerted in his Commentaries the Copie of the Popes letters written to the Venetians to the ſame purpoſe.

The taking of Rauenna by the Venetians.
The creation of Exarch.

The Venetians in the meane time were in tumult round about Grada, becauſe Calixtus Biſhop of Aquileia, diſdaining (as it is thought) that the new Church of Grada ſhould preceed his which was verie ancient, ouer-ranne the bounds of Grada. But the Pope commanding to deſiſt, the matter was forthwith ended.

The troubles round about Grada.

There aroſe after that, great diſſenſion, which in a manner produced a ciuill warre, greatly diſquieting the State neere to Heraclea. It is ſaid, that the Dukes inſolency was the certaine cauſe of this commotion. For the Ieſulans not being able anie longer to endure his preſumptuous pride, armed themſelues and ioyned battaile. This proude Duke marched againſt them, meaning to bring them to reaſonable tearmes, and they fought on either ſide with more fierceneſſe and hatred, than force. At the laſt after diuers loſſes on either parte, the Heracleans being wearie of the warres, did on a ſodaine turne all their hatred towards the enemies vpon the Duke, as one whom they knew to be the author of all thoſe miſeries: who was vilanouſly murthered by his owne Cittizens, about the latter end of the eleuenth yeare of his Magiſtracie.

The Duke murthered by his owne Citizens.

The Heracleans being amazed at the newes of the Dukes death, remooued their dwelling ſoone after (as it is thought) to Malamoc; no man knowes whether it were becauſe they hated thoſe places for the murther committed on the Duks perſon, or elſe for that the ſame place was too neere the firme Land, and by that meanes more ſubiect to the ordinarie incurſions of the enemies. Some affirme it hapned by reaſon of the warre which aroſe betwixt the Heracleans and the Equilins. Thoſe which are more curious alleadge cauſes wholly different from theſe, and denie that theſe places were thus abandoned by and by after the murther. And to ſpeake truly, this firſt cauſe ſeemes too friuolous to make ſo populous a Citie at an inſtant to change her dwelling. The troth is, that long after the Dukes murther, during the principalitie of Mauritio and Giouanni his ſonne, Heraclea and Equiline were abandoned, as ſhall be hereafter declared in his place.

Difference ariſing about the creation of a new Duke.

I will now returne to that wherein the Authors agree among themſelues. For Vrſus being ſlaine, in regard the Iſlanders could not agree about the creation of a new Duke, and that the Electors voyces did greatly varie, which was neuer ſeene before then, they concluded to chooſe no Duke in ſixe yvares following, but to eſtabliſh ſome new Magiſtrate, that ſhould haue the whole power and authoritie, whoſe place ſhould be but for a yeare. Thus it came to paſſe that the fortieth yeare or thereabouts, from the creation of the firſt Duke of the Common-wealth, they inuented a new manner of gouernment.

The maſter or Colonell of the men at Armes Dominico Leon the firſt.
Felix Cornicula the ſecond.
Theodato the third.
Iuliano Cepari the fourth.

This new Magiſtrate ſet vp in the Dukes place, was called the Maſter or Colonell of the men at Armes. The firſt that was appointed to this office by the common conſent, was Dominico Leon. Felix Cornicula ſucceeded him, who (as ſome ſay) was choſen at Malamoc. Next followed Theodato ſonne to Duke Vrſus, lately called from exile, who by the conſent of euery one, continued the yeare following, but he died before his time was expired to the great griefe of all men. Iuliano Cepari (or according to others) Hippati ſucceeded him. Some Authors ſay, that the Venetians in this mans time tooke Rauenna from the Barbarians. Fabritio Ciani, (ſome ſet downe Giouanni for Ciani) enioyed the fifth yeares gouernment, who before the yeares end, was depoſed from his office, and had his eyes thruſt out by the people.

before

Some haue written, that this yeare the Heraclians and Ieſulans fought one againſt the other with great furie, and that the place of battaile was for a perpetuall memorie called Parco de Canale. Both of them at the laſt being defeated, the Heracleans, Ieſulans, and Equilins ſought out new dwellings. But wee will ſet downe in the booke following, vpon what occaſion the inhabitants departed thence.

* * *

The end of the firſt Booke of the firſt Decade.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE FIRST DECAD OF THE HISTORIE Of Venice.

¶ The Contents of the second Booke of the first Decad.

THE gouernment of Duke restored to the Citie. Duke THEODATO being blinde was banished. The Principalitie of Galla his successor had the like end. Duke MAVRITIO by a new example tooke GIOVANNI his sonne for companion, in the gouernment. From whence the strife proceeded betwixt MAVRITIO and PORTVNATO Bishop of Grada. Diuers opinions of the warre of the French against the Venetians, vnder the conduct of PEPIN. A briefe description of the Cities situation. PEPIN takes all from the Venetians except Rialto. PEPIN, defeated at Sea by the Venetians betwixt the Citie and Malamoc. The Romans compared with the Venetians, in both their exploits against the French: The end of the Venetians warre against PEPIN their full libertie. Heraclea repaired by Duke PARTITIATIO. Description of the Duks Pallace, and of the place where the Senate is assembled. The building of diuers Churches in the Citie. For what cause the Plaies were ordained, which are made at Shrouetide in the great Court of the Pallace. From whence the Sarracens are descended. How St. MARKS bodie, being stolen out of Egypt, was brought to Venice.

¶ THEODATO, the fourth Duke of Venice.

THE fifth yeare of the creation of the Master or Colonell of the men at Armes was not yet fully expired, when the whole Citie, possessed with a meruailous desire to haue a Duke (as though the Commonwealth could not stand without such a Magistrate,) Theodato, sonne to Vrsus, was on the sodaine, by the mutuall consent ſent of the aſſemblie held at Malamoc, declared Duke of the Common-wealth. This man obtained of Aſtolpho King of Lombardie, that the bounds of Heraclea ſhould ſtand for the Venetians in the ſame termes as they did of old, euen to the Riuer of Piauo. Beſides, there was an Hauen diſtant three miles from Chioggia; neere vnto the entrie whereof ſtood a Caſtle, ſtronger by arte then by nature, which the inhabitants thereof called Brundulla. Nothing is now to be ſeene there, but the ruines of a Tower; all the reſt is razed to the ground. Theodato going thither to fortifie it, was ſurpriſed by Galla his enemie, the thirteenth yeare of his gouernment, and hauing his eyes put out by his diſloyall aduerſarie, was miſerably depoſed by him from his dignitie; the which he hauing purchaſed by ſo wicked a deed did enioy at his returne to Malamoc.

The gouernment of Duke restored.

A cruell and vnworthie acte.

¶ GALLA, the fifth Duke of Venice.

DIuers doe affirme that Theodato was ſuſpected to haue affected tyrannie by the new fortification of this Caſtle: and that by Gallas meanes the people made him blind. But Galla being verie diſſolute, poſſeſſed with all manner of vices, abuſing his ill-gotten Principalitie, did iuſtly receiue his deſerued rewarde. For after that his eyes were likewiſe put out, hee was baniſhed almoſt in the beginning of the ſecond yeare of his gouernment.

A puniſhment of God.

¶ Monegario

¶ MONEGARIO, the ſixth Duke of Venice.

Dominico Monegario was forthwith appointed in his place, vnto whom in regard of his violent and furious nature, were yearely Tribunes aſſigned, to aſſiſt him in the gouernment: For they feared that the Common-wealth might receiue ſome great hurt by his raſheneſſe, if there were not ſome in the Councell to counterpoiſe the violence of his Spirit. But this was to ſmall purpoſe. For in ſteed of a bridle and ſtay, it proued a ſpurre to his depraued humour; cauſing him to thunder forth all manner of miſchieſes. The people then being impatient at his new tyrannie, after they had depriued him of his ſight, turned him out of all authoritie, the fifth yeare after his election. Mauritio of Heraclea, a wiſe man, and of vertuous life, ſucceeded Monegario.

Monegario his miſerable end.

¶ MAVRITIO of Heraclea, the ſeuenth Duke of Venice.

This

THis man hauing well and happily gouerned the Common-wealth for a certaine time, and thereby purchaſed the loue and good will of the people, did obtaine in another aſſemblie (that which no man euer till then had done) libertie to aſſociate his ſonne Giouanni, as Colleague with him in the Principalitie. Some affirme that in theſe mens dayes thoſe of Heraclea and Equiline retired themſelues to Malamoc: and that the cauſe of their retreit proceeded from the ſecret hatred of the Dukes againſt Fortunato Biſhop of Grada, about the gouernment of the Common-wealth. This Fortunato had with diuers others conſpired againſt them; but their deſſeignes being diſcouered, he with his complices, for feare of being apprehended, fled for ſafetie to the Emperour Charles: where hauing accuſed the Venetians, for that contrarie to the agreement ſworne betwixt him and Nicephorus, who commaunded the Eaſterne Empire, deſpiſing the Eſtate of the Roman Empire, they had ſhewed themſelues affectionate to that of Conſtantinople: ſeeing that agreement did expreſly import that the Venetians ſhould be free, acknowledging neither of the Empires; This did in ſuch ſort moue Charles, as in the end he did by letters commaund his ſonne Pepin, who gouerned the affaires of Italie, to make furious warres vpon the Venetians. Vpon this commaund Pepin forthwith came and aſſailed the Venetian coaſt next to the firme-land, where Heraclea and Equiline ſtood. The inhabitants of thoſe places frighted at the firſt alarme of this warre, and diſtruſting the ſufficiencie of their walles, nothing ſtrong either by arte or nature, fled away in great troopes and retired themſelues to Malamoc, and to Rialto.

The firſt aſſociation into the Principalitie.

Conſpiracie againſt the Duke.

But it ſeemeth that the Authors doe greatly differ concerning the deſtruction of Heraclea, and the troubles of thoſe times. Bonitendius diſpoſeth the affaires of thoſe dayes in ſuch ſort, as hee ſaith, that Prince Mauritio (in whoſe time Charles King of France had wholly aboliſhed in Italie the power and ancient Kingdome of the Lombards, enemies to the Pope, by reaſon whereof he was made Emperour) the affaires of the Venetians not being verie ſafe, neither at home nor abroad, amiddeſt thoſe tumultes of Italie, had drawne in to the gouernment of the Common-wealth, by hauing wiſely appeaſed the quarrels of the Citizens, and brauely defended their frontiers, (rather by ſufferance then approbation of the people,) a new and pernicious example, in taking Giouanni his ſonne for Colleague in the Principalitie, which fell out vnhappily; not for himſelfe who was old, and dyed ſoone after; but for his ſonne which ſuruiued him, and his ſonnes ſonne, aſſociated by his father, after the Grand-ſires example.

What Bonitendius ſaith concerning the aſſociation.

¶ GIOVANNI, the eighth Duke of Venice.

BEcauſe, in the gouernment, Giouanni did not follow his fathers ſteps: and that beſides his other miſchiefes committed in his place, hee ſent Mauritio his ſonne with a mightie Sea-armie to aſſaile Giouanni Biſhop of Grada, a vertuous man in thoſe dayes: He, nor yet the reſt, doe not ſet downe the occaſion of this warre. And it is to bee ſuppoſed that they did expreſly conceale it, becauſe there was none at all. For it comes often to paſſe, that when a wicked man will hurt any one, hee neuer regardes the occaſion why. This naughtie ſonne hauing obeyed the commaundment of his bad father, and taken this Biſhop, threwe him head-long downe from an high Tower.

The cruell death of the Biſhop of Grada.

Fortunato the Trieſtine, who ſoone after ſucceeded him, reſoluing to reuenge the vnworthie death of Giouanni, did ſecretly practiſe with certaine chiefe men of the Citie, to depoſe yong Mauritio, and his father likewiſe, from the Principalitie, who without occaſion at all, had committed ſo cruell a murther. But the enterpriſe beeing diſcouered, hee with certaine of his adherents withdrew himſelfe to Treuiſo, among whom were Demetrio Marmani, Foſcaro de Georges, and Obellerio of Malamoc: who at that time were Tribunes.

Conſpiracie againſt the Duke diſcouered.

Fortunato departed from Treuiſo, and went into France to the Emperour Charles: at whoſe ſuite (ſaith Bonitendius) the Emperour commaunded his ſonne Pepin, (who by Pope Adrian was named King of Italie) to make warre vpon the Venetians: and that in the meane time, in hatred of the murtherer Mauritio, and his father, it hapned that Obellerio of Malamoc, who (as hath beene ſaid) did follow the Biſhop Fortunato to Treuiſo, being declared Duke, both the father and ſonne, were driuen forth of the Citie; the one being oppreſſed with olde age, went to Mantua, and the other into France: by meanes whereof, Heraclea, as the place of their birth, was wholly with the places adiacent deſtroyed. Some ſay that Iohn was ſent by the firſt Mauritio to aſſaile Grada, to reuenge the death of Biſhop Giouanni ſlaine in that place; in which charge not bearing himſelfe faithfully, It is ſuppoſed that Fortunato was diſpleaſed with him: Neither is it certainly knowne how long theſe three commanded one after another. Yet Bonitendius ſets it briefly downe thus; That the firſt Mauritio gouerned three and twenty yeares, accounting nine, wherein his ſonne was his Colleague, who after that, commaunded as long alone and after hee had aſſociated the young Mauritio, they were both expulſed the ſeuenth yeare of their aſſociation. Some hold that in the time of the firſt Mauritio, the Church of Oliuolla (called afterwards the quarter of the Caſtle) was by Pope Adrian erected into an Epiſcopall See: the Iſlands of Rialto, Lupria, and Dorſſe-dura, which were called twinnes, being vnder the iuridiction thereof. Some doe beſides ſet downe, that at the ſame time, the Scopares an ancient Family as then in Venice builded the Church of Saint Moſes of an excellent ſtructure, according to the Cities abilitie in thoſe dayes, and enriched it with goodly preſents: And moreouer, that Saint Michaels Church, which at this day hath many markes of antiquitie, neere to Brundula, was repaired and enriched by a ſtranger named Sergius, who hauing a long time beene ſicke of an incurable diſeaſe, was in the night time diuinely warned in a dreame, that if he did viſit a Church which was neere to Brundula, he ſhould be healed of his ſickneſſe. And becauſe it came to paſſe according to the prediction, he did ſumptuouſly repaire the ſame Church, and beſtowed on it many rich preſents.

The Duke and his ſonne expeld the Citie.

¶ Obellerio

¶ OBELLERIO, the ninth Duke of Venice.

LEt vs returne to Obellerio, who in his abſence being created Duke (as hath beene ſaid) comming to Malamoc, hauing for a time commanded with the peoples great good liking, did aſſociate his brother Beato for Colleague. This man went to Conſtantinople to the Emperour Nicephorus, where he was nobly entertained, and honored with certaine markes of the Empire. In the meane time, Valentin his younger brother was by the people giuen to Obellerio for his Colleague. But we finde the Hiſtorians ſo much to varie concerning the occurrents of theſe times, as wee can hardly iudge which of them beſt deſerues to be followed.

There be others which ſay, that Obellerio beeing expulſed by his brother Beato, had recourſe to the Emperour Charles, whoſe daughter he married, promiſing to the King to betray his countrie, and that the French being fedde with this hope, did ſodainely marche againſt the Venetians; that hauing in a moment ſeiſed on all the Sea-frontiers he came to Malamoc, which he found not inhabited, from whence he ſought to paſſe ouer to Rialto by boate, whither hee had heard the Prince and people were retired, but being there beaten by a furious tempeſt he loſt the greateſt part of his Armie, and was enforced to retire without doing any thing worthie of note. Touching this and the reſt which may eaſily be refuted, all of them almoſt doe affirme that Charles was not the chiefe leader of this enterpriſe, but his ſonne Pepin. And the eaſier to vnderſtand how it hapned, we muſt ſearch the matter from farre, to the end we doe not too much ſtraie from the Venetians. From thence we will continue our hiſtorie, where it behoues vs lightly to paſſe ouer that which diuers haue left in writing in a long and prolix ſtile more than needed.

Who led the French Army againſt the Venetians.

The Lombards Kingdome being extinct (as wee haue ſaid) and the affaires of Italie ſetled by Charles, or Pepin his ſonne, who was afterward, inſtalled King: & the Venetians being in the meane time freed by the agreement betwixt Charles and Nicephorus; there hapned ſtrife betwixt the two Empires about Dalmatia. It is reported that by the ſame agreement (whereof we now ſpake) it was expreſly mentioned, that Dalmatia ſhould be a Prouince of the Grecian Empire. The Romans not well digeſting that ſuch a maritime Prouince ſo neere Italie, ſhould be cut off from their Empire, after they had a long time debated thereon, both ſides prepared for warre. But ſoone after, truce being agreed on betwixt Nicetes, who commaunded in that Prouince for the Greeke Emperour; and Pepin: this Gouernour nour returned with his Sea-armie to Coſtantinople, and comming backe in time with the ſame Armie into Dalmatia refreſhing himſelfe in the ſame Prouince, hee reſolued to aſſaile the townes on the Sea coaſt (for the truce was already expired) which did obey Pepin. So ſoone as Pepin had notice of theſe preparations, he aſſembled all his French and Italian forces and tooke Comada, rounded on euery ſide with the Sea and Lakes in forme of an Iſland: for this place was very commodious to bridle the enemies attempts. Nicetes comming thither ſoone after, was with great loſſe of his people brauely repulſed. In this encounter diuers Venetians were ſlaine and hurt. But it is not knowne whether this Venetian ſuccour which accompanied the Grecian, were ſent by the generall conſent, or whether the Grecian did hire them. Nicetes being diſapointed of his purpoſe came to Venice. They ſay that after his arriuall, Obellerio and his brother who then gouerned the Common-wealth ſought to make an agreement betwixt Pepin and Nicephorus.

Pepin King of Italie.

The cauſe of the warre betwixt the two Empires.

The French take Commada.
The Greeke defeated before Commada.

The Venetians power was alreadie ſo encreaſed, as the two mightieſt Empires of the Earth, did looke vpon them as on a rocke expoſed to the ſundrie billowes of the Sea. Some in thoſe dayes did thinke that Obellerio during the treaty of peace, did practiſe ſome treaſon againſt Pepin, (as witneſſeth Paulus Diaconus in his Hiſtorie of the Lombards) by meanes whereof Nicetes and Pepin departed malecontent from Venice, ſo as the French ſoon after aſſailed the Venetians. Al thoſe in a manner who haue written the Venetian Hiſtorie, doe impute the cauſe of this warre to Obellerio, who being driuen thence by his brother, that was allyed to France by marriage, and had married the daughter of Charles (as ſome ſay) did ſollicite the Emperour, or (according to the opinion the credibleſt Authors) Pepin, to take away the libertie of the Venetians. Blondus who hath written more of the Hiſtorie then any of the Modernes, ſaith that he is of opinion according to Godfrey of Viterbo, that Pepin made warre twice vpon the Venetians, (the firſt, when Heraclea was ruinated, of which exploit wee haue heretofore ſpoken) and how that at this firſt time the Venetians were ouercome, and then reſtored to libertie, vpon condition that they ſhould neuer more haue intelligence with the Greeke Emperour. The which, they not obſeruing, but vnder-hand practiſing the friend-ſhip of Nicephorus, by the meanes of certaine Marchants trafficking toward the Propontide on the coaſte of the Ponticke Sea: Pepin was aduertiſed hereof, which cauſed him forthwith to come & aſſaile them once againe with the greateſt forces hee could gather together, as ſhall bee hereafter declared, with the iſſue thereof. But we muſt firſt of all refute Blondus, who ſeemeth in ſome ſort to contradict himſelfe when he ſaith, that they yeelded themſelues at ſuch time time as Heraclea was deſtroyed. If it were ſo, this had not hapned in the time of Obellerio and his brother, but in that time of Giouanni and Mauritio the younger, ſeeing that himſelfe affirmes in another place, that Heraclea was razed in their time.

Obellerio practiſeth treaſon againſt Pepin.

The opinion of Blondus concerning the warre French againſt the Venetians.

Now becauſe all thoſe which haue written the Venetian Hiſtorie doe ſtedfaſtly denie that the Citie was euer in ſubiection; the matter could not thus haue come to paſſe, that through the Patriarch Fortunato his report made to Charles, That the Venetians, contrarie to the agreement ſworne betwixt him and Nicephorus, whereby they were declared neuters, ſhould haue practiſed by their Agents the friendſhip of Nicephorus: Pepin was commaunded by his father to aſſaile them with all his forces: and becauſe he had deſtroyed Heraclea and Equiline, and thereby greatly weakened their whole power, the common report was that the Venetians with their Duke were ſubiected. But it is certaine that the Venetians did euer retaine their ancient libertie, and that they were freed from that warre, on condition wholly to forſake the friendſhip of Nicephorus.

Why the French did aſſaile the Venetians.

The Venetians haue alwaies kept their ancient libertie.

Some ſtrife ariſing ſoone after betwixt the two Empires concerning Dalmatia, the Venetians hauing openly taken Nicephorus part (for it is reported that they ſuccoured his Lieutenant Nicetes by Sea and Land) Pepin being then incenſed againſt the Venetians, came and aſſailed them with greater forces than before.

All

All Authors moreouer doe agree, that at ſuch time as the French made warre vpon them, Obellerio and his brother Beato were by a ciuill or domeſticke broile driuen forth of the Citie, and had retired themſelues to the enemie, whilſt Valentin their yonger brother commanded within the towne. And the better to vnderſtand the ſtate of this fearefull warre, we will in breife ſpeake ſomewhat of the ſcituation of the Citie, beſide that which hath beene ſaid in the precedent booke.

Diſcription of the ſcituation of the Citie of Venice.

The Citie of Venice is (as hath beene ſaid elſewhere,) ſcituate vpon Iſlands verie neere to one another, which the continuall ebbing of the Sea, doth ſeuer in a manner by equall ſpaces, and yet in ſuch manner, as her ſhoares on the South-ſide betwixt the Sea & the Lakes, are diuided by the ſpace of fortie thouſand paces into ten waterie channels: and all thoſe ſhoares cut out after the manner of Iſlands, were at that time wholly inhabited. The firſt of them all on the South-ſide, were the Brondolians: after them, came the Chioggians, Peleſtrians, Albiolans, thoſe of Malamoc, and of the Caſtle, where at this day is the Patriarkes ſeat. Thoſe within beeing farther off from the Sea, dwelt in the middeſt of the lakes; the cheife of whom were thoſe of Rialto, who haue in our time by the great concourſe of people, and by their owne fame, obſcured all the reſt. Pepin hauing oppoſed his Sea-armie againſt that ſide to ſtoppe the incurſions of the enemie, and thereby to take from him all hope of hauing victuals, did with his forces that he had on land, aſſaile the neereſt Iſlands to the firme land; and hauing in part driuen awaie, and partly ſubiected the Brondolians, Chioggians, and Peleſtrians, he marched againſt the Albiolans.

The retreate of Valentin, and all the Venetians to Rialto.

This ſiege hauing contrarie to all mens hopes ſtaied him there ſometime, gaue Duke Valentin and thoſe of Malamoc leiſure to retire themſelues to Rialto with their wiues and children, and whatſoeuer ſuch a like feare would ſuffer them to carrie awaie: not only tranſporting their particular wealth, but ſoueraine Magiſtrate, and the whole maieſtie of their common wealth, where it hath euer ſince then, made hir aboade, with greater felicitie and encreaſe of all things. But this place inuites vs to ſpeake ſome-what of the antiquitie of Malamoc. All thoſe (in a manner) who haue written the Venetian Hiſtorie, do affirme that this Malamoc which is ſeene at this daie, (on the left hand) going to the Citie from Chioggia, neere to the Port bearing the ſame name, is not that ancient one which the firſt Venetians did build, and from whence wee haue ſaid that the inhabitants retired themſelues to Rialto for feare of the French; but that the ruines of this ancient one are to be ſeene in the middeſt of the Sea. Whereby may be coniectured, how much ground the Sea hath deuoured ſince that time. I dare moreouer affirme, that that place was in the beginning called Medoac, and ſince by the Modernes named Malamoc, by corruption of the language like vnto diuers others.

The auncient Malamoc ruinated.

The Albiolans yeeld.

The Albiolans amazed at the Dukes flight, and thoſe of Malamoc, fell forthwith to compoſition; the like did thoſe few people which remained in Malamoc. Theſe being receiued by compoſition; ſo ſoone as the victorious French man came to the Port of Albiola which at this day is right ouer againſt new Malamoc, and had perceiued (for he did ſee nothing but Sea on the one ſide, and lakes on the other) that he muſt either change his purpoſe, or his manner of warre: it is ſaid that he ſate a certaine time verie melancholie vpon the ſhoare, with his face turned towards the enemie, as though hee were deuiſing ſome meanes to giue end to that warre; and that at laſt, through the counſell of an old woman (which is not credible) he made a bridge ouer the water, for his ſoldiers paſſage ouer to Rialto. But concerning the counſell of a ſimple olde woman, it is wholly ridiculous; as, if an old doting Crone had knowne better what did belong to a deed of ſo great importance, than ſo manie thouſands of men which followed the French: ſeeing that diuers Italians moſt expert in marine matters, and capable of greater things, were then with him. But admit that all thoſe which were with him were ignorant of that meanes: thoſe of Malamoc which were taken priſoners could eaſily haue executed ſuch an enterpriſe.

For

For it is not credible (though ſome ſay it) that there were none in that place, which was in time paſt ſo populous, but one poore old woman.

There be that haue likewiſe affirmed, that they laboured firſt to ouercome them by famine, but that the beſieged hauing with certaine warre-like engins throwne loaues of bread into the enemies camp, the hautie French impatient of more delay, did forthwith ioine and make faſt together diuers hogſheads or tuns, head to head, and couering them with boards, made a verie long bridge. Whereupon the Venetians perceiuing it did behooue them to fight, for their libertie, their Churches, and for their owne liues, and their childrens, and for want of ſo doing to vndergoe the yoke of the proud enemie, reſolued to fight couragiouſly, intending either to die fighting, or to preſerue their libertie, & to hazard their laſt fortune by that maner of fight, wherein they were moſt exerciſed. Hauing then imbarked themſelues in ſmall light boats apt for fight and ſaile, the winde and tide ſeruing them; after they had tarried for the ebbe, they came furiouſly vpon the enemie, who alreadie approched. There began on a ſodaine a bloudie battaile betwixt them, ſuſtained neuertheleſſe by verie different courages: For the French fought, incited with a deſire to ſpoile, and to maintaine their former honour; But the Venetians, for their wiues, and children, for their publike and particular wealth, and for their libertie, which they held deerer then all the reſt. And becauſe the bridge was weakely built, and continually ſhaken by the waues of the ſea, the enemie being accuſtomed to firme footing, began forthwith to ſtagger. The Venetians on the contrarie, truſting to the lightneſſe of their veſſels, couragiouſly aſſailed them behinde, and in flanke. The bridge at the laſt being broken by force, (which ſome thinke hapned by the violence of a tempeſt, which aroſe at the beginning of the fight) there was in a moment a great ſlaughter of the french: the ſword on the one ſide, and the Sea on the other, preſenting death vnto them. The multitude of ſuch as were then ſlaine and drowned, gaue the firſt ground, why that place, by the which men turne from Malamoc to the Rialto, was, for that notable victorie, called afterward Orphano.

The Venetians pollicie.

The Venetians reſolution.

Different intents of the combatants.

The French vanquiſhed by the Venetians.

We haue heard, how the Venetians fought with good ſucceſſe againſt Pepin the ſonne of Charles. We may then, vpon a iuſt ground in ſome things compare the Venetians Common-wealth with that of the Romans, as we will often hereafter doe. For diuers things are to be found, as well in the proſperitie as aduerſitie of both the Common-wealths, much like the one to the other. It is certaine that the proſperous beginnings and encreaſe of both theſe people, were wholly almoſt extinct by the Barbarians: albeit the Venetians Common-welth was in ſome ſort more new in the time of her firſt troubles, than was that of the Romans in the time of the Senonians warre. Yet notwithſtanding each of them had the French for their enemies. The Romans were aſſailed by the Senonians, a Nation altogether vnknown before the taking of the Citie; Theſe by the Belgians, no leſſe couragious, but more mightie then the Senonians: becauſe they were, beſides the forces of the Empire, aided by the ſuccors of Italie. The Roman ſtate had incenſed the enemie, becauſe one of her Ambaſſadours had contrarie to the law of Nations iniured a French man; The Venetian, becauſe, in contempt of the agreement made betwixt Charles and Nicephorus, it had fauoured one of the parties. The Senonians were maſters of all, ſauing the Capitol. The Belgians left the Venetians nothing but Rialto. And both the one and other deceiued the enemie by caſting loaues of bread. Theſe men defended the Sea bankes; and the other a little hill. Each of them haue valiantly repulſed the French, puffed vp with the pride of his victories and happie ſucceſſe. But the firſt did it voluntarily; and this by conſtraint. But the Roman therein deſerued high glorie: in that all her enemies were ſlaine, And the Venetians, in that they defeated ſo mightie a king, aſſiſted aſwell with his owne forces, as with thoſe of his Father and the Empire. The preſeruing of the Capitoll was cauſe of the encreaſe of the Citie, and of the perpetuall eſtabliſhment of the Empire. That of Rialto gaue not only occaſion of the Cities encreaſe, but of eſtabliſhing the Princes reſidence in a more eminent and magnificent place, than either Heraclea or Malamoc.

The Venetians compared with the Romans.

Thus farre extended the Cities infancie. Now followes her youth: during which the Venetians, after they had confirmed their forces, did mightily enlarge the limits of their estate.

Pepin retires to the firme land.

But we will returne to Pepin, who amazed (as they say) at such a losse, did forthwith raise the siege. And after the French had spoyled all the places they went through, he brought backe his Armie. Some say, that Obellerio, and his brother, being authors of so many mischiefes, did willingly banish themselues, and followed the enemie. Others, who make the Emperour Charles the authour of this warre, and not Pepin, doe affirme, that the French after this losse made peace with the Venetian, and came to Rialto; where being honourably entertained, he intreated the people to receiue Obellerio into the Countrie: which the Venetians hauing vnwillingly graunted (as the euent witnessed) so soone as Charles was gone, Obellerio was cut in peeces by the people: and his bowels being rent forth of his body, were torne in peeces by some of the multitudes teeth; his wife likewise, who was reported to bee of the royall bloud of France, was slaine with him. But neither was Charles the leader of this Armie, nor did this happen which they report. And the common consent of the credibleſt Historians, makes me to beleeue, that it was Pepin which made warre on the Venetians. But whether it were the one or the other, it is certaine that the Venetians did wholly preserue their libertie, and became open friends to either Empire.

SOme report, that Obellerio being slaine, his brother Beato held the Principalitie; and others say, that Obellerio and Beato being expelled, Valentin their yonger brother commanded in the Citie. But howsoeuer it was (for it is hard to iudge the right in such diuersitie of opinions) it is certaine that the Gouernement of these three, lasted not aboue fiue yeares. Angelo Partitiatio succeeded these three, who was the first that held his seate at Rialto. They gaue him two yearely Tribunes to assist him in all thinges. Some say he had the surname of Badoairio, from whom the Badoairians are descended. The most curious Historians haue numbred the Partitiatij, among the noblest families which came from Heraclea to Rialto. And that which makes me easily eaſily to beleeue it is; becauſe among the moſt memorable matters acted in his Gouernment, we find the reparation of Heraclea, which by reaſon thereof was afterward called Villa-noua. And becauſe that in the time of the warre with the French, a great number of people ranne to Rialto, ſoas the place was filled with an incredible multitude of inhabitants; it came to paſſe, that threeſcore ſmall Ilands next to themwere ioyned together by Bridges. But all men did thinke this place, for the great multitude of people, and for the commodiouſneſſe thereof, worthie, that the Soueraigne Magiſtrate, and the whole State of the Commonwealth ſhould reſide there. And with a good and happie preſage for the Duke and the whole Venetian State, it was decreed, That Rialto ſhould euer after bee the Princes ſeate. According to this concluſion; to the end that the Soueraigne Magiſtrate ſhould not want a houſe; the Duke himſelfe did forthwith appoint a place, whereon to build the Dukes Pallace, which ſtands (as we ſee at this daie) neere to the goodly Church of S^t. Marke. But we may truly ſay, that it is only the olde Pallace, which Partitiatio did edifie. For the other neighbour-buildings confronting the Senate-houſe doe repreſent a newer architecture. For it is nor likelie, that in thoſe daies they could tell from whence to haue gotten ſo manie coſtlie pillars, and excellent ſtones? their meanes being then verie ſmall. But whether it were in Partitiatios time, or ſince (as it is moſt credible by the report almoſt of all Annaliſts) that this worke was built: the excellencie and greatneſſe thereof doth deſerue, that ſuch a thing ſhould not be buried in ſilence. But becauſe it would be too tedious a matter to particularize all the ſingularities of that place, wee will ſpeake onely of the admirable ſtructure thereof.

Heraclea after it was repaired, was named Villa-noua.

Rialto choſen for the Princes ordinarie reſidence.

The Dukes Pallace in Rialto.

This place then, as it is appointed to manie and ſundrie purpoſes, hath likewiſe manie and diuers fronts: whereof that which lookes vpon the Weſt and South, is vnder-propt by two rankes of columns; and that which ſupporteth the whole burthen of the worke, hath pillars of a ſtrange kinde of ſtone, rather bigge then long. The Arches are verie ſumptuous, made of the ſame matter and workemanſhip, embracing vnder the bending of a coſtlie vault, diuers columns ſet verie neere together. That ranke which is aboue, is made almoſt of the ſame ſtone and faſhion; and becauſe it hath a greater number of Pillars, they are the more ſlender, and vnderneath enuironed with a verie thicke rew of other pillars, but farre leſſe, ſo as they doe not onely ſerue for a ſtaie, but for a meruailous adornment. But as well the vppermoſt ranke (whereof we now ſpake) as the loweſt, doth make a great gallerie: the moſt ſpacious part whereof is almoſt wholly poſſeſſed by the market-place. The remainder of the front, euen to the toppe of the whole Maſſe, which is of a verie rare ſtone, red and white, is ſo high, that it troubleth, as much as it delighteth the eies of the beholders, being verie richly couered with lead. Aboue the gallerie, there is a part of a verie great Librarie ſtored with manie Greeke and Latine bookes: the greateſt part whereof was giuen by the laſt Will and Teſtament of Cardinall Beſſarion. The reſidue, which lookes towards the South, is the Comitia (For I know not how otherwiſe to terme this place) where euerie eight daies, and ſometimes oftner, all the Nobilitie are aſſembled about the creation of Magiſtrates. As alſo I will more freely call that part of the Palace, which lookes towards the Eaſt, The Court, whereas the Senate vſually doe reſort. I vnderſtand by the Senate, that which they call the Councell of the Preguays; by whom are handled the moſt important affaires of the Common-wealth. For the ancient Fathers, the Authors of this State, haue, among other things, borrowed of the Romans, to name thoſe Preguays which debate in the Senate, becauſe they were intreated to deliuer their opinion, concerning that which was ſpoken by him that held the cheifeſt place in the Senate. But we will ſpeake more amply in an other place. We will now returne to the gouernment of Partitiatio, who hauing two ſonnes, he ſent the one named Iuſtiniano to Leo Emperour of Greece, by whom he was liberally entertained, and greatly honoured and praiſed; and in the mean time, he tooke the other, named Giouanni, Deſcription of the Dukes Pallace.

A verie excellent Librarie within the Pallace.

Wherefore they are called Preguays.

Iuſtiniano the Dukes ſonne ſent to Conſtantinople.

for his Colleague, whereat Iustiniano at his returne was in such sort moued, as he obstinately refused to come and see his Father: But the olde man being extreamely desirous to see his sonne, after he had deposed Giouanni, who refused to obaie his Father (had not the people constrained him thereunto) did associate Iustiniano, and his nephew Angelo sonne to Iustimiano: the people did confine Giouanni that was deposed, to Constantinople. Some saie that hee went of his owne accord, to Pergamus to the Emperour Leon, from whence, returning, he did, by his Fathers commandement, take his wife and children and went to Constantinople.

Giouanni deposed by the people.

About the same time, the Emperour Leon gaue Partitiatio the bodie of Saint Zacharie, and part of the garments of our Sauiour Iesus Christ, and of the glorious Virgin: with a peece of the holie Crosse, which he religiously lockt vp in Saint Zacharies Church which he had built. He did moreouer translate the Monkes of the Couent of Saint Seruulo at the entreatie of the Abbot, into Saint Hilaries Church, which stood then in the fartheſt part of the Rialto. And they which now knowe those places, doe at this day shewe the ruines thereof in the firme Land. Hee built likewise at the same time two Churches in the Islands, in those daies called the Twinnes, one to Saint Seuerus, and the other to Saint Laurence. Not long after, his sonne Vrsus made a Monasterie of Nunnes of Saint Laurence his Church. I finde in some Authors, that he did likewise builde, to the honour of the Prince of the Apostles, the Church of Oliuollo, which stands in that part of the towne which at this day is called the Castle; and that at the dedication thereof, the relicks of Saint Sergius and Bacchus were brought thither.

The Emperour Leo giues many goodly relikes to the Prince.

About the same time likewise, diuers of the chiefest of the Citie conspired against these Princes. Giouanni Talonico, and Bono Bragadino chiefe of the conspiracie were put death. Monetario, one of the complices of this bad designe, saued himselfe by flight; but all his goods were confiscate. Some Authors doe likewise affirme, that, vnder this Princes gouernment, Vlric Bishop of Aquileia, accompained with certaine of the chiefe of Friuli were vanquished by the Venetians in a fight at Sea. This Vlric was a little before condemned for an Hereticke by Pope Alexander. This man for despight that the Church of Grada was preferred before his of Aquileia, being assisted by troopes of the Forlani, came on a sodaine, and assailed the Bishop of the Island. The Venetians Fleete came as sodainely to his reskew; who hauing drawne the enemie to fight, did easily breake and defeate him, and tooke Vlric, with diuers other Gentlemen, prisoners. Then the victorious Venetian pursuing this scattered troope euen to the firme Land, did put all the Sea-coast of the Forlani (called at this day the Friuli) to fire and sword, and destroyed likewise certaine towns by their sodaine incursions. Diuers that escaped from the battaile, not knowing the waies, after they had strayed a long time through the marishes of Caorli, fell at last into the hands of the victors The Venetians to purchase the name of meeke and gentle, did set Viric and all the rest of the prisoners at libertie: on condition that they should send yearely to Venice, on the same day that the victorie was obtained, twelue wild Boares, (with as many loaues of one size) which, with a Bull, should be killed before the generall assemblie: And they should beside, ouerthrow with their Pikes Castles of wood. All this is yet at this day obserued with great preparation, as yearly sports, in the market place, on the same day as the battell was fought.

A conspiracie against the Prince discouered.

Vlric Bishop of Aquileia vanquished by the Venetians.

The publike games at shrouetide.

This is that which hapned as well at home, as abroad, during the gouernment of Angelo Partitiatio; who after that he had transported the Ducall state to Rialto, did there beginne his gouernment with better augurie, than did in times past Paulutio at Heraclea, or Theodato since that at Malamoc. For since the limits of the State were mightily enlarged, the whole honour and maiestie of the Common-wealth hath there remained, as in a settled and sure place.

¶ Iustiniano

¶ IVSTINIANO, the II. Duke of Venice.

Vſtiniano after his fathers death gouerned the Commonwealth alone. Soone after, he perſuaded the State to ſend to Michael the Eaſterne Emperour (for the perpetuall conſeruation of their friendſhip with the Grecian Empire) certaine armed ſhippes to aide him againſt the Saracens, who at that time did ouer-runne moſt of the Ilands of Europe, and chiefly Sicilie: but not meeting the enemie, they ſoone returned to the Citie.

Succour ſent to the Greeke Emperour againſt the Sarazens.

And becauſe we haue ſpoken of the Saracens, it ſhall not be impertinent to ſaie ſomewhat of the originall of the name. For it was then verie new; and brought in according to the opinion of ſome, in the daies of Mahomet: who in his deteſtable Sermons, whereby he hath almoſt diuerted the whole Eaſt from the true light, folding them vp in ſuch darkeneſſe as they could neuer ſince free themſelues off, was wont to call all thoſe Sarracens, (by the name of Sara, Abrahams lawfull wife) who had embraced his ſect; as if thoſe, which followed his Doctrine, had beene by a Diuine oracle the onely lawfull ſucceſſors, and heires of the Diuine promiſe. I will not likewiſe denie, but that this name may be deriued from Sarraca, a Citie in Arabia Fœlix: But all Hiſtorians doe in a manner hold the firſt opinion for true. This Nation hath made manie and diuers Roades into Affricke and Europe, and manie likewiſe into Aſia, but they haue beene ouerthrowne and defeated, as well by the French Armies, as by thoſe of the Venetians. Let vs now returne to the Venetians affaires, which of themſelues ſucceeding happily in thoſe daies, did afterwards receiue a great encreaſe, by the bodie of S^t. Marke, brought to them from Alexandria after this manner.

From whence came the name of Sarazens.

The king of that Countrie cauſed a magnificent Palace to be built, and for the erecting thereof, had commaunded to take all the faire and rareſt ſtones from the ancient Churches and other buildings, as wel publike as priuate; and S. Markes Church in Alexandria being built of the ſame matter, it was thought that it would not bee ſpared: the which Stauracius the Monke, and Theodore the Preiſt, both Grecians, fearing, who did not only celebrate Diuine Seruice there but as Sextens did heedfully keepe that ſacred place, were in great care. But it luckily came to paſſe that Bono of Malamoc and Ruſtico of Tourcelles arriued there, being driuen by tempeſt into that place, contrarie to the publike appointment, with ten ſhips. Theſe men comming for deuotion ſake into the ſaid Church, and perceiuing the ſorrowfulneſſe of thoſe two, enquired the occaſion of their ſadneſſe; and vnderſtanding that it proceeded from feare, leaſt the Church ſhould bee deſtroied, they aſſaied to winne them by many goodly promiſes, aſſuring them that if they wold deliuer vnto them the body of S. Marke, that both of them ſhould be greatly honoured of the Venetians. At the firſt they reiected this demaund, as holding it a ſacrilegious matter to remoue the holy bodie out of his place. But it came to paſſe by the diuine prouidēce, that whilſt they were talking about the matter, ſome of thoſe who had cōmiſſion from the king to ſeeke ſuch ſtones, came into the Church, & cauſed diuers ſtones which were fit for the building of the new-begun Pallace to be taken thence, greatly therby diſfiguring the Church. Theſe two Sextens being incenſed hereat, and vehemently vrged by the Venetians to cōdiſcend to their requeſt, ſeeing ſome likelihood of the Churches ruine, did conſent to their demand. But to the end that the Townſ-men (who were much addicted to the name of the Saint, & to the holy place, in regard of the many miracles there wrought) ſhould not on a ſodaine perceiue any thing, they did vnrip the cloth behind, wherein the holy body was wrapped, not medling with the ſeales which were on the forepart therof, & did put the bodie of S. Claudina into the ſheet, in ſtead of that which they had taken awaie. It is reported that at the ſame time there came ſuch a pleaſant ſweete ſmell forth of the Church, as euerie one ranne to taſte it. And the matter had eaſily beene diſcouered, if they had not perceiued the fore-part of the cloth and the ſeales to be whole. And becauſe they certainely knew that they could not, without great danger, beare the ſtoln body to their ſhips, they bethought themſelues of a new ſubtile inuention to deceiue the people: The which I would ſcarſe credit, were it not, that the continuall courſe of the ſtorie is painted with admirable arte in the ſumptuous Church of Saint Marke.

Why S. Marks bodie was brought from Alexandria.

The Alexandrines inſolent to ſtrangers.

Now to eſchew the brauadoes which that Nation did daily vſe to ſtrangers, to diſcouer matters, they did put that holie burthen into a baſket, and couered it with hearbes; then they threw ſwines fleſh vpon it; which that Nation according to their ancient cuſtome did extreamely abhorre: from whence came this prouerb ſpoken by Auguſtus, That hee had rather bee Herods ſwine than his ſonne. Thoſe then which were appointed to carrie it awaie, being formerly inſtructed what to do, cried aloud when they met any in the ſtreetes, Ganzer, which ſignifieth in the Barbarian language, ſwine, and in this manner they brought it to their ſhippes; and the bodie being wrapped vp in the ſailes, and tied to the ſhroudes, they hung it on the maſt, as determining preciſely to depart, fearing leaſt that pretious theft ſhould be perceiued by thoſe who had charge to viſit the ſhippes before the Marchants departure. At the laſt hoiſing Ankers, they departed with great ioy: But it is reported that as they were in the maine Sea, they were toſſed by an horrible tempeſt; and that then Saint Marke appeared to Bono of Mamaluc, and willed him preſently to ſtrike ſaile, leaſt the ſhippes, driuen by force of the windes vpon the rockes neere at hand, ſhould happen to periſh: which being ſodainely done, they were by this Diuine oracle preſerued from danger.

Auguſtus his prouerb.

Pollicie of thoſe which carried S. Markes bodie to the ſhips.

Miraculous apparition of S. Marke.

The matter beeing diuulged at Venice before their arriuall, cauſed a meruailous ioie ouer all the whole Citie; euerie man declaring that the preſence of that holie bodie, would make the name and State of Venice to be perpetuall; That the propheeie, which was deliuered from the Father to the Sonne, was accompliſhed: That in times paſt before the Foundation of the Citie, Saint Marke in his life-time going towards Aquileia, his ſhippe arriuing in thoſe Iſlands, it was reuealed vnto him in his ſleepe, that his bones ſhould one day reſt in thoſe places which he ſaw ſo deſert and vninhabited. Amiddeſt this ioie there was nothing heard but ſongs and daunces, with vowes, and praiers, that in all time of neede it would pleaſe him to come and viſit his Citizens, and to ſuffer his bodie to reſt for euer in that place, which the Common-wealth would afterward dedicate vnto him. And in this manner the whole people of all ſortes, ſex, and age, came to meete it at the Port of the Oliuollo: the Clergie going before, ſinging Hymnes and praiſes to God; where the Citie receiued with all reuerenee, in the midſt of an infinite number of ſweete odors, an aſſured pledge of her future greatneſſe: Which beeing receiued was carried into the Chappell of the Pallace.

The propheeie accompliſhed

The end of the ſecond Booke of the firſt Decade.

THE THIRD BOOKE OF THE FIRST DECAD Of The Historie Of Venice.

¶ The Contents of the third Booke of the first Decad.

Deane and Prieſts were ordained in St. MARKS Church. OBELLERIO taken in the Iſle of Veggio is beheaded. Malamoc being beſieged and taken, in hatred to him, was wholly burnt. The Duke being exil'd the Citie by the conſpiracie of CARROSIO, goes into France: Soone after he being reſtored by the practiſe of the Chiefe Citizens, is finally confined in the Iſland of Grada and there dyeth. Saint PAVLS Church built in the middeſt of the Citie. The Venetians vnluckily fight with the Narentines. Thoſe of Verona are ſuccoured by the Venetians againſt the inhabitants of the Lake of Benac. A mightie Sea-armie againſt the Sarracen Moores. What the Moores did in a ſhort ſpace, about Rome and the reſt of Italie. The Venetians and the Greekes defeated by the Moores on the Sea of Crotona. The bodies of Saint PANCRATIVS, and Saint SABINA, giuen by the Pope, were put into Saint ZACHARIES Church. Ciuil diſſenſion doth for a time much hinder the Common-wealth. Prince TRADONICO is villanouſly murthered by conſpiratours. When Poueggia beganne to be inhabited. The Iſle of Grada was by the Venetians comming deliuered from the Sarracens ſiege. Why Dorce-duro was inhabited. Commachia taken by the Venetians for a reuenge. The Duke CANDIANO ſlaine fighting againſt the Narentines. The Duke, and Senate, giue limits to thoſe of Chioggia. What the Hunnes did in Hungarie. The Hunnes defeate BERENGARIVS at his entrie into Italie, and after they had ſpoiled the Venetian Territorie, they come and beſiege the Citie of Venice. The Venetians ouercome the Hunnes at Sea. The Hiſtrians made tributaries to the Venetians; and they fight with good ſucceſſe (as ſome ſay) at the ſame time againſt the Narentines. Duke CANDIANO was murthered by the people for his ouer-much pride, and for being ſuſpected to haue affected Tyrannie.

IN this ſort did the Citie daily encreaſe, and it was not onely augmented in ſtrength, but in Religion, and by this happy ſucceſſe did the gouernment of Iuſtiniano flouriſh. But by how much it was happier, by ſo much ſhorter was it. Such is the ordinarie cuſtome of humane affaires, as they cannot long continue in happineſſe. For ſoone after that he had laid St. Marks bodie in the Chapell of the Caſtle, and made himſelefe the Hoſte of ſo great a Sanctitie, he dyed. Hee ordained by his will, that his heires ſhould build a greater Church to Saint Marke. Hee did moreouer enrich by the ſame will the Churches of S. Zacharie and Hilarie with manie great reuenues.

Iuſtinians laſt will and Teſtament concerning S. Marks Church

GIOVANNI

¶ Giovanni Partitiatio the twelfth Duke of Venice.

Iouanni Partitiatio brother to Iustiniano (who being called home from Greece was made his Colleague) being declared Prince, began his publike gouernment by Diuine actions; and appointed for the same purpose the neereſt Church to the Palace: into the which (being dedicated according to the ancient manner) the bodie of the holie Euangeliſt was brought; and from among the Clergie certaine Prieſts were choſen to celebrate Diuine Seruice there, vnto whom was giuen a chiefe Officer, at this day called the Deane. This building was at that time of a meane ſtature, nothing like to that riches and greatneſſe wherewith it is at this daie adorned. But we will ſpeake of the excellencie of this Church in a more conuenient place. The Common-wealth made a league with the Narentines, a Nation which vſed to ſcoure and robbe the neighbour Seas. But the ſame being ſoone after broken, the Barbarians ſurpriſed certaine Venetian Merchants at the Sea, and ſlue them, comming homewards from Apulia. It is ſaid that about the ſame time, Prince Obellerio, who, according to the opinion of ſome Annaliſts, did (as hath beene ſaid in the precedent Booke) voluntarily abſent and banniſh himſelfe, came into the Iſle of Curtia, vulgarly called at this day Veggia, reſoluing to ſtirre vp new troubles for his reentrie into the gouernment. Partitiatio did forthwith arme a mightie Fleet, and went to meete him, before he had time to attempt any thing, and at his firſt arriuall ſurpriſed him. In the meane time diuers of Malamoc, incited by their ancient loue towards Obellerio (who being of their Citie had beene their Prince) did flie forth of the Towne. Giouanni being heereat moued did ſodainely breake vp his campe; and being with his armie returned to Venice, came in hatred of thoſe which were fled, tooke Malamoc, and burnt it. Then hauing taken new forces, he returned with all ſpeed to Veggia: which being taken, he cauſed Obellerio his head to be ſtricken of.

The Creation of the Deane of S. Markes Church.

Malamoc ruined.

The death of Obellerio.

Not long after, diuers of the Nobilitie conſpired againſt him, by the meanes of Carroſio, ſon to Bonico, and being driuen thence by reaſon of this ſodaine conſpiracie, he fled into France. Carroſio in the meane time, without the conſent of the people, ſeized on the Dukes Palace. Againſt him (thus brought in by himſelfe into the gouernment) aroſe a companie of the chiefe Citizens, whoſe names were, Baſilio Traſimondo, Giouanni Marturio, and Dominico Orcianico. Theſe men were followed by thirtie other gentlemen, who from the beginning did miſlike of Duke Giouanni his banniſhment. They aſſailed Carroſio, tooke him, put out his eies, and afterward banniſhed him: They ſlue moreouer Theodato Cyuri, Marini Patritio, Dominico Monetario, Duke Giouanni flieth.

The vſurper puniſhed Giouanni repealed.

tario, with diuers others of Carroſio's faction. The gouernment of the Commonwealth was in the meane time committed to Vrſus Biſhop of Oliuollo, Baſilio Traſimondo, and Giouanni Maturio, vntill Giouanni were returned out of France: who being come home, they willingly reſtored it vnto him. This man hauing in proces of time much to doe to appeaſe many ſecret hatreds againſt thoſe of the familie of Maſtalici, being at that time one of the chiefeſt of Venice, was on a day ſurpriſed by the contrarie faction neere to S. Peters Church, whither he went to heare Diuine Seruice: and being deſpoiled of the ornaments of ſoueraigne dignitie, ſo ſoone as they had cut the haire of his beard and head, they confined him to Grada in the 8. yeare of his gouernment; where entring into holie orders, he died ſoone after.

Duke Giouanni depoſed from his charge and becomes a Prieſt.

¶ Piero Tradonico, the 13. Duke of Venice.

Iero Tradonico was choſen in his place. He was borne at Pola, and being driuen out of Equiline in the time of the French-mens warres, came to Rialto. Pola is an ancient Citie in the confines of Italie, and built (as Callimachus ſaith) in a gulph of the Sea, in forme of an Hauen, by the Colchians ſent to purſue Medæa. Tradonico tooke his ſonne Giouanni for Colleague. He cauſed a Church to be built in the honor of Saint Paul, the Apoſtle of the Gentils, as coſtlie as the Cities meanes in thoſe daies would permit, and in that place, where it is at this daie to be ſeene, with ſignes of great antiquitie. It is ſaid that he made ſome attempts on their enemies the Narentines, but not with great ſucceſſe. Others ſaie that he ſent his ſonne againſt them at times, who fought with the Sea-Pyrats with better fortune than his Father.

Pola an ancient Citie.

The Ambaſſadors of thoſe of Verona, came at the ſame time to Venice, to craue helpe againſt the inhabitants of the Lake of Benac: whom it was to bee thought they could not ouercome without forraine aide. Some write that thoſe of the Lake craued this aide. The moſt curious Authors neuertheleſſe doe affirme, that it was thoſe of Verona: who hauing by the aduice of the Venetians furniſhed the Lake with ſhippes of warre, did the more eaſily ouercome their enemies: For which they did not only thank the Venetians, but ſent them rich and coſtly preſents to Venice. Others ſaie (for there is nothing wherein the Authors doe not almoſt diſagree) that after that loſſe receiued on the Sea of Crotona (whereof we will heereafter make mention) the Venetians did ſuccour the Veronois: the which is ſcarce credible. For there is no Nation, how warlike ſoeuer, but would haue beene daunted after ſo great an ouerthrow.

The Veronois requeſt againſt thoſe of Benac.

In

In this state stood the affaires of the Venetians, beeing more prosperous within the Citie, and the places neere to the firme Land, than abroad, when Theodosius of Constantinople, Generall of the Sea-armie of Michael the Greeke Emperour, against the Moores, arriued at Venice, where he laboured with Tradonico, to haue the Venetians to send forth a mightie armie against the Barbarians, which spoiled the coasts of Apulia.

The comming of Theodosius to Venice.

They freely graunted his request in honour of the Emperour, and they armed threescore Gallies against the Moores: In regard whereof Theodosius intituled Tradonico, Protos-pater of the Grecian Empire; which dignitie was next to the Emperours.

A Sea-armie graunted to the Grecian against the Sarracens

Saba the Captaine of the Moores, (for it will not bee impertinent briefely to speake somewhat of the incursions of this Nation, who are reported to be descended from Mauritania) at his arriuall in Italie tooke the Sea-port in Tuscanie, now called Ciuita Vecchia, others terme it Centochiese by the name of a Towne neere thereunto, which the Emperour Adrian did very sumptuously build (as witnesseth Plinie in his Epistles.) I dare affirme these men to be the ancient Pirgues, the which the name of their Citie doth seeme to shew which is called Vecchia; and I would call it the Hauen of Pirgues, were it not, that hard by as yee goe to Ostia, there is a place, which the Inhabitants call Pyrgues at this day. Now Saba hauing landed his men in that place, and left a sufficient Garrison for the Guarde of his Ships, marched with his Armie to Rome: who, after hee had first of all taken the Vatican, and spoyled the most renowned Church of the world, dedicated to the Prince of the Apostles, did besiege the Citie. But hauing intelligence of Guido's comming, whom Pope Gregorie the fourth had called out of France for the Cities safetie, he did on a sodaine dislodge thence, and tooke his iourney betwixt Via Appia, and Via Latina, putting all the Suburbes to fire and sword, not sparing the noble Church of S. Paul two miles distant from the Citie.

From whence the Sarracen Moores are descended.

The Pirgueys.

Saint Peters Church at Rome taken by the Moores.

The Barbarian turned towards Via Latina, and being come to the Forrest of Cassina, he tooke by force the Citie which stood therein, spoyling and ruinating it. The new Citie which was since then builded there, is at this day called Saint Germans. There is also hard by the same place a very famous Monasterie, renowned for the ancient Religion and wealth thereof. This did the Barbarians likewise take, and burnt the greatest part of it. Marching from thence along the Riuer Liris (called Garillano at this day) they ranne to Sea ward, like a storme falling from the Mountaines, and driuen by the force of the winds, into the neighbour plaines; they put all places by which they passed to fire and sword; and after they had stuft their Ships (which they had sent for forth of Tuscanie) with rich spoyles, they departed into Mauritania. It was not long ere they returned againe: For being puffed vp with the fortunate successe of their former voyage, & promising better fortune to themselues, they left their countrie and returned into Italie: where they tumultuously assailed, at one selfe-same time in a manner, the Citie of Tarentum, and Sicilie.

The spoiles made by the Moores.

The Moores returne into Italie.

Now seeing it was to be feared, that the Moores would spoile all the Sea coasts, Theodosius distrusting the forces which he brought from Greece, had recourse (as hath alreadie beene said) to the Venetians succors; the which being easily obtained, he marched against the Barbarians. In the meane time, so soone as Saba vnderstood the enemies comming he raised his siege from before Tarentum, & sodainly retired with his armie into the streights of the Sea neer to Crotona. It is not known whether he did it for feare, or whether it were most auailable for his purpose to deceiue the enemie vnder colour of flight, to constraine him thereby to make some rash attempt. Crotona is scituated on the Sea of Tarentum, a verie ancient Citie, builded in times past by the Greekes, following Apollos Oracle vnder Nicellus their Captaine; and in times past so mighty, as the Crotonians had an Armie of an hundred and thirtie thousand fighting men, at such time as they were vanquished by the Locrians neere to the Riuer Sagra. They were great warriours, and very expert expert in a wraſtling. But Pythagoras of Samos, and Milo his diſciple, were the chiefe ornaments of that Citie; the one for being a Citizen of the ſame, and the beſt wraſtler of his time; and the other for his skill in Philoſophie.

Saba the Moore before Tarentum.

The Citie of Crotona.

Pythagoras and Milo the two ornaments of the Crotonians.

In this place (for the Grecke and Venetian Fleet was there arriued) after certaine vſuall light skirmſhes, at laſt they came to ſtrokes with the whole forces of either ſide. The Greekes being broken and defeated, the whole ſtrength of the Moors lighted on the Venetians: But they being extreamely buſied in the fight neuer perceiued the flight of their fellowes, vntill they found themſelues euironed on euery ſide by the Barbarians: and by this meanes did the Venetian Gallies ſuſtaine the force of the furious enemie. But the great multitude of the Moors preuailing they were either ſunke or taken. Thoſe Venetians which were left aliue, were taken by the enemie; the reſt, were either ſlaine in the fight, or drowned. Some write that the battaile of Crotona was before the Moores beſieged Rome, (among whome is Bonitendius) The Barbarians proude of this ſucceſſe, ſailed into Dalmatia, where they ſpoiled certaine Townes, ſurpriſed by their ſodaine incurſions. They tooke likewiſe certaine Shippes laden with rich marchandize, returning from Syria, who hauing from farre eſpied the Moores fleete, had retired themſelues into the Gulph of Trieſte: But after they had taken them, in hatred of the Venetians, they ſlue all the priſoners.

The battaile of Crotona.
The Greekes flie.
The Venetian Armie defeated before Crotona.
The Moores came into Dalmatia.

The report of the loſſe of the battaile at Crotona, brought a meruailous griefe and terror to the Citie. But this latter, as leaſt of all look't for, did in ſuch ſort grieue them, as the feare was no leſſe in Venice than as the enemie had beene before it; and this feare would haue beene greater, had they not vnderſtood by their ſpies, that the enemies were gone to Ancona; which being taken, and ſpoiled by their ſodaine and vnlook't for comming, they did forthwith put themſelues to Sea. The Narentines ioyfull for the Venetians loſſe, came ſodainely from Dalmatia, to ſteale and ſpoile, euen as farre as Caorli. This Towne ſtands at the mouth of the Riuer Limenes, whither the ancient Venetians, which fled from Concorda in the troublous time of the Hunnes, had retired themſelues. About the ſame time or ſoone after (as ſaith Bonitendius) Pope Benedict came to Venice, where at the importunate entreatie of Agnes de Moroſin Abbeſſe of the place, hee promiſed to ſend from Rome the bodies of Saint Pancratius, and Saint Sabina, by the deuotion done to which bodies, the Church might be furthered in the building. They were afterwards ſent thither, and placed with great reuerence in a little Chappell of the Church.

The Narentines roades euen to Caorli.
Pope Bennet comes to Venice
The bodies of S. Pancratius, and S. Sabina brought to Venice.

Vnder this Princes gouernment the Emperour Lotharius (and manie Emperours likewiſe after him) did confirme by writing all the ancient priuiledges, and immunities of the Venetians, to the end they might be inuiolably obſerued. Moreouer as the Common-wealth was then not very forunate abroad, it was much leſſe at home: For the ciuill diſſenſion of ſix of the nobleſt families in the Citie diuided into two factions, did greatly trouble it. On the one ſide were the Iuſtiniani, the Polani and the Baſſei; on the other the Barbolani, the Seliani, and the Seuoli, who beeing ioyned together, did by their quarrells, often-times preſent the people with verie fearefull and horrible ſpectacles. And after they had fought in the middeſt of the Citie with different ſucceſſe, euen almoſt to the totall ruine of one another, the Barbolani with all their adherents were driuen forth of the Citie. But ſoone after, at the entreatie of the Emperour Lodowicke, to whom they had retired themſelues, the ſtrife betweene the two factions beeing appeaſed, they were reſtored to their houſes. Theſe things hapned during the gouernment of Piero Tradonico: who after he had gouerned certaine yeares alone after his ſonnes death, whome hee had aſſociated for the gouernment of the Common-wealth, comming one daie from diuine ſeruice at Saint Zacharies Church, it came to paſſe as he returned home-ward, hee was on a ſodaine and vnlook't for aſſailed by certaine conſpiratours, and by them murthered, the ninth yeare of his gouernment. At this ſo horrible and fearefull a deed

The Emperour Lotharius confirmes the franchizes of Venice Great ſtrife among the Citizens.
Duke Tradonico murthered.

deed, his Ministers and seruants, which waited vpon him, mooued with a charitable affection towards the old man, endeuoured to defend him, and to repell the wrong, but being driuen away by a greater number, and stronger then themselues, they sodainly with a great noise seized on the Dukes Palace, where being besieged by the conspiratours, they did thirtie daies together sustaine their furie. At the last, after they had receiued assurance of the people, that the defending of so good a Prince against the trecherous attempts of wicked conspiratours, should not be imputed vnto them for a capitall crime; nor yet the seizing on the publike place for their safetie, which they had so couragiously defended: they came foorth of the Palace; hauing first of all capitulated, That the Citie should not leaue such an example vnpunished, to haue wickedly and miserably slaine so vertuous a Prince, without desert at all; saying, That it was an hainous matter, to behold Citizens to walke in a Citie, where they had committed so execrable a parricide, and besprinkled the peoples face with the bloud of the soueraigne Magistrate.

The Princes houshold-seruants retired into the Palace, doe Capitulate.

The people appointed three men to enquire concerning the murther, to punish the guiltie, and to take order for those who had seized on the Dukes Palace. The three which were deputed, were Piero Bishop of Equiline, Giouanni Arch-deacon of Grada, and Dominico Massoni. These men banished the guiltie for euer; some into France, and the rest into Greece. Diuers, who as yet were not condemned, were murthered. Vrso Grugnario one of the conspirators died miserably, being possessed by wicked spirits; to shew that the death of Tradonico did not only displease men, but God. And those who had seized on the Dukes Palace, because it was not done without great commotion in the Citie; some of them were banished out of the limits of the Venetians, and the most part of the rest were confined into the Isle of Pouegia. This place is fiue mile distant from the Citie: whither after they had carried their wiues and children, they did in time so encrease, as the Town which they built there was afterward greatly inhabited; but such as it was, the warres of the Genouezes did wholly ruinate it.

Three men appointed by the people to enquire of the Princes murther.

The murtherers punished.

Pouegia newly inhabited.

¶ Vrso Partitiatio, the 14. Duke of Venice.

THe Commonwealth being quieted by iudgment of these three men: Vrso Partitiatio was declared Duke. Vnder this man the Citie was, abroad and at home, prosperously gouerned. At the beginning of his gouernment, to the end that the Venetians might haue a firme peace, they were of opinion to send hostages to the Barbarians. Their Annalls nalls affirme this: but diuers Hiſtorians make no mention of hoſtages. The Saracens ſoone after, who came from Alexandria about eight and twentie yeares after Saba the Moores comming into Italie, had poſſeſſed the Iſle of Candie: & being come on a ſodaine into Dalmatia, after they had ſpoiled the Sea-coaſts of Hiſtria, they came and beſieged Grada. Vrſo did in ſuch ſort terrifie them by his ſodaine arriuall, as with great feare they withdrew their veſſells, and in an inſtant hoiſed ſaile and put to Sea. Some Hiſtorians ſaie that Giouanni the Princes ſonne, a courageous yong man, did beare himſelfe verie valiantly in this action. If it be ſo, it will not be amiſſe to beleeue, that the Barbarians were ſo farre from flying away vpon report of the comming of the Venetians fleet, as that on the contrarie they were ſo hardie as to tarrie for them, and to ioine battaile, whereby it hapned that this yong man, behauing himſelfe brauely the ſame daie againſt the enemie, was therefore by the people giuen for Colleague to his Father. Bonitendius reports that Vrſo did not only fight there fortunately againſt the Saracens, but likewiſe at Tarentum: That he did moreouer brauely aſſaile the Narentines with 30. ſhips of war, for that they had, contrarie to the agreement, robbed and ſpoiled certaine townes of Hiſtria. But the Hiſtorians make no mention why he tooke Armes for the Hiſtrians, ſeeing they were not as yet vnder the Venetians Dominion. It is likely, that after they had ouerrunne the Hiſtrians, they entred vpon the Venetians frontiers. Vrſo in the meane ſpace bare a ſecret grudge to Pietro Biſhop of Grada, till ſuch time as he had confirmed Dominico Calloprini, who had beene elected Biſhop of Tourcelles; the which he refuſed to do in regard they were enemies. Now the ſtate of the Commonwealth being peaceably gouerned abroade, the Duke enacted, That thoſe who were called the Princes Squiers, ſhould inhabit that part of the Citie, which at the beginning was called Dorſſe-dura, and ſhould build houſes there. And in this ſort that place began to bee habitable, which before then was deſert for feare of Sea-incurſions. This Princes good fortune was likewiſe the cauſe, that the ancient ſtrife betwixt the Venetians and the Forlani, occaſioned by a particular affection which each of them did beare to the churches of Aquileia & Grada, was wholly extinct, vpon the promiſe which Vulpertio of Aquileia made, neuer more to moleſt the Church of Grada. All theſe felicities were followed by an other nothing leſſe. For hauing fortunatly preuailed againſt the Saracens, he was declared by the Ambaſſadors of the Emperor Baſilius, Protoſpater of the Grecian Empire. But becauſe Baſilius ſhold not ouercome him in bountie, he ſent twelue great Bells to Conſtantinople to him for a preſent; and the Greekes by this meanes of the Venetians liberalitie began at that time to vſe Bells.

The Saracens before Grada.

The Saracens fought with before Grada.

Dorſſe dura newly inhabited.

Vrſo declared Protoſpater of the Grecian Empire.

¶ Giovanni Partitiatio, the 15. Duke of Venice.

NOw Vrso, after he had thus obtained whatsoeuer belonged to the adornment of mans life, deceased in the seuenth yeare of his gouernment: and by his death Giouanni his brother began to gouerne the Common-wealth. Hee determined to send his brother Badoario to Pope Iohn; that by his authoritie Commachia might be added to their State. This is likely to haue beene plotted by the Venetians, because this place stood on the ancient confines of Venice. Marini, Earle of Commachia, being aduertised of their determination, laide waite for the Venetian on the confines of Rauenna, as he went towards Rome. He hurt and tooke him, and after hee had made him to promise to deale no more in that businesse, hee sent him home. But soone after his returne to Venice he died of his hurts. The angrie Duke, resoluing to reuenge his brothers death, came with a mightie Armie to Commachia, tooke it by force, and vsed all hostile proceedings against those who had consented to his brothers death; and after he had left a Garrison there, he did spoyle and ouer-runne the Territorie neere to Rauenna, because they likewise had their hand in that enterprise. Hee builded the Church of Saint Cyprian and Cornelius on the bankes of Malamoc, which a while after, in the dayes of Prince Vitalis Michaeli, and by his meanes, was conuerted into a Monasterie of Nunnes. Then falling sicke, hee left his brother Pietro (by the peoples command) for his successour: but recouering his health contrarie to all mens expectation, he tooke him for Colleague in the Gouernment; who dying afterwards, he associated Vrso his other brother, who was elder then Pietro deceased. Soone after, being troubled with a dangerous disease, which hindred him from intending the affaires of the Common-wealth, (Vrso hauing in the meane space voluntarily deposed himselfe) after hee had permitted the people to elect a new Duke, hee retired to his owne house as a priuate Citizen; the sixth yeare of his Gouernement being not fully expired. Some say, that both the brethren deposed themselues, because they perceiued the people to bee discontented with their Gouernement.

The Dukes brother taken by the Count of Commachia.

Duke Giouanni doth voluntarily depose himselfe.

¶ PIETRO CANDIANO, the first, the 16. Duke of Venice.

Iouanni being deposed, Pietro Candiano succeeded him; vnto whom, Giouanni being called into the Senate, did freely surrender the titles of the Soueraigne Magistrate, and withdrew himselfe to his own priuate house. At the same time certaine galleis were sent against the Narentines, ancient enemies to the Venetians (who robbed all the neighbour bo ur Seas) to preuent their incurſions; but they returned without doing any thing, by reaſon they could no where meete with the enemie. Not long after, Prince Candiano went againſt the ſame enemies, with twelue Galleis (ſome ſaie but ſeuen) and met them neere to the Promontorie of Dalmatia, which the inhabitants cal Micolal. The Venetians animated by their Duke, did furiouſly aſſaile them. The Liburnians did brauely receiue them. They fought on both ſides with more furie and courage than with forces. The Venetians at the firſt had the better, hauing ſunke certaine of the enemies ſhippes: but the great multitude of the Barbarians beginning to preuaile, and the Dukes Gallie being boarded, Prince Candiano fighting valliantly was ſlaine, after he had commanded the Common-wealth but ſixe moneths. His bodie being ſecretly conueied by the Hiſtrians to Grada, was there buried.

The Duke dies fighting with the Narentines.

At the firſt report of this loſſe, the whole Citie was in an vproare: which had beene much greater, if Giouanni Partitiatio, who had renounced the ſoueraigne dignitie, had not ſodainely at the peoples entreatie taken vpon him againe the gouernment of the Common-wealth, with the Ducall titles. But the tumult being appeaſed, the people with a common conſent, named Pietro, ſurnamed Tribuno, for their Prince.

Giouanni Partitiatio takes again the gouernment vpon him.

¶ PIETRO TRIBVNO, the 17. Duke of Venice.

THis man was likewiſe made Prothoſpater by the Grecian Emperour: Their common enemies (the Pirats) did very much vexe the places neere to the Citie: in regard whereof, Tribuno cauſed a wall to be made to defend the Citie, from the little Canall neere to the Caſtle vnto the Church of Saint Maria Zubanica, with a chaine from that wall vnto S. Georges Church, for feare leaſt the enemie ſhould enter the Citie on a ſodaine. But at this day there is no ſigne of that ancient wall to be ſeene: He gaue bounds to the Chioggians, from their Hauen along the ſhoare, euen to the mouth of the Riuer Acide: which are called Foſſon, Beſba, and Conchia; and ſo backagaine to the ſame Hauen.

The Citie newly fortified.

At the ſame time, the Venetian State, with that of all Italie on the Sea-coaſt was verie much troubled: For they were aſſailed on the one ſide by Pirates, and on the other by the ordinarie inuaſions of the Saracens, who as a new amazement ſeiſed on the Venetians.

The Hunnes, who (as we haue elſe-where ſaid) were come forth of Scithia, entred tred Italie with great furie. A verie great multitude of them leauing Scithia at that time, would ſtaie in no place, til they had firſt ſeene how their friends and kindsfolke in Hungarie fared. Theſe men by continuall frequentation with the Italians, being accuſtomed to the iournies of Italie, had for the moſt part changed their naturall crueltie and manner of life: by meanes whereof waxing more ciuill, they were driuen from the places which they had gotten by right of warre, by thoſe that came after them. The crueltie of this Nation is reported to be ſuch, as after that they had been in Hungarie, they abſtained not from eating humane fleſh after their countrie manner; who forthwith tooke vpon them the names of thoſe whom they had driuen thence, and were called Hungarians. Thoſe which were expulſed, were likewiſe in times paſt called Huns, aſwell as the latter; And being come into Hungarie in the daies of Attila, they were afterward named Bauarians, then Huns; and certaine letters being taken awaie from both names, it was made but one.

The Huns come into Italie the ſecond time.

Ciuill warre betwixt the Huns.

Theſe then after diuers warlike actions done as well in France as Germanie, after they had vanquiſhed Lewis king of Germanie, and made him tributarie, carrying great ſtore of bootie home with them, being proude of ſo good ſucceſſe, reſolued to make attempts on Italie; hauing perhaps vnderſtood that they were at ſtrife among themſelues. By meanes whereof comming firſt into Miſia, they defeated the Princes of the ſame in a bloudie battaile, and made them tributarie. Departing thence, vpon report that they determined to inuade Italie: Berengarius, who at the ſame time held the Roman Empire, marched againſt them with fifteene thouſand men, and they fought verie furiouſly vpon the confines of Italie, where Berengarius being ouercome, fledde from the battaile with the loſſe of the greateſt patt of his forces.

Lewis King of Germanie, Tributarie to the Huns.

Berengarius defeated by the Huns.

The Hunnes became more hauty after this victorie, and they entred Italie the neereſt waie, putting all they met with to fire and ſword; and comming to Treuiſo they tooke and ſpoiled it. From thence determining to goe to Milan, the report of the great wealth of the Venetians which began at the ſame time to be verie famous ouer all Italie was the cauſe, that on a ſodaine they turned all their forces vpon the Venetians. They ſpeedily made a great number of ſmall light boates; which they couered (as it is reported) with leather, by reaſon that they were groſſely made, and of a thicke ſubſtance. In theſe the Barbarians embarqued themſelues, and aſſailed Villa-noua (ſo was the ancient Heraclia called, after it was reedified) which, beeing taken at the firſt aſſault, they burnt downe to the ground. From thence marching to Equiline and Ieſulune, they deſtroied them in the ſame manner. Then purſuing the courſe of their victories all along the Sea-coaſt, they ſpoiled Chioggia and Capodarger, and afterward burnt them. At the laſt they reſolued to aſſaile Rialto. The feare, which then fell vpon the Venetians, was not like to that which poſſeſſed them in the time of the French-mens warres. For this terror was much greater then the other. They fought with the French for their libertie. They muſt fight with theſe men for the ſafetie of their liues. Thoſe, albeit they were enemies, had in them ſome ſparkes of pietie and Religion. The Huns did not only contemne godlineſſe but all humanitie; for they did not ſpare the dead carkaſes, but like brute beaſts they tare them in pieces and deuoured them. The euill diſpoſition of this Nation had at the firſt report ſo terrified all people of each ſex and age, as they did not alone bewaile the loſſe of their libertie; but their liues likewiſe. But (as it oftentimes hapneth) this deſpaire of theirs was conuerted into furie, and this furie into a deſire of reuenge; or if that could not be effected, to die valiantly. This deſire gaue them hope to vanquiſh the Barbarians, if they ſhould attempt to hazard the fight.

Treuiſo taken by the Huns.

The Huns aſſaile the Citie of Venice.

The great crueltie of the Huns.

It is to be ſuppoſed (for we cannot certainely affirme it) That the Venetians were ſodainely encouraged by ſome, by this manner of ſpeech. That it was now time for them by their actions to ſhew themſelues valiant men; That a mightie danger did not onely threaten their Countrie, but their liues; That they had to doe with a kinde of people, who as little vſed to Exhortation to the Venetians.

to ſpare the bodies of the dead, as their liues in battaile. But yet neuertheleſſe they were not made of iron, but their bodies might eaſily be pierced. That they ſhould call to memorie how the ancient Venetians with a few inhabitants of the Latines, made no difficultie in their Countries behalfe to expoſe their liues before the walles of Aquileia, againſt three hundred thouſand men; (for Attila had ſo many in his Armie) That the euent of that battaile did manifeſt, how much vertue and courage is better in warre than great multitudes: But it may be that ſome will tearme them raſh and inconſiderate for their attempt, in daring to aſſaile the enemie with that ſort of fight, wherein he was moſt expert: whereas on the contrarie, they ſhould rather haue fought with them at Sea, or in the Lakes, knowne better to them than to the Barbarians: (then which, he ſaid, nothing could bee more acceptable to the Venetians, who from their youth are accuſtomed to the Sea) than in ſuch a place where their valour might be moſt apparent. Moreouer, that the enemies had neither the skill, nor ſhippes, fit for that purpoſe. That their Anceſtors had in the ſame places, where they were now to fight, vanquiſhed in times paſt King Pepin, followed with his owne forces, and with thoſe of the Emperour his father: And that they onely fought for their libertie: whereas now, the danger of their liues did conſtraine them to defend themſelues brauely. Now, in regard that if they were ouercome, they were ſure to die, he could not thinke that there was anie Cittizen ſo baſe or recreant but would rather chooſe to dye valliantly with his ſword in his hand, then by yeelding, to looſe all he had, and to haue his throte cut, like a Sheepe, by a barbarous and cruell enemie. He ſaid, That the ſtrength and magnanimitie of the Cittizens were ſuch, as they were not onely ſufficient to rebate the edges of the Hunnes ſwords who threatned them; but to free their Countrie likewiſe from ſo weariſome a ſiege.

Being animated by theſe, or ſuch like exhortations, they became couragious. For it were follie to imagine that a multitude of people, being amazed with the feare of their enemies, could be encouraged without ſome vehement Oration, full of perſwaſiue ſpeeches. All men, after that, ran to arme themſelues, not onely to defend their libertie, but likewiſe, or rather, to preſerue the ſafetie of their liues. The enemies in the meane ſpace haſted towards Rialto. The Venetians imbarqued in their wel-armed veſſels, and fit for the fight, met with them neere to Albiola. The fight at the beginning was verie cruell.

The Venetians conſtant reſolution.

The attempts of the Hunnes were diuers; who relying on their great numbers, aſſailed them in ſundrie places at once. The Venetians euerie where oppoſing themſelues againſt them, did brauely reſiſt their aſſaults: They fought ſundrie daies without any likely-hood of victorie to either ſide. But at the laſt, both partes ioyning their whole forces, the Barbarians were broken and defeated, and diſperſing their troopes, fledde farre from thence, leauing to the Venetians a moſt famous victorie. The enemies (as ſome report) beeing ſoone after wonne by the rewards of Berengarius, departed out of Italie.

Battaile betwixt the Venetians and the Hunnes.

The Venetians grew famous, by gaining this victorie neere to Albiola. All men ſaid that the Venetians had abated the furie of the Hunnes; vnto whom Berengarius (a valliant and mightie Prince, by reaſon of the Empire of Italie) had giuen place. Hee did likewiſe greatly praiſe the abſent Duke, by whoſe meanes and vnder whom all was done. It is to bee ſuppoſed, that the Duke Tribuno did at that time fortifie the Citie with a wall and chaine; and not for feare of the Pirates: the which certaine Hiſtorians doe likewiſe affirme.

The Venetians ouercome the Hunnes.

Great praiſe giuen to the Duke.

¶ VRSO BADOAIRIO, the 18. Duke of Venice.

NOw the Common wealth being thus happily gouerned at home and abroad, the Duke Tribuno dyed; the nineteenth yeare of his gouernment, as some saie: and according to others, the three and twentieth. Vrso Badoiario was chosen in his stead. This man sent his sonne Pietro to Constantinople to the Greeke Emperour, of whom being made Protospater, he receaued diuers great and riche presents: But this young man returning home to Venice, was surprised by a meane Prince of the Dalmatians called Michael, who spoiled him of his treasure, and confined him into Misia; from whence escaping he returned secretly to Venice. Vrso would haue examined the bounds of the Chioggians; but vnderstanding that Prince Pietro, his predecessor, had limited them, he changed his purpose. He is reported to haue bin a verie good & religious Prince. For the eleuenth yeare of his gouernment, hee did willingly depose himselfe, and went to the monasterie of Saint Felix d' Amiana, where he spent the remainder of his dayes in the Monasticke life. The ruines of this place are to be seene yet at this day, (the Church almost fallen downe) as men goe from the Citie towards the Hauen of the Gruarij. This Towne belongs to the Forlani; and may be seene by those which saile on the left hand, neere to the Tower, called La Liamaiore.

The Dukes son taken at Sea.

The Duke voluntarily deposeth himselfe, & becomes a Monke.

¶ PIETRO CANDIANO the 19. Duke of Venice.

THe gouernment of Pietro Candiano or Sanuto, (for they report this ſurname to remaine euer after to the familie of the Candiani) ſucceeded this voluntarie diſmiſſion. This man was ſonne to the ſame Pietro who was ſlaine in the Dalmatian warre. Hee had a ſonne of the ſame name, who being ſent by his father to Greece, was by the Emperour created Prothoſpater. Some Authors refer the rauiſhment of the Maidens to theſe times; of whome albeit we haue ſufficiently ſpoken in the firſt Booke, yet becauſe the Hiſtorians doe likewiſe varie herein, it ſhall not be amiſſe here to ſaie ſomewhat of it. The Hiſtrians, who were at the ſame time enemies to the Venetians, did on a ſodaine take away certaine Maides by force, with their dowrie, out of Saint Peters Church, which ſtands in that part of the Citie, called the Caſtell, at ſuch time as they celebrated their marriage. Whereat the Citie being in an vp-roare: the Duke, after he had in haſt gathered together certaine forces, marched ſodainly after them, and ouertaking them in the marſhes of Caorli, as they were deuiding the ſpoile, he did furiouſly aſſaile them, and (as ſome ſay) did eaſily breake them. Others affirme that they fought furiouſly on either ſide, and that the battaile was verie bloudie; but that at laſt the enemies were all ſlaine, and their bodies flung into the Sea. And that in remembrance of this victorie, the yearely Games, called (of the married) were ordained. At a certaine day euerie yeare they carried twelue Virgins with great pompe round about the Citie. But this order being brought in by deuotion, was afterward changed into a meruailous abuſe. This cuſtome continued till the warres with the Genowaies, That twelue Virgins, adorned with gold and pretious ſtones, were yearely on a certaine day carried round about the Citie, in memorie of what had beene done: But the Genoways imploying thoſe of Chioggia and the Venetians in more important buſineſſes; this cuſtome was wholly aboliſhed. Diuers of the moſt authentike Hiſtorians doe affirme, that this hapned not vnder Pietro Candiano, but vnder Badoario his gouernment.

The originall of the plaies dedicated to them that are maried.

I finde that about the ſame time they made warre on thoſe of Commachia with proſperous ſucceſſe: who being ſummoned to reſtore what they had iniuriouſly taken from the wronged Venetians, refuſed ſo to doe, till at the laſt they were enforced; For they did not then only ſurrender the priſoners, but promiſed on their faith to doe whatſoeuer the Venetians would command them.

The Commachians vanquiſhed.

It is reported, that at the ſame time thoſe of the Cape of Hiſtria did yeeld themſelues ſelues to the Venetians. But it is likely, that they did it more by conſtraint, than of free will. For being aſſailed by the Venetians, for prophaning their ceremonies and rauiſhing the Virgins, they were conſtrained to make ſatisfaction, and to ſend yearely to Venice, for a tribute, an hundred peeces of wine. Pietro Biſhop of Oliuollo ſonne to Duke Pietro ſurnamed Tribuno, placed the bodies of Saint Saturnine, and Saint Nichodemus, in the Church of Saint Maria Formoſa. And this is all we finde to haue beene done, during the gouernment of Candiano; who dyed in the ſecond yeare of his regiment, or (as ſome others ſay) the latter end of the ſeuenth.

¶ Pietro Bodoario, the 20. Duke of Venice.

Pietro Bodoario ſucceeded him (who as hath beene ſaid) was taken priſoner in Sclauonia as hee returned out of Greece: This man did likewiſe gouerne the Common-wealth two yeares. Others ſay three; and affirme, that it was hee that ouercame the Hiſtrians in the marſhes of Caorli, and reſtored the Virgins of whome wee lately ſpake. More then this, I finde not anie memorable matter done by him.

¶ Pietro Candiano, the third, the 21. Duke of Venice.

Candiano

Candiano ſonne to Pietro ſucceeded him; who being by his father aſſociated to the gouernment, was for his great pride baniſhed. But waxing by yeares more wiſe and modeſt, hee was by the common conſent of the people reſtored to his loſt dignitie.

Complaints againſt the Narentines.

The Narentines in the meane time did by their theſts vexe all the neighbour-Seas, ſo as the Venetians condition was, in a manner, to bee compared to theirs, who are ſtreighly beſieged. The ſhame and anger ſtirred vp euery one to reuenge, ſaying; It was a diſhonour to the Venetians, who had in times paſt obtained ſo many goodly victories on the boſome of the waters, patiently to endure that a fewe baſe theeues who had no hope but in flight, ſhould ſo much preſume, as to leaue the Venetians nothing in ſafetie. That diuers euen till then had beene by them vndone euen in the Cities ſight, and that there remained nothing for them now to doe, but to come into the middeſt of the Citie, and knocke downe the wretched Citizens like heartleſſe beaſts. Being mooued with theſe complaints; they forthwith prepared a new Voyage againſt the Narentines. And for the ſame purpoſe thirtie three Sips (called for the maner of their building Gombaries) were ſet forth. Vrſo Bodoairio, and Pietro Roſſolo commanded the Armie. The Narentines being amazed, at the reporte of this Nauie, had not the ſpirits to attend them, but by Ambaſſadours they ſued for peace; which was graunted them vpon theſe conditions, That they ſhould pay vnto the Venetians the iuſt value of the hurt which they had till then done. Some ſay that the Fleete returned, as at other former times, without doing any thing at all.

A fleet ſent againſt the Narentines.

The League at the ſame time was renewed, with the Biſhop of Aquileia. Dominico Biſhop of Oliuollo cauſed certaine relickes of Saint Iohn Baptiſt to be reuerently placed in the Church, builded in times paſt by his Anceſtors, in that part of the Citie which is called Embragola. Duke Candiano in the meane time hauing three ſonnes, did elect for his Colleague, neither the eldeſt, nor the youngeſt, but the ſecond, called Pietro: who ſoone after became ſo inſolent, as hee durſt, in contempt of his fathers wholeſome Counſels, ſtirre vp certaine diſſolute perſons to raiſe a ſodaine ſedition in the Citie. The whole Senate, in manner, fauoured the old father. The animated ſeditious people followed the fooliſh young man; and the ſundrie affections of either party preuailed ſo farre, as the Citizens were like to haue aſſailed one another in the middeſt of the Citie. Candianos authoritie appeaſed thoſe tumultuous parties readie to fight, and on a ſodaine by the peoples commandement (the greateſt number of whom were actors in this conſpiracie) the ſonne was depoſed and baniſhed. And at the ſame inſtant the Clergie and the chiefe of the Citie ſware iointly, neuer to ſuffer neither in the fathers life time, nor afterward, that ſeditious perſon Pietro Candiano to be reſtored againe to his place, from the which he had iuſtly bin depoſed. Some ſay that he was by the people committed to priſon, and condemned to dye, but at his fathers requeſt they ſaued his life, and baniſhed him. In his exile he went to Rauenna to Guido ſonne to Berengarius, (ſome ſay Albert for Guido) and obtained meanes at Berengarius purſute, to make warre on the Venetians, whoſe enemie hee had beene proclaimed. Some thincke that Guido furniſhed him with ſix Gallies to this purpoſe: For no one particular man had been able to enterpriſe ſo great a matter, in a deiected fortune like his. This raſh young man did in ſhort time take certaine Venetian ſhippes, not farre from Rauenna, wherewith the old Duke was ſo grieued, as within fewe daies after he departed out of this life, after he had gouerned ſeauen yeares or (as ſome ſay) eleauen.

The Dukes ſon which was his Colleague ſtirres vp ſedition in the Citie.

The Dukes ſon baniſhed the Citie.

A ſolemme oath made by the Clergie and chiefe Citizens.

The ſonne warrs on the Venetians.

The Duke dyes for griefe.

Pietro

¶ PIETRO CANDIANO, the fourth, the 22. Duke of Venice.

THe Citie being busied about the election of a new Duke: (the peoples affections being euer inconstant) the whole multitude possessed with a wonderfull desire to see this absent yong man, did on a sodaine by a publike decree repeale Candiano from bannishment; and contrarie to the oath, made aswell by the Clergie as the Principall Citizens, installed him in his dead Fathers place. But soon after, the Citie, and Pietro himselfe receiued the punishmēt of their rashnesse. The one, for contemning her oath, endured a tirannicall gouernment, with a publike losse, by meanes of fier; And the other, for iniuring his Father and his Countrie. It is reported, that, the more to honor him, they sent three hundred barkes to Rauenna to accompanie him home. For it were a madnesse to thinke that they were so manie shippes, as some do write.

The Church of the Augustines builded.

Now in this Princes daies, Pietro Marturio Bishop of Oliuollo did with a sumptuous preparation builde the Church of the Augustines. Ambassadours likewise at the same time were sent to Rome to Pope Leo, and to the emperour Otho, to entreat them, that the Church of Grada might be declared by the generall Councell, then held at Rome, Metropolitane of the Venetians dominions, and of Histria. The which they did not onely obtaine, but brought home other priuiledges graunted to the Venetians.

The Generall Councell held at Rome, declares the Church of Grada for Metropolitan.

The Duke puts away his wife.

The Duke in the meane time did repudiate Ioane his wife, because (as he said) she was old. He had a sonne by her named Vitalis: who taking holie orders vpon him, was by his Father disinherited, vnder colour of entring into Religion: But it occasioned his future good; for he became afterwards Bishop of Grada. Now his wife being put away, and sent to Saint Zacharies Nunnerie, he married Vualderta daughter to Guido, with whom he receiued for her dowrie, great inheritances, manie slaues, and other riches. By meanes whereof, being puft vp with his great wealth, and new alliance, he vomited out his bad inclination, which till then hee had hidden, and gaue himselfe to all manner of vices; beginning openly to practize tirannie in sted of a iust gouernment. He became proude, and full of menaces. He had rather be feared than loued of the people. He did moreouer leuie a mightie Armie, and marched against the inhabitants of Vderza; saying that they did wrongfully hold from him certaine lands belonging to his wife. Hee did first spoile the Countrie round about, then he assailed the Citie; which, being taken, hee burned downe to the ground.

The Duke marrieth Vualderta daughter to Guido.

The Dukes tirannie.

Vderza taken and ruinated by the Duke.

Some

Some Authors affirme, that vpon the ſame occaſion he aſſailed likewiſe thoſe of Ferrara: and that he tooke by force a Citie of their confines. Theſe warlike actions made him more inſolent. For he placed a companie of ſoldiors in the Dukes Palace for his guard: and all his ſpeech and actions ſauoured of tirannie. The people calling to minde their ancient libertie, fel on a ſodaine vpon him, the ſeuenteenth yeare of his gouernment, as ſome ſaie, or the eighteenth, according to others. For the Hiſtorians doe much diſagree concerning the times of euerie Princes gouernment. But with his Guarde defending himſelfe valiantly from the top of his houſe, they ſet fier on the houſes next to the Palace on this ſide the Canall, on the ſame ſide the winde did blow, which being kindled, the flame did not onely burne the Dukes Palace but Saint Markes Church. Pietro ſeeing himſelfe inuironed with ſo manie miſeries, and that he muſt bee conſtrained either to giue place to the peoples furie, or elſe to die there, he tooke his yonge ſon which he had by this laſt wife in his armes, and went into that part of the Church which the fier had not yet touched, and comming forth by a priuie way, he endeuoured to ſaue himſelf and his ſonne by flight, whom he meant to carrie into Exile with him. But when he perceiued all the waies ſtopped with Armed men, he then fell to intreaties, That they would not fall vpon him as on a cruell beaſt; that they would abſtaine from hurting him, till he had excuſed himſelfe to the people: and then it ſhould be at their choice, either to put him to a cruell death, if they thought it fit, or elſe to ſaue his life, as by their bountie they had done in times paſt, whilſt his Father liued, at ſuch time as they accounted him guiltie of Treaſon. He did moreouer confeſſe, that the people might be iuſtly mooued againſt him, but yet, the yonge childe in his armes was innocent; that they ſhould doe a moſt vnworthie deede, If, for the hatred they did beare to the Father, they ſhould murther the innocent creature, who neuer yet had offended anie one. All theſe entreaties were vaine; and thoſe who aſſailed him cried out a loud, That it was lawfull for them (being an holie and iuſt matter) to take awaie a Tirant from the Common-wealth, whoſe excuſes could not be but wicked: And ſo ruſhing vpon him, he did in a moment fall downe dead to the ground, wounded in diuers places, with his yong ſonne likewiſe.

The people aſſaile the Duke.

The Duke ſeekes to ſaue himſelfe and his yong ſon.

The Dukes requeſt to the people.

The death of the Duke and his ſon.

Some ſaie, that they did cut the childes throate in the trembling nurſes armes, and that the bodies were by the peoples command throwne vpon the dunghill, and there left to bee eaten with dogges, but that at the intreatie of Giouanni Gradonico, that lamentable ſpectacle was remoued from the ſight of the multitude, and the bodies honorably buried in S^t. Hilaries Church. Some thinke that through the counſell of Pietro Vrſeolo, who was Duke after him, the people fired the houſes next to the Palace, and that it was done onely to hurt the Duke: But it fell out otherwiſe. For the force of the winde, and the houſes neere to the Palace did in ſuch ſort feede this fier, as, beſides the Palace, the moſt magnificent Cathedrall Church of the Citie, and thoſe of Saint Theodore the Martir, and Saint Marie Iubenica, with three hundred priuate houſes were the ſame daie burnt.

The bodies throwne vpon the common dunghill.

Buried afterwards verie honourably.

The great harm which the fier did the ſame day

The end of the third Booke of the firſt Decade.

THE FOVRTH BOOKE OF THE FIRST DECAD Of The Historie Of Venice.

¶ The Contents of the fourth Booke of the first Decad.

THe Dukes Palace, burnt in the last popular sedition, is repaired at VRSEOLO's cost, who succeeded CANDIANO. He giues a most rich Table to laie vpon Saint MARKES Altar. VITALIS Patriarch of Grada, sonne to the deceased Duke CANDIANO, flies to the Emperour OTHO. ADHELETA a most renowned Ladie, and her manie crosses. The league renued with those of the Cape of Histria. VRSEOLO, moued with a Religious desire, doth secretly leaue the Citie. The Common-wealth endangered by ciuile discorde. OTHO the second makes secret warre on the Venetians, whom he first seekes to ouercome by famine. Saint GEORGES Churche built right opposite to the great market-place. The description of the Countrie of Illiria. All Histria, and Dalmatia, brought vnder the subiection of VRSEOLO. The Emperour OTHO the third comes to Venice in disguise, and remaines secretly for a time with the Duke. The Phaledrini build Saint BENETS Church. The Venetian ouercomes the Hadrians neere to the mouthes of the Riuers Po, and Adice. They fight likewise afterward with good successe in Dalmatia, with Heresimus, King of Croatia. Prince OTHO banished. DOMINICO VRSEOLO flies to Rauenna the morrow after he had seised on the Dukes Palace, being driuen thence by the people. Those of Zara reuolt, after they had first yeelded to the Venetians. PEPIN, Patriarch of Aquileia, troubleth the quiet of the Common-wealth. From whence the Normans are descended, who haue a long time reigned in Italie and Sicilie. GISCARD their Captaine. The Venetians vanquish the Normans at Sea, neere to Durazzo.

THE Common-wealth hauing by the Dukes death preserued her ancient libertie, it was an hard matter to declare whether of these two were the greatest; either their ioye for being freed from tyrannie, or their sorrow to see so many publique and priuate buildings consumed to ashes by the late fire, which did maruellously deface the Cities beautie. But fearing least such an astonishment might breed some greater mischeife in the Citie (as it is often seene, that one new sorrow followeth another at the heeles) they forthwith created a new Duke. But yet they sought out one, differing in humour and qualitie from him that last deceased. But they needed not make any farre search, being so well furnished neere at hand.

¶ Pietro Vrseola, the 23. Duke of Venice.

He refuseth to take the charge vpon him.

THe vertuous wisedome of Pietro Vrseolo, being at the same time knowne to all men, was the cause, that at the generall assembly held at Saint Peters Church for the same purpose (which is at this day the Patriarks seat) he was with a generall applause declared Prince: who refusing this charge, tooke it vpon him at the peoples entreatie, who told him that he ought not to forsake the Commonwealth in so dangerous a season. Yet it is most certaine that hee vnwillingly embraced it. For being from his youth brought vp and trained in the loue of Iustice, hee was afraid of popular gouernment, which seldome or neuer respects the innocent. But the affection which hee did beare to his Countrie, for the which we are chiefly borne (as saith diuine Plato) made him not to abandon his fellow-citizens in so great a danger. So soone therefore as hee was chosen Prince, because there was some likelihood, that the state of the Common-wealth could not bee on a sodaine established, but that greater troubles were to be expected in a Citie newly mutinied for her Princes massacre; to the end to make the people more obedient, he bound them vnto him by oath: and protested, that hee would in no sort endure any enterprise to bee vndertaken against himselfe, nor the State, whilest hee should manage the soueraigne dignitie. And because the Pallace had beene burnt, he transported the ensignes and Ducall dignitie into his owne priuate house: meaning neuertheless to returne to the Pallace so soone as it should be reedified,

The people sweare to the Prince.

The Palace and Saint Markes Church repaired

His gouernment began by repairing these two places, which he did at his owne costs, more magnificently than they were before. Now the Church being thus beautified, hee caused the bodie of the Euangelist, which few people thought had escaped the fire, to be brought againe into it. He gaue besides to the same Church a table of gold, richly wrought at Constantinople, which hee caused to be dedicated with greate solemnitie on the high Altar.

Vrseolo ouercomes the Sarazens before Barri.

About the same time, or a little before, the Sarracens, being entred in two companies into Italie, after they had taken Capua, they besieged Barri by land and Sea, a towne seated betwixt Brundusium, and the mouth of the Riuer Ausida: the poore inhabitants whereof enduring all miseries through want of foode, were succored with victuals by the Venetians fleet vnder the conduct of Vrseolo. But because the Barbarians did notwithstanding ouer-streightly presse those of the towne, Vrseolo accompanied with the aide of Greece, came and fought with the enemie on the Sea, and hauing defeated the greatest part of them, and put the residue to flight, he purchaſed great glorie to the Venetians. He had but one ſonne by his wife Felicia, and as ſoone he was borne, they both vowed chaſtitie. He gouerned the State in the meane ſpace with ſuch wiſedome and integritie, as men did eaſily perceiue by his carriage, that he had not accepted the charge thereof for any deſire that he had to command, but for the good onely of the Common-wealth; in ſuch ſort as a peaceable gouernment had ſucceeded the tumults of the deceaſed Duke, if certaine Authors and Miniſters of the late Duke Candianos furie had not reſolued to trouble the publike peace.

to

The husband & wife vow chaſtitie.

At theſe mens perſwaſions, Vitalis Biſhop of Grada (who was as hath beene ſaid, reiected by his father vnder colour of entring into religion,) fled into Lombardie to the Emperour Otho the ſecond; where after hee had greatly complained of the miſerable death of his father Pietro, hee beſought him with great inſtance to reuenge it, in regard he had beene ſome time his frend and gueſt. Happily ſome would ſay, that hee was iuſtly ſlaine: but they could not ſay ſo of the young infant his brother, whom they had cruelly murthered in his fathers armes. He did moreouer manifeſt his owne baniſhment (which his very enemies lamented,) wherein he was likely to wax old and to die farre from his natiue Countrie, if he were not by ſome forraine aide reeſtabliſhed in the Citie, from whence he had beene ſo vniuſtly driuen by his fellowe Citizens.

The complaint of Vitalis Biſhop of Grada.

His complaint and teares did greatly mooue the Emperour Otho, who ſeemed priuatly to be greatly diſpleaſed at his gueſts miſerie, whereupon, after hee had giuen him ſome hope of returning into his Countrie, hee willed him to be of good courage, and to be merrie in his companie, till a fit occaſion were preſented to ſend him home, which he promiſed ſhortly to effect with all his power.

The Emperours anſwere to Vitalis.

Vualderta in the meane ſeaſon, Vitalis his mother in law, being come along with him, went to Adheleta, Othos mother, who then laie at Placentia, and by her meanes ſhe was ſoone after, with the conſent both of the Prince and people, admitted into the Citie. It is not vnneceſſarie (in regard it belongs to our Hiſtorie) briefly to rehearſe, by what meanes Adheleta returned to the Imperiall dignitie, from whence ſhe fell by the deceaſe of her firſt husband.

She married firſt of all the Emperour Lotharius, a great friend to the Venetians. He being dead, Berengarius his ſucceſſor confined her for euer into the Caſtle of La Garda, (whereof the goodlieſt Lake of Italie doth at this day beare the name) where ſhe was brought to ſuch pouertie, as begging her bread by letters and meſſages, ſhe led a miſerable life. Whereby wee may learne, that there is no man ſo great (did not the fooliſh admiration of wordly riches make men forget their weakeneſſe) but may confeſſe, that there is nothing in this world ſo firme and certaine, which a man may promiſe to himſelfe long to enioy, Adheleta eſcaping ſecretly from this place, came to Verona, to Alard, who (as I thinke) was Biſhop of the Citie: for it is certaine that the familie of the Alardi, are at this day of great account there. This man, becauſe hee had no place where he might hide ſuch a Ladie, ſent her to Accioni his vnkle, who was in times paſt a good friend to Lotharius, who hid her a long time in a countrie-houſe, tenne miles diſtant from the Citie, vntill ſuch time, as (knowne to himſelfe alone) ſhe married for her ſecond husband Otho the firſt, who carried her into Germanie; by whom he had a ſonne, which was the Emperour Otho the ſecond, of whom wee euen now ſpake: Who after he had not onely defeated Berengarius, and Albert his ſonne, but wholly ouerthrowne them, and by their ruines confirmed the Empire to himſelfe: hee made peace with the Venetians at the requeſt of his mother Adheleta, againſt whom he was incenſed for the murther of Prince Candiano.

A marueilous example of fortune.

Berengarius & his ſonne Albert defeated.

About the ſame time there aroſe a new ſtrife with thoſe of the Cape of Hiſtria, which was ſoone appeaſed by the meanes of a new League; wherin it was expreſly couenanted, That they ſhould paie vnto the Venetians euerie yeare an hundred Hogſheades of wine. The Biſhops of Grada haue for a certaine time gathered this tribute in the peoples name.

The Hiſtrians tributarie to the Venetians.

Thus ſtood the State of the Common-wealth, which was ſodainly depriued of the preſence of this good Prince, by an vnheard-of accident.

Guerin comes in pilgrimage to Venice.

A certaine man, named Guerin, comming from Aquitaine in pilgrimage to Venice, to viſit Saint Markes bodie, was brought before the Prince according to his appointment, which was, that all thoſe who ſhould come to the Citie for anie deuotion ſhould be bountifully entertained in his Pallace. This man hauing a great while diſcourſed of religion and of Pennance (for this ſtranger was by profeſſion a Moncke) brought the Prince by little and little to this paſſe, (who of himſelfe was ſufficiently addicted thereunto,) as he forthwith thought vpon meanes how he might giue ouer the gouernment. And to put it in practiſe, hee craued but ſo much time of the ſtranger, as was ſufficient for the quiet ſetling of the Common-wealth; and hauing prayed him to returne within a yeare, he diſmiſſed him. Vrſeolo in the meane time gaue himſelfe to all exerciſes of pietie, and taking vpon himſelfe the cauſe of the poore, he did comfort their pouertie with a meruailous affection. He built, beſides, a deuout Hoſpitall which is yet to be ſeene at this day right ouer againſt the great market-place. He did moreouer take into his owne protection, and maintained with an incredible charitie, the Colledges, the Clergie, and all Religious ſorts of people. He did patiently beare whatſoeuer Vitalis, (who was abſent) and his adherents did daily practiſe againſt him, whoſe wicked deſeignes were likewiſe (as ſome ſay) diuinely reuealed vnto him. At the laſt, after hee had ſpent the yeare in theſe good exerciſes, vpon a night, (for Guerin failed not to returne at the prefixed time) he left the Citie in diſguiſed habite, vnknown to his wife, his ſonne, and all his kins-folkes, and went on his iourney. When he forſooke his charge and Countrie, he was followed and accompanied by Giouanni Gradonico, Giouanni Moroſini, Remoaldo, and Marini of Rauenna: they all being partakers of his enterpriſe. He led in proceſſe of time ſo holie and religious a life, as after his death in Aquitaine, where he paſſed the remainder of his daies, hee was (as hath beene ſaid) honoured for many miracles.

The Prince reſolues to giue ouer his place.

How the Prince ſpent the time, in the meane ſpace, till he departed.

The Dukes ſecret departure.

¶ VITALIS CANDIANO, the 24. Duke of Venice.

The 50

THe Citie being depriued of ſuch a Prince was poſſeſſed with a meruailous ſorrow, but their deſire to haue him againe was much greater. Yet neuertheleſſe remembring the Common-wealth, they made haſt the next day to elect another in his ſted that was ſo much bewailed. Vitalis Candiano, ſonne to Pietro Candiano the third, was by the generall conſent declared Prince. At this mans entreatie, Vitalis, Patriarch of Grada, who till then for feare of the people had abſented himſelfe; was called home into his Countrie: And was ſoone after, by the Princes meanes, ſent in companie of the Ambaſſadours into Germanie vnto Otho, who extreamely hated the Venetians for the cruell death of Pietro Candiano. This Ambaſſade was to much purpoſe, for it did appeaſe the wrath of Otho; wherein, the preſence of Vitalis, ſonne to the murthered Duke, did greatly auaile them, of whom he had a verie great care, taking order for his ſafetie; which he could not haue done, if he had diſmiſſed the Ambaſſadours vnſatisfied.

Otho the ſecond bateth the Venetians.

In the meane ſpace Duke Candiano fell grieuouſly ſicke, a yeare and certaine moneths after his election; and imagining hee could not liue long, depoſing himſelfe from his charge, and vowing all the remainder of his dayes to a monaſticke life, he cauſed himſelfe to bee carried to Saint Hillaries Monaſterie, where within few daies after he dyed, and lies buried.

¶ Tribvno Memio, the 25. Duke of Venice.

Ribuno Memio, a great wiſe man, but of few words, was elected in his ſted. This man although he was very wiſe (as we haue ſaid) was not verie fortunate in his gouernment. For he was at times cruelly aſſailed by the conſpiracies of his fellow-Citizens. And moreouer, in his time the Moroſini and Caloprini two verie noble families, fighting one with the other, with greater hatred than force, cauſed the people manie times to behold verie vile and bloudie ſpectacles: of the which I know not whether I may reckon that for chiefe and moſt cruell, which in likelihood, though not in effect, was done by Stephano Calloprini; who came with his children, allies, and diuers others of his faction, well armed, to aſſaile the houſe of Moroſini, with an intent not onely to kill all the men, but wholly to extinguiſh (if it had beene poſſible) the name of the familie. This armed troupe marched through the Citie, readie to fight, with as great boldneſſe and hatred, as if it had beene againſt the publike enemie; wherat the people, being amazed, ſilently attended to ſee the iſſue therof, when as the Moroſini ſurpriſed perhaps, or elſe fearing their enemies, came not in ſight.

Ciuill diſcordes.

The cruel intent of the Caloprini.

I know not whether they defended themselues in their own houses, or whether dispersed through the Citie (which some doe affirme) they hid themselues in this tumult among their friends and kindsfolkes, and did not shew themselues. But the Citie could not escape that daie from beeing coloured with the bloud of her Citizens. For the mischief was, that albeit they fought not, yet nenertheless by chance there was a miserable murther committed. Dominico Morosino beeing met neere to the Castle was vnluckily slaine by the Caloprini: They beeing afterwards called in question for this murther, (for they were sure that those of the contrarie faction, aided by Tribuno, did Arme themselues to reuenge this iniurie) fledde with thier Captaine Stephano, to Verona, to the Emperour Otho the second; vnto whom, for hatred of the Prince, and the familie of the Morosini, they promised that state of Venice.

Dominico Morosino murthered.

The flight of the Calloprini to the Emperour Otho, with their promise to him.

Otho did willingly lend an eare to this offer, because hee perceiued the practisers to be of the chiefe of the Citie: But before hee would assaile them by open warre, he would trie whether he could winne them by famine. He forthwith forbad, ouer all Italie, anie traffike with the Venetians. He caused to be signified vnto them, that they should not enter into anie of the Cities of the Empire, neither vpon trafficke, nor any other pretence: If they did any thing rashly, hee would holde them afterwards for open enemies. By these menaces they soone knew whereunto Otho tended. For in shutting all manner of victuals from them, he meant to bring them to the last and most intolerable point of all miserie, which is hunger. But howsoeuer the Citie might be affrighted thereby, yet would not the Venetians seeme to bee amazed, nor make shew to vnderstand whereunto Otho his desseignes tended; dissembling their griefe and feare; resoluing rather to endure all extreames, than to lose their libertie. The want of all necessaries grew already verie great in the Citie, when those of Capodarger, enioying the same priuiledges with them (as oftentimes one mischiefe followes an other) reuolted against them. The inhabitants obtained of the Emperour for their reuolt, certaine inheritances of the Lauretans; to the end it might serue for a baite for others to doe the like.

The Emperours cruell Edict against the Venetians.

Otho the second his desigue.

The Venetians braue resolution.

The reuolt of Capodarger.

But these things beeing done abroade, and the Citie in the meane time pressed with want of all necessaries, they began to laie all the fault on those of the faction of the Caloprini, which were neere to Otho, accusing them that by their meanes and pursuite, the enemie laied all these trappes for them. Whereupon by a publick decree the houses of the Calloprini were wholly razed to the ground; their wiues and children committed to safe keeping; and the remainder of their goods confiscate. Otho in the meane space perseuering in his selfe-will, not to make open war vpon the Venetians, nor yet to haue peace with them, went to Rome; where being stricken with a sodaine disease he within few daies died. The Venetians were by his death (as at sundrie other times) deliuered from a great danger.

The peoples reuenge on the Caloprini.

The Death of Otho the second.

Adheleta, after Otho dis decease, not willing to abandon the Caloprini obtained of the Venetians, that Stephano, and those who had followed him, should be repealed from banishment: which the Prince and people granting at Adheleta's request, and the Calloprini being returned into their Countrie: it hapned that foure of the Morosini, remembring fore-passed wrongs, did assaile and kill three brethren of the Caloprini, sonnes to Stephano, as they returned to the Palace, entring into a boate to goe home to their houses. The Duke was suspected, and the people beleeued it, that this murther was committed by his consent; but hee cleared himselfe in open Assembly.

The Caloprini return to Venice.

Three sonnes of Stephano Caloprini slaine.

The same Prince gaue to Giouanni Morosino at his returne from Aquitain, whither he had accompanied Vrseolo, Saint Georges Church which stands right ouer against the Market-place, with the Marshes adioining, which were dependancies of the Dukes Chappell, vpon condition to build thereupon a Monasterie for the Religious of the order of Saint Bennet. He sent his sonne Mauritio to Basilius Emperour of Greece; to the end, that being honoured by him with certaine titles, hee might ap-appeare more notable among his fellow-Citizens. All theſe things thus executed, he was ſurprized with a grieuous diſeaſe: by meanes whereof he voluntarily depoſed himſelfe: or (as ſome ſay) he was conſtrained ſo to doe by the people, the foureteenth yeare of his gouernment, for that in the ciuill diſſenſions he had carried himſelfe not like a iuſt Prince, but had euer fauoured one ſide more than another. He liued not long after: for ſo ſoone as he had made himſelfe a Monke, he died forthwith.

The Duke voluntarily depoſeth himſelfe.

¶ PIETRO VRSEOLO, the ſecond, the 26. Duke of Venice.

Ietro Vrſeolo was by the people declared his ſucceſſor. This dignitie was foretold him a long time before, as by a Diuine preſage, by his Father who was a man of an holie life. During his gouernment, the Venetians State did meruailouſly encreaſe both at home and abroade. Firſt of all hee obteined of Baſilius and Alexis (who at the ſame time did iointly command the Grecian Empire) that through all their Dominions, the Venetian Marchants ſhould be free by Sea and land from al cuſtomes and tributes. He did moreouer by his Ambaſſadours, purchaſe the frendſhip of the Kings of Ægypt and Siria. Then did he win by bountie, and good offices, the greateſt Lords of Italie. So ſoone as hee perceiued a conuenient time to reuenge all the wronges which the Venetians had receiued of the Narentines; hee forbad to paie them any more the accuſtomed yearely tribute, for the free commerce and Nauigation of the coaſt of Dalmatia. The Narentines being thereby incenſed againſt the Venetians, did ſodainely rob and ſpoile: And not ſatisfied with their thefts at Sea, they came on ſhoare & ſpoiled the Countrie neere to Zara: For that Citie alone, of all the reſt of Dalmatia, was at the ſame time ſubiect to the Venetians. But the Venetians were not onely moleſted by theſe incurſions, but all the neighbour-Nations Likewiſe: who after they had endured it with much diſcontentment for a while, perceiuing the furie of theſe robbers, who abuſed their patience, daily to encreaſe, and foreſeeing that thoſe inſolent people, would neuer giue ouer, vnleſſe their attempts were aſſiſted: Diuers Dalamatians, not finding themſelues alone ſtrong enough for ſuch an enterpriſe, had recourſe to the Venetians. The Ambaſſadours of Liburnia, and Hiſtria, came thither likewiſe, being all of them ſent for this purpoſe, to treate with the Prince in the name of their Common-wealths; That if he would ſend a mightie fleet into Dalmatia againſt the Narentines, to defend the Sea-coaſtes, and the neere neigh-

The Venetians free ouer all the Grecian Empire.

Prohibitions to pay no more tribute to the Barbarians.

The Narentines great incurſions.

The Ambaſſadors of Dalmatia, Liburnia, and Hiſtria come to Venice to complaine of the Narentines.

nieghbours thereof, from the theftes of theſe Pirats; that it would come to paſſe (which they in the name of their fellow-citizens did promiſe) that all Dalmatia along the Sea-coaſt, Liburnia, and Hiſtria, would ſubmit themſelues vnder the Venetians dominion. The offers which the Ambaſſadours made, did puffe vp the Princes minde, and filled the whole Citie with great hope one day to be Lords of Dalmatia. Whereupon, fearing to looſe ſuch an occaſion, they reſolued to ſend forth a mightie Fleet. But before wee ſpeake of the ſetting out thereof, wee muſt briefly make mention of the ſituation of that Prouince; fetching it from farre.

The Ambaſſadors offers to the Venetians.

Deſcription of Illiria.

The Grecians called thoſe Illirians, which inhabited the vpper parts of Macedonia and Thrace, from the Cahonians and Theſprotti, vnto the Riuer of Hiſtria, encreaſing in bredth from the hilles of Macedon and Thrace, euen to the Peonians, and the Ionian Sea, containing in all fiue daies iourney, and in length thrice aſmuch. The which being meaſured by the Roman Authors, was found to containe 6000. ſtadij in length, and 1200. in bredth. Whereby it is apparent, that the Ancients haue called all that Illiria, which is contained within theſe limits euen to the Adriatick-Sea: comprehending therein Dalmatia and Liburnia.

They ſaie beſides, that the Prouince, and the Nation, were ſo named by Illirius, ſonne to Poliphemus and Galathea, ſometimes Lords of that Countrie; that Dardanus, Taulanus, with others, were his children, from whom the Dardanians and Taulantians, people of Dalmatia, are deſcended. This Prouince, ſuch as it is, did in times paſt containe, according to the ancient diuiſion of the Coſmographers, Liburnia and Dalmatia. At this preſent all that Countrie whith lieth from Hiſtria, verie neere to Liburnia, which ſtretcheth it ſelfe towards the Adriatick-Sea, and almoſt to the riuer Drillon, is called Dalmatia. Thoſe who inhabited vpon this riuer, were the Dalmatians in times paſt. Since then, the Epirots being driuen forth of their Countrie, poſſeſſed this Prouince euen to Macedon: and all the Region is by the Moderns called Albania. In this ſort Dalmatia extends it ſelfe more from the North to the South than from the Eaſt to the Weſt.

Albania is a part of Illiria.

Now the armie being in a readineſſe, and the Soldiours ſhip't, after that Vrſeolo had receiued the publicke enſignes in the Church of Oliuollo from the hands of the Biſhop, he ſailed into Dalmatia. It was then the ſpring-time, and ſailing pleaſantly, he arriued firſt at Aquileia, after at Grada. Vitalis Biſhop of the Citie accompanied with the whole Clergie and the people, went out to meete him, and after he had welcomed him: Take (ſaith he) Vrſeolo this banner of Saint Hermagoras, which I wiſh may be fortunate to thy ſelfe and to the Commonwealth: cauſe thy Soldiours to follow it, among the enſignes of their Countrie, and let them fight valiantly vnder it: I hope that thou wilt one day confeſſe, that this banner which wee giue thee hath no leſſe aided thee in the obtaining of the victorie, than the ſtrength and courage of thy people. Wee are not ignorant how that by valour all Commonweales are well gouerned; but they are much better, when they haue God for their guide. I doe accept (ſaith the Duke) this thy Preſage, and I pray thee, when we are departed hence, to beſeech that good God to graunt vs a proſperous voiage, and victorie ouer our enemies. Then bidding him farewell, hee came with a faire winde ſodainly into Hiſtria.

The Venetians Armie againſt the Narentines.

The Biſhop of Grada his preſent to the Duke.

Hiſtria is at this day the fartheſt Countrie of Italie, a neighbour in times paſt to Liburnia and conſiſteth wholly almoſt of Iſlands: The Venetians firſt landing was at Parenza, but he was ſcarſely come to the Iſland next to the Citie, when as Andrea Biſhop thereof, accompanied with all the inhabitants, came forth to meete him, and committed his owne perſon his Citizens, and all their meanes, as well publicke as priuate, into the Venetians hands. The Prince beeing enuironed with troopes of Soldiours made his entrie into the Citie, where he did not faile to viſit the bodie of Saint Mauro.

The Duke arriueth at Parenza

The fleete being gone from Parenza, came to the Iſland neere to Pola, which is a verie ancient Citie of Hiſtria, builded (as hath been ſaid elſewhere) by the Colchi-

The Duke commeth to Pola.

ans

ans. At his arriuall, the Polani following the example of the Parentines, came with one accord, with Bercaldo their Bishop, to receiue the Venetians. Sundrie other people, who had beene a long time desirous to yeeld vnto them, ran to meet Vrseolo in the same place, where by their Ambassadors they submitted themselues vnder their obedience.

Vrseolo, after hee had made some stay there, as well to giue audience to the Ambassadors, and to receiue their othes and homage, as to leuie new soldiours whom he embarqued; he held his course towards Zara. That Citie was not long before yeelded to the Venetians, in regard whereof all the people went out to meet and receiue them with great ioy, calling them their Lords, and deliuerers. The Bishops of Coricta and Arba came thither soone after, with the Commissioners of their Cities, to sue for peace, and to receiue his command; swearing and protesting, inuiolably to perfourme what soeuer he should command them; adding thereunto, that they would in their praiers make mention of the Duke of Venice, as they did of the Emperour. All things falling out thus luckily for the Venetians on the coast of Dalmatia, Murcemirus, who, after hee had banished his elder brother, did possesse the kingdome of Croatia (namely that Croatia the red, which the Modernes haue termed to be a part of Illiria, which extends it selfe from the desert plaines, which lie almost in the middest of the Prouince, euen to Durazzo) fearing least the Venetian, spurred forward by the happie fortune which accompanied him, would enter too farre into Dalmatia, made hast by his Ambassadours to insinuate himselfe into the Dukes fauour, promising the Venetians all aide and succour.

The occasion of his staie there.
The Dukes comming to Zara.
Coricta and Arba rendred to him.
Murcemirus king of Croatia sends Ambassadors to the Duke.

The Duke in the meane time sent ten Gallies from Zara to spoile the Narentines Countrie: These Gallies surprised neere to the Island next to Belgrade, called by the inhabitants Chama, fortie Narentine marchants, who were returned from Apulia. Some saie that their comming was discouered by spies, and that therefore the Gallies were sent to meete them. The Duke, after he had refreshed himselfe, did forthwith follow them; but he found, that, before his arriuall, those whom he had first sent had taken the Island, neere to the which wee haue said the Narentines were surprised. Whereby it came passe that vpon Vrseolo his arriuall, the Ambassadors of Belgrade & Trahu, came thither likewise to receiue the Venetians gouernment. These men did promise aud sweare in the name of their Common-wealth, to remaine for euer obedient to the Venetians hauing of their own accord requested that it might be so. Trahu is an Island of Dalmatia ioining almost to the firme Land, with a Citie of the same name builded by the Issetes. Suringa of Croatia, brother to Murcemirus, was in this Island, who after the yeelding vp thereof gaue his sonne Stephen for hostage to the Duke, whom the Venetian did afterwards marrie to his daughter Hicela.

Fortie Narentine marchants taken.
The yeelding vp of Belgrade and Trahu.
The yeelding of Spalatra.

The fleet afterward departed to other places of Dalmatia. Spalatra, a verie rich Towne in those daies, following the example of her neighbours, receiued the Venetians into her wals. After that, he went to Corcira the black, now called Cursula, the which refusing to obey his commandements was taken by force: That being done, the Venetian Gallies came neere to the Isle of Pharos, (called likewise by the Modernes Lesnia in sted of Pharos, by corruption of the language) where they espied a fort builded on great Rockes in the middest of the Sea, which a farre off seemed impregnable to the beholders. The nature of the place had till then caused the Narentines to commit infinite robberies at Sea, who in case of necessitie had that place alwaies for an assured retreit.

The taking of Corcyra the blacke.
The situation of Pharos.

There was likewise in the same Island a towne, stronge both by Art and Nature: not farre from whence the Venetian Marchants were wont to bee rob'd and taken. The Gallies at their arriuall tooke the Hauen of the Island. Then they summoned the inhabitants to yeeld, willing them, by the examples of others, not to trie the furie of the Venetian armes: telling them that it was a follie for them to saie, that they had rather endure all shamefull extremities with the hazard of their liues, than to pre-preſerue their children, and their goods, by receiuing the Venetian quietly into their Citie. This was ſundrie times told them, that they ſhould beware, leaſt by their obſtinacie they did incenſe the Venetians againſt them: that after the aſſault ſhould be begun, there would be no hope of compoſition. There was ſome likelihood that they would willingly haue receiued a Garriſon, and obeied forthwith, if they had beene certaine to haue beene receiued on the ſame conditions as others were; but fearing (that which was true) that if the Venetians were maſters of the Towne they would raze it downe to the ground, the loue to their Countrie, (which is that we chiefly loue) made them reſolute to defend themſelues and to beate backe the enimie. The Duke on the contrarie, ſo ſoone as hee had vnderſtood the meaning of the townſ-men, commanded to begin the aſſault. The Iſlanders did brauely defend themſelues. There was a Caſtle (as hath beene ſaid) inacceſſible by reaſon of the ſteepneſſe of the place: but the Venetians from the foote of the hill ſhot at once ſuch a number of arrowes vpon the beſieged, as being couered therewith like a cloud, they were conſtrained to abandon their places of defence. Then they which were in the ſhippes, with the hired Soldiours, did goe vp by the broken and pathleſſe places of the mountaine euen to the toppe: Thoſe within the Town being amazed to ſee them there, beganne to defend themſelues, and the Venetians did furiouſly aſſaile them. and hauing ſet vp skaling ladders in diuers places, they beganne a cruell fight on either ſide. The hope to winne the Towne if they would a little ſtriue to doe valliantly, encreaſed the Venetians ſtrength; and deſpaire poſſeſſed the other. A Tower in the meane time was taken by a few, who expulſed the enemie from that ſide, and made themſelues maſters of the wall: Then thoſe within being amazed flung downe their weapons, and vpon their knees cried for mercie. At this noiſe the gentle and mercifull Prince commanded to pardon thoſe that were diſarmed; and the Towne being razed downe to the earth by his commandement, he departed ſodainly from thence, and came to Saint Maximins. The Commiſſioners of Raguſa with their Biſhop came and met him, and ſubmitted themſelues to him and to the Venetian people.

The Venetian Gallies surprise the Hauen of Pharos.
Those of Pharos summoned.

What moued thoſe of Pharos to defend themſelues.

The taking of the caſtle and towne of Pharos called Leſina.

The Citie of Pharos deſtroied.

The Duke after that, entring their Countrie in hoſtile manner, did put all to fire and ſword. The enemies being amazed at this ſpoile ſent their Ambaſſadours to ſue for peace, which was graunted them on theſe conditions; To paye vnto the Venetians the iuſt value of all the loſſe they had ſuſtained from the beginning of the warres; neuer after, to exact any more tribute; and not to ſuffer any Lord of their owne nation, or a ſtranger for them, and in their name, to ſpoile and robbe at Sea. The Narentines, who had made warre on the Venetians for the ſoueraigntie at Sea the ſpace of one hundred three ſcore and tenne yeares, with different ſucceſſe many times, embracing peace, which was more neceſſarie, than honorable for them, did willingly accept theſe conditions. All the priſoners being ſet at libertie, the victorious Armie was embarqued.

The conditions of peace graunted to the Narentines.

The Duke returnes to Venice

The Duke, after hee had freed the Sea from Pirats, and brought all the Sea-coaſts of Dalmatia, Liburnia, & Hiſtria, vnder the Venetians ſubiection, he returned with a proſperous winde to Venice: where hee entred, almoſt in a manner triumphantly (the true ancient triumphes being no more in vſe) being enuironed by the people, who highly praiſed him for his great victories vnto; whom after hee had related what he had done, and how by the grace of Almightie God, and his owne conduct, he had ſubiected to the Venetians all the Sea-coaſts from Hiſtria, euen to the fartheſt parts of Dalmatia, with all the Iſlands neere adiacent, he was greatly extolled in an Oration: And it was decred, that euer after, both he and his ſucceſſors, ſhould carrie the title of the Duke of Venice, and Dalmatia; beſeeching God that the ſame might be proſperous to him, and to the Venetian Nation likewiſe.

New officers ſent to the Cities newly conquered

It was moreouer thought fit to ſend new Magiſtrates to all the Cities of this new Prouince. It is thought, that Otho Vrſo was ſent to Raguſa; his ſonne to Spalatra; Dominico Polano to Trahu; Giouanni Cornare to Sicore; (called Sibinica by the Moderne dernes) Vitalis Michaeli to Belgrade; and others to other townes, whose names the length of time hath worne out.

Vrseolo repaired the Citie of Grada; and with great cost caused diuers Palaces to be builded. He caused the holie bodies of Fortunatus, and Hermagoras, with those of Dionise, Largius, and Hermogenes, to be new in-shrined. He caused likewise a goodly Pallace to be built at Heraclea, with a Church, according to those times; the towne being then smally inhabited.

He did in such sort terrifie Giouanni Bishop of Belluna, who troubled the Venetians, by a sodaine prohibition to his subiects not to trafficke in any sort with them, as hee did forthwith surrender whatsoeuer had beene taken (vnto which the commandement of the Emperor Otho could neuer induce him) withall & humbly sued for peace: which because it should last the longer, he would haue confirmed by a new alliance. He sent his young sonne afterwards to Verona to the Emperour Otho, who had sent for him by letters, whom at the holie Sacrament of Confirmation he named Otho, who was called before then Peter. He did moreouer obtaine of the same Emperour diuers new immunities and priuiledges of Faires, & Ports. Concerning likewise the limits of Heraclea, which extended in time past to the Riuer of Piauo, Giouanni Diacono (whom the Prince had sent to Verona to acquaint the Emperour with the conqueste of Dalmatia) had commandement to treat with him about it, who easily obtained, that they should stand at the same stay, as they had done in ancient time.

The Emperour grants sundrie priuiledges to the Venetians.

Otho went to Rome, from whence resoluing to returne into Lombardie, hee commanded Giouanni (who went along with him) to write to Vrseolo, that hee would be shortly at Rauenna, & from thence would secretly come to Venice, to performe a vow that he had made, and that therefore he desired to haue his comming kept secret, because his determination was to come thither in disguise and with a small traine. The Duke, meruailous ioyfull at these newes, did with a wonderfull affection attend the comming of such a gueste. The Emperour in the meane space came to Rauenna, and from thence to Pomposia, a place verie neere Ghoria at the mouth of the Riuer Po. Then in the night entring into a boat with fiue of his household seruants, and Giouanni Diacono, he came with a faire wind to Venice. Hee went rather to the Monasterie of Saint Seruula, than to anie Inne or Citizens house, to the end that his comming might be the better concealed. The Prince came to him by night in the same place, where after a reciprocall gratulation, for the arriuall of the one in health and with a prosperous winde to Venice, and for the others happie exploits in Dalmatia, they came about mid-night into St. Markes Church, from whence, so soone as Otho had made his prayers and accomplished his vow, they went to the Pallace. And because each of them were verie desirous to haue the arriuall of this new gueste kept secret; so long as the Emperour staied in Venice, the Duke euerie day dined in publike, but he supt in priuate with him. And to the end they might be allied together not onely by the law of friendship & hospitalitie but by another more strict and holie band, Otho held a daughter of the Dukes, then new borne, at the Font, the same day she was baptized: He did for euer remit to the Venetians the Cloake of cloth of gold, which the Common-wealth by accord solemnly sworne to, were yeerely bound to giue vnto the Emperours. Being honored likewise by the Duke with diuers great and rich presents hee went back againe to Rauenna.

The Emperour Otho comes to Venice in disguise.

The Dukes great wisdome.

Three dayes after Otho was departed, the Duke commanded a generall assemblie, where he publikely declared how that the Emperour Otho had beene in Venice; in what manner he had beene at home with him for certaine dayes; and what he had obtained of him. It was verie pleasing to the people, and they greatly praised Vrseolos wisdome for concealing the presence of so great a Prince. And because he had so well deserued of the Common-wealth, they permitted him soone after by a decree to associate Giouanni his sonne into the Principalitie; whom hee sent thus honoured honoured with the soueraigne dignitie, with his wife, and Otho his brother, to Constantinople, to the Emperours Constantine and Basilius; from whence they returned soone after to Venice laden with diuers rich presents.

The Duke permitted to associate Giouanni his sonne into the gouernment.

Plague and famine in the Citie.

But because neuer anie humane prosperitie was seene to bee exempt from one troublesome accident or other of Fortune; it hapned thus, that before this old man, (otherwise most fortunate,) dyed, he saw by two extreame miseries, Plague and Famine, and by the decease of his sonne and daughter in law, hapned almost on one day, the course of his happie fortune altered. He was after that constrained to enter into controuersie with those of Cap-darger, and with the Sacceans, with the one for refusing to pay the tribute called Ripetta, and with the other about the Marshes of the Lauretans: But he ended them both as he wished, to the profit and honour of the Common-wealth.

The Church and Monasterie of Saint Benet buil'ded by the Phaledrini.

At the same time the Phaledrini, a noble familie, caused the Church and Monasterie of St. Benedict to be builded, which they enriched with diuers great and goodlie inheritances neere adioyning. It is reported that the Duke was verie carefull to end the reparations of the Palace, and the Church neere adiacent. Then by his last will he diuided his wealth into three partes. The first and greatest, hee bequeathed to his children; the second he would haue to be imployed for the succouring of poore people and repairing of Churches: and the third to bee spent in his life time in publicke shewes, guifts, and liberalitie to the people. Those things being accomplished at home and abroad, hee deceased the eighteenth yeare of his gouernment. His bodie, bewailed of all men, was carried to Saint Zacharies Church and there honorably buried.

The Dukes last will.

¶ Otho Vrseolo, the 27. Duke of Venice.

Otho, his sonne, a young man of great hope, and worthie of such a father and grand-sire, men of great deuotion, did with the generall consent of all the Citizens succeede him. Hee beganne his gouernment with the same wisdome which all men expected, at what time Geica King of Hungarie being mooued by the reporte of his great reputation, gaue him his daughter in marriage. Hee defeated the Hadrians neere to Lauretta, betwixt the mouthes of the Riuers Po and Adice: for that they had spoiled the Venetian frontires; and hauing vanquished them, he made peace with them, vpon condition they should surrender both to the Lauretans that which they had lost loſt, and ſhould make no more incurſions afterward. But it is reported that the Hadrians, who before that time had beene very mightie, did ſo ſodainely decaie by the loſſe of Lauretta, as ſince then waxing daily worſe and worſe, they could neuer afterward recouer themſelues.

The Hadrians defeated by the Duke.

About the ſame time Murcimirus (I finde in ſome Authours Hereſimus for Murcimire) Lord of Croatia, did very much moleſt thoſe of Zara contrarie to the agreement lately made, and did inceſſantly ouer-runne the whole Countrie. And the neighbour Cities likewiſe had already felt the furie of the Croatian Armies, when Otho reſoluing to reuenge it, marched againſt the Barbarian; who daring to tarrie for him and to offer battaile, was by him verie eaſily broken and deſeated: But thoſe Authours whom we follow, doe not ſet downe, whether it were by Sea or Land. Otho purſuing this happie victorie, after he had ſcoured with his Armie all the Sea, coaſts of Dalmatia, Liburnia, and Hiſtria, which his Father had ſubdued to the Venetians, he entred vnder colour of taking notice of the State of the Prouince into all their Cities, and aſſemblies; he cauſed the inhabitants to make new oaths of fidelitie, that they ſhould euer after continue faithfull to the Venetians, in the ſame manner as they had voluntarily ſubmitted themſelues, and not to permit any whatſoeuer to practiſe ought againſt their State. At his returne from Dalmatia, he was vnfortunately ſurpriſed by the conſpiracie of Dominico Flabenico, who after he had ſhauen his beard, draue him into Greece, the fifth yeare after hee had taken the gouernmenr alone vpon himſelfe: where ſoone after he dyed.

Otho vanquiſheth the King of Croatia.

Conſpiracie againſt the Duke and his baniſhment.

¶ Pietro Centranico, the 28. Duke of Venice.

Pietro Centranico or Barbolano (for both theſe ſurnames are found in this family) ſucceeded Otho thus baniſhed. This man entring into the Gouernement of his Countrie, which was full of troubles at home, and abroad, tooke great care which buſineſſe to take in hand firſt; Yet neuertheleſſe he thought it beſt to reduce the Citie into her former peaceable eſtate, being yet in an vproare, by meanes of this cruell conſpiracie, and the baniſhment of this good Prince. In the meane time Pepin Patriarch of Aquileia, preſuming on the aſſurance of theſe troubles, and on the flight of the Biſhop of Grada (for ſome write that Vrſus Biſhop of that place after his brothers baniſhment fearing to be trecherouſly ſurpriſed by thoſe of the cõtrary faction, fled) ſeized on Grada, as though he ment to keepe it for Vrſus in his abſence. Others affirme that it was taken by force, in the behalfe of Vrſus, from the Venetian Garriſon which kept it, the which is altogether vntrue. For if they had beene then friends, they would not both of them at the ſame time haue pleaded the controuerſie of their Churches at the Councell held at Rome, not without great ſuſpition of enuie and hatred; where it is reported that the Pope and the whole aſſembly declared the Church of Grada to be the Metropolitan of the whole Venetian Territorie. But it is certaine, that the Emperour Conrade was at the ſame time in the behalfe of Pepin greatly incenſed againſt the Venetians, declaring himſelfe in ſome matters their open enemie.

Pepin Patriarch of Aquileia diſquiets Grada.

Centranico depoſed from his dignitie, & by the people ſhorne and made a Moncke.

In this ſtate ſtood the affaires of the Venetians, when as Centranico after hee had commanded foure yeares, was (as ſome ſay) at the purſuite of Vrſus Biſhop of Grada, taken by the people, hauing his head and beard ſhauen, and in the habit of a Monke was baniſhed. He thus exiled, the people commanded Vrſus to take vpon him the publike Gouernment, and to command as Duke, till ſuch time as Otho his brother ſhould be called home from baniſhment: Thoſe which were ſent for that purpoſe, brought backe word that at their comming into Greece they found Otho dead, a little before their arriuall, as though it had ſo hapned by the diuine permiſſion, to the end that this ingratefull Citie might not bee ſo happie as once againe to enioy ſuch a Noble man, Sonne to ſo good a Prince, and himſelfe ſo well deſeruing of the Commonwealth, whom it had ſuffered to bee ſo ignominiouſly handled by the conſpiracie of a fewe, againſt whom being able to haue oppoſed her ſelfe, yet would not. Vrſus hauing notice of his brothers death, did voluntarily depoſe himſelfe, and went to his owne houſe, after he had commanded one yeare.

Otho dieth in Greece.

Vrſus hauing retired himſelfe, Dominico Vrſeolo moued rather by the reputation of his Anceſtors (for he was neere kinſman to Otho) than by the fauour and conſent of the people, ſeized indiſcreetly on the Dukes Palace. But the people mindfull of their libertie, foreſeeing how vnleſſe they did oppoſe themſelues againſt the attempts of that inſolent Citizen, that on a ſodaine the euill diſpoſed perſons induced by that pernicious example, would without any reſpect vſurpe the Gouernment, came the morrow after his entrance and aſſailed him, and had vndoubtedly ſlaine him, had he not ſecretly fled away to Rauenna, where ſoone after he died.

Dominico Vrſeolo, vſurpes the Dukes Pallace.

¶ DOMINICO FLABENICO,
the 29. Duke of Venice.

Dominico

DOminico Flabenico created by the generall consent of all men succeeded the short gouernment of Vrseolo. This man (as hath beene said) was the Authour of Otho his banishment; and therefore during the gouernment of Vrso Bishop of Grada, hee was banished the Citie as an enemie, but not long after, hee was repealed at the peoples request. So soone as he had receiued the gouernment, hee propounded to the people, that he thought it fit and most profitable for the Common-wealth, to driue the familie of the Vrseoli out of the Citie, as pernicious enemies to the publique quiet. He willed them then to assemble themselues, and to declare the Vrseoli vnworthy euer after to execute the soueraigne dignitie, or any other Office whatsoeuer: or to haue any authoritie to be present at the suffrages, and that they should adiudge them common enemies, and, as such, banish them. The people being ill aduised, hauing alreadie forgotten the sundrie deserts and benefits of this familie, making themselues the ministers of an other mans hatred, did sodainely consent thereto. After this sort, this familie, till then famous, and which had affoorded so many worthie men to the Common-wealth, was by this ignominie so deiected, as it could neuer after rise againe. He did likewise abolish the custome of associating a Colleague in the Principalitie, the which as most profitable is carefully obserued vnto this day. I find no memorable matter done by him abroad, but being oppressed with yeares he departed this life.

Great ingratitude of the Venetians.
The family of the Vrseoli for euer banished from the Citie.
The custome of taking a Colleague into the Principalitie abolished.

¶ DOMINICO CONTARENO, the 30. Duke of Venice.

DOminico Contareno was by the generall consent of all men established in his place. Pepin in the meane time had molested all the places round about Grada, and for that time there was nothing decreed against him, in regard the City was then busied in affaires of more importance. Those of Zara had yeelded to the Lord of Croatia, or (as some write) to Salomon King of Hungarie. At the report hereof, (for it was to bee supposed, that vnlesse the Venetian Armie did speedily passe into Dalmatia, the other Countries which were now readie to rebell would soone after reuolt from the Venetians) the Duke with a great fleet sodainely hasted to Dalmatia; besieged Zara; and tooke it by force. The report of the repriſall of Zara auailed much to containe the other Cities in their dutie and fidelitie.

Zara taken againe which was reuolted.

Pepin in the meane ſpace tooke Grada the ſecond time by aſſault, and did more harme at this entrie, than at the former. The Venetians iuſtly moued by this iniurie, determined before they would reuenge it, to aduertiſe Pope Benedict of the wrong which Pepin had done them, reſoluing that if he did not obey the Pope, who they thought would redreſſe it, to reuenge the loſſe of Grada by Armes. Pepin ſodainely obeyed the Popes commandement; but being of an obſtinate and turbulent ſpirit, he dyed (as ſome ſay) ſoone after miſerably.

Pepin obeyes the Popes commandement.

Some write that Pope Leo came at the ſame time to Venice. But if they ſent to Pope Benedict concerning the buſineſſe of Grada (as hath beene ſaid) following the opinion of diuers, I cannot imagine how the Popes name ſhould bee ſo ſodainely changed; which makes me to thinke that it hapned by the negligence of ſome writers, who haue ſet downe Benedict for Leo, or on the contrarie, Leo for Benedict, or that (which is moſt likely) that theſe things were done at ſundrie times. They ſay the occaſion of his iournie was to viſite the body of Saint Marke: and they affirme that hee gaue diuers great priuiledges to his Church, and to diuers others in the Citie.

Pope Leo comes to Venice.

VVee finde alſo that about the ſame time, thoſe of Apulia fought diuers times with Robert ſurnamed Guiſcard, a Norman by Nation, whoſe power at the ſame time was very great in Italie: The which neuertheleſſe I dare not altogether affirme, becauſe of all thoſe Authours, whom wee follow, there is but one which makes mention thereof.

¶ DOMINICO SILVIO, the 31. Duke of Venice.

THis is all which hapned vnder the gouernment of Prince Contareno, who the ſix and twentieth yeare of his Principalitie dyed: he was buried in Saint Nicholas Church, his funerall being followed by great multitudes of people. Dominico Siluio was by ſodaine acclamation of the people; as hee followed the bodie, ſaluted Duke. He is reported to haue married a wife from Conſtantinople, ſo full of arrogancie and greekiſh pride, who (as ſaith Damian) was ſo nice and delicate in her manner of life, as ſhee would neuer waſh with ordinarie water, ſhee neuer touched her meate but with a forke of gold, her Chamber was perfumed with ſuch rare odours, as the ſenſes of thoſe which came into it were ouercome with the ſweetneſſe thereof. But as nothing is of leſſer continuance, than vnbridled diſſoluteneſſe, luteneſſe, which is ſo much the more dangerous as it is moſt exceſſiue. This moſt proude and curious manner of life procured her a very loathſome and ſtinking diſeaſe, ſo as ſhe, who by her inſolent pride would not vſe the moſt neceſſarie element of water, becauſe it was common to euery one, could not bee holpen or comforted by the ſame, nor yet by any other meanes, to clenſe the filth and infection of her bodie. A Diuine punſhment.

Too great nicenes of a woman.

About the ſame time Dominico Biſhop of Oliuollo deceaſed. Henrie ſonne to the laſt Duke ſucceeded him, who altered the ancient name of Oliuollo, and would be called Biſhop of the Caſtle, as they are now at this day.

It is reported that vnder this Princes gouernment the Normans were driuen out of the confines of Dalmatia. And becauſe the Venetians haue had diuers warlike incounters with this Nation, we muſt ſpeake ſomething of them. They were then (as ſome Authors affirme) neere neighbours to the Sea-coaſts of Guyenne, who after they had a certaine time ſcoured the Neighbour-Seas, entred in tract of time vnder their Captaine Raoul by the Riuer of Loire into France. They ouerranne Lorraine and a part of Germanie with fier and ſword; afterwards returning into France, Raoul made a league with king Charles the third ſurnamed the Simple, and beeing by him perſwaded to become a Chriſtian, of an Enemie hee became his Gueſt; and being named Robert, he married the kings daughter. By meanes of which marriage Charles gaue vnto him that Prouince lying vpon the Riuer of Seine, which hath beene ſince called Normandie, by the name of the inhabitants. This man, of whom I ſpeake, was great Grandfather to that Robert, who came with an Armie into Italie, of whom we muſt ſay ſomewhat, to the end we may the more eaſily vnderſtand, that which they haue done there. What the Normans were, and their Originall. Raoul the Normans Captaine becomes a Chriſtian.

Now at what time this yong Robert began to wex great on the confines of Lucania, and Sicill, the affaires of Italie were then in meane eſtate, as well by the new receiued loſſes, as by the incurſions of the Saracens, who ouer-ranne that whole Prouince, and Sicill in like manner. But it is vncertaine whether this man or ſome other of that Nation, did bring the Normans out of France into Italie. For it is certaine that the ſame great Robert, who from the ſhoares of the Ocean Sea did enter by the riuer of Loire ſo farre into France, was great Grandfather to this man: So as perhaps ſome other of the Roiall bloud might conduct the Normans into Tranſ-Alpine Gaule, which at this day, is a part of Italie, before his time. From thence it comes that diuers doe affirme, that this yong Robert marched firſt againſt the Saracens. Neuertheleſſe howſoeuer it is, herein all doe agree, that at the ſame time almoſt, the Normans did driue the Barbarians out of Italie, and Sicilie, with manie thowſands of men ſlain on either ſide, and the Greekes likewiſe out of Calabria and Apulia. But after that the Norman forces, after manie and ſundrie exploits, became ſuſpitious to the Popes for that they were increaſed in Sicilie, and in a great part of Italie; more than was thought needfull for the ſafetie of the Lands of the Church and others; the common rumor was, that the Normans, after they had poſſeſſed Lucania, would ſeize on Campania It is reported, that Pope Leo reſolued at the ſame time, if he could not ſtay them by entreaties, and threats, to vſe force And hauing leuied a mightie Armie for the ſame purpoſe, he fought with them with bad ſucceſſe neere to Beneuentum: where after he had receiued a notable loſſe, he fledde forth of the battaile into the neereſt Citie. Neuertheleſſe hee was not diſcouraged at this loſſe, but being a man ſtout and couragious, he found new meanes and forces to driue them forth of Italie; but all his attempts proued vaine. He being dead, Pope Nicholas his ſucceſſour, not daring to contend with them, thought it much auaileable for the ſafetie of the Churches Lands; if paying them a yerely tribute, he might oblige Robert to aide the holie Sea, when need ſhould be; making him by that means to acknowledge, that he did depend on an other man. This is in a maner all that which ſome Authors haue ſet downe of the ſtirres of this Nation. By what meanes the Normans grew great. The Normans driue the Saracens and Greeks forth of Italie. Pope Leo vanquiſhed by the Normans. Pope Nicholas tributarie to the Normans.

Others haue affirmed, that the ſame Robert (as we haue ſaid) came from Tranſalpine salpine Gaule, not making any mention of France; and they say that Tancrea Lord of that Prouince had twelue children, among whom they highly esteeme two, that is to say, William surnamed Ferrabach, and Robert Guiscard. They doe moreouer denie that which we haue spoken of the Normans, to bee done vnder the conduct of Robert, but vnder his brother William. And besides, they do not set downe the matter like those whom we follow, but quite contrarie; That Campania and Lucania were neuer possessed by them, and that the Saracens were neuer driuen thence: but how that William iointly with the Princes of Campania and Salerne, marched against the Barbarians, who had alreadie possessed Sicilie, and tooke into their fellow-ship Molloc, Gouernour of Apulia and Calabria for the Greeke Emperour: by whose meanes being ioined altogether, the Barbarians were easily driuen forth of Sicilie. And that Molloc after the Island was taken againe, did seize on it, placing strong Garrisons in the Emperours name, vnto whom he said the Island did belong, and not to his fellowes: whereat the Norman beeing incensed did sodainely leaue the Island, & came the neerest way into the firme Land, & laid seege to Melphi in Apulia. For the releeuing whereof, Molloc leauing the Island, the victorie remained to the Norman, & Molloc being defeated with the losse of all his Armie fled into Greece: so that in the end the Normans beeing conducted by William made themselues masters of the greatest part of Apulia. But after they had a long time debated the possession of this Prouince, with diuers euents, it came to passe that the Emperour Michael with three of his children were driuen from Constantinople by Nicephorus. The Emperour delt with Robert Guiscard, who at the same time beseeged Tarentum (for it is certain that vnder his conduct the Normans did in those daies flourish in Italie) to come to his aide into Greece, assuring him, that Nicephorus being vanquished (the which by his meanes he presumed easily to do) he should afterward haue the command of Greece. Whereunto Robert being likewise perswaded by Pope Gregorie did agree, and raising his seege on a sodaine, came to Ottranto, where assembling and imbarking such forces as he needed, he did put to Sea, and with a faire winde he landed first at Auellona, and from thence comming to Durazzo, hee beseeged it by Sea and Land. Nicephorus sent Alexis with an Armie by Land, against Robert and the Emperour Michael, to enforce him to raise the seege of Durazzo. This man obtained of Prince Siluio in the name of Nicephorus, that the Venetians should send a mightie Armie against the Normans. Some saie that Nicephorus obtained it by his Ambassadours before Alexis comming, by meanes whereof the Venetian Prince, came with a mightie Armie against the Normans: and being come before Durazzo in the view of the enemie, he put his people in battaile, and without any long stay, came furiously against them. The enemies in like manner being puft vp with their former victories, did couragiously and without feare receiue the Venetian Gallies. The Enemies fought with such furie, as they seemed not alone to fight for the imperiall dignitie of one of their confederates, but likewise for their Countrie. The victorie was for a long time doubtfull: At the last the Norman Armie being broken, part of their ships taken, or sunck, and the rest fled, the victorious Venetian opened to those of Durazzo, the passage to Sea, which was before shut from them.

Sundrie opinions of the Normans comming into Italie.

Molloc Gouernour for the Greeke Emperour deceiueth his fellowes.

The Normans defeate Molloc.

The Emperour Michael driuen from Constantinople.

Durazzo beseeged by the Normans.

The Venetians Armie succoreth Nicephorus.

The Venetians victorious ouer the Normans.

* * *

The end of the fourth Booke of the first Decade.

THE FIFTH BOOKE OF THE FIRST DECAD Of The Historie Of Venice.

¶ The Contents of the fifth Booke of the first Decad.

THe Venetians are defeated by the Normans vnder Prince Silvio in a set battaile neere to Durazzo. The Emperour Henrie comes to Venice. The miraculous appearing of Saint Markes bodie, after it had beene a long time hid from his Citizens. Vpon what occasion all Christendome tooke the Crosse vpon them, and armed themselues against the Turks and Saracens. Pope Vrban his Oration in the Councell of Clermont, exhorting all Christian Princes to recouer the holie Land. The voiage of the Vltra-montani into Asia. How vnlikely the Christians fought at the beginning in Bythinia. The Christians beseege Nicea: with their notable victorie obtained against a great number of Turkes. The taking of Iconium, Heraclea, with diuers other Cities, from the Infidels by the Christians. Antioch is taken by them after a long and painefull siege and sundrie incounters. The Venetians take Smirna. The dissensions and secret hatred betwixt Beamond, and Raymond, Earle of Saint Giles. And whatsoeuer was done in Phœnicia, is generally comprehended in this Booke.

THe raising of the siege of Durazzo on that side where the battaile was fought, brought no great commoditie to the Venetians: For Nicephorus being wholy vndone by the sodaine rebellion of his people; the Norman after hee had repaired his fleete returning to besiege Durazzo by Sea and Land, Michael and Alexis (iointly possessing the Empire by meanes of Nicephorus ouerthrow) determined in the Venetians absence to succour the Citie, so that it is reported there was a cruell fight neere to the walles, and that the Greekes beeing vanquished, and one of the companions of the Empire beeing slaine, Alexis saued himselfe by flight, by meanes whereof the Durasshians beeing constrained to yeeld, became subiect to the enemies power. And not long afterwards the Venetians in the behalf of Alexis came against the Normans, almost in the verie same place where the first battaile was fought but the euent did much differ from the former. For the Venetians being vanquished, receiued so notable a losse, as of all that great fleete which Siluio had brought with him a small number was saued: part being drowned, and the residue taken. This purchased the Prince great hatred and enuie: For, at his return to Venice, the people deposed him in the thirteenth yeare of his gouernment. Diuers do conconfeſſe, that the Venetians and the Greekes were vanquiſhed before the Port of Durazzo, but that the loſſe was not ſo great as wee haue ſaid it was; but only that the battaile was very bloudy on either-ſide and that ſo ſoone as the Norman began to haue the better, Alexis fled on the left hand towardes Peloponeſus, and Siluio on the right hand towardes Venice. They doe beſides denie that hee was depoſed from his gouernment; but that the two and twentieth, or as others ſay the three and twentieth yeare of his Principalitie, hee fortunately deceaſed and was honourablie buried in Saint Marks Church.

The Greekes ouerthrowne by the Normans before Durazzo.

The Venetians defeated.

¶ VITALIS PHALERIO, the 32. Duke of Venice.

Siluio being dead, Vitalis Phalerio was with the generall conſent choſen in his ſted. His firſt propoſition was no leſſe honorable than profitable for the Common-wealth. For ſo ſoone as hee was declared Prince, he propounded to the People to ſend Ambaſſadours to Conſtantinople, to the Emperour Alexis, to obtaine of him, that Dalmatia and Croatia, which they had taken from the vſurpers and purchaſed by right of warre, might for euer remaine to the Venetians. It was likely that the Emperour would eaſily grant their requeſt, in regard of the kindneſſe which he had lately receiued from them. The Ambaſſadours were Dominico Dandulo, Andrea Michaeli, and Iacomo Auro. But in ſted of theſe, I finde in ſome Authors, Ciani Vitalis and Antonio.

New titles giuen to the Duke of Venice.

Alexis did freely graunt their requeſts, whereby the Venetians haue euer ſince by iuſt title poſſeſſed Dalmatia and Croatia. And Phalerio was the firſt (according to ſome Annaliſts) who in his titles did beare theſe Prouinces. I finde likewiſe that about the ſame time the Greekes and the Venetians fought vnder Phalerio before Durazzo with Guiſcard, but the iſſue thereof was as ſucceſſeleſſe as vnder Siluio.

The Emperour Henrie comes to Venice.

The Emperour Henrie came from Treuiſo to Venice to viſit Saint Markes Church, whoſe miraculous apparition was a little before diuulged euerie where. It is reported that for a time it was not known in what part of the Church his bones did reſt, ſo as the cõmon people cryed out, that he had retired himſelfe into ſome ſecret place, as though he meant to conceale himſelfe from the peoples ſight: whereupon the whole Citie being deſirous to know his reſting place, prayers and faſts were appointed euery where; then diuers Biſhops, being followed by the Clergie and people, came in proceſſion to his Church, where it is reported, that after diuers prayers, he did miraculouſly ſhew himſelfe to his Citizens, by putting out of his armes

Saint Markes miraculous apparition.

forth

forth of the earth: and that then to the peoples great contentment, his body was taken vp, and carried to a more honorable place: and it was decreed that none but the Prince and the Procurators of the Church, ſhould know his reſting place; and it is thought that at the ſame time they dedicated a new Church vnto him, more rich and ſumptuous than the former.

Phalerio did afterward repaire the Burrough of Lauretta decayed by antiquitie: and reducing it into the forme of a little Citie, he did enrich it with diuers liberties and priuiledges, to make it thereby the more to be inhabited. After he had made this reparation (we finde no other matter done by him abroad nor at home) hee departed this life, the twelfth, or (according to ſome) the thirteenth yeare of his Principalitie.

¶ VITALIS MICHAELI, the 33. Duke of Venice.

Italis Michaeli was choſen in his place. In his time and vnder his gouernment, a mighty Armie was ſent into Siria for to recouer the Cities and places of the Holie land. But becauſe wee know that the Venetians haue had ſhare in diuers great exploits executed by the Chriſtians in Aſia: I haue thought it not impertinent to touch briefly in order what was done there, to the end that by that which ſhall be ſet downe, it may be eaſily knowne what the Venetians did in that iourney.

Who was the Author of the warre againſt the Turkes.

The Author then of this warre (as ſome write) was a French Hermit, named Peter, who going on pilgrimage to the Sepulcher of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, did vnderſtand of Simeon Biſhop of Ieruſalem, and of other Chriſtians who were there in ſmall number, in what diſtres and miſerable ſeruitude this holie Land, where the Sauiour of the world did redeeme vs, was held by the cruell Mahometiſts: That there was no place in the ſame, how holie or religious ſoeuer it were, which that abhominable Nation had not till then, defiled and contaminated, by theſts, murthers, & adulteries, adding therewithall the ſcourges, torments, and wrongs, which thoſe who profeſſed Chriſtianitie did endure, who were of neceſſitie either to goe from thence, or reſolue to dye there miſerably. To this was ioyned a great miracle: How that vpon Eaſter euen about mid-night, it ſeemed vnto Peter in his ſleep, that Ieſus Chriſt did call vnto him, inioyning him ſo ſoone as he ſhould arriue in Italie, he ſhould tell the Pope, and afterwards, all the other Princes of France and Germanie, that it would be pleaſing vnto him, and that he did commaund them to take by force that Countrie out of the Infidels hands, wherein for the Saluation of mankinde it was his pleasure to be borne, and to die, where diuers and great tokens of his humanitie were yet to be seen: witnesse the little house wherein he was borne; the Temple, where being a childe he wept, and growne bigger had disputed, and at last being become a man had taught; The mounts of Thabor and Oliuet; this a place of praier; and that of his transfiguration; Pilats Pretorium; mount Caluarie, where his crosse was set vp; and his Sepulcher not farre from thence.

A wonderfull viſion hapned to Peter the Hermit.

to

Peter tells his message to the Pope.

Peter being returned into Italie, had no other thought but to goe to Pope Vrban, vnto whom hauing deliuered his message, hee passed the mounts, and went to the other Christian Princes. In the meane space that hee in a manner ranne ouer all Europe, he forgat not by the way to exhort all men in his sermons to vndertake this holie voiage. But Pope Vrban comming soon after to the Councell of Clermont in Auergne treated of this matter with a verie vehement Oration: the substance whereof was thus.

The Pope comes to the Councell of Clermont in Auuergne.

Pope Vrban his Oration.

THat he was not departed from Rome, and come to that holy assemblie for the affaires of the Church of Rome only, albeit it greatly needed to bee reformed, but was stirred vp by an other occasion, the which, as more holie, was likewise more notable: That he did not doubt, but that those there assembled had heard tell of what had befallen long since in Siria, and chiefely in the confines of that Region which is commonly called the Holy Land: The vniust vsurpation of the Sepulcher of our Soueraigne Lord Iesus Christ (the which he could not vtter without teares) by those cruell barbarous Saracens; that there was no Church, Altar, or any other sacred place, but was either razed downe to the ground by those cursed Mahometans, or conuerted to their prophane vses: that the Religious people dwelling there at such time as those enemies made themselues masters thereof, were constrained, some for feare of horrible punishment, to renounce the faith of Iesus Christ, and others that would perseuer therein, were by sword and fier, and other sorts of torments miserably consumed: That deuout Matrons going thither on pilgrimage from all parts almost of Europe, had not beene onely forced by them to satiate their brutish lust, but likewise in contempt and derision of vs, tormented by monstrous embracements: That if that which he had related was not in their opinions sufficient to cause them to take Armes, and to prosecute reuenge, He besought them at least to consider, and call to remembrance, how that in a short time through the negligence of their Ancestors, the forces of Asia were encreased; and besides, how farre the Mahometans had in length and breadth extended their Dominions: How manie Countries they possessed, which did in times past belong to the Roman Empire. But would to God (said he) that the affaires of Christendome were brought to that passe, that we were but to complaine and bewaile other mens miseries. We haue (alas) seene in our daies Italie, wholly destroied by their spoiles and incursions; Castles, Cities and Churches beaten downe, and burnt by those Sacrilegious persons. But wherefore doe I relate the murthers, imprisonments, rapes, and so manie other matters neuer almost heard of, which this Land hath endured a long time: seeing that Spaine likewise, and her neighbour Aquitaine, and all the Occidentall Prouinces, haue not only felt the like losse, but hauing at this daie scarce dried vp their teares, doe stand in feare of the like. And ye ô Frenchmen (said he) albeit that this wound is not yet entred into your bowels; no doubt, but in regard of your neighbour-hood, you haue heard and seene likewise some-what of that, whereof I haue now spoken. And the Germans, and other Westerne Nations, who haue not as yet felt these losses, ought often to forethinke what dangers menace them from the East, nay rather, how neere they are to them already. I know not (said he) if the Venetians were not, (who with strong Garrisons defend the Sea-coasts, and who haue often repulsed this cruell enemie from Histria and Dalmatia) whether this storme would (ere this) haue beene blowne euen into Hungarie and Germanie. The power of the Grecian Empire, which whilst her strength and vigour lasted, was wont to be the Bulwarke of Europe on the East and West side, is in such sort ruined,

The crueltie of the Mahometans.

as

as the Emperour dreames on nothing but on meanes and forces whereby he may conſerue his Citie of Conſtantinople; which place if we had loſt (as God forbid) we may eaſily conuecture how great ſuch a loſſe would be, as well to Europe as to him. I tremble with horror, when I doe but thinke what will happen, if this fier be not quickly quenched, which daily doth more and more kindle. All the miſeries, which thoſe haue felt whom we bewaile, hang ouer our heads. Men and women ſhall be reſerued to ſatisfie the luxurie of thoſe barbarous people: and ye will hereafter lament, when it will be too late, that hauing had meanes, you haue not oppoſed your ſelues againſt theſe miſeries. It may be you thinke, that this cannot come to paſſe. No more did they who haue ſince felt it. And would to God wee did not ſo often feede our ſelues with vaine hope. But it were better (ô couragious ſpirits) whilſt we haue ſtrength, counſell, aide, power, and monie readie, and generally whatſoeur may giue hope of a victorie, to diuert this euident perill from vs. Nor is our enterpriſe aboue humane ſtrength. That Charles, ſurnamed the Great, in a manner your Countriman, (ô ye Germans) in regard of the deſcent of his Anceſtors, and your king (ô Frenchmen) and the glorie of your name, did driue the Saracens forth of Spaine and Aquitaine: The ſame Charles conſtrained them to leaue Italie. The ſame Charles (of whom yee ſo much vaunt) did recouer Ieruſalem which ye terme Holie, and draue thence the enemies: And by how much his glorie and reputation is great: by ſo much the more ought it to incite you which are deſcended from him, to attempt ſome new exploit which may augment this your ancient renowne. If ye do not thus, but giue your ſelues to reſt and idleneſſe, yee ſhall not only hazard what your Anceſtors haue left you, but you ſhall ſuffer the natiue Countrie of our ſoueraigne king, to your great ſhame and contempt, with that of all Chriſtendome likewiſe, to bee trodden downe by theſe cruell enemies; and his Sepulcher, Temple, and other holie places to be polluted by murthers, rapes, and ſacriledges. Arme your ſelues then in time rather, and deface this common infamie: Purchaſe to your ſelues and to all Europe aſſured ſafetie. I thinke you may eaſily doe it. For by how much your forces ſurpaſſe thoſe of Charles (If ye all iointly vndertake this voiage) by ſo much more ſhall the victorie be certaine and eaſie for you. The victors profit ſhall be great & ineſtimable, by the ſpoiles of ſo opulent a Nation, and ſuch rich kingdomes: But the Celeſtiall reward ſhall be much greater, the which in the name of Almightie God, we promiſe to as many as ſhall fight valiantly.

What Charlemaine did againſt the Infidels.

It is reported that when the Pope had ended his ſpeech, the whole aſſembly cried out, that it was Gods will to haue it ſo: Then the Pope hauing commaunded ſilence, replied. Goe then (quoth hee) yee generous ſpirits, and let that which ye haue all, with one accord, now ſpoken, bee your watch-word in this warre, and let as many as meane to vndertake this iourney, ſew a Croſſe of red cloath on the right ſide of their garments. They report a very admirable matter, the which I ſhould hardly ſet downe, were it not for the aſſurance that we haue, that God doth euer aſſiſt holy enterpriſes; Which is, that the ſame day that the warre was reſolued vpon at Clermont, it was knowne and diuulged to the fartheſt Regions of the earth.

The Aſſemblies anſwere to the Pope.

An admirable matter.

But whileſt Pope Vrban and the reſt did labour about the choice of a Captaine in the aſſembly, the which beſides other matters had giuen great hope to all men, and that this buſineſſe had kept them there certaine dayes: it is reported, that diuers thouſands of men affecting this new warre came thither: And that ſoone after, three hundered thouſand armed men were in a readineſſe to march.

The number of thoſe who at the ſame time tooke the Croiſado.

The leaders to theſe great numbers of Chriſtians, were Godfry of Bouillon, Euſtace, and Baldwin his brethren, Raymond Earle of Saint Giles, and Robert Earle of Flaunders, Hugh, ſirnamed the great, brother to Phillip the French King, Stephen Earle of Chartres, the Biſhop of Puy, and Peter the Hermit the Author of this enterpriſe.

The chiefe commanders.

This man, becauſe hee would bee ſeene to haue ſome cheife commaund in this warre, came with Baldwin and his brethren, through Germanie, Hungarie, and Thrace, to Conſtantinople, accompanied with troops of ſouldiers. The Biſhop of Puy, Raymond, Hugh the great, paſſed into Italie with greater forces; and came to Rome to viſit the Pope. From whence they departed in three troopes. The one mar-marched directly to Brundusium, the other to Barri, and the third to Ottranto. But Beamond sonne to Guiscard a valliant Prince, being incited before by the report of this gallant enterprise, did ioyne his forces with those which passed through Apulia.

Their sundrie passadges.

Whilest the troopes which were in Italie made themselues ready to march, Peter the Hermit, who was arriued at Constantinople with the three brethren of Bouillon, so soone as he had crossed the Bosphorus of Thrace, the next and shortest way, he passed ouer his troopes into Asia; which the Emperor Alexis (as it is reported) did soone enforce him to doe, in regard his souldiers obserued no martiall discipline, but gaue themselues licentiously to all manner of euill. The which, Alexis with others did impute wholly to the Hermit, being altogether ignorant of martiall discipline and vnworthie to haue any command; by meanes whereof diuers did report that the Emperour caused Peter, whether he would or no, to depart formost into Asia, where his Army soone after marched towards Nicomedia and Nicea.

Peter the Hermite, ignorant of Martiall discipline.

But because it did manifestly appeare, that vnlesse some other besides the Hermit, (who was more religious than martiall) did take charge of the Armie, it was likely at the verie first encounter to fall into great danger: they chose Raymond a German by nation, and a verie warlike person, for their Generall. By the which election we may easily coniecture, that the brethren of Bouillon came not with Peter to Constantinople: or if they did come, after the Hermit was gone into Asia, they remained with the the Emperour Alexis, till the rest of the forces were arriued.

Raymond a German chosen in the Hermits sted

The Sarracens, who had beene aduertised of the resolution of the Councell held in France, and of whatsoeuer the Christian Princes had since then enterprised in this warre; did determine by Ambush to surprise those who should first come into Asia; to kill them; and then to resist the passage of the rest ouer the Bosphorus of Thrace. Raymond hauing marched on the Territorie of Nicea, without sending forth his discouerers, fell into Ambuscado, and retired with great losse of his people to the Citie of Exorga. This place had beene of set purpose abandoned by the enemie: who so soone as they perceiued the Germaine to be within the Towne, came sodainly and besieged it on euery side. Raymond being wearied with that long siege, of a Captaine became a fugitiue, and with certaine others went to the enemies side. The Citie after that was valiantly defended for a time, but at the last the enemie tooke it; and the most of those who were within it hauing beene tormented with hunger, thirst, and infinite other miseries, were put to death, either by the sword, or by some other accident of warre; all those which yeelded, were likewise put to the edge of the sword. The Hermit in the meane time seized on the Citie of Cynita, which was forsaken by the inhabitants; and hauing fortified it with those few forces which hee had, hee ioyned himselfe with the troopes, at such time as his Countrimen arriued.

The Infidels aduertised of the Christians enterprise.

Raymond flies to the enemie.

Whilest these things were done in Bythinia, Hugo the Norman, the Earles of Flaunders and of Chartres, departed from Barri, and with a faire wind arriued at Durazzo. Then at the intreatie of the Gouernour of Dalmatia in the name of the Emperour Alexis, they marched in bands, and at sundrie times, to Constantinople, for feare least so great an Armie marching all together should spoile the Countrie: whither being come, as into a place of safetie, it is reported that Alexis did lay snares for them; as one who from the beginning had greatly suspected their enterprise. But being reconciled to Baldwin, Godfrey and the rest, The Bishop of Puy and Raymond did arriue, who had conducted their troopes through Dalmatia, Albania, Macedon and Thrace.

The French arriue at Constantinople.

Alexis practiseth treacherie.

Beamond, who for his fathers and his owne particular enmitie with Alexis, thought not himselfe safe if he should come into Greece, sailed with a direct course from Brundusium into Morea; and from thence marching in battaile (as if he had beene beene to fights, through the higher Miſia and Thrace, to auoide the trappes of Alexis, and came into Aſia ſooner than hee was expected; where after he had taken a Citie of the Hereticks; ſpoiled and ouerthrowne it; and being come to the banks of the riuer Barbara, he cauſed part of his forces to paſſe ouer at a foord, and kept the reſidue with himſelfe. But the morrow after by breake of day, Alexis forces being come to aſſaile thoſe troopes that were gone ouer the riuer, they did greatly amaze them at the firſt, and had vndoubtedly much endangered them, if Beamond had not ſpeedily come to their reſkue with two thouſand horſe, which he had ready fot the ſame purpoſe; at whoſe comming, the Greekes retired themſelues. And by this meanes Beamond perceiuing that there was no place free from the ambuſhes of Alexis, he reſolued ſtill to march in order of battaile. But the Emperour, after he had in vaine made all theſe attempts, thought it his beſt courſe to make an attonement with him, and to that end ſent his Ambaſſadours to him, laying all that was paſt vpon the malice of certaine people deſirous of ſpoile.

Beamond aſſayled by Alexis Subiects.

Alexis and Beamond reconciled

It is reported that Alexis did afterward more eſteeme of Beamond than of all the reſt of the Princes and Captaines of the Armie, whereunto the meekeneſſe and courteſie of the Norman did incite him, ſo as after his comming to Conſtantinople, he did ſo farre inſinuate himſelfe into the Emperous fauour, as he freely promiſed him to furniſh the Armie with new ſuccours, horſes, garments, weapons and all other neceſſaries. But yet neuertheleſſe, becauſe he would ſeeme to haue care of his owne affaires, he ſaid, that his meaning was to performe his promiſe; prouided, that the Captaines would promiſe and ſweare, not to attempt any thing againſt himſelfe, his State, and ſubiects; and that all the Cities which they ſhould take in Aſia (Hieruſalem excepted) ſhould be reduced vnder the gouernment of the Grecian Empire. This thus conluded: the whole troopes were forthwith tranſported into Aſia; Beamond only with certaine others remained with Alexis, to further the diſpatch of victualls and other neceſſaries. The Captaines in the meane time being come to Nicomedia, ſo ſoone as they had vnited their forces, reſolued firſt of all to aſſaile Nicea. Wherefore diſlodging thence, they came through forreſts, and by-wayes before the Citie; and the ſiege was planted before Beamonds arriuall at the Campe, by reaſon of his long ſtaie about the ſending away of victualls and other neceſſaries.

A new agreement betwixt Alexis and the Chriſtian Princes.

At his arriuall, Nicea, the cheife Citie of Bithynia, (called at firſt Antigona, by Antigonus her founder, and ſince then, Nicea by Lyſimachus, in fauour of his wife) was aſſailed in three ſeuerall places. This Citie was reaſonably ſtrong by ſituation, and much more by arte, being compaſſed about with verie high and thicke walles, the towers builded foure-ſquare: the fourth part whereof towards the South is watred with the lake Aſcania. They forthwith erected enginnes of batterie, and woodden Caſtles of the iuſt height of the Citie walles. Then they brought thither the ramme, and other warlicke engines. They did likewiſe vſe the mine. The Citie, beſides a great number of inhabitants, had likewiſe ſtore of armed ſouldiers in gariſon, and euery day new ſupplies came to them by the lake in their ſteades that had beene ſlaine or hurt: So as they were ſure that whileſt the paſſage of the lake ſhould remaine open, Nicea could neuer bee taken. Wherefore it was concluded, for the hindering of the enemies paſſage, to ſend to the Emperour Alexis, and to entreate him, that with a certaine number of ſhippes hee would ſhut vp the lake from the enemies. Alexis fulfilled their requeſt, but not ſodainely. For whileſt he made readie his ſhippes, threeſcore thouſand Turkes, with certaine troopes of Sarracens, came and incamped on the hilles next to the Citie, whereof they ſodainely aduertiſed the beſieged by the lake, which was not yet ſhut from them, to the end that on a day prefixed they ſhould make a ſallie on the Chriſtians, on the ſame ſide as they ſhould on a ſodaine aſſaile their Campe. The alarum began in the Biſhop of Puy his quarter, who was encamped on the Eaſt-ſide, where the French did not onely with great valour receiue the enemies forces, but running Nicea beſieged.

The ſtrength of Nicea.

Sixtie thouſand Turkes come to ſuccour the Towne.

The Turkish succour defeated.

furiously on them, they enforced them with great losse to turne their backe, and shamefully to runne vp to the mountaines. In the meane time the Emperour Alexis Fleet arriued, which made themselues masters of the Lake: & then the Niceans being enuironed on all sides, gaue ouer their stubornnesse & yeelded, after capitulation; That the Citie should be deliuered to Alexis, and that all those that were within it, should with their Armes and baggage retire themselues to Constantinople.

Nicea yeelded vp and vpon what conditions.

The Princes and Captaines albeit they knew this to be the practise of Alexis, who would not seeme heereby to bee beholding to the Christians, did neuertheless dissemble it for the present time, because all their attempts did yet depend vpon a greater victorie. Nicea being in this sort yeelded, all the troopes did forthwith dislodge, and separated themselues into two bands, in regard of the barrennesse of the Countrie. Beamond Captaine of the one, encamped the fourth day after neere to a Riuer, which watred a goodly Meadow, where being desirous to refresh his Armie, so soone as he had giuen commaundement to fortifie the Campe in the same place where they were, hee had notice by sundrie messengers, one after another, that a great Armie of the enemies did approach. He forthwith then commaunded, that all men, leauing the fortifying of the Campe, should be in readinesse for the battaile: and dispatched Postes at the same instant to Hugo, and the rest, to aduertise them of the great number of Turkes, that were likely to oppresse him; intreating them to haste speedily to his reskew. He marched against the enemie in a square battallion: who approached verie neere, with great noise and cries as their manner is: And they fought alreadie on either side verie couragiously; when diuers greater troopes of the enemies seized here and there, without any noise at all, on the highest places, from whence they shotte an incredible number of arrowes vpon the Christians: but the greatest number of them fell without doing any harme, lighting vpon those that were armed. The Norman beganne not the fight with arrowes, but with push of Pike; after that, with the sword. There was a great massacre of the Turkes, with small losse on the Christians side: and the heapes of dead bodies were so great, as the Victors could no more come neere the vanquished; and the enemies had on euerie sides huge heapes of their owne slaughtered people which serued them for rampiers.

A new Armie of Infidelles.

A great battaile betwixt the Christians and the Infidelles.

But whilest either side were busied in fighting: a thousand Turkish Horse brake in behind on Beamonds Camp, where the sodaine crie of the women and Soldiours boyes, whome they slew, caused a great alarum; and they had done more harme if Beamond had not arriued, who draue these horse-men forth of his Camp with great slaughter. But returning to the front of the battaile, hauing left a Squadron of Horse for the guarde of the Camp, he found the chance of the Dice so turned, as the Normans were in a manner readie to turne their backes. But being hartned by their Captaines returne, they tooke fresh courage. The Turkes returning againe with greater forces, to assaile the Campe, those who were left for the guard thereof not being able to sustaine their assaults (for the place was not fortified,) had beene soone cut in peeces, had not Hugo fortunatly arriued, who with tenne thousand Horse which he brought with him, reskewed the Campe, and defeated the enemies. From thence hee marched directly to the battailes front, where when the Barbarians, who were scattered here and there, as spectators of the fight, had descryed his great Armie of Horse (for perceiuing their darts and arrowes rather to hurt their owne disarmed fellowes than the armed Christians, they durst shoote no more) they came downe into the plaine without any noise at all to the reskew of their fellowes. The fight continued from the breake of daie to the shutting in of the euening: when the enemies giuing backe by little and little, retired into the next mountaines, and our men to Beamonds Campe.

The great danger the Christians were in.

Hugo cometh to aide Beamond.

The Infidells retire.

But the morrow after, by breake of daie, Hugo, and the Norman presented themselues in order of battaile in the selfe-same place: where the enemies in no sort would shew themselues. Commandement was giuen to make a heape of the dead

dead bodies, where the Croſſe, which was the Chriſtians badge, did diſtinguiſh them from the Infidelles. They being all put together, the number of the dead enemies was eaſily found to be twice as manie as the Chriſtians: After that, they gathered the ſpoiles, where they found ſuch aboundance of golde, ſiluer, Horſes, and other riches of the Barbarians, as by this bootie, the neceſſitie wherewith the difficultie of the long way had afflicted them, was eaſily recompenced. Then after they had ſpent one daie in burying the dead, & looking to the ſicke and maimed, the ſecond daie after the battaile they diſlodged, determining to follow the enemie.

The number of the dead Infidels farre greater then that of the Chriſtians.

The Commaunders of the Armie hauing enquired of certaine priſoners of note reſerued for that purpoſe, what the ſtate of the Armie was, did vnderſtand that the number of thoſe, againſt whom they did fight, was farre greater than they had thought them to bee, exceeding the number of foure hundred thouſand fighting men, who were Syrians, Chaldeans, Turkes, Arabians, and Meſopotamians; and the greateſt part of theſe were young men, who being tickled with a deſire of nouelties, had voluntarily marched thither without receiuing anie paie at all, or being ſubiect to the command of any one.

The number of the Infidelles Armie.

Soliman, who was the chiefe conducter of this enterpriſe, did with great ſpeed in a ſhort time get farre enough from the Normans Campe, and in euerie place, as he paſſed along, concealing his owne loſſe hee did not ſaie that he was vanquiſhed; but vaunted to haue wonne the victorie. And becauſe he would depriue the enemies of all hope of ſuccours for their Armie, he did expreſſely in his iourney ouerthrow Citties, ſpoile the inhabitants, and whatſoeuer elſe he thought might ſtand them in ſted.

Soliman Generall of the Armie.

Beamond, and the other Captaines diſlodging thence, came by drie and vneaſie wayes to Iconium a Citie of Licaonia verie neere to mount Taurus. The yeelding of the inhabitants at their arriuall was to much purpoſe, for the Armie had great need of refreſhing: which hauing marched through deſert and barren places, to the great hurt of diuers men and Horſes, was with much paine and trauaile arriued in a good Countrie, and plentifull in victualls. Certaine daies after, they marched in battaile directly towards Heraclea, hauing had ſpeciall care to auoide the enemies ambuſhes: For they vnderſtood how that great numbers of Turks did attend them there with intent to fight. But being come neere to the Citie in good order, the Heracleans being deſtitute of any Garriſon, came forth and met them humbly ſuing for peace, and yeelded both themſelues and meanes to the Chriſtian Princes. Heraclea being thus taken, (becauſe the ſpies brought word that the enemies were farre from thence) foure dayes after, the troupes were diuided into two bandes. Baldwin and Tancred, who conducted the one, marched to Tharſis, where (as it was reported) there was no Garriſon: The men of Tharſis preſently yeelding, opened their gates. The Principalitie of this Citie was by a generall conſent giuen to Baldwin, with whatſoeuer elſe he ſhould conquere neere thereunto, whereupon ſoone after, he tooke the Cities of Eduſſa, and Manuſtra. The greateſt part of the Armie marched in the meane time towards Armenia the leſſe, in times paſt called Cilicia. The which Prouince tooke her name of Armenus, who was companion to Iaſon. The Coſmographers haue diuided it into two, calling that Armenia the leſſe, which lieth vnder Cappadocia, on this ſide the Riuer Euphrates, whoſe borders are not diuided on the ſouth ſide from Cilicia; and the greater that, which lies beyond the Riuer, containing the chiefe part of the Countrie, which runnes along the Ponticke and Caſpian Seas.

The taking of Iconium.

Heraclea.

Tharſis being yeelded is giuen to Baldwin.

Who gaue the name to Armenia.

All the Cities of this prouince were ſoone brought vnder the ſubiection of the French, being vnfurniſhed of garriſons, and by their conſents giuen not long after to Palmarius an Armenian, a man of great valour, who had euer till then followed the Chriſtian Armie. Then entring into Cappadocia, they tooke Ceſarea. And becauſe the report was, that the enemies were determined to guard Antioch aboue all the reſt, they ſeized on the towne of Soccor, by meanes of certaine Chriſtians that were within it, where they remained till ſuch a time as the ſouldiers had made prouiſion of victualls for fiue dayes. But being departed from thence, ſo ſoone as they had ſurpriſed the Citie of Sura, and the Forte of the Impoſts, with certaine other ſmall townes in the Territorie of Sura, they laboured by a very ſtreight path to aſcend the top of Mount Taurus.

Armenia maior giuen by the French men to Palmarius. Ceſarea.

Sura.

The Forte of the Impoſts.

A very dangerous way.

This way, which was but a dayes iournie, was no leſſe dangerous than painfull. It was verie narrow by reaſon of the flint-ſtones, and ſharpe rockes which hem'd it in on the one ſide, and with a very deepe vally on the other, which was of ſo fearefull a depth, as it did amaze the beholders: the troopes were a whole day paſſing this way not without the great care and heede of the Captaines, and the greateſt part thereof they went on foote. There was none ſo hardie in the whole Armie as durſt aſcend thoſe ſteepe places on horſebacke, but they threw their cloakes and baggage on their horſebacks for to make themſelues more apt and diſpoſed, to ouercome the danger of the way. It is reported that the ſame day diuers ſumpter-horſes, which were loden, fell head-long downe into the valley; ſome of them by chance; and ſome likewiſe were throwne downe of purpoſe, by thoſe, who ſaw no poſſibilitie to bring them vp to the top of the hill.

Muraſis.

Hauing paſſed theſe mountainous ſtreights, they came to the Citie of Muraſis which forthwith yeelded vnto them. From thence they diſcouered ſuch huge and ſpatious plaines, as their ſight was dazeled with beholding them. In the middeſt of that plaine they eſpied Antioch, whither all the Captaines ment to march, and to beſiege it. Being come downe into the valley they deſcried the enemies a farre off vpon a Riuers ſide, which runnes ouerthwart the plaine. Theſe men were ſent by the King of Antioch, to conuey the victualls, which was to come to the Citie from the mountaines. Againſt theſe were certaine light horſe ſent, who at the firſt charge brake and defeated them, part of whome being ſlaine, the reſt fled to the Citie. There were taken the ſame day, a great number of ſumpter-horſes, and great quantitie of victuals, which as moſt neceſſarie were brought to the Armie to the great content of the victorious. They came afterwards to the riuer neare to Antioch, the which by the inhabitants is (as they ſay) named Farfar. But we know for a certaine that the Riuer Orontes watereth the Citie of Antioch. Whereby wee may not only doubt of the riuers name, but likewiſe which Antioch theſe modernes did meane; were it not that the fame of the Citie is ſo great, as it will eaſily bring vs forth of the Hiſtorians darkneſſe. For there is an Antioch in Pamphilia, neighbour to Seleucia; and an other more excellent than that in Phenicia, builded by Seleucus Nicanor, ſonne to Antiochus ſurnamed Ephiphanes, through the which runs the riuer Orontes. Towards this then marched Beamond, Hugo, and the reſt, and vnderſtood by certaine priſoners that Caſſianus was King of this Citie, and Tributarie to the King of Babilon: who vpon this occaſion had ſent diuers thouſands of men to guard the Citie, who were eſteemed ſo ſtrong and valiant, as none in a manner durſt fight with them; much leſſe attend them.

A luckie euent for the Chriſtians.

What Antioch the Chriſtians did beſiege.

Beamond gines the firſt aſſault to the Citie of Antioch.

The commaunders were not amazed at theſe ſpeeches. Chiefly Beamond who conducted fiue legions, did the next morrow by breake of day march directly towards the Citie, where he did fiercely aſſaile the enemies, who were vnder the walles in order of battaile. But the neereneſſe of the walles and their other munitions, which conſtrained the aſſailants to retire; was the cauſe that both ſides did not fight with all their forces; by reaſon whereof this fight was made rather in haſt, than otherwiſe. But how light ſoeuer it was, it laſted euen till night, at which time Beamond retired to his fellowes. After that, they made a bridge vpon the riuer, which was directly betweene the Citie and their Campe: and they incamped in ſuch ſort, as it was beſieged on all ſides, ſauing on the part next to the mountaines, from whence they perceiued no poſſibilitie to free themſelues from the enemies incurſions.

The Citie of Antioch is circled with a double wall, The inmoſt is of bricke, and the

the other of great ſquare ſtone, with foure hundred and threeſcore towers, with a Citadell on the Eaſt ſide thereof ſo ſtrongly fortified, as it did not feare the aſſaults of the enemies. There was beſides not farre off a lake abounding in fiſh, and meruailous fruitfull plaines, watred with riuers and fountaines, twelue miles diſtant from the Sea of Cilicia. It is reported that Saint Peter in the Churchs infancie did there eſtabliſh his See, which did afterward greatly illuſtrate the Citie. Antioch Saint Peters firſt Seate

The Campe at the firſt wanted no victualls: for ripe grapes hung on the vines: and the whole Armie was a long time fed with great ſtore of corne, found in wells where the Countrimen did vſe to hide their graine, and beſides they brought at times great ſtore of cattell to the Campe, taken ſtragling in the neighbour vallies by meanes of certaine Armenians, Chriſtians by profeſſion, inhabiting the tops of the neighbour-mountaines, who for that they had conſtantly perſeuered in Chriſtian religion, after Hieruſalem was taken by the Sarracens in the time of the Emperour Heracleus, could neuer ſince obtaine of the curſed enemie a dwelling place, vntill at the laſt Carpharat the Egyptian, permitted the Biſhop and a few with him to inhabit the fourth part of the Citie, neare to the holy ſepulcher; paying a certaine yearely tribute. But being driuen forth of Hieruſalem, vpon the report of the Chriſtians comming into Aſia, they retired themſelues into the mountaines neare to Antioch. A boundance of victuailes at the beginning of the ſiege.

Now whileſt the French-men and Germans performed theſe warlike exploits in Aſia, the Venetians (I know not whether of their owne proper motion, or incited at the intreatie of the Pope and the Emperour Alexis,) ſent a greater Armie than euer yet they had done, into Ionia: the which I finde to be of two hundred veſſels of all ſorts, and vnder the conduct of Henrico Contareni Biſhop of the Caſtle, and Michaeli Vitalis the Dukes ſonne. The Venetians fleet.

Some neuertheleſſe doe affirme, that the Venetians came not into Aſia, till Hieruſalem was taken. But I cannot beleeue, that a Nation ſo mightie at Sea as were the Venetians, would be idle during theſe great ſtirres in Aſia and Europe; eſpecially at ſuch a time when as they might perceiue all the Sea-coaſts from Helleſpont euen to Peluſium, at the mouth of Nilus, to be expoſed for a prey: the which in a ſhort time, with neuer ſo little labour, they might eaſily take from the Mahometans. The Venetians being come to Rhodes: it is reported that they fell at words with the Piſans, who were likewiſe arriued in the Hauen with a great Fleet; and falling from words to blowes, they fought on either ſide like enemies. But the Venetians getting the vpper hand tooke eighteene Gallies from the Piſans wherein were foure thouſand men. It is not knowne wherefore, nor vpon what occaſion the Piſans durſt buckle with the Venetians, ſeeing they were mightier than they: but hauing taken them, becauſe they perceiued them to weare redde Croſſes, they ſent them and their veſſeiles away, detaining thirtie of the chiefeſt Gentlemen among them for hoſtages. From thence they ſailed with a faire wind into Ionia, where at their firſt arriuall they tooke Smyrna vnprouided of a Garriſon. From whence it is ſaid, that the bodie of Saint Nicholas was brought to Venice, and laid in the Church, dedicated vnto him, on the ſhoare. The Venetians defeate the Piſans at Rhodes. The Venetians take Smyrna.

This is all which ſome report the Venetians did in their firſt iourney. But others doe ſet downe, after the taking of Smyrna, all that which they did in Syria, which is not impertinent. For whileſt their Fleete was preparing at Venice, they tooke in freſh ſupplies in Dalmatia, and came firſt to Rhodes; then to Ionia where they tooke Smyrna; and afterwards they ſcoured the Seas of Pamphilia, Cilicia, and Syria. The Citie of Antioch being taken, the French Captaines did not onely beſiege Hieruſalem, but tooke it with eaſe. For it is certaine, that the Venetians, departing from the Hauen of Ioppa, from whence they had driuen the enemies Armie, at the Princes firſt arriuall in Syria, came to Hieruſalem, and then beſieged the places round about. But wee will hereafter make mention of that which they did in Syria.

The length of the siege of Antioch with the want in the Armie.

The siege of Antioch in the meane time was no lesse long than painefull, hauing for the space of nine moneths greatly weakened all the forces of Europe. For they were at times tormented with famine euen with all extremitie; so as besides the common Soldiours, diuerse likewise of the chiefe, not being able to endure so great scarcitie, sought manie times to flie thence, among whom were Peter the Hermit, William Carpenter issued of Royall bloud, and Tancred cousin to Beamond; who being shamefully reprehended in the middest of their flight for abandoning the Armie, were constrained to take new oathes. There was likewise great complaints made against the Captains for bringing out of the west al the flower of Christendom to die in the East by famine before the walles of Antioch; That there was no kind of meate how vile and filthie soeuer, wherewith the miserable Soldiours had not till then fed themselues. They said moreouer that it behooued them to leaue the Armie and those wilfull Captaines: For if they had had any care of them or their safetie, they would ere then haue ledde them from thence into some other farre place, or if they were so pleased, to engage them in some dangerous fight: saying that in regard of the miseries they sustained, they had rather marche to some battaile where they were sure to dye honorably with their weapons in hand, than idly to perish through famine like wretched Slaues.

The complaints of the Christians before Antioch.

How great Beamond his authoritie was.

Beamond his authoritie (whose vertue and experience in warre according to the saying of as many as haue written of him, had purchased to him selfe aboue all the other Captaines of the Armie a marueilous reputation) did with a gentle exhortatation profit verie much for the appeasing of this tumult, who gaue the Soldiours hope of better fortune. But the famine neuertheless continuing, diuers thought on fit meanes how to escape it. And, without doubt, they would all of them at last haue disbanded, had it not beene for the sodaine newes that was brought, how that the enemies Armie was neere at hand, with whom they were not onely to fight for the maintenance of the siege, but for the safetie of their liues: That now the time was come when the flower and choise of all Europe should in the view of Antioch either dye fighting valliantly, if the enemies obtained the victorie, or else open the way to free themselues from famine and other miseries, which they had till then endured. At these fearefull newes the French were so farre from being amazed, as the whole Campe on the contrarie cryed out, that they would presently to the battaile; saying that it were better to dye at once if they could not winne the daie, than hourely to endure those miseries which were farre worse than death.

How glad the Armie was to fight to free themselues from famine.

They were then at the same instant conducted against the enemie, and the fight being begunne in the view of the Citie, they cruelly fought on either side; the victorie for certaine houres space remaining doubtfull. But at last the enemies beeing broken and put to flight, with the losse of halfe their forces, they left a glorious victorie to the Christians. And this was not the first time onely that they fought with the enemies during the siege, but at diuers other times also as occasion serued; And some times both sides fought in set battaile, whereby their famine was often times by the enemies victuailes releeued.

The enemies that came to the succour of Antioch are defeated.

Treacherie of a Citizen of Antioch.

In the end by the treacherie of Pyrrhus, one of the chiefest men of Antioch, (who being drawne by the great fame of Beamond, would be knowne in fauour of him to haue done such a deede) the Citie was taken by night, the ninth moneth after it was besieged. The King, vnderstanding by that nightly tumult that the enemie was entred, going forth of the Citie at a Posterne gate, saued himselfe in the neighbour mountaines: But being fearefull and amazed, not keeping the beaten wayes, but wandring through woods and groues neere to the Citie, the Armenians, who inhabited those places (as hath beene said) met him and slew him.

The taking of Antioch.

The death of King Cassianus.

Not long after the taking of Antioch, there was neere vnto the Citie a fiercer fight than at any time before, fought betwixt the Christians and Corbanes, Lieuetenant to the King of Persia, and Sensadolus, sonne to Cassian; where it is reported that an hunan hundred thousand fighting men of the enemies were slaine vpon the place, and that, besides the horse and other beasts of carriage, fifteene thousand Camels were taken.

The Captaine of the Castle of Antioch, who till then had brauely defended the place, being moued with this happie victorie of ours, yeelded it to Beamond. It is reported that the Citie being by the generall consent offered to Alexis by Hugo, surnamed the great, sent for the same purpose to Constantinople, was vpon his refusall thereof, by the aduise of all men (except of Raymond Earle of Saint Gylles who alone opposed himselfe against it) giuen to Beamond. They say likewise, that Pyrrhus, the day before he committed the treason, had agreed with the Captaines of the Armie that it should be so. The common rumor was, that Alexis knowing in his owne conscience, that he had delt perfidiously with the French and Germans, refused to accept their bountie, fearing some deceit to bee couched in their offer: perceiuing very well, that they did iustly suspect him for not obseruing the agreement made betwixt them. For he had neuer succoured them with victuals or ought else, notwithstanding that they had oftentimes sent vnto him in their greatest miseries. Antioch being adiudged to the Norman, the Armie dislodged the fourth moneth after the yeelding thereof, and marched first to Rugia, and from thence to Albaria. This place did somewhat hold backe the happie successe of their affaires by reason of a long siege. At the last, the Walles being beaten downe with the Ram, Albaria was taken by assault, and all that were within it were cut in pieces, except a few whom Beamond saued.

Why Alexis refused Antioch

Rugia. Albaria.

There grew in the same place a quarrell betwixt the Earle of Saint Gylles and the Norman, who returned with all his troupes to Antioch: The other Captaines wintered; some at Albaria, and some at Rugia. Beamond being requested to come where they wintered, meanes was made to reconcile him to the Earle of S. Gylles; but the one would in no sort leaue his stubburnnesse, nor the other diminish his authoritie: and each of them hauing vsed words, sauouring not onely of emulation, but of hatred and wrath, they were ready to haue come to strokes, had not Beamond, fearing that by his meanes the affaires of Christendome might be endangered, (which he sought by all meanes to auoide) seemed to yeeld, and returned backe to Antioch: He was followed in maner of a faction, by Godfrey of Bouillon, and by the Earle of Flanders.

A great quarrell betwixt Beamond and the Earle of Saint Gyles.

The Winter was spent in certaine light attempts, executed by Raymond, and his followers: But at the beginning of the Spring (because these places towards the East are exceeding hot) the Armie began to march. They made a stand in the valley neere to the Citie of Camella, in regard it was Candlemas day; resoluing at their departure thence to make Warre on the King of Tripoly, in the behalfe of Raymond. For he determined to haue that Kingdome either by force or policie: Therefore they laide siege to Tripoly; but striuing in vaine by reason of the strength thereof, they diuided the Armie into two parts: the Earle of Chartres continuing the siege with the one, whilst Raymond marched with the other to Tortosa. Beamond likewise, Godfrey and the Earle of Flaunders departed at the same time from Antioch. But vnderstanding that Raymond was become more audacious, by reason of his exploits done in winter: and foreseeing the notable losse which Christendome would receiue if they should fight one with another, Beamond with his troopes returned to Antioch. Godfrey in the meane time and the Earle of Flaunders came and besieged Gibella a most rich Citie, and soone after tooke it. From thence they marched to Tortosa, vnderstanding that their fellowes were in great danger by reason of their small number. The Earle of Chartres being sent for likewise by Raymond, came thither. And so these three Armies ioyning togehter, Tortosa was more streigthly besieged. But after they had beene three moneths before it to no purpose at all, leauing the enterprise vnfinished, they dislodged, and making peace with the King of Tripoli vpon more easie conditions than the former which they propounded Tripoli besieged by the Christias.

Tortosa.

Gibella.

Agreement made with the King of Tripoly.

propounded to him, being furnished by him with weapons, cloathes, money and victualls, and they marched directy towards Ierusalem.

Bethlehem. The first day that the Armie dislodged, it came to Bethlem; from thence to Za-Zabarim. barim, where they were in some want of water; the third day they camped on
The riuer Braim the Riuer of Braim; departing thence they came diuided in fiue troopes ouer stee-Berithon. pie mountaines, and rocks, not without feare of ambushes, to Berithon a Sea-town;
Cesarea. and from thence to Sagitta: At the last they came on the tenth day to Cesarea:
Ramolles. where after they had rested two daies, they marched in battaile to Ramolles, which the enemies had forsaken for feare. The 3. day after, about sun-rising; those which Ierusalem. were in the Vantgard, descried not farre from thence the Walls of Ierusalem: At this first discouerie they made a great shout in signe of ioy; some honouring the name of Christ our soueraigne king with great reuerence; others vpon their knees weeping for ioy, did salute the holie Citie and the holie Sepulcher. But because this place requireth that we should say some-what of the antiquitie and magnificence thereof: to the end that this booke grow not too big, we will begin the sixt, which followeth by the descrip-tion of the Citie.

The end of the fift Booke of the first Decade.

THE SIXTH BOOKE OF THE FIRST DECAD

Of The Historie Of Venice.

¶ The Contents of the ſixth Booke of the firſt Decad.

THe ſixth Booke containeth the deſcription of the Citie of Ieruſalem with the taking thereof. GODFREY of BOVILLON made King of Ieruſalem. The Chriſtians moſt happie victorie againſt the Turkes. The taking of Aſcalon with other Cities of Syria. The Venetian Fleet returneth into Italie. The priuiledges graunted to the Venetians in the Citie of Ferrara. The Venetian Sea-armie called backe into Syria. The taking of the Cities of Ptolomais and Sydon, with the priuiledges which the Venetians for their part obtained therein. The lucky iſſue of the warre againſt the Paduans, and their confederats. Two ſtrange and wonderfull accidents hapned by fire in the Citie of Venice one after another. Thoſe of Zara, and other people of Dalmatia, doe rebell. Prince ORDELAPHO his ſucceſſe at the repriſall of the Cities in Dalmatia; with his death, fighting againſt the Barbarians. The Venetian Armie at the purſute of Pope CALIXTVS returneth into Syria. The Citie of Tyre beſieged by Sea and Land. The Tyrians yeeld. The Venetian Armie returneth from Syria into Italie. The building of the Hoſpitall of the publicke Charitie.

THe Citie of Ieruſalem which we may properly terme holy, is (as wee haue learned,) ſeated on a high place enuironed almoſt on euery ſide with very high mountaines, hauing neither fountaines nor Riuers neare to it, but only Siloe, which Ioſephus calleth a fountaine, and others a riuer. This which we cannot call a riuer for the ſmall quantitie of water which is in it, running from mount Sion, paſſeth through the vale of Ioſaphat. The Territorie neare to the Citie is very drie and barren, and is full of Ciſternes to receiue raine water. The Solymi which were ſometime called Lycians according to Herodotus, were the founders of this Citie, as the verie name it ſelfe doth witneſſe; and Cornelius Tacitus doth affirme it, in that place where he ſpeakes of the antiquitie of the Iewes. Homer neuertheleſſe ſinging the praiſes of the Lycians, doth ſeeme to make a difference betwixt them and the Solymi. His verſe is thus;

The deſcription of Ieruſalem.

This man againe warr'd on the Solymi,

Meaning Bellerophon, who was deſcended from Lycia. Concerning the Religion, and ancient manner of life, which this Nation vſed, it ſhal not be amiſſe to ſet down what Strabo a man verie much addicted to Paganiſme hath written therof. For there is no man almoſt, but hath either read or heard what the Authours of the holie Scrip-

Scripture haue set downe concerning the antiquitie of this place. It is good then, and (I say) lawfull, to know how neere some, who were stuffed with Paganish superstitions, haue approched to the knowledge of the truth.

Strabo his opinion concerning Moses.

The common report (saith he) of matters beleeued concerning the temple of the Ierosolimitans doth affirme, That those, who are now called Iewes, are descended from the Ægyptians: For Moses, a Priest of Ægypt, being possessed with a certain Idea of Religion, detesting the vaine institutions of his owne Countrie, came from thence into Palestine, followed by great numbers of people highly deuoted to Diuine matters. He taught them how greatly the Ægyptians did erre, to attribute the name of God to brute beasts; and the Grecians likewise, to represent their Gods vnder humane pictures and figures: And that the same thing was God which had created vs and the whole world beside, which we call Nature; the figure of whom, no man how wise soeuer, durst vndertake to present; That it behoued them then to reiect all those Images and Idolls, and to build a Temple to the only God, wherein to worship him without any superstition: And that those who should liue chastly in all integritie and righteousnesse, might hope for happinesse; otherwise not. Strabo did not know all. But it is altogether necessarie to vnderstand, how an Ethnick, brought vp in superstition, doth approue that which is directly contrarie to his law. For he doth sufficiently approue that which he doth not reproue, and chiefly that, which hee knoweth to bee openly repugnant to the dreames of his Religion. But (as I said) he knew not all. For, concerning the portraits of the Diuinitie, hee seemeth as much to reiect our custome as theirs. And to speake truth, as much as they did it foolishly, we do it wisely, with an other kinde of consideration. Now Moses, after he had thus perswaded a great multitude of people, brought them in to the same place where the Citie of Ierusalem now stands, the which hee possessed, with so much the more ease, as for the barrennesse thereof it was desired of none; being no such place as was worth the contending for by Armes. For the place, whereon the Citie is seated, is verie stonie, and ill-prouided of water. Strabo would heereby inferre, That Moses, and those which followed him out of Ægypt, were the founders of this Citie, and not the Solymi. He sets downe besides, That there was a Quarrie of stone found in the Citie, two hundred and fiftie foote in length, and threescore in breadth, wherewith that most magnificent Temple was builded in the Citie, from the foundation, euen to the toppe thereof: whereof diuers haue so largely written; and principally Iosephus in his Historie of the Iewes.

Sinne the cause of the destruction of Ierusalem.

But so soone as straying forth of the right way, they gaue themselues ouer; first to tyrannie; then to couetousnesse; and vnto all other vices: it came to passe, that by a iust iudgement of God, the Citie hath not beene only once, but many and sundrie times, and in diuers manner, taken and afflicted. For omitting that which went before the time of Alexander the great, it is written, That the first Ptolomie, king of Ægypt, did wholly destroy it: Then in succession of time, vnder the happie gouernment of Titus sonne to Vespasian, it receiued so much the greater losse, by how much before then it had offended: Soone after that, in the daies of the Emperour Adrian, and then after him, these losses following one an other, it had no leasure almost to breath in the middest of so manie miseries, which haue continued euen to the time of this iournie. In this manner the Holie Land, otherwise happie, hath been a long time tormented vnder the cursed Empire of Mahomet, who cruelly possessed it, at such time as the Christian troopes did arriue.

The first taking of Ierusalem by Ptolomie.
The second by Titus.
The third by Adrian.

The Christians besiege Ierusalem.

Now after the Princes had viewed the situation of the Citie, they resolued to assaile it in three seuerall places. The Earles of Flanders and Chartres encamped on the North-side, neere to Saint Stephens gate; (for neere thereunto is a Chappell of his name, because it is thought, that he being throwne out of the Citie, was stoned in the same place) Godfrey and Tancred on the West-side; and Raymond neere to mount Sion, toward the South. So soone as the campe arriued, certaine skirmishes were were made on both ſides, as occaſion ſerued. And the Armie in the meane time wanted no victualls, as it did before Antioch, by reaſon of the Sea which was not far of; as alſo for that they poſſeſſed diuers ſtrong townes in Paleſtine. They attempted at times, during the ſeege, to take the Citie by Scalado, but it was in vaine. At the laſt, bringing woodden Caſtles, and other warlike engins, before the walls, the batterie was ſomewhat more furious than before; and a breach being made they marched to the aſſault, which laſted from the day-breake till noone, with a great ſlaughter of our men, the which did howerly encreaſe, without anie likelihood of waxing better, had not Baldwin, followed by a troope of Soldiers, mounted the wall on boards, which the enemies had there placed to catch our engins, which were brought before the walls. For a while it was doubtfull what would become of them. But the Citie-gate in the meane time being broken open, and the wall neere thereunto beaten downe by the Ramme, the victors entring on euerie ſide, the enemie retired, where at their firſt entrance they made in all places a meruailous ſlaughter, without exception of ſex or age. Dauids tower, fortified in manner of a Cittadell, was forthwith yeelded vp. All the furie of the fight was neere to the Temple, whither great multitudes of people were retired. They fought there with great loſſe on either ſide. Deſpaire encouraged the one, and ſhame the other; becauſe the Citie beeing taken, the Temple was poſſeſſed, and kept from them by a few. Yet neuertheleſſe they entred it by force, and ranne ſo couragiouſly vpon the enemie, as beeing thruſt forward in front by thoſe which followed them, they which firſt entred were conſtrained to fight hand to hand, with the whole ſquadron of the Armed enemie, and were beſides thruſt forward, by thoſe which were behinde them, vpon the points of their ſwords. The enemies in the meane time did valliantly defend themſelues, whom the imminent danger did conſtrain to fight with hazard of all things. Therefore the fight was verie bloudie, not onely at the entrie of the Temple, but in the middeſt thereof. And ſo great was the ſlaughter aſwell of the victors, as the vanquiſhed, as the bloud, which was ſpilt on the pauement of the Temple, was a foot deep. In the end, the vppermoſt part of the Temple being not yet taken, the retreate was ſounded a little before night. The next morrow, after commandement was giuen not to hurt thoſe that were diſarmed, they which defended the higher part of the Temple did ſodainly yeeld.

The Chriſtians take Ieruſalem.

Great effuſion of bloud in the Temple.

In this manner was the Citie of Ieruſalem taken in the yeare of our Saluation 1099. and foure hundred foureſcore and ten yeares after it was taken by the Infidels, and the thirtie ninth day after the Chriſtians had beſieged it. Godfrey of Bouillon was by the conſent of all men ſaluted king: who after he had receiued all the Roiall ornaments, (except the Crowne) would by no meanes be crowned; ſaying, That it did not become a Chriſtian to weare a Crowne of gold in the ſame place, where Chriſt, the ſoueraigne king, had worne a Crowne of thornes.

1099.

Godfrey of Bouillon king of Ieruſalem.

Whilſt theſe things were done in Ieruſalem, fearefull newes was brought, that great multitudes of enemies did approach. To meete whom, Godfrey, after he had left a good Garriſon in the Citie, marched almoſt as farre as Aſdona. There they fought a bloudie battaile, which for diuers howers ſpace inclined to neither part. In the end the enemies were broken, and put to flight, with great loſſe. Some ſaie that there died the ſame daie an hundred thouſand men. The priſoners that were taken did report, That the number of their Armie was fiue hundred thouſand fighting men.

The deſeate of the enemie, with the number of the dead.

During this happie ſucceſſe in Syria; the Venetians, departing from Smyrna, after they had coaſted the Seas of Lycia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia, they arriued in Syria, and kept the Hauen of Ioppa, taken before by the Chriſtians. But I dare not affirme, that the Venetians beeing departed from Smyrna, did arriue in Syria, before that the holie Citie was taken. Neuertheleſſe it is certaine, that the French, beeing encamped before Ieruſalem, were releiued with victualls comming from the Sea. The which I can not ſee how it ſhould be done by any other, but by them, at that time; ſeeing seeing that all the coast of Syria was as yet in the enemies power. After the Venetians had left a sufficient garrison for the defence of their vessells, they departed from Ioppa, and marched in order of battaile towards Ierusalem: from whence returning they tooke by force the Citie of Ascalon vpon the Sea, which the French had a little before attempted in vaine; and leauing French-men there in garrison, they laid siege to Caypha, which is likewise called Porphiria, neere to Ptolomais: the which siege lasted longer than it was suspected. From whence, because they would not liue idely, they went to besiege Tiberias: the which being yeelded by the inhabitants, those of Caypha did soone after the like.

The Venetians comming into Syria.

The Venetians take Ascalon.

Some Authours attribute these exploits to Godfrey, and not to the Venetians. But I thinke them to haue beene done by a mutuall consent; namely by Godfrey, with his Armie by Land, after the taking of Ierusalem; and by the Venetians, by Sea, keeping way with him still all-along the coast. And from thence it commeth that the Venetian Chroniclers attribute the whole to the Venetians; and the French to Godfrey. It is certaine, that so soone as the Venetians arriued in Syria, they ioyned with the French, and that the affaires of the Christians were, for the space of a whole yeare, gouerned in the Prouince vnder the happie fortune of either of them. These things being done, the Venetian Armie returned to Venice. And Godfrey of Bouillon soone after died.

The Frenchmen and Venetians ioyned together.

The death of Godfrey.

It is reported, that, about the same time, the bodies of Saint Nicholas and Saint Theodore, were brought to Venice; the one being laid in Saint Sauiours Church, and the other in that which of a long time had beene dedicated vnto him on the banks of the Sea. The Normans vnder the conduct of Roger, brother to Beamond, made incursions on Grecia and Dalmatia. The Venetians, after they had made a league with Caloman, sonne to Geica King of Hungarie, marched against the Normans. But I know not vpon what ground the Normans at the same time made warre on the Venetians, and Alexius. The Venetian fleet being strengthned by the succours of the Barbarian passed into Apulia. For Caloman had not only made a league with the Venetians, but ioyned his forces to theirs. I know not vpon what occasion this was done, vnlesse it were that the Hungarians did at the same time hold some places in Dalmatia; and that it grieued them to bee molested by the Normans. It may be likewise that they had couenanted so to doe in the articles of their agreement.

The bodies of Saint Theodore and Saint Nicholas brought to Venice.

The Venetians agreement with Caloman King of Hungarie.

Now the Venetians hauing, in a manner, at their first arriuall taken Brundusium, left a garrison there, and scattering their forces on euery side ouer the firme land, filled all the Sea-coasts with spoile and terrour. And afterwards the fleet being stuft with booties returned to Venice. It is said, that it was expressely mentioned in the treatie of peace with Caloman, that neither he, nor any of his successours should pretend any right to Dalmatia.

The Venetians take Brundusium

The Hungarians giue ouer their pretended right to Dalmatia.

About the same time Matilda, a noble Ladie of the illustrious family of the Sigefretti, being by meanes of the Venetians repossessed of the Citie of Ferrara, granted vnto them, as to her friends by whose meanes she had obtained the victorie, fredome and exemption for euer from all matters within the same Citie. Prince Vitalis about the end of the fourth yeare of his gouernment died.

Orde-

¶ ORDELAPHO PHALERIO, the 34. Duke of Venice.

Rdelapho Phalerio was choſen in his place. In the firſt, or certainely in the ſecond yeare of his gouernment, a very great fleete was ſent againe into Syria. The Venetian Chroniclers ſay, That they were one hundred Gallies; Blondus mentioneth but foureſcore. The Genoueſes likewiſe about the ſame time, a litle before the Venetians, had ſent their fleete thither. Baldwin, called King of Ieruſalem after his brothers death, was at the ſame time incamped before Ptolomais a Sea-towne. This man being diſcouraged with the loſſe of a great battaile in Syria, ſoone after the death of Godfrey, durſt neuer after attempt any thing, vntill that he vnderſtood that Beamond was deliuered and returned to Antioch, by the induſtrie and liberalitie of his nephew Tancred, his brothers ſonne, who to free him, paid a great waight of gold for his ranſome: For being then confirmed by the preſence of ſo notable a man, he came (as hath beene ſaid) and beſieged Ptolomais, called Acon by the modernes, and at laſt Acre by corrupted ſpeech.

A new fleete of Venetians in Syria.

Baldwin King of Ieruſalem.

Beamond is ſet at libertie and returnes to Antioch.

Baldwin, being incamped in this place, receiued two mightie fleetes called out of Europe vpon faire promiſes, and being ſtrengthned by theſe ſuccours he ſhut in the Citie more ſtrictly by Sea and Land; by meanes whereof it was taken the twentieth day after. Blondus ſaith that after Ptolomais was taken, there was no warlike exploite done vntill that Beamond (who was then gone into Italie) was returned into Aſia. Whereby it is apparent that Baldwin made more account of Beamond alone, than of all the other Chriſtian Captaines in the Armie. But that which Blondus writes of Beamonds comming into Italie, ſeemeth to be verie true: Becauſe diuers Annalls make mention, That whileſt Beamond tarried in Italie, the Venetians, in fauour of Alexis, armed themſelues againſt the Normans, who were incamped before Durazzo: and that, remembring perhaps the loſſe which they had in times paſt receiued, they durſt not aſſaile the enemie who was in the Hauen, but held their courſe towards Apulia, where after they had greatly moleſted and indangered the enemie, they returned to Venice, leauing their enterpriſe imperfect. If it bee ſo, we muſt thinke that the Venetian fleete, after the taking of Ptolomais, returned into Italie, as well becauſe it was Ordelapho (as they affirme) which marched againſt the Normans, as alſo in regard, ſo many veſſels being buſied in Syria, they muſt of neceſſitie prouide newe to goe againſt ſo mightie a King; the which could hardly haue beene done.

The taking of Acon by Baldwin.

What account Baldwin made of Beamond.

The occaſion of the warre betwixt Alexis and Beamond.

It is reported, that the occaſion which moued Beamond to make warre on Alexis, was becauſe that after Tancred had ſeized on Laodicia, the Greekes inuaded and moleſted the Sea-townes of the Principalitie of Antioch. Others ſay, that Beamond was ſo terrified at the only ſight of the Armies of Alexis and the Venetians, as he ſodainely fell to compoſition, and that by that meanes the ſiege of Durazzo was raiſed.

The taking of Sydon.

The Venetian Annalls affirme, that after the taking of Ptolomais, their fleete ſailed to Sydon, whither Baldwins forces marched by Land, which in few dayes they tooke. Sydon ſtood in times paſt betweene Berithon and Tyre, the three moſt famous Cities of Phænicia, the moſt renowned for antiquitie and riches. Some ſet downe the taking of Berithon before that of Sydon, becauſe it was the firſt that was beſieged, before which they were incamped two whole moneths: and being taken with great loſſe, it cauſed the Chriſtians at their entrance, not only to kill thoſe which were armed, but ſuch likewiſe who for age were not able to defend themſelues. A Chriſtian Colonie was ſent thither by reaſon of the fruitfulneſſe of the Countrie. And this is all we finde to be done by the Venetians in Syria in the dayes of Ordelapho. Some Authours ſay, that the Venetians, after the taking of Sydon, tooke Faronia by aſſault, which is a Sea-towne neare to the mouth of Nilus, and how likewiſe in that iourney they ſunke diuers ſhips of the enemies, which did vſe to ſcoure the Seas. In recompence whereof Baldwin gaue the Venetians in the Citie of Acre, a Church, and a part of the towne, with a place where they might doe iuſtice one to another, with like power and authoritie as the French had, with diuers goodly priuiledges; and that not only in the ſame place, but ouer all the Kingdome of Ieruſalem. They ſay beſides, that Baldwin being puffed vp with the happie ſucceſſe of his affaires deſired farther to extend the bounds of his Kingdome; and to the ſame purpoſe he cauſed to bee built on the other ſide of the Riuer Iordan (famous for the baptiſme of Chriſt our Lord) the Caſtle of Soball in a very high place: but that, ſoone after the Venetians were returned into Italy, hauing loſt certaine battailes againſt the enemie, and fortified ſome places neare to Ptolomais, plotting higher matters in his minde, he died, euen as theſe warlike preparations were in readineſſe. Baldwin ſurnamed Burgenſis, who was his neare kinſman, was declared King of Ieruſalem in his ſtead; and for the ſtronger aſſurance thereof he was confirmed by Pope Gelaſius. Others write, that vpon the returne of the Venetian Armie from Syria, Ordelapho ſoone after led it againſt the Norman; but they ſet not downe vpon what occaſion, nor to what place. And I thinke they did vnderſtand it to be the iournie againſt Beamond (alreadie mentioned) notwithſtanding that they affirme, how the ſame enterpriſe was not againſt Beamond, but againſt Liemond his ſonne.

The Venetians take Faronia by aſſault.

The Caſtle of Soball builded by Baldwin.

Baldwin ſurnamed Burgenſis King of Ieruſalem.

Great priuiledges granted to the Venetians by the Emperour Henry the fourth

The Venetians at the ſame time did obtaine ſondrie great priuiledges of the Emperour Henrie the fourth; and they ſay, that for the ſame purpoſe Vitalis Phalerio, Stephano Moroſini, and Vrſo Iuſtiniano were ſent to Rome, who in acknowledgment of that grant, promiſed him in the name of the people, a yearely cloake of cloath of gold, and a penſion of monie, which was not verie great. Some ſay they obtained theſe priuiledges at Verona, and that the Emperor willed them to ſend commiſſioners to him to treat of the controuerſie betwixt them and the Paduans. For it fell out at the ſame time, that the Paduans, ioyned with thoſe of the Marches of Treuiſo, and of Rauenna, were in Armes againſt the Venetians. And, notwithſtanding that the occaſion of this warre is vnknowne, yet may we perceiue by the Emperour Henries declaration, which followed ſoone after, that theſe two people then, as at other times, were at variance concerning their bounds. The Venetians marched againſt the enemies who were come as farre as the Tower of Bebia, betwixt the Riuers Brenta and Adice: where at the firſt they made certaine light skirmiſhes, and afterward fought with their whole forces, where the Paduans being ouercome, ſix hundred of their people were taken priſoners. The Paduans being terri-terrified with this loſſe, had recourſe to the Emperour Henrie, demaunding aide of him againſt the Venetians. Henrie, for that he would not ſeeme to contemne their requeſt, concluded with the Ambaſſadours ſent for that end (as hath beene ſaid) to Verona, That, all ſtrife and contention laid a ſide, The Venetians and the Paduans ſhould louingly treate together concerning their greefes, Declaring to the Venetians, that they ought to remember how they were ſprung from the Paduans; That they ſhould greatly erre vnleſſe they did honour the Citie from whence they were deſcended; and reſpect the inhabitants thereof in the ſame manner, as well-bred children doe their ancient parents: That the Paduans on the other ſide, in ſted of enuying the Venetians glorie, ought rather to reioyce to ſee thoſe, that were deſcended from them, to haue purchaſed, euen till then, ſo great fame and reputation both by land and Sea; That his opinion was, in regard of their kinred, that their bounds ſhould be common to either of them, and that they ſhould neuer afterwards contend about any matter whatſoeuer. The Emperours authoritie preuailed much for the appeaſing of this ſtrife, but moſt of all by his gentle exhortation, whereby the Ambaſſadours there preſent were mooued at the ſame inſtant to forget all former hatred, according to his deſire. And it is thought that the Venetians at the ſame time obtained of the Emperour Henrie that which hath been alreadie mentioned. Other Hiſtorians haue thought, that thoſe priuiledges were graunted to the Venetians at his firſt arriuall, not making mention of the golden cloake, nor of any other tribute.

The Warre againſt the Paduans: with their diſcomfiture.

The Emperours mediation betweene the Venetians and the Paduans.

The Venetians and Paduans reconciled.

At the ſame time a great part of the Citie was conſumed by fire; which beginning in the houſe of Henrico Zeno, tooke holde on Saint Peters Church; and in an inſtant, after it had conſumed a whole ſtreet by reaſon of the wind and of the matter apt to burne, it flew on the farther ſide of the canall, where in a moment it conſumed the Iſle of Caſſian to aſhes; and ſo ſcattering it ſelfe here and there, burnt our Ladyes Church, and the ſtreets of Saint Agatha, Saint Auſten, and Saint Stephen all on a rew. Two moneths after or there about: (for Authors doe not ſet downe the certaine time) the Citie being yet terrified with the firſt fire, was preſently frighted with another more terrible than the former, which beginning at the houſes of the Zancares flew into Saint Laurence his Iſland, and being ſodainely ſcattered abroad did in a moment burne ſixteene Iſlands of the Citie, and that part of the Dukes Palace, which looketh vpon Saint Baſſius Church. Some ſay likewiſe that Malamoc was at the ſame time, in a manner, wholly burnt, and not long after drowned. Whereupon by the aduice of Ordelapho, thoſe of Chioggia were ſuffered to take ſtones, columnes, and what other things they would carrie with them to Chioggia, to build Churches, and other publicke buildings, with the ruines of Malamoc. And by that meane this citie, which till then was but of a meane ſtructure, was in an inſtant greatly bewtified with coſtly buildings. The religious brethren of Saint Hilaries order of Malamoc remooued themſelues to the Monaſterie of Saint Seruulo. The Gradonici likewiſe builded at Muriana a goodly Church to Saint Ciprian, for the religious ſiſters of the order of St. Ciprian of Malamoc. The Badoarij mooued with that ſelfe-ſame zeale to Religion, did, at their owne coſts, build the Church of Holie Croſſe, with the Monaſterie thereunto adioyning.

Two great accidents of fire happened in the Citie.

Malamoc burnt and drowned.

Chioggia builded with the ruines of Malamoc.

S. Ciprians Monaſterie builded.

The Common-wealth had ſcarce time to breath after thoſe two terrible accidents of fire, when as on a ſodaine newes was brought, that thoſe of Zara, hauing driuen away their Gouernour, were reuolted from the Venetians, and had yeelded themſelues to Caloman King of Hungarie. For the Barbarian, after the warre with the Normans wherein he was accompanied by the Venetians, being puſte vp with pride for his good ſucceſſe, (in contempt of the alliance which the Venetians till then had ſtrictly obſerued) ſeized vpon Dalmatia, and tooke Zara firſt of all, and the reſidew of the Prouince in a manner by a voluntarie ſubmiſſion. And wholly to alienate that Nation from the Venetians obedience, hee proclaimed forthwith,

The rebellion of Zara.

That he came to ſet the Dalmatians at libertie. And after he had giuen great guifts to the Churches of the Cities, hee went backe into Hungarie, where he dyed ſodainely. It was thought that it fell iuſtly vpon him for breaking the league which he ſo religiouſly had ſworne vnto.

Caloman King of Hungarie dyed ſodainely.

Ordelapho, taking occaſion by the death of Caloman to recouer that Prouince, did in the thirteenth yeere of his gouernment paſſe ouer into Dalmatia. He beſieged Zara and in ſhort time tooke it. The Barbarians in the meanetime who were left in garriſon in the citie, or (as I thinke rather) were ſent out of Hungarie to raiſe the ſiege, comming to fight with the Venetians, were by them broken and put to rout, and by that meanes did wholly abandon Dalmatia; Thus by the happie ſucceſſe of this victorie, Zara was recouered. Then the troupes marched to Sicqua, which was likewiſe reuolted, conſtraining the inhabitants to yeeld. The towne was ſoone after diſmantelled. Other places conſequently ſubmitted themſelues to the Venetians obedience, who not ſatisfied wrth this victorie, trauerſing the mountaines of Croatia, ſubdued in a ſhort ſpace whatſoeuer lay in the middeſt of the countrie. By meanes whereof ſome ſay, that the Venetians beganne then to vſe the title of Croatia.

Zara recouered by Venetians

Croatia brought vnder the Venetians obedience.

Now after Ordelapho had quieted the Prouince, and enlarged the boundes of the State, he returned to Venice, whither he brought diuers great Lords of Illiria, with other men of note, priſoners; the which made his returne home more magnificent, ſetting it forth to the people almoſt after the manner of an ancient triumph. But this Prouince did not long remaine quiet. For ſo ſoone as the newes of that which the Venetians had done in Dalmatia and Croatia was reported in Hungarie: a freſh Armie of Hungarians marched into Dalmatia. Which being vnderſtood at Venice did greatly buſie them, by plotting meanes how they might keepe that Prouince vnder their obedience. For there was likely-hood, that vnleſſe the Sea-townes were ſtrongly kept with good Garriſons, the Dalmatians (being naturally inclined to change and nouelty) would deliuer their countrie to the enemie. Ordelapho, knowing that in ſuch dangerous buſineſſes ſpeed was to be vſed, paſſed into Dalmatia with a greater Armie than before, and ouertaking the enemie before the walles of Zara, drew him forthwith to battaile. At the beginning they fought furiouſly on either ſide, fortune enclining to neither part, vntill that Ordelapho, encouraging his Soldiours, and thruſting himſelfe into the formoſt rankes, fighting hand to hand with the enemie, was ſtricken with a dart, of which wound he ſodainely dyed.

A new Armie of Hungarians in Dalmatia.

Ordelapho comes againe into Dalmatia.

Ordelapho dyes and the Venetians are defeated

The Venetians being amazed at their Princes death did for a time ſuſtaine the enemies forces; but beeing diſordered, they fell to flight; diuers were ſlaine in the fight, and many taken priſoners. The report of this loſſe brought great heauineſſe to the Citie. The common people thought, that their Prince being dead, and their Armie defeated, there was no more hope for them tobe able to keepe the Prouince. Therefore they reſolued to ſend Ambaſſadours to the king of Hungarie, to obtaine a peace if it might be, or elſe truce for a certaine time. Vitalis Phaledrio, Vrſo Iuſtiniano, and Marini Moroſino the Secretarie, were ſent thither, who obtained truce of the king for fiue yeares. Ordelapho's bodie, beeing brought to Venice, was honorably buried in Saint Markes Church, who fighting valiantly for his Countrie was ſlaine in the nineteenth yeare of his Principalitie. Dominico Michaeli was choſen in his ſted.

Truce with the King of Hungarie for fiue yeares.

Dominico

¶ DOMINICO MICHAELI, the 35. Duke of Venice.

Aldwin, the ſecond of that name, ſent to this Prince for aide. For the affaires of the Chriſtians in Syria, were brought to ſuch a paſſe, that they ſpake no more of making themſelues greater, but only how to keepe that which they had gotten. For albeit in the two firſt yeares of his raigne he had obtained certaine victories of the enemie, yet there was ſome likelihood, that they daily waxing ſtronger (as indeede they did) they ſhould hardly be able to keepe thoſe places which they held in Syria, without freſh ſupplies. He requeſted the Venetians by his Ambaſſadours, to paſſe with a mightie fleete into Aſia; and the more eaſily to obtaine it, his Ambaſſadours in his name promiſed a verie great recompence. But Baldwin, expecting ſupplies from Italie, being taken priſoner by Dalochus king of the Parthians, with whom hee had fought, was carried away captiue to Cayro. Then thoſe that remained in Ieruſalem, did ſpeedily certifie Pope Calixus of the ſtate of the affaires of Syria, aſſuring him, that if they were not forthwith ſuccoured with ſupplies from Italie, and Europe, that their dominion in Aſia would not only be ſoone brought to nothing, but the name of Chriſtians would be extinct, and all reduced vnder the power of the Turkes.

Baldwin taken priſoner by Dalochus king of the Parthians.

The Pope being moued by this great danger, began forthwith to examine which were the chiefeſt forces of Italie, and found that there were none but the Venetians, which were able in thoſe miſerable times to preſerue the affaires and ſtate of the Chriſtians in Syria. Therefore he ſent his Nuncio to entreate Prince Dominico ſpeedily to paſſe into Aſia with a mightie fleete, to aid the Chriſtians. The people then being called before the Aſſemblie, after due Praiers made vnto God, the Patriarch of the Citie by the Princes commaundement ſpake to them after this manner.

The Popes reſolution for the ſuccour of the holie Land.

The Oration of the Patriarch of Grada to the people of Venice.

I Thinke (ô people of Venice) that you are not ignorant, what our owne forces in part, and partly thoſe of the reſt of Europe haue done theſe precedent yeares, for the recouerie of Paleſtine, which ye call the holie Land. For this is the ſix and twentith yeare (if I miſtake not) ſince that great voiage, which ſo manie Chriſtian Princes, taking the badge of the croſſe vpon them, vndertooke for the same purpose into Asia, where by the Diuine bountie and their valour, all that which stretcheth from Bythinia euen to Syria, was in a short space taken by force out of the hands of the cruell enemie. And our people likewise after they had taken Smyrna in Ionia, and executed manie martiall exploits all along the Sea-coasts of Syria, did not only purchase great commendation, but had their share in the Cities that were taken. The which if we well obserue, ye shall finde, that they laid a sure foundation at that instant whereon to enlarge in time to come your Dominion in Syria. But it hath hapned in a short time, that by the decease of Godfrey, Baldwin, and Beamond, with other excellent Captaines, who died according to the necessitie of nature, our affaires in Syria haue been so altred, as in sted of their woonted prosperous successe, they are on a sodaine fallen to the ground, and doe daily wex weake, so as being more and more exposed to the violent assaults of the enemies, wee haue left vs small hope of abilitie to defend that Prouince. The which Baldwin, the second, fearing, did not long since send his Ambassadours vnto vs, to entreate vs, with great promises, to prepare forthwith a mightie Armie, and therewith to passe speedily into Asia. The intreaties of so great a person did moone vs. But beeing at the point to open the matter vnto you, and deuising meanes how to prouide such an Armie, we haue with great terrour receiued newes, how Baldwin is taken by Dalochus king of the Parthians, and carried prisoner to Cayro. Whereupon Varimond Bishop of Ierusalem (ô yee Christian people) being amazed, with all those which lie in garrison in the Citie, haue speedily sent for aide and succour to Pope Calixtus, saying, that vnlesse they be speedily releiued, themselues, with whatsoeuer they possesse in that Prouince, are in danger to be lost. The Pope being troubled with these newes, hath thought the Venetians alone to be worthie of such an enterprise. He hath written to your Prince, and to you, (yee people of Venice) whom hee intreateth, exhorteth and adiureth, not to abandon Christian Religion in so great a daunger. Wherewith your Princes pleasure is you should be acquainted, to the end ye might will and command a great Armie to be prouided for that purpose: whereunto, pittie alone, and the affection which we beare to the Apostolike Sea, and to all Christians in generall, should not onely prouoke vs, (which hauing receiued from our Anecstors as hereditarie, we ought to preserue and increase with all our power) but likewise the desire which wee haue to enlarge the bounds of our Dominions. Who is it but seeth that it will cheefely be an holy and iust warre, the which wee ought principally to consider in all things; and secondarily, highly worthie of the charitie and Religion for which ye are are euery where famous, to defend by Armes, and to preserue from the enemies wrong, this land where Christ, our king, was borne, did hide himselfe, wept, was betraied, taken and crucified, and his most holie bodie laid in the graue, and who (according as holie Writ doth witnesse to vs) shall come the soueraigne Iudge, one daie, to enquire of the deedes of all mankind. What Churches? what monasteries? what Altars doe yee thinke can be so agreeable unto him, as this holy voiage? Whereby yee shall free from base and cruell seruitude, the place of his birth, his Sepulcher, and generally all the signes and tokens of his humanitie. But because humane affaires are of such nature, as there is almost no publike charitie exempted from ambition: And your selues likewise, perhaps since I began to speake of this subiect, haue closely demaunded of your selues, what honour, what glorie, what recompence may be expected thereby? Certainly it is, and euer shall bee well beseeming, and greatly profitable for our reputation, that the Venetians only, of all Europe, haue beene thought fit at this time to oppose themselues with all boldnesse against all Asia in a manner. The farthest parts of the East shall feele the worth of the Venetians power. Affrick shall talke of it; but Europe shall greatly admire it: All men shall speake of you: The whole honour of the warre shall be attributed to you. That which we haue done heeretofore in Asia, seemeth to be effected rather by strangers than by vs. But that which we shall henceforth do there, shall be ascribed to vs alone. The glorie of strangers hath greatly hurt vs, who by their luster haue (in a manner) darkened all our great actions: the which in time to come they shall not doe. Their trauaile and danger in breaking the enemies forces shall bee our praise and glorie, to haue thus brauely broken and beaten them back. Moreouer I doubt not, but that all of ye are willing and desirous to enlarge your estate as far as may be. But how? by what meanes will you effect it? In liuing idely? or rowing vp and downe these Lakes in your little boates? Hee that thinketh so, doth greatly deceiue himselfe.

The

The ancient Romans of whom ye vaunt yee are deſcended, and whom ye deſire to imitate, did not purchaſe the Empire of the World by liuing idely, and at their eaſe, but by making one warre to grow from off an other: By warre they did ſubdue all Nations: And finally, by warre their power and greatneſſe did increaſe beyond all thought. Heereunto wee may yet adde that which is moſt to bee deſired, That wee are to take Armes againſt enemies, whom to kill it is not onely lawfull, but likewiſe iuſt and holie. Beſides, thoſe whom wee relieue, haue alreadie, and will ſtill giue vs a ſhare in thoſe Townes and Cities conquered from the enemie: But happily, ſome will thinke this a ſmall matter, and wholly vnworthie (for the recompence) of ſo great an enterprize. I confeſſe that it is ſmall in ſhew. But whoſoeuer will thinke vpon the time to come, will finde it to be an aſſured foundation whereon to builde and encreaſe our Dominion in the Leuant. For great and admirable matters are often-times ſeene to ſpring from meane beginnings. But if neither the honour, recompence, nor the mutuall loue we all beare to the Chriſtians name can not moue you: This, vndoubtedly, ought to prouoke you thereunto, That by freeing this holie Land from the bondage of the enemies, appearing one day before the Throne of this incomprehenſible Iudge we ſhall ſtand vpright, acknowledged by this great King and by all the reſt, for Soldiours of his guard, receiuing an holie guerdon, for ſo holy a war. Depart then in Gods name, and prepare a mightie Armie, which may be for the profit and honor of the Common-wealth. It behoueth you to vſe ſpeed, leaſt (as it often times hapneth) ſome vnlook't for accident do foreſlow ſo great an enterprize:

This ſpeech being ended, a ſodaine noiſe was heard ouer all the Church, entermingled with ſighs and teares, all the people crauing that the Armie might quickly be in readineſſe; ſaying, That there was no man in the whole citie, but had rather enroll his name for ſo holie a warre, than to liue idly at home. Hereupon they armed fortie Gallies; (as they ſay which ſpeak ſparingly of the matter) but (according to their opinions who ſpeak more indifferently thereof one hundred; alſo (according to others who amplifie the matter) two hundred: which opinion neuertheleſſe I hold to be the trueſt. For if it were ſo as they ſay, I know not vpon what occaſion Prince Michaeli (as ſhall bee heere-after mentioned) ſhould dare to aſſaile the enemies Fleete before Ioppa, which conſiſted of ſeauen hundred Shippes of warre. But ſome ſay that the enemie, inſted of ſeauen hundred, had but three ſcore and ten. If it were ſo, all the Hiſtorians ſhould haue ſmall cauſe ſo highly to praiſe this victorie obtained by Prince Michaeli; and chiefly Blondus, who hath more curiouſly, than anie other, ſet downe that which was done at the ſame time in Syria. Beſides, Giacomo of Genoa, who came to Hieruſalem by and by after the battaile, doth write that the Venetians had two hundred veſſelles, whereof three ſcore and tenne were Shippes of burthen.

The Venetians reſolue to ſuccor the holy land.

The number of the Fleet.

The Prince, being come to Dalmatia, tooke in freſh ſupplies. Then he ſailed with a faire wind to Ciprus, where hauing certaine notice of the great multitude of enemies incamped before Ioppa, he marched furiouſly againſt them. The Barbarians at the ſame time held thoſe of Ioppa, which were become Chriſtians, ſtreightly beſieged; and hauing ſhut vp their Hauen, and taken from them all hope of ſuccour on that ſide, from whence they moſt expected it, they attempted to make them yeeld. The Biſhop, ſo ſoone as he vnderſtood that the Venetian Fleet did approach, came to Ioppa with victuailes, and with the greateſt forces that hee could, to the end to relieue the citie vntill the arriuall of the Venetian ſuccours. But whileſt he made theſe preparations, Prince Michaeli, who (as hath beene ſaid) was come ſomewhat neere to the enemie, did on a ſodaine aſſaile him, not giuing him time to order his Ships in battell; vanquiſhed him, and enforced him to diſcampe, after he had ſlaine ſome, and taken the reſt. Some Authors affirme, That they fought in the maine Sea, and that the enemies Fleete was but an hundred veſſels, where the battell being very bloudie on both ſides laſted for certaine houres ſpace, and that in the end, the enemies being ouercome, and their Admirall Galley taken, with diuers others, the Venetians opened the paſſage of the Sea to thoſe of Ioppa; That our men, certaine dayes after, tooke in the maine Sea ten of the enemies

Ioppa beſieged by the Barbarians.

The Barbarians defeated by the venetians before Ioppa.

mies Ships of burden, laden with rich Merchandise: so as there was neither Captaine, Marriner, nor Souldiour, but were a long time after the better for that rich bootie.

The Duke of Venice commeth to Ierusalem.

Some Authours doe affirme, That Prince Michaeli, after this victorie came to Ierusalem, where being kindly welcomed by Bishop Varimond and the rest, hee was by them gratified, for his opportune arriuall, and for his happie defeating of the enemie. It was debated there among the Captaines, after what maner they should prosecute the Warres. Wherein hauing spent certaine dayes, without any resolution what Citie they should first attempt: It is reported, that by the aduice of Prince Michaeli they fell to cast lots, and that the same falling on the Citie of Tyre, it was the first that was besieged. The maner of casting these Lots was thus. The names of all the Cities, which they would besiege, were written in little scrowles of Paper; and being laide together confusedly on a heape vpon the next Altar, they were mingled by a yong boy: then after the celebration of Diuince Seruice, the same boy drew forth all those scrowles one after an other, in the presence of the Princes; and in this sort they concluded to begin the warre by the siege of Tyre.

The lot fell vpon Tyre.

Description of the Citie of Tyre.

This Citie was in time past an Island in the maine Sea, seuen hundred paces distant from the firme land. Alexander, sonne to Philip, being incamped before it, caused that space or distance from the Sea to bee filled vp to ioyne it to the land. It is very famous in respect of such excellent Cities as haue descended from thence; namely, Lepta, Vtica, and Carthage enuious of the Romane greatnesse, with Gades scituate in the farthest parts of the earth. This Island is in circuite nineteene thousand paces. When Alexander besieged it, it was taken by warlike engines the seuenth Moneth of the siege. The excellencie and riches thereof consisteth in Purples and Scarlets; in regard whereof, forraine Kings, and the Romanes likewise, haue euer enfranchized the Inhabitants of that place. The Citie it selfe is in circuit two and twentie Stadij. It is thought, that Agenor, sonne to that ancient Belus, was the founder thereof, and that it was in times past called Sarra. From whence it came (as I thinke) that we find in the Venetian Annals, Surra for Tyre. The Phœnicians (among whom, next to the Citie of Sydon, Tyre hath euer held the chiefe place, as well for greatnesse as antiquitie) haue beene highly praised and esteemed by all ancient Authours, for inuenting Arithmeticke and the Letters of the Alphabet, and for being the first that gazed vpon the Starres in the night.

The Phœnicians, the inuentors of Arithmeticke, the Alphabet, and Astronomie.

It was then concluded to besiege this Citie by Sea and Land; where at the beginning of the siege it was agreed vpon betwixt Varimond and the Venetians, That whatsoeuer Baldwin the first had in the last warres giuen to the Venetians in Syria, should remaine firme to them. Blondus saith, that hee had seene the Coppie of the Priuiledge, which did expresly containe, That the Venetians should in all places of the Kingdome of Ierusalem, and Principalitie of Antioch, haue a particular place and streete apart, and a place for them to pleade in before their Magistrate. They obtained, besides, many other matters necessarie for the publike vse, That the Venetian Merchants should be free in Syria, from tolles and impositions; And that if any Venetian should suffer shipwrack, or dye in those places without making a will or heire, all his wealth should be put into the hands of the Venetian Magistrate, vnto whom the Treasurer generall of the kingdome should paye euerie yeare three hundred Crownes, out of the Kings reuenues. This is it which Bishop Varimond, and those who did then manage the affaires of Syria, did graunt to the Venetians, and much more than this, which Baldwin at his returne from prison did willingly ratifie.

The conditions graunted by Varimond to the Venetians.

Tyre besieged.

In this treatie with Varimond, it was expresly said, That if the Cities of Tyre and Ascalon were taken, the Venetians should partake the thirdes thereof. This Citie had in times past beene besieged by Baldwin by the space of foure moneths, who could not take it, by reason it was so enuironed with the Sea. This new siege likewise was much longer than was suspected: But whilest it was besieged by

Land

Land and Sea, thoſe of the Land-Campe began to murmur againſt the Venetians, ſaying, That they alone were out of danger in their ſhips, and that if the enemie (whom they continnually expected) ſhould arriue, who would aſſaile them by Land, the Venetians in the meane time would put forth to Sea, and get to ſome place of ſafetie, and therefore they would either diſcampe, or ſhare equally the labour and danger betwixt them. This ſlaunder being reported to Michaeli, he was greatly troubled therewith: and after he had continued a certaiue time penſiue, ruminating to himſelfe by what meanes he might roote out this ſuſpition which his fellowes had vniuſtly conceiued: he commaunded on a ſoddaine to plucke vp all the bords from the bottome of the veſſells, or (as others ſay) all the nailes and oares, with other matters belonging to nauigation. And cauſing them to be brought into the preſence of Varimond and the reſt of the Captaines, hee vſed this ſpeech vnto them.

The diſtruſt conceiued againſt the Venetians.

A courageous act of Prince Michaeli.

The Princes Oration to Varimond and the reſt.

I vnderſtand, (quoth he) companions in Armes, that ye doe in ſome ſort doubt of the faith and loyaltie of the Venetians, & that inſtead of holding vs for faithfull companions, Ye repute vs cowards and traitours. But our fidelitie is not of ſo ſmall continuance, that we will ſuffer yee long to ſuſpect it, for which we are reſolued to hazard all dangers. Take (ſaith hee) this certaine pledge of our fidelitie. (and in ſo ſaying, he cauſed all the furniture of his veſſels to be throwne downe before them) Then he added, Yee haue now (as I take it) O Varimond, and the reſt, matter enough to repoſe truſt in vs, albeit that it is a common ſaying, that, before all things, we ſhould conſider the nature and inclinations of people. But to the end to take away from euerie one occaſion of euill ſpeaking, it hath pleaſed vs to doe thus; to let ye vnderſtand, that the Venetians haue the ſame courage like you. It remaineth now, that with a like affection wee goe forward with the Cities ſiege; whith being taken, I hope that in ſhort time, we ſhall become maſters of all Syria.

The fidelitie of the Prince and the Venetians, was highly eſteemed; all men with a loud voice, did greatly praiſe them, and accounted them for faithfull companions and good Souldiers. Thus being confirmed, and continuing the ſiege with greater care than before, they report an accident newly hapned in the Campe, which the ignorant multitude may hold for a miracle. Thoſe which kept the guard (experienced belike in ſuch matters) reported that they had deſcried a Doue, executing the office of a Poſt, comming from the Campe of Dachines King of Damaſcus, who made great preparations to relieue the Tryians; and at ſuch time, as it ſhould flie ouer the Campe, they tooke ſpeciall care at the very inſtant to make a great noyſe, ſo as the Doue looſing her ſtrength, fell downe all amazed. Being taken vp, they knew by the letters which were tied to her feete: That King Dachines did intreate the Tyrians to be of good cheare; That within few dayes he would be neare them with great forces, and by the death of their enemies free them from the ſiege. The Princes were greatly moued at theſe newes: For there was ſome likelihood that the Tyrians vpon this hope would haue more obſtinately held out the ſiege, and that which was moſt dangerous, they feared to come to ſtroakes with ſo mightie an euemie. Whereupon they bethought themſelues of a ſubtile ſtratagem; to tie counterfeit letters to the Doues feete, in ſtead of thoſe which Dachines had ſent to the Tyrians: which imported, Not to expect any ſuccour from the King, And therefore they ſhould doe wiſely, ſeeing their affaires ſtood ſo as they muſt needs yeeld, to giue place to the time, which they were chiefely to thinke on, and by a timely yeelding to prouide for themſelues and their meanes.

Proof of the Venetians loyaltie.

A ſtrange caſe of a Pigeon.

The Chriſtians. ſtratagem before Tyre.

Theſe Letters being publiquely read, (for the Pigeon being let looſe flew directly into the Citie) the Tyrians being wholly diſcouraged did yeeld themſelues the

The yeelding vp of Tyre.

the fifth moneth of the ſiege. I know of a certaine, that many will hold this, which wee haue reported of the Pigeon, for a fable, thinking it to be againſt nature, and ſo conſequently vnworthie of beliefe, that a bird tranſported into a farre Region, ſhould at a flight returne to her former neſt. But it is vndoubtedly true that it was ſo: The which hath beene oftentimes knowne by experience. For diuers doe witneſſe, that the ancient Romans made vſe ſometimes of birds for the ſame purpoſe. Plinie makes mention of a Pigeon, which brought letters to the Campe before Modena. I finde that Fabius the Roman Hiſtorian, and Cecynna Volateran, haue ſometimes vſed ſwallowes in ſuch like buſineſſe. But let it be granted that it may be ſo; it is no leſſe ſtrange, that theſe birds, flying in the ayre, ſhould fall to the ground by a ſuddaine noyſe. For ſome doe affirme the ſame to haue hapned in the aſſembly of the Iſmenians (as oftentimes in other places) at ſuch time as by the meanes of Titus Flaminius, all Grecia did recouer her ancient libertie. Plutarch, a man of ſingular learning, hath taught the ſame to come to paſſe by the clearing of the aire, becauſe that by a ſuddaine crie aſcending vpwards, the aire is forcibly cleft, leauing no ſupport for the birds; for waxing more ſoft and ſlipperie, the birds fall, as though they were come into an emptie place, without any ſtay at all, whereby they fall downe, being ſtricken with the noyſe, as if it were with an arrow; It may bee likewiſe according to the ſame Authour, that this noyſe engendreth in the aire a violent by-turning like to the tempeſt of the Sea, wherewith birds, being touched, fall downe amazed.

The like done by a Pigeon before Modena.

Now the Tyrians hauing yeelded; there were ſet vp on the Towers and higheſt places of the Citie, the enſignes of Varimond, and of the Venetians, vnto whom were giuen the third part of the Citie, according to the agreement, the proweſſe and valour of whom (according to the ſaying of Chroniclers) was greatly admired in that ſiege: The like was giuen to them in the Citie of Aſcalon. Baldwin, returning from his impriſonment at the ſame time, did not only approue all theſe things, but did likewiſe at the ratifying thereof highly honour the Venetian Prince.

The third part of the Citie giuē to the Venetians

Baldwin ratifies it.

It is to be ſeene in ſome Authours, that he vſed this preface. Dominico Michaeli, Duke of Venice and Dalmatia, Prince of the Kingdome of Ieruſalem, who after he had defeated a great Armie of the enemies on the inacceſſible ſhoare of Aſcalon; ſlaine and taken many thouſands of thoſe Barbarians: and deliuered thoſe of Ioppa from the ſiege, wherewith they were ſhut in, did enter victorious into Ieruſalem. Some others, adding greater matters than theſe, ſay, That, beſides theſe things graunted at the ſame time to the Venetians in Syria, it was confirmed vnto them ouer and aboue all the reſt, that whileſt the Duke of Venice ſhould make his aboad in Ieruſalem, hee ſhould enioy the ſame honours and prerogatiues as the King did. Whereas there is mention made, that the enemies were defeated before Aſcalon, and not before Ioppa; the ſame proceedeth from the varietie of Hiſtorians.

During the Venetians proſperous ſucceſſe in Syria, Caloianes ſonne to Alexis (ſome ſet downe Emanuel for Caloianes) enuying that the Chriſtians had obtained ſo notable a victorie; and chiefely the Venetians, vnto whom was aſcribed all the glorie of whatſoeuer had beene then done in Syria; reſolued to make open warre againſt them. In regard whereof, there was ſome likelihood, that the Venetians, if they reſpected their owne priuate affaires, would wholly leaue Syria, as indeed it happened. For the Prince being ſpeedily called home, vpon the firſt commotion of the Greekes, did depart out of the Prouince: who being come to Rhodes; and the Townesmen refuſing to furniſh him with victualls: he tooke and ſpoiled the Citie. I beleeue hee had ſome other cauſe ſo to doe, For that had beene to haue drawne a kindneſſe from them perforce. But it is moſt likely, that it was done in hatred to Caloianes, who had alreadie declared himſelfe their open enemie; (which ſome Authours affirme) or elſe certainely, becauſe the Venetians had in times

New warre againſt the Greeks

paſt

paſt receiued ſome notable iniurie of the Rhodians, they would then at the inſtant call it in queſtion, hauing ſo fit an occaſion.

Prince Michaeli, from thence comming to the Iſle of Chyos, waſted it likewiſe, and carried from thence the bodie of Saint Iſidore to Venice, which was laid in Saint Marks Church, in the Chappell, which we haue elſewhere ſaid was builded by Narſes with the ſpoiles of the enemies. The fleet made ſome ſtaie there, in regard of the great ſharpneſſe of the winter. From whence (finding that place fit for the affaires of warre) they would not ſlodge, vntill they had taken all the neighbour-Iſlands from the Greekes. Whereupon departing thence on a ſodaine, they firſt tooke Samos, then Lesbos, Andros, and all the other Iſlands of the Greeke Empire. Hauing performed theſe exploits neare to the Iſlands Ciclades, they ſayled into Peloponeſſus, where he ſeed on Methon, at this day called Modona, and left a garriſon there. Then comming into Dalmatia, he recouered Zara (as ſome write) which had, before, driuen thence the Venetian Magiſtrate; and being thus recouered (to the end that her deſtruction might ſerue for example to the neighbour-Cities how in time to come to falſifie their faith ſo religiouſly ſworne vnto) they did for the moſt part ruine it. Then they recouered Spalatra and Trahu by force.

All the Iſlands of the Grecian Empire taken.

Zara and all the other Cities of Dalmatia recouered.

But other Authours haue paſſed ouer in ſilence that which we haue now mentioned to haue beene done by him in Dalmatia. All theſe great atchieuements luckily finiſhed, after that he had tamed one part by Armes, and protected the other from al wrong, from the Sea-coaſt of Syria euen to Dalmatia, he brought backe his Armie entire to Venice, where hee was receiued with generall ioy. And ſo ſoone as he had related what he had done in that voyage, the whole Citie did highly praiſe him. The affaires of the Chriſtians in Syria ſtill declining by little and little, did euery day wax worſe, vntill the time of Baldwin the fifth. From whom Saladine, King of Egypt, recouered Ieruſalem, the foureſcore and eighth yeare after the Chriſtians had taken it. There were diuers and ſundrie warlike preparations made aſwell in Italie as in other parts of Europe, for the conſeruation of Syria. But all thoſe attempts proued vaine and fruitleſſe; of which wee determine briefly to ſpeake as occaſion ſhall ſerue, not interrupting the courſe of our Hiſtorie.

The Prince returneth to Venice.

In whoſe time the Turkes recouered the Holy-land.

During the aboade of Prince Michaeli in Aſia, or ſoone after his returne, the Hoſpitall of the publike charitie was builded, with all that which ſtands neere to it. The bodie of Saint Donato, brought from Pera to Venice, was laid in a Church newly built, by the diligence and coſt (as ſome Authours ſay) of one called Marco Iuliano. Michaeli, after hee had gouerned the Common-wealth eleuen yeares, did fortunately deceaſe. His funeralls were followed by great multitudes of people. His tombe is to be ſeene at this day in the porch of Saint Georges Church, right ouer againſt the Comcell-Hall on the left hand as ye enter into the Church.

The building of the Hoſpitall of the publike charitie.

()

The end of the ſixt Booke of the firſt Decad.

THE SEVENTH BOOKE OF THE FIRST DECAD Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the seuenth Booke of the first Decad.

THe voluntarie submission of the Faneses. The institution of a new Religious Order in the Church of Saint SALVATORI. The erecting of the Church of Saint CLEMENT. The Paduans are defeated on the turning of the Riuer Brente. The Venetians warre against the Normans, in fauour of the Emperour EMANVEL. The building of the great Tower before the Market-place. Diuers people of Histria made Tributaries. The building of the Church of the Crossed Friers. How greatly the conspiracies of the Neighbour-people did trouble the Venetians. The originall of the plaies made at Shrouetide. What the Emperour EMANVEL did to the Venetian Merchants ouer all his Empire in one day. The Venetians mightie Sea-armie against EMANVEL. The familie of the IVSTINIANI are almost extinct through the malice of their enemies. The miserable death of Prince VITALIS, slaine by his owne people at his returne from Greece. Two huge Pillars of a wonderfull workemanship, erected in the Market-place, by an Artificer of Lombardie. An Ambassadour of Venice is abused by the Emperour EMANVEL. The cause why the Emperour EMANVEL hated the Venetians. At what time they beganne to shut vp in the publike Treasurie the money of particular persons vnder colour of loane. Pope ALEXANDER flies to Venice in disguise. The Venetians make warre against the Emperour FREDERICK BARBAROSSA, in fauour of the Pope. The Emperours Sonne defeated at Sea by the Venetians; with his imprisonment; and the Emperour FREDERICK his comming to Venice. The Honours and Titles giuen by Pope ALEXANDER to the Dukes of Venice. The agreement betwixt FREDERICK, the Pope, and the Venetians, made at Venice. The Venetian Prince hauing accompanied the Pope to Rome, returneth to Venice, honoured with rich presents. And lastly the description of the magnificent Church of St. MARKE.

¶ Pietro Pollani, the 36. Duke of Venice.

Pietro Pollani ſucceeded his deceaſed Father-in-law Michaeli. At his entrance into the gouernement, the Faneſes ſubmitted themſelues to the Venetians authoritie, promiſing to aide them when neede ſhould be; to giue yearlie the quantitie of a thouſand pound weight of oile, for the vſe of S. Markes Church, and to pay them, beſides, a yearly penſion of money, in manner of Tribute. It ſeemeth vnto mee that this tribute proceeded from ſome aide which they had receiued from the Venetians in their warres, the which ſome Hiſtorians haue noted, albeit they ſet not downe againſt whom it was. The Faneſes made Tributarie to the Venetians.

Bonfilio Michaeli, Adminiſtrator at that time of the Church of S. Saluatori, and all thoſe which accompanied him, tooke a Religious habit vpon them, inſtituting a new order, which was afterward authoriſed by Pope Innocent; and after him, Pope Alexander the fourth conſecrated their Church. Pietro Gathilaſo cauſed the Church of S. Clement to be builded on the Canal Orphano. It is reported beſides, that at the ſame time a great ſtrife aroſe betwixt the Venetians and the Piſans, occaſioned by a brauado, raſhly made vpon them in the Hauen of Rhodes by Michaeli Vitalis, the Princes ſonne, Generall of the Venetian Armie: where the Piſans being ouer-come, and loſing the greateſt part of their Armie, did receiue a great diſgrace: which afterward cauſed diuers and ſundrie murthers on either ſide. And theſe two States would haue beene more ſharply bent one againſt the other, had not the Pope by his wiſe mediation, ſodainely pacified their ſtrife. A new Religious order. Agreement with the Piſans.

Diuers cities of Dalmatia, inſinuating themſelues into the Venetians fauour, promiſed each of them in her owne name to waite on the Prince with one armed Gallie, as often as he ſhould put to Sea with fifteene Gallies. The Polani likewiſe, a people of Hiſtria, offered them all aide, with all neceſſaries for the furniture of the Gallies, at any time when the Prince, marching againſt the enemies, ſhould arriue in their Countrey.

I finde about the ſame time the Venetians fought a cruell fight with the Paduans who would haue cut off the Riuer Brente neere to Saint Hilaries Chruch. Guido Monticulano, Generall of the Venetians Armie by Land in that warre, hauing incountered them neere to Tumba, the bickering was verie bloudie on either ſide; The Paduans deſcaried.

but the enemies being ouercome and put to flight, three hundred and fiftie of them were brought priſoners to Venice: who neuertheleſſe at the entreatie of the chiefe of their Citie, laying all the blame on ſome audacious perſons among the Common people, and not on the Nobilitie, were all freely ſent home againe. Vrſo Badoario left to Giouanni Throno of Mayorba diuers goodly Lands ſeated neere to Muriana and Maiorba, to build an Hoſpitall in the name of Saint Iames; which being ſince much augmented and enriched, was giuen to the Religious ſiſters of the order of the Ciſtercians. But whileſt the Citie was thus at quiet: the Venetians, becauſe they would not liue idely did ſet ſet forth an Armie, at the requeſt of the Emperour Emanuel againſt Rogero, ſonne to Guiſcard King of Sicilie. This Prince, departing from Ottranto with a great Fleete, came to the Iſle of Corfu, bordring vpon the Adriaticke and Ionian Seas: And hauing ſeized thereon, hee ſailed into Morea, where betwixt the Promontorie of Mailla, and the Gulphe of Argiers, and Laconia, he executed diuers hoſtile actions. Returning thence towards the Sea of Sarrona, neere to the Hauens of Cenchrea and Corinth, hee put all the Countrie adioyning to fire and ſword: Then paſſing forward without any reſiſtance at all, and being come to Iſtmos (vulgarly called at this day Heximilia) he filled all Achaia with feare and terror. He tooke likewiſe the Citie of Thebes; where it is reported he ſhewed himſelfe ouer-couetous, in his curious ſeeking for gold, In the end, he neither ſpared the Countrie of Nigrepont, nor Beotia called Phocides. And being puft vp by this happie ſucceſſe, he ſent one of his Lieutenants with threeſcore Gallies to croſſe the Helleſpont, called at this day the ſtreight of Gallipolis, euen to the Boſphorus of Thrace, at this preſent called Saint Georges Arme, who with great boldneſſe vſed ſuch ſpeed, as being arriued on the ſodaine before Conſtantinople, he ſet fire on diuers houſes neere to the Cittie with firie arrowes, which hee ſhotte from his Gallies.

Rogero ſonne to Guiſcard King of Sicilie.

Emanuel his requeſt againſt the Normans.

The affaires of the Empire being thus troubled; Emanuel by his Ambaſſadours had recourſe vnto the Venetians, of whom, in reſpect of their ancient friendſhip, he freely craued helpe in his great need: or if he asked it too late, that they would yet reuenge the wrongs done vnto him. Therefore they prepared a mightie Fleete, which being in readineſſe in the Hauen, after that certaine Gallies which were abroad were by a decree called home, the Prince ſet forward againſt the enemies. But Hiſtorians make no mention at what time theſe Gallies, which were called home, departed from Venice. We muſt beleeue they were thoſe which the Venetians did entertaine for the defence of the coaſte of Syria, according to their promiſe made to Baldwin: as ſome Authors doe affirme. The Fleet being departed from the Citie, ſayling on the maine, and grieuouſly toſſed with a mightie tempeſt, did put it ſelfe into the Hauen of Caorli, a territorie of the Forlani; where the Prince falling ſicke, and perceiuing his diſeaſe growing worſe and worſe and that there was no hope of his ſodaine recouerie, after he had committed the charge of the Armie to Giouanni his brother, and Reyniero his ſonne, he returned to Venice. Emanuel likewiſe had armed a great number of veſſelles, which hee committed to the charge of one of his Lieutenants, with all authoritie at Sea. He came by Land with his forces into Albania where he beſieged the Citie of Butritot.

A new Armie againſt the Normans.

Corfu taken by the Venetians.

But during theſe atchieuements: the Venetians after they had ſlaine diuers of the enemies, and taken many priſoners, tooke the Iſle of Corfu by force. Some neuertheleſſe affirme, That the Iſland was rather recouered; that they did not fight on the maine Sea; and That the Kings Fleete being diſperſed and defeated, the Venetians tooke foureteene of his Gallies: who after they had left ſtrong Garriſon for the guard of this Iſland, ſailed forthwith into Sicilia: where ſo ſoone as they arriued, there is no ſort of crueltie which they committed not. They did put all the Prouince to fire and ſword; burnt diuers Cities; cut downe the Trees; plucked vp plants by the rootes; and carried great numbers of priſoners with them to Venice. By meanes whereof the Empire was not onely protected (as at other times) by the Venetians forces, but reſtored to her ancient ſplendor and maieſtie, which would hardly haue beene done without their aide. The Princes death, which hapned before the Armies returne, hindred the publike ioye for ſuch a victorie; who deceaſed the nineteenth yeare of his gouernment. Dominico Moroſini was by a generall conſent choſen in his place.

The Venetians Armie in Sicilie

times

¶ DOMINICO MOROSINI, the 37. Duke of Venice.

ABout the ſame time (as ſome write) Rogero King of Sicilie deceaſed, who was an enemie to the Venetians. This Prince, after diuers great atchieuements, hauing ſubiected vnder his power the Citie of Thunis in Africke, cauſed in his life-time theſe Latine verſes to be engrauen on his kinglie ſword. The death of Rogero king of Sicily.

Appulus, & Calaber, Siculus mihi ſeruit & Apher.

Which may be thus engliſhed,

The prowd Calabrian beares my yoake
Black Affrica I tam'd,
Sicilia's Iſland felt my ſtroake with' Pulia, (Naples nam'd.)

Sixe galleies were ſent the ſame yeare to defend the Sea-coaſts, on which the Pirats made ordinary incurſions, who ſailing on the maine, tooke fiue Galleies of Ancona, which Guiſcard, one of the Pirats of his time, did commaund; who being taken was preſently hanged. About the ſame time likewiſe, diuers buildings aſwell publike as priuate, were conſumed with fier in our Ladies Iſland, no man knowing from whence it came. Beſides, at the ſame time the foundations of the great Tower was laid, which is right ouer againſt the market-place, and is a verie admirable peece of worke. For it is reported, that the foundations of the ſame great Maſſe are laid ſo deepe vnder ground, as there was more time ſpent therein, than on the whole worke beſides. The top thereof, gliſtering with gold, is of ſuch heighth, as a man may not only from thence ſee round about the Citie, but likewiſe diſcouer a great way off at Sea towards the South and Eaſt, in ſuch ſort as the brightneſſe thereof doth appeare like a luckie ſtarre, two hundred ſtadij in length, to thoſe which ſaile from Hiſtria and Dalmatia. A ſodaine fier.

The Polani, with diuers other of Hiſtria, did by their thefts trouble the Gulfe. The Dukes Sonne with Marino Gradonico were ſent againſt them with fiftie Armed Gallies. Pola being beſieged by them, the inhabitants at their firſt arriuall ſued for peace, which was granted them on condition, That they ſhould no more robbe at Sea; and pay yearlie two thouſand weight of oile for S. Markes Church. The Parenzans likewiſe, being moued with the like feare, promiſed to giue them aide, as oftentimes as the Duke ſhould goe to the wars. The Emonians promiſed as much, with a yearelie tribute of oile. Some did, beſides, acknowledge them for their Soueraigne Lords, promiſing to free all the Venetian Merchants from ſubſidies and impoſitions: Thoſe of Ancona likewiſe at the ſame time made a league with the Venetians. The like did William King of Sicilie who ſucceeded Rogero; in regard whereof he graunted diuers priuileges, and immunities, to the Venetian Marchants which frequented the Faires of Sicilie.

A league with William King of Sicil.

Pope Anaſtaſius, at the Venetians entreatie, erected the Church of Zara into an Arch-biſhops See, whereunto he ſubiected all the Cities of the neighbour-Iſlands. Yet I am not of opinion, that the ſame was done ſo much in fauour of thoſe of Zara, who were not at the ſame time greatly affectionate to the Venetians, as in hatred to the other Cities of Dalmatia; which, for the moſt part being reuolted from the Venetians, did at the ſame time obaie the King of Hungarie. If this be ſo (as diuers likewiſe affirme it) we muſt thinke, That Dominico Michaeli, at his returne from Syria, did not recouer Spalatra, Trahu, nor any other Citie in Dalmatia, but only Zara; or elſe of a certaine, That this Archi-epiſcopall erection was in the daies of Vitalis Michaeli the ſecond, in whoſe time, we finde, Trahu, Spalatra, Raguſa, and diuers other Cities of Dalmatia, to bee poſſeſſed by the Emperour Emanuel.

Zara made an Archbiſhopricke

The Church of the Virgin, which the croſſed Friers poſſeſſe, was built at the charges of the Guſſoni, an honourable familie, as that likewiſe of S^t. Mathew: toward the which Bernardo Cornari did freely giue the ground. This is all which is obſerued to haue hapned at home, or abroade, vnder this Princes gouernment; who died the eighth yeare of his Principalitie, and was buried in the Church of Holie-Croſſe.

¶ VITALIS MICHAELI, the ſecond the 38. Duke of Venice.

Italis Michaeli, the second, succeeded him: who after he had wholly rooted out all ancient emulation betwixt the Venetians and the Pisans, made a league with them.

The Venetians vnder this Princes gouernment took part with Pope Alexander the third, vpheld by the kings of France and England, against Octauian the Anti-Pope, who was alone fauoured by the Emperour Frederick Barbaroſſa; who, for this cauſe, commaunded the ſubiects of the Empire which were neere neighbours to the Venetians, to ouer-runne them. At the Emperours commandement, thoſe of Verona, Padua, and Ferrara, ſo ſoone as they had ioined their forces together, did aſſaile and take by force the Cape of la Mothe. But vnderſtanding that the Venetian Armie approached, (which vpon the firſt report of the enemies riſing was prepared) they ſoone diſlodged, after they had ſpoiled the Towne, and carried awaie the inhabitants as priſoners. The Venetians not meeting with the enemie, fell on the Territorie of the Hadrians, to reuenge the iniurie done to their ſubiects. Vlrich, Biſhop of Aquileia, preſuming on theſe troubles (for he likewiſe fauoured Octauian) came with a great troope of Forlani and tooke the Citie of Grada, not ſo much in hope to keepe the place (for hee had none at all) as to take thence the rareſt and richeſt things, and to carrie them to Aquileia. But being taken with the manner by the Prince his vnlookt-for comming, himſelfe, with twelue of his Channons, and manie others of note, were brought priſoners to Venice. From whence ſoon after he was diſcharged, on condition, To ſend euerie yeare, at ſhroue-tide, a fat Bull with twelue wilde Boares, which ſhould be ſlaine in the Market-place, in the preſence of all the people, for a perpetuall teſtimonie to poſteritie of their victorie. But ſome Authours referre this to the gouernment of Angelo Partitiatio, which wee haue heeretofore mentioned. But I thinke the errour proceeded hence-from, that they deliuer the ſame to haue hapned in the time of Pope Alexander; not making mention of which Alexander.

The Venetians neighbours take armes againſt them.

Vlrich Biſhop of Aquileia brought to Venice as a priſoner.

The originall of the Games at ſhroue-tide.

Whileſt theſe things were done neere the circuites of the Citie, the Emperour Emanuel attempted by new ſleights to gripe from the Venetians. Who hauing made a new League with William king of Sicilie, had giuen his daughter ſecretly to him in marriage, or elſe of a certaine, ſome hope of new affinitie. For if the ſame had bene done vnder-hand, I know not with what face he could haue entreated the Venetians to make warre on him; becauſe that euerie one would haue perceiued his diſſimulation, by ſolliciting forraine Armes againſt him, with whom hee had contracted new friendſhip and alliance. Now therefore that he might with-draw this King from the Venetians, whoſe faithfull friend hée knew him to be, and who (as then) were ignorant of what had paſſed, he requeſted them by his Ambaſſadors to aide him againſt him. Some write that after the agreement was ſworne to, there aroſe ſome diſſenſion betwixt the Emperour and the King. If it were ſo, the matter is anſwered, for otherwiſe it would be a hard matter to beleiue, that ſuch affinitie and alliance betwixt ſo great perſonages, could bee contracted vnknowne to the Venetians, or at leaſt could be long concealed from them. Therefore the Grecian Ambaſſadours receiued this anſwere, that the Venetians could not by the Law of Nations, nor by their ancient cuſtome, take Armes without a cauſe againſt him who was their good friend and confederate: But that the Emperour Emanuel might wholly make vſe of their meanes, as of a Nation which did greatly affect him, ſo farre forth as their honour and conſcience would giue them leaue: though they could not at that time ſend him aide, without great breach to their reputation and publike loialtie. The Ambaſſadours were with this anſwere diſmiſſed, who were no ſooner departed from Venice (becauſe there was ſome likelihood of diſcontent about this anſwere) but they ſodainely decreed to ſend to all Venetian Marchants trafficking at the ſame time in Greece, to returne home ſpeedily to Venice.

A ſecret league betwixt the Greeke Emperour and the king of Sicilie.

The Emperour Emanuels Ambaſſadours at Venice.

The anſwere made to the Greeke Ambaſſadours.

The Emperour, who before then bare them no great good will, thinking by this refuſall to haue a iuſt occaſion to make warre vpon them, ſeized on the Cities of Spalatra, Trahu, and Raguſa, but it is not knowne whether it were by force or by a voluntarie yeelding of the inhabitants. Then adding treacherie to treacherie, he did feigne that hee ſeazed on them, only to conſtraine the Venetians to renew the league with him, and with no intent to detaine them. Therefore he intreated them by his Ambaſſadours to ſuffer their merchants to vſe their trafficke in the accuſtomed faires of Greece, and that hee would ſhortly let them vnderſtand, how much hee did loue them, and was mindfull of the benefits which hee had receiued from them, as from his good friends, and companions in Armes. The promiſe of ſo great a Prince did indeed moue the whole Citie, but much more the remembrance which he ſaid he carried of the benefits which the Greeke Empire had in times paſt receiued from their Anceſtors. Vpon which aſſurance hauing reuoked their former decree, they permitted euerie one to ſaile into Greece. Whereupon a great number of Merchants did ſodainely depart, who ſtirred vp by profit went thither, being followed by two Ambaſſadours ſent to renew the league, namely, Sebaſtiano Cyani, and Auria Maripietro; who were ſcarce come to Conſtantinople, when Emanuel, at a day appointed for the ſame purpoſe, cauſed ouer all his Empire all the Venetians to be taken, with their ſhips and merchandize, commanding them to bee ſtreightly kept till his farther pleaſure were knowne, and their money and goods to be ſhut vp in the publicke warehouſes.

Emanuel ſeizeth on the Cities of Dalmatia.

Treacherie of Emanuel.

The Ambaſſadours amazed at the newneſſe of this deed (for they durſt not by the law of Nations hurt them) leauing Conſtantinople returned into Italie. Some, who in this tumult and feare had put to Sea, arriued ſooner at Venice than the Ambaſſadours, and did report, that by the treacherie and diſloyaltie of Emanuel, all their Countrimen (a few excepted) were impriſoned, and their ſhippes and goods ſeized on in the hauens and faires of Greece.

The vnworthineſſe of the matter did greatly trouble the whole Citie. But calling to minde that there is nothing ſooner puniſhed among men than trecherie, being reſolued to reuenge this wronge, they ſodainely prepared a mightie Armie. A hundred gallies were (as they ſay) in as many dayes, with a meruailous courage, readie to ſet ſaile, with twentie ſhippes of burthen. And hauing, beſides, ſent to all that were abroade in trafficke of merchandize to returne to Venice by the firſt of September, after they had receiued the ſupplies of Hiſtria and Dalmatia, the fleete ſet ſaile vnder the commaund of Michaeli. He firſt tooke Trahu by force, and wholy ruined it: whereby wee may perceiue that they had voluntarily yeelded to the Greekes. Raguſa likewiſe being recouered, the walles next to the Sea-ſide, with a tower, were beaten downe to the ground, whereon the Emperours Armes were ingrauen. This being done in Dalmatia, they came with a faire winde into the Iſle of Nigrepont, where Prince Michaeli preparing to beſiege the Cities notwithſtanding that they were furniſhed with good garriſons, was diſſwaded from it by the Gouernour of the Iſland: who being amazed to ſee ſo great an Armie, or (perhaps) not ignorant of his maſters meaning, to abuſe ſo mightie an enemie by ſome delay counſailed Vitalis to ſend his Ambaſſadours to Conſtantinople, aſſuring him that he knew of a certaine, that Emanuel would rather chooſe a ſhamefull and diſcommodious peace, than warre.

A great Fleete againſt the Greeke Emperour.

A new deceit of the Greekes.

The Biſhop of Equiline, who ſpake good Greeke, and Manaſſes Badoario, were ſent thither. Vitalis in the meane time went to the Iſle of Chios, where hee ſoone reduced the Citie with the whole Iſland vnder his obedience. And becauſe the cold grew alreadie verie ſharpe, hee reſolued to ſpend the winter there, and to expect the returne of his Ambaſſadours. And for that after the taking of Chyos, there was ſome hope of peace, hee abſteined from making any more incurſions on the lands of the Empire. Emanuel in the meane time being cunning and polliticke, ſo ſoone as the Ambaſſadours arriued made ſhew in publicke to deſire peace, ſometimes crauing ſuch things, then refuſing others, now approuing the Ambaſſadours demaunds,

demaunds, and on a ſodaine ſaying that he would communicate them to his Councell, and ſo of ſet purpoſe by theſe delaies, hee mocked the Venetians. At the laſt, the Biſhop of Equiline and Manaſſes returned to Vitalis, hauing effected nothing at all, accompanied with the Ambaſſadours of Emanuel, who arriuing at Chios, and alleadging now one matter, and then another, cauſed a meruailous delaie.

Whileſt theſe things were doing, the contagious ſickneſſe, ſeizing on the Venetian Armie, did in a ſhort ſpace carrie great numbers of them into another world. The rumour was that the wells and fountaines, from whence the Venetians drew their water, were poiſoned by the Emperours commandement, and that the contagion in the Armie proceeded from the drinking of thoſe waters. Some thinke that Emanuel came with a great Armie to the reſcue of the Iſlands; but not daring to aſſault the enemie, he returned, after hee had cauſed all the waters to bee poiſoned. It is reported that the whole family of the Iuſtiniani, was wholly extinct by this ſickneſſe. For all the males of this familie, that were able to beare Armes, did follow the Prince to theſe warres. The Citie did meruailouſly bewaile the loſſe of this family. But calling to minde that there was one of the ſame houſe yet liuing called Nicholas, who hauing taken holy orders on him, did ſerue in Saint Georges Church, right ouer againſt the market-place, or (as others ſay) in Saint Nicholas Church on the ſhoare; meſſengers were by the Common-wealth ſent to the Pope, to intreate him to permit the young man to leaue his profeſſion, and to marrie that hee might haue children. Which being granted, the race of the Iuſtiniani, which hath produced ſince then ſo many learned men and great oratours, was preſerued in the Citie.

The contagious ſickneſſe in the Venetian Armie.

The family of the Iuſtinians, worne out by the ſickneſſe.

The family of the Iuſtinians reſtored.

Although Vitalis was greatly vexed with this loſſe, and perceiued the matter to be delaied by the malice of Emanuel, yet would not he ſeeme to keepe his Souldiers idle. Therefore, at the beginning of the ſpring he departed from Chios, and came to Lesbos, and from thence to Lemnos, then to Scyros. But becauſe the ſickneſſe which was begun in the winter time, did ſtill increaſe, and that the Souldiers and Marriners did ſodainely fall downe dead in the ſtreetes; being frighted with the cries and ſlaunders of his owne people hee reſolued to bring backe the remainder of his Armie to Venice, after he had loſt the greateſt part thereof.

Some Authours write, that Trahu, Spalatra, and Raguſa, did reuolt and yeeld to the Greeke Emperour, (which neuertheleſſe diuers doe denie) whileſt the Venetian Armie was on the Coaſtes of the Iſlands Ciclades; and that Michaeli at his returne recouered them.

The Armie being returned to the Citie, the ſickneſſe followed ſoone after; which waxing more contagious at home than abroad, diuers thouſands of perſons died in few daues. Whereupon the people being called into the aſſemblie, all men laid the blame of that loſſe on Michaeli, calling him traitour to the Common-wealth and to his owne Souldiers, who ſeeking to pleaſe Emanuel enemie to the Venetian people, had ſuffered the opportunitie of ſo godly a victorie to be ſnatched forth of his hands, hauing abandoned his Armie to the treacheries and deceits of the Greekes: whereunto as hee was readie to anſwere, and to alleadge his excuſes, there aroſe a ſodaine noiſe among the people which was intermingled with reproaches. Hee perceiuing it dangerous to make any ſtay there, ſtept aſide out of the thronge, hauing no man in his companie, and went along the ſhoare the neareſt way to Saint Zacharies Church. Thus eſcaping he met with a certaine man who fell vpon him and gaue him many dangerous wounds, whereof he ſhortly died, hauing beene deuoutly confeſſed; the ſeuententh yeare of his gouernmeut. Others alleadge diuers other cauſes of his death. But it is ſufficient to knowe that enuie alone procured the ſame. And nothing did him ſo much harme, as the ouer-great deſire hee had to peace, the which ſincerely purſuing, he hid greatly endanger the Common wealth. As concerning other matters, he was a vertuous man, and at the

The Plague very great in Venice.

Prince Vitalis murthered.

the beginning greatly beloued of euery one for his wiſedome. His funerals did manifeſt the good will and affection which the people bare vnto him, who in great multitudes were preſent at the ſame.

So ſoone as he was buried, the whole companie came into the Cathedrall Church, where, to cut off thoſe troubles and ſeditions which ſeemed to threaten the Citie, being yet in an vproare for the Princes murther, they choſe ten from among them, who did ſweare at that inſtant to elect no Prince, but ſuch an one as ſhould bee for the profit of the common-wealth. Diuers are of opinion that theſe ten were not appointed to elect a Duke, but only for to puniſh the murther, and not then only, but likewiſe euer after, when any one ſhould offer outrage to the ſoueraigne Magiſtrate, whoſe authoritie they would haue to be ſacred and inuiolate: Others affirme, that fortie were appointed to proceede to a new election in the place of him that was deceaſed. Now, ſo ſoone as they entred into diſcourſe concerning a new Duke, it is reported, that they all with one accord named Auria Maripietro, a man of ſingular wiſedome and ripeneſſe of counſaile, and who at that time was one of the ten: But he bearing an incredible affection towards his Countrie, perſwaded them at the ſame time to make choiſe of ſome other, who would be more for the profit of the common-wealth than himſelfe; and in ſo ſaying, hee named Sebaſtiano Cyani, a man of threeſcore and ten yeares old, and exceeding rich; proteſting, that he was fitter for the common-wealth, being one who was not able alone to helpe it in thoſe dangerous times with counſaile, but with meanes, which it did chiefly want. By this mans modeſtie, wee may eaſily ſee how free thoſe ancient Fathers were from ambition, and how zealous they were for their Countries well-fare, neglecting their owne priuate profit, for the good of the publike. According to his aduice, his fellowes declared Cyani for their Prince, who was forth-with receiued by the people with great applauſe. And becauſe diuers matters worthy of memorie, as well abroade, as at home, haue beene done vnder this Princes gouernement, we will beginne with thoſe done in the Citie.

The creation of the ten.

An example of great affection to a mans Countrey.

¶ Sebastiano Cyani, the 39. Duke of Venice.

NOt long after hee was created Duke, there were brought out of Greece (ſome ſay from Conſtantinople, but I cannot conceiue how that ſhould be, ſo long as Emanuel liued) in ſhips of burthen commonly called Carraques, three Columnes, or Pillars, of a wonderfull greatnes: theſe ſhips being come into the hauen, as they began to vnſhip

Three great Pillars brought to Venice.

ſhip one of theſe pillars with cables and other engines, the huge weight thereof, ſurmounting the induſtrie of the labourers, brake all the ropes, ſo as it fell into the bottome of the Sea, where it yet remaines: the other two were landed with more care. The which, after they had laien for a certaine time on the ſhore, no man durſt vndertake for any hire whatſoeuer to ſet them vp. The deſire which all men had to ſee them erected, was the cauſe, that by a publike decree it was euery where publiſhed, That whoſoeuer would by his induſtrie vndertake to bring the ſame to effect, it ſhould bee lawfull for him to craue of the Prince and People whatſoeuer hee would, promiſing on the publike faith, that it ſhould be giuen him: Prouided, that it were a matter which might honeſtly be demanded. At the report hereof, diuers (as the manner is) came running from all parts, ſome for hope of reward, and others being pricked forward with the deſire of fame. But of them al there was none which vnder-tooke the matter, but only one that came forth of Lombardie, who by continuall wetting with water the great cables which ſupported the whole weight, being by that meanes brought into the Market place, did ſet them vp in the ſame place where they now ſtand, leauing a certaine ſpace betwixt each of them. And on the top of the one was ſet a gilded Lyon with open wings, which is the badge of S. Marke, and on the other the figure of S. Theodore the Martyr, holding his lance and ſhield, with the Dragon vnder his feete.

How the columnes were erected & by whom

It is reported, that he demanded for his recompence, That it might bee lawfull for all dice and carde-plaiers, to play and cheate betwixt thoſe pillars without any feare of puniſhment. I ſhould praiſe thine induſtrie (O Enginer) whoſoeuer thou wert, haddeſt thou not ſo greatly recommended ſo baſe and vile an exerciſe, the which if thou haddeſt not extremely loued, thou wouldeſt neuer haue ſo much importuned. But God beſtoweth not all on one man. This man likewiſe was the firſt beginner of the bridge at Rialto, and of many other very profitable deuiſes for the common-wealth, in regard whereof it was decreed, (he himſelfe hauing ſo requeſted it) that he ſhould be maintained during his life at the publike charge.

The recompence which the Enginer demanded.

But whileſt theſe things were done in the Citie, Emanuel being deſirous to make his profit of the Venetians misfortune, (for hee had heard how greatly the Citie had beene afflicted with the plague after the returne of the Armie, and likewiſe of the Princes murther) omitted no kinde of treacherie againſt the Venetians. He did outrage to their Ambaſſadours that were with him, contrarie to the law of Nations. Prince Vitalis, at his departure from Greece, had ſent them to Conſtantinople, vpon likelihood that the enemie would hearken to a peace: Hee called then Henrico Dandulo, one of the Ambaſſadours, into his cabinet, as if he had meant to haue imparted ſome ſecret matter to him, where hee made him blinde by holding red hot copper before his eies. This monſtrous treacherie, which noteth ſuch a Prince to be of a baſe and abiect minde, makes me to beleeue, that which diuers Venetian Hiſtorians haue reported of him: That being deſcended of baſe Parentage, after hee had (to ſatisfie the inordinate appetite of a voluptuous widdow) put to death for that occaſion all the Nobilitie of Greece, he obtained the Imperiall dignitie.

Crueltie againſt the law of Nations.

This widdow (as I thinke) had beene wife to Alexis; for Emanuel ſucceeded him, her huſband being dead. After his death there being ſome likelihood that ſuch an Empire could not be well gouerned by a Womans authoritie, the Princes and other great Lords of the Empire, did ſolicite her to marrie againe, and to take for huſband whomſoeuer ſhee ſhould like among the Nobilitie. Shee being enamoured on one of her houſhold ſeruants of meane condition, named Gryphon (who after he had vſurped the Empire tooke the name of Emanuel) called him ſecretly into her cabinet, and bewraied to him her wicked intent. I haue determined (ſaid ſhee) for feare leaſt by a new marriage I ſhould be depriued of our familiar conuerſation, to make thee Emperour, if thou wilt but ſhew thy ſelfe ſtout and valiant. But giue care how this may be done. I know that thou haſt many Kinſfolkes in the Countrie; I will haue thee cauſe them all to come ſecretly Armed into the Citie, by Cruell determination of a Woman.

ſundrie

ſundrie waies, and at ſundrie times: Theſe thus Armed, thou muſt, when neede ſhall bee, bring into ſome place in this Palace, making them readie to ſtrike, when thou ſhalt command. Then, all the chiefe of the Empire beeing called together, I will aske them if their meaning be to haue me marrie with ſuch an one as I loue, and whether they will acknowledge him for Emperour of Greece? If they ſay (as I doubt not but they will) that they are ſo content; I will then name the for my huſband and Emperour, and enforce them at the inſtant to ſweare fealtie and alleageance vnto thee; But if they ſhall refuſe ſo to doe, I will deliuer them all into thy hands, and into the power of thy friends, to doe with them what ſhall ſeeme good vnto thee. This yong man, being valiant and amorous, did greatly praiſe the inuention of this woman; and after that hee had made readie that which was concluded betwixt them, vpon the refuſall which the Princes made to conſent to ſo baſe and vnequall nuptials, they were altogether at an inſtant murthered: and by that meanes, in one daie, ended the race of Conſtantine in Grecia.

All the Princes of the Grecke Empire murthered.

Emanuel hauing in this ſort vſurped the Empire; It is reported, that hee found a Booke of Prophecies, wherein reading by chaunce he was greatly frighted at one of the verſes, which ſaid, that thoſe of Adria ſhould one daie command in Conſtantinople. I omit the reſt, which he, being not able to vnderſtand, did impart to ſoothſaiers and Aſtrologians; who were of opinion, that it was to bee meant of the Venetians, who inhabited the Adriatick Sea: which hee himſelfe likewiſe imagining, had alreadie thought likelie to come to paſſe. And from thence (as it is ſaid) proceeded the originall of his hatred towards the Venetians. For he, thinking it would ſhortly happen, that the Citie of Conſtantinople ſhould be beſieged by them, (the which of a certaine fell ſo out within a while after) he ſought by treacherie and ſtratagems (not being able to do it by open force) to ouerthrow and ruinate the Venetian State. And not ſatisfied with that which he had till then done againſt them; he drew them of Ancona from their alliance, who in fauor of him, did for a time bar them from their free Nauigation. But the Venetians, making alliance with thoſe of Ariminium, neere neighours to the Anconezans, did in ſuch ſort ſhut vp the paſſages from them, as their condition was like vnto theirs who are ſtraightly beſieged.

The cauſe why Emanuell hated the Venetians.

The Cities treaſure being wholly exhauſted by means of the great affaires which had hapned, it was decreed, That the monies of particular men laid in Depoſito, ſhould be brought to the treaſurie of Saint Marke, to be imploied and kept in the name of the Common-wealth as neede ſhould be, vntill ſuch time as the Citie had recouered her former wealth. The which at this day is commonly called a Loane, which was (as ſome ſay) deuiſed by Prince Michaeli. From whence (as is ſuppoſed) grew the chiefe reaſon of the peoples hatred againſt him, and the principall occaſion of his death. Diuers Ambaſſadours were ſent likewiſe about the ſame time from ſundrie places to treate af an agreement with the Emperour-

When the loane began at Venice

Thus ſtood the affaires of the Venetians, when as (to the end that the Citie might be alwaies buſied about weightie matters) The Cauſe of Alexander the third gaue them the ſubiect of a goodly victorie. Some moderne Hiſtorians doe in no ſort approue this matter. But all the Venetian Annaliſts, and ſome ſtrangers likewiſe, doe make particular mention of it; and ſaie, That after diuers ſecret enmities betwixt Alexander and the Emperour Frederick, occaſioned, becauſe in the new Schiſme betwixt Alexander and Octauian the Anti-Pope, the matter beeing referred to the deciſion of Frederick, Alexander would not ſtand to his iudgement: Fredrick being moued heerewith, called Octauian before him, and declared himſelfe openly againſt Alexander. In hatred of whom, he publiſhed a Generall Councell at Dijon a Citie in France; the which beeing diſſolued by reaſon there was nothing done, becauſe Pope Alexander refuſed to come thither, Frederick in rage reſolued to returne into Italie. Whereupon hauing ſent his Anti-Pope before him, he marched ſoone after with great forces beyond the Mounts; but before his arriuall Octauian died. In

The True cauſe of Vitalis his death.

Wherefore the Emperour Frederick hated Pope Alexander the third.

A generall councell publiſhed to be holden at Dijon.

whoſe

whoſe ſted Guido of Cremona being elected, Frederick promiſed to aſſiſt him with all his power againſt Alexander. And after diuers exploits executed in the Prouince, comming neere to Ancona, hee turned towards Rome, whither he ſodainely marched with an intent wholly to ouerthrow Alexander. Who being frighted with his comming, making vſe of two Gallies belonging to William King of Sicilie, hee came firſt to Cayetta, and from thence to Beneuentum. Frederick, after hee had inſtalled Guido in the holie Chaire, returned into Lombardie. But Guido likewiſe died ſoone after.

The flight of Pope Alexander.

Now Alexander, committing the temporall gouernment to the Romans, craued no more but to intend Diuine matters; Prouided, that they of the contrarie faction would permit him to liue in Rome. But not being able to purchaſe his peace on theſe conditions, and deſpairing of all reconciliation, he departed from the Citie. But it is hard to determine whither this refuſall were the cauſe of his departure (a thing ſcarſe credible, that the diuiſion of the inhabitants could haue conſtrained him to leaue the Citie, the Romans not being intereſſed therein, in regard they had the temporall iuriſdiction in their own power) or whither it were rather the vniuſt command of the Emperour whereby he was banniſhed forth of all Italie, and thoſe attainted of capitall Treaſon which ſhould giue him meate or drinke, or receiue him into their houſes; threatning to ruine thoſe Cities which ſhould giue him entertainement, and to make warre on thoſe Lords and Potentates, which ſhould fauour him, which might be the cauſe, that hauing no place of ſafetie in all Italie, nor any good affiance in William King of Sicilie, hee came through Apulia to mount Gargari; and from thence taking ſhip (as Obba of Rauenna ſaith) in a veſſell of Liburnia, he came to Zara; And afterwards paſſing through Dalmatia, hee came in diſguiſe to Venice, as to the only refuge of all libertie. Yet there ſcarce thinking himſelfe in ſafetie (as being vnacquainted with the Venetians loue and affection towards him) concealing his eſtate, which he thought beſt ſo to doe, hee remained ſo long in the Hoſpitall of the Charitie in poore raiment, called by the name of Commodo, as at laſt he was knowne by a naturall marke vpon his body. Some write, that the better to liue there in ſecret, he ſerued for Scullion of the kitchin. But it is more credible that he concealed his Dignitie vnder the habit of a poore Prieſt; which by diuers likewiſe is affirmed.

The Emperour Fredericks rigorous ed ict againſt the Pope.

Pope Alexander comes to Venice in diſguiſe.

Forraine Hiſtorians doe affirme, That he came to Venice with thirteene Gallies belonging to King William, and not like a fugitiue, to recouer the Emperours fauour in a free Citie, the place hauing beene appointed for the meeting. But if it were ſo as they ſay; What needed ſo many Gallies? which were ſufficient, not only to haue tranſported the Popes ſmall houſhold, which is likely, at that time, to be but meane, but all Rome likewiſe: which in thoſe daies was ſmally inhabited. Beſides, what needed he to haue made ſo long and dangerous a iourney? As though he had rather to haue trauerſed the Sea-coaſts with danger, than to paſſe in ſafetie through the Duchie of Spoleta, and marches of Ancona. Vndoubtedly hee needed not to haue beene at ſo great expenſes, nor yet to haue ſo greatly hazarded himſelfe, had it not beene to haue auoided a greater danger. For the Emperours decree made all things difficult to him.

Therefore, in diſguiſed habit, or in theſe Gallies (for ſome of our Hiſtorians couertly ſeeme to conſent thereunto) he muſt of neceſſitie come to Venice. But how ſoeuer he arriued there, all thoſe, whom we follow, doe agree, That being at the purſuit of Fredericke driuen from the Pontificiall dignitie, hee had recourſe to the Venetians; and that, being knowne, he was honourably entertained by Prince Cyani, and lodged in the Caſtle of Oliuollo: with promiſe, either to reconcile him to the Emperour, or elſe that they themſelues would reeſtabliſh him in his See.

How the Venetians entertained the Pope when they knew him.

First of all, they concluded to ſend Ambaſſadours to Fredericke, to entreate him, in the name of the common-wealth, to be reconciled with Pope Alexander, and that in ſo doing he ſhould not only performe a matter moſt profitable for all Chriſtendome, dome, but most acceptable to the Venetians, who wholly sought the profit and aduancement of Alexander. It is reported that the Pope being present when the letters were writing to Fredericke, and perceiuing that they sealed them with wax, he commaunded, in fauour of Ciani & his successors, That euer after the Duks letters should be sealed with lead: the which is obserued euen to this daie. Obba of Rauenna who liued in those times, as well in regard of the antiquitie of his booke, from whence we haue taken this, as also because he hath curiously set downe al which passed in this warre saith, That the Venetian Princes had till then vsed two sorts of seales; namely lead in all their publicke acts of perpetuall remembrance, and wax in all their missiues, and other priuate writings. And how at that time by Pope Alexanders authoritie, they decreed euer after to vse lead.

A reſolued Ambaſſade to Fredericke in the Popes behalfe.

At what time the Venetian Prince began to seal: with lead.

Fredericke his answere to the Venetian Ambassadours.

The Ambassadours being come into the presence of Fredericke, were at the first curteously entertained. But so soon as they made mention of peace with Alexander he fell into a rage, and said: Get yee hence, and tell your Prince and people, That

" Fredericke, the Roman Emperour, demaundeth his enemie which is come to them
" for succour; whom if they send not presently vnto him bound hand and foote, with " a sure guard, he will proclaime them enemies to him and the whole Empire: And " that there is neither alliance, nor law of Nations, which shall be able to free them
" from his reuenge for such an iniurie, To prosecute which hee is resolued to ouer-
" turne all diuine and humane lawes: That he will sodainey bring his forces by Sea
" and Land before their Citie, and will, contrarie to their hope, plant his victorious
" Eagles in the market-place of Saint Marke.

Fredericke's menaces.

Preparations for warre against Fredericke.

The Ambassadours, being sent sent backe in this manner, did report at Venice the fierce menaces which the Emperour had vttered: wherewith the Citie was in some sort troubled; For there was likelyhood of more sharpe warres, than euer in anie time before. They decreed forthwith to arme a great number of Shippes, and to make themselues euer masters of the Sea. For, that being well defended, they did not greatly feare the enemies forces.

Whilest the Fleet was preparing, aud the whole Citie in expectation of this warre, speedie newes was brought, that Otho sonne to Fredericke, did approach with threescore and fifteene Gallies. Whereupon Ciani determining to meet him, caused the Fleete then presently made readie, to set saile. Before they went aboard the Pope celebrated diuine seruice, with prayers to God, That it might please him to graunt the victorie to the Prince and his followers. Afterwards turning towards Ciani, he honored him with the golden sword, and with other signes of Knighthood; who sayling from the Port with thirtie Gallies, made way with speed towards the enemies. It is reported that they met on the frontiers of Histria, neere to the Promontorie of Salberico, in the Countrie of the Piranni. And that they fought there a long time; where at last, the enemie beeing broken and put to rout, eight and fortie of his Gallies were taken; and among others, the Royall Gallie, and two suncke in the fight. The Venetians, after they had gotten the masterie at Sea, brought Otho prisoner to Venice.

The Prince imbaketh himselfe in the Popes presence.

Fredericke his Fleet put to flight, and his sonne brought prisoner to Venice.

At the report of this victorie, the whole Citie was filled with meruailous ioie and amazement: They did hardly beleeue that the battaile was so luckily obteined, and that so small a number had fought so valiantly. But vnderstanding that the Fleet was at hand, and that Otho, sonne to Fredericke, with diuers other great personages were brought prisoners, a great multitude of people ranne to see them. The taking of so great a Prince made Ciani his return the more triumphant. Vnto whom, being come on shoare, the Pope, after he had congratulated his victorie, presented a ring of gold. Take (quoth he) Ciani this ring, and by my aduice, giue it to the Sea,

" obliging it thereby vnto thee, the which both thou and thy successors likewise shall
" for euer hereafter yearely doe on this same day, to the end posteritie may know, that " ye haue in times passed by right of warre purchased the intire dominion ouer the " Sea, making it subiect vnto you as a woman is to her husband.

At what time the Venetian Prince did beginne to marrie the Sea.

The

The Venetians ſuffered Otho vpon his word, to goe vnto his father Frederick. promiſing to returne if hee could not mediate a peace for Alexander and for them. Departing vpon theſe promiſes, and being come into his fathers preſence, he was entertained with ſo much the more ioy, as the feare and doubt of his being aliue had beene great: where after many reciprocall embracements entermingled with teares hee did briefly diſcourſe of the battaile, and referre it to haue beene done by the diuine prouidence; ſaying hee had omitted nothing in that fight which did belong to a good Captaine, and that there wanted nothing for the obtaining of victorie, but a iuſt quarrell. It behooued him then to beleeue, that God was powerfull therein, and not men, ſeeing ſo mightie an Armie as theirs was, not being ſlowe to fight, had beene defeated by a few, who were not halfe their number. And howſoeuer they might well ouerthrowe and deſtroy humane forces, yet it was impoſſible to ſurmount diuine. Therefore hee did moſt humbly beſeech his Maieſtie, no more to trouble Alexander for his place, whoſe quarrell hee might perceiue, by the ſucceſſe, to bee maintained not only by men, but by God himſelfe: further alleadging, That he had alreadie diſquieted him with the forces of the Empire, and ſought to put him from his ſeate, yet all in vaine: That therfore he ſhould do a deede pleaſing to all men, and worthie of a Chriſtian, if (all hatred being forgotten) it would pleaſe him to change his minde, and after aſſurance taken from the Venetians for his ſafe comming, he would be pleaſed to viſit the Pope, and openly to giue him ſatisfaction. Which being once done they might euer after remaine good friends, and conſult together about the welfare of all Chriſtendome; the which hee did againe moſt earneſtly intreat.

Otho his diſcourſe to his father Frederick.

The diſcourſe of Otho did mightily preuaile with his father; who on a ſodaine being changed from warre to peace, began to incline toward a reconcilement with Alexander and the Venetians. Whereupon ſo ſoone as hee had receiued ſafe-conduct from the Venetians, he came to Venice. Pietro Cyani, the Princes ſonne, was ſent with ſix Gallies to Rauenna to meet him. Diuers ſmall boates went as farre as Chioggia to doe the like. But being arriued at Venice, without ſtaying in any place, hee went to ſee the Pope, who tarried for him at the gate of Saint Marks Church, reueſted in his Pontificalibus, ſitting in a chaire richly decked: neare vnto whom when he approached, he threw off his purple roabe, and crept on his knees euen to his Holineſſe feet, the which hee humbly kiſſed. The Pope raiſed him vp, and embraced him. Then both of them entering into the Church went vnto the high Altar, whereon that moſt excellent table of gold (whereof wee haue heretofore ſpoken) enriched with moſt pretious gems was laid, and the which is at this day to bee ſeene in the treaſurie of Saint Marke. The ſame was then ſeene and gazed vpon by the people, who receiued a wonderfull contentment to ſee the two greateſt Potentates of Chriſtendome talking there louingly together.

How farre Otho his entreatie preuailed with his Father.

The Emperour arriues at Venice

The Emperours obedience to the Pope.

Some ſay that the Pope (for ſatisfaction of his wrongs ſuſteined) whileſt the Emperour kneeled on the ground did ſet his foote vpon his necke, ſpeaking this verſe of Dauid, ſuper aſpidem & Baſiliſcum ambulabis; and that the Emperour with a great and inuincible courage made anſwere at the ſame time, Non tibi ſed Petro. Vnto whom hee replied in choller treading more hard vpon him, Et mihi & Petro. This was done vpon Aſcenſion day. Others ſay that it was vpon the day that the battaile was wonne, and that in memorie thereof, the Pope granted great pardons to all, who repenting, and being confeſſed, ſhould viſit euery yeare on the ſame day Saint Marks Church. Not long after, the Emperour and the Pope departed from Venice. But the Venetian Hiſtorians ſay that both of them tarried there certaine moneths.

Diuers opinions of the Hiſtorians concerning this reconciliation.

Obba of Rauenna reportes that Frederick came by Land to Ancona, and Pope Alexander with Prince Cyani arriued there at the ſame time: the whole Citie running out to meet them: And to giue them honorable entertainment, the City ſent out two Canopies; the one for Alexander, and the other for Frederick; and that then the Pope commaunded a third to bee brought for the Venetian Prince, and permitted him in the presence of all the people, that he and his successours should for euer vse one, as they at this day doe, when they walke abroad in solemnitie, with the other Ducall Ensignes.

How long the Venetian Princes haue vſed the Canopie.

VVhen they arriued at Rome, the Pope was receiued with all gladnesse: who obseruing amongest these triumphes siluer trumpets which made a verie excellent sound, caused eight of them to be giuen to the Venetian Prince, in memorie of his victorie: which the soueraigne Magistrate of Venice should euer afterwards vse. All the Venetian Chroniclers doe affirme this to be true.

Cyani taking leaue of the Pope; returned with his holy blessing to Venice. The Marriners appointed for that purpose went to receiue him in the Bucentauro. The Bishop of the Castle with the most part of the Citie went forth to meete him and to doe him reuerence; who landing at the Hauen, hauing a burning taper of white wax borne before him (as the first gift which he receiued of Pope Alexander being at Venice) the Canopie, the siluer trumpets, and the banner, (being the ensignes which he and his successours had receiued, on condition to haue them carried before them euer after) he entered the Citie with great ioy. This is it which we finde aswell in the Venetian Historians as in strangers, touching this so famous victorie, obtained by the Venetians against Otho, sonne to the Emperour Frederick: All which the Venetians, who liued long time after, would haue to be publikely represented. For the whole order of this warre is painted in the hall of the Palace, where euerie eight dayes they assemble for the creation of new Officers.

Why they vse siluer Trumpets.

The ornaments and ensignes of the Venetian Princes.

Cyani being oppressed with old age, and ill disposed of his person, after that hee had prosperously gouerned the Common-wealth for the space of eight yeares, caused himselfe to be carried into Saint Georges Monasterie, where in short space he died. Hee gaue to the Common-wealth by his testament diuers lands, neere to Saint Marks Chuch; and some others in the Mercers street, neere to Saint Iulians, to the Priestes of the Church where he should be buried.

The death of Prince Cyani and his last Will.

It is reported, That it was hee which did enrich Saint Marks Church with that sumptuousnesse and magnificent cost, whereof wee will make so much the shotter mention, as we drawe neare to the end of this booke.

Now this Church is not, as diuers other, so much recommended for the greatnesse and vnmeasurable extent, as it is for the richnesse thereof. It is builded in forme like a Crosse, whose corners are highly vaulted, and couered with lead, as all the rest is, which is discerned of Sea-men higher than all the buildings of the Citie aboue six-score stadij from thence. The whole masse is besides supported by most curious Arches, ioyned together by a meruailous skill: The inner part, from the middle euen to the highest part thereof, glistereth with gold; and the concauitie of the vaults is enriched with diuers goodly and ancient pictures, made after the Greeke manner, which, with the labour to behold them in respect of their heigth, doe present to the spectatators, by their sad and venerable aspect, a kinde of feare entermingled with pietie, and religion. That which is from the guilding downe to the pauement, is so well compassed and ioyned together with goodly tables of marble, as by their pleasant raies in forme of vaines, the eyes of the beholders are rather wearied than satisfied. The seats below are of a strange red stone, like to Porphirie. The pauement all of marble, engrauen with diuers figures wholly different, and of sundrie colours. Besides, sundrie Columnes, and diuers tables of marble Tapsic, Parian, Spartan, and Numidian, (at least, resembling them) enuiron the high seates on both sides the Quire. The comming into the Church on both sides is in a manner of the same trimming. Whose guilded Arches, are susteined without, by more then three hundred admirable Columnes, not so much for their greatnesse, as for their diuersitie of colours: the space betweene those pillers being couered with goodly tables of marble. On the heigth of this entrance, foure great brazen horses guilded are to bee seene, as if they neighed for ioy: which is indeede a most excellent

The description of Saint Markes Church.

excellent peece of worke, but not of our time. All this beares vp the higheſt top of the Church, diuided into ſixe ſteeples: euery of which, built like a Piramides, hath on the ſharpeſt point thereof ſtanding a white marble ſtatue of a naked man. Diuers other repreſentations delightfull to behold, and wrought with exceeding skill, do greatly beautifie the ſpaces betwixt theſe ſteeples. The whole worke aſwell on the right hand, as on the left, is of the ſame ſubſtance and workemanſhip, and all that which is vaulted vnderneath, is couered with gold. In a word there is no place in the whole Church, either within or without, but is either trimmed with gold, or marble, or with ſome other rich ſtone; ſo that two Columnes of Alablaſter, which ſtand neere to the high Altar, and the Calcidonie ſtones, which are to bee ſeene in the middeſt of the pauement, of the breadth of a foote and halfe, are among ſo great riches counted as nothing. Such is the ſtructure of Saint Marks Church, the adorning whereof (as I haue ſaid) is for the moſt part attributed to Prince Cyani. And becauſe it wholly (in a manner) gliſtereth with gold, I will not ſticke (as I haue alreadie done) to call it the golden Church, as often as I ſhall haue cauſe to ſpeake thereof.

(* * *)

The end of the ſeuenth Booke of the firſt Decad.

THE EIGHTH BOOKE OF THE FIRST DECAD Of The Historie Of Venice.

¶ The Contents of the eighth Booke of the firſt Decad.

THe inſtitution of the publike Almes, by whom, and at what time. The fourth rebellion of thoſe of Zara. A new iourney of the Chriſtians againſt the Turkes, with the defeate of Saladine, and the recouerie of the Citie of Acre by the Chriſtians. The coyning of the money (called Aurelia) in the Citie. Pola ſurpriſed by the Piſans. The recouerie of the ſame by the Venetians, and the defeate of the Piſans neare to Modona. Isaac is impriſoned by his brother Alexis, after hee had depriued him of the Empire. The Chriſtian Princes that march againſt the Turkes arriue at Venice. The Venetians agreement with theſe Princes. The recouerie of Zara. The reſoiution of the Venetians, and the ſtranger-Princes to goe into Greece, at the entreatie of yong Alexis. Conſtantinople is taken by the Chriſtian Princes, and by the Venetians. The death of yong Alexis, after the deceaſſe of his Father Isaac, through the treacherie of his people. The recouerie of Conſtantinople by the Chriſtian Princes, and by the Venetians ioyned together. Baldwin, Earle of Flanders, made Emperour of Greece. The Iſle of Candie, with all the Iſlands (in a manner) of the Ægean Sea, allotted to the Venetians for their claime which they might pretend to Conſtantinople. The beginning of the warre againſt the Genoueſes, for the Iſle of Candie. The victorie alſo againſt the Paduans, for a wrong offered to the Venetians at a publike ſhew at Treuiſo. The Venetians ſend a Colonie to Corfu. The Emperour Henrie, who ſucceedeth Baldwin, is treacherouſly taken by Theodore the Albanois. The taking of Damiet in Ægypt by the Chriſtians, where they became rich with the ſpoile: and what priſoners they brought away with them.

Who was the Author of the publike Almes.

The ancient manner of diſtributing Almes.

THe common opinion is, That by a Teſtamentarie legacie of Prince Cyani, this holy diſtribution of money was likewiſe ordained, whereby the Procurators of S. Marke doe at this day releeue with the publike money, the neceſſitie of Orphans, and other poore diſtreſſed People. But the ancient manner of diſtributing it was altogether different from that at this day; the which being more ſeemely, was alſo more to bee praiſed. For it is ſaid, That thoſe diſtributers did themſelues enquire of euery ones neceſſitie, and then putting the money into little coffins of paper, wherein were written the ſeuerall names of ſuch only as they meant to releeue that day, they would would in the euening go to the poore mens houſes, and giue them the Almes in very great ſecrecie. A man ſhould not haue ſeene in thoſe dayes (becauſe there was no ſuch neede) ſo many poore people at their Gates as now there are. The recommendation of friends and kinsfolkes did then ſmally preuaile; thoſe onely which were knowne to be poore were alone releeued. The ancient maner is now wholly changed: and this change proceedeth from the great multitude of buſineſſes. For they which at this day haue thoſe offices, are almoſt of the chiefe of the Senate, for Councell, Age, and Authoritie, whereby they haue not onely the managing of this buſineſſe of the Commonwealth, but diuers others likewiſe, and of greater importance: So, as being imploied in diuers buſineſſes, they themſelues cannot in ſuch manner intend this, as did thoſe of old time. But they doe at this day liberally releeue all thoſe who are recommended vnto them (prouided that the partie who recommendeth be of good reputation, and the pouertie of the perſon recommended apparant) therein omitting no worke of charitie.

¶ Avria Maripietro, the 40. Duke of Venice.

IN the place of deceaſed Cyani, the people did ſubrogate Auria Maripietro, (called by ſome, Andrea) hauing for the ſame purpoſe appointed foure men amongſt them, who ſhould euer after haue authoritie to chooſe fortie. Being by theſe men choſen Prince, he had no ſooner receiued the enſignes of Soueraigne dignitie, but forthwith he diſioyned the Piſans from thoſe of Ancona: who being backt by the Piſans, and by conueniencie of the places, had for a time by their ordinarie incurſions greatly moleſted the Venetians at Sea. But at the laſt, after a reciprocall reſtitution of whatſoeuer had beene taken, truce was granted for ten yeares.

A new manner of electing the Prince.

At the ſame time thoſe of Zara reuolted from the Venetians the fourth time, and ſoone after this reuolt, Bella King of Hungarie, filled their Citie with Garriſons. It is ſaid that they did thus vpon diſcontentment, that their Church ſhould be ſubiect to that of Grada; if it were vpon any other occaſion, yet this at the leaſt was all their pretext. It is certaine that this Citie, which in reſpect of her often rebellions had beene a cauſe of extraordinarie expence to the Venetians, was very glad, vnder this pretence to vent her former determinations. This reuolt being knowne, all men were of opinion forth-with to leuie an Armie, to reduce the Zaratins to their obedience, and to puniſh them according to their deſerts, for their often breach of faith, that they might ſerue for an example to others. But mens hope to ſee this Armie in readineſſe, in regard of the pouertie of the common Treaſurie, was ſmall; where-

The fourth rebellion of thoſe of Zara.

Example of great loue towards a mans Countrie. vpon diuers of the wealthieſt Citizens bearing a ſingular affection to the common-wealth, louing their Countries profit more than their owne, did giue great ſummes of money. There were likewiſe diuers impoſitions exacted at Rialto towards this warre. By meanes whereof the Armie being readie, ſailed into Dalmatia. At the Venetians arriuall Zara was beſieged, and all the Iſlands neare to the Citie were in a ſhort ſpace recouered. The Citie it ſelfe, in regard of the Kings Garriſon within it, could not be taken.

A New Armie of Chriſtians for the recouerie of the holy Land. But whileſt the Venetians were buſied in the Dalmatian warres, the Chriſtian Princes tooke armes for the recouerie of Ieruſalem, from whence the Sarracens vnder the conduct of Saladine had expulſed the French, the foure-ſcore and eighth yeare after it was taken by Godfrey. Wherefore the Venetians taking truce for two yeares with King Bella, at Pope Clement his entreatie, who did earneſtly ſolicit them to vndertake this voiage, they ſoone reſolued to leuie a mightie armie. Diuers
Who were the chiefe of this enterprize against the Turkes. great Princes likewiſe did for the ſame purpoſe arme themſelues (as wee haue ſaid) at the Popes requeſt. Among whom were the Emperour Fredericke, the Kings of France, and England, and Otho Duke of Burgundie, accompanied by diuers great Prelats: The Piſans likewiſe ioining themſelues with the Venetians on the Adriatike Sea, paſſed into Syria with diuers veſſels. But both their fleetes arriued there, a long time before thoſe of Frederick and the other kings. For the Citie of Acre, (which the Chriſtians had likewiſe loſt) was beſieged, before Frederick had croſſed Saint Georges Arme to come into Aſia, or before that Philip (departing from Meſſina, whither he was come with Richard, after they had croſſed the Riuer of Genowaie and the Tuſcan Sea) did arriue in the Prouince. Richard being toſſed with a furious tempeſt caſt Anker in Cyprus, which he wholly ſpoiled, becauſe the inhabitants at his arriuall had refuſed to receiue him into their Hauen. From whence ſoon after he paſſed into Syria.

The Emperour Frederick dieth in Armenia. Frederick, after he had taken certaine Townes in Aſia, entred Armenia the leſſe, where vnaduiſedly going into a deepe Riuer, to waſh and refreſh himſelfe, beeing carried awaie by the force of the ſtreame he was drowned. But before this happened, our people had a long time laboured before Acre: for they had ſometime Great famine in the Campe before Ptolomais. fought with great hazard with Saladine. And beſides that, want of all neceſſaries was ſo great in the Chriſtians campe, as the Soldiours did not refuſe to eate whatſoeuer they found, how vnholeſome or bad ſo euer it were, and being almoſt ſtarued, did expoſe themſelues out of their Trenches to bee ſlaine by the enemies ſhot. In the end, at the arriuall of theſe two Kings, the two Armies beeing ioined together, the French became ſo ſtrong, as they no more feared to bee enforced by the enemie to diſcampe from that ſide. Saladine reſolued by force to open a waie for his Soldiours, and vſing fraud with force, hee cauſed a ſhip full of Snakes and Serpents, to Saladines Armie defeated. ſaile directly towards the front of the Chriſtians battaile. But being come in view, before the Barbarians who were within it could haue leiſure to vſe their cunning, their fleete being broken and defeated before the Hauen, this ſhippe was of ſet purpoſe ſunke. Whereupon, the Towneſ-men and thoſe of the Garriſon hauing loſt all Ptolomais yeeldeth. hope of being relieued, did yeeld, after they had maintained the ſiege a whole yere. They were cruelly dealt with, by reaſon that in their capitulation they promiſed to giue the Chriſtians a part of the holie Croſſe, the which could no where be found.

Acre beeing taken, the Venetians poſſeſſed the ſelfe-ſame right, which they had in times paſt purchaſed by Armes in the ſame Citie. This is all which hapned abroade during the Principallitie of Auria. But within the Citie they ſtamped a new coine, called (Aurelia) by the name of the Authour; who retiring himſelfe into the Monaſterie of Holie Croſſe, the ninth yeare (as ſome ſay) of his gouernment, or the fourteenth (according to ſome) or the eight & twentieth yeare, which is much more (as others ſay) tooke the Monaſtick habit, and there died.

Henrico

¶ HENRICO DANDVLO, the 41. Duke of Venice.

Enrico Dandulo, beeing declared Prince by the fortie according to the manner aboue mentioned, ſucceeded him.

The Common-wealth vnder this man did not only purchaſe fame and renowne, but did mightily enlarge the bounds of her Dominions. He firſt of all forbad thoſe of Verona from trafficking with the Venetians, becauſe they had wronged certaine Venetian Marchants on the Riuer Adice. This prohibition cauſed them to reſtore that which they had taken from the Venetians in their Priuileges and immunities, and neuer more to moleſt them ſailing on thoſe ſtreames.

The Armie returned from Syria, for the great want it had of freſh ſupplies, hauing beene abroade three yeares: The Piſans likewiſe left the Prouince: But they, continually during the three yeares they were abroad, did ſo enuie and hate the Venetians, that the ſame (as it often hapneth) did beget open diſſenſion, which turned at laſt to the Piſans ouerthrow. For they, ſailing on the Adriatick Sea, ſurprized the Citie of Pola tributarie to the Venetians, with intent to winter there, if it were poſſible. But the Venetians, not being able to ſuffer ſuch indignitie, did Arme ten Gallies, and ſix ſhips of burthen: and adding certaine freſh ſupplies of Souldiours, they came ſpeedily to Pola, the which being as ſpeedily recouered, they burnt al the Tuſcan ſhips which they found in the Hauen. The greateſt part of their Fleet was gone to conuoie ſix ſhips of burthen of their owne, who returned at that time from Greece laden with Marchandize, and were going home. The Venetians, after they had diſmantelled the Citie of Pola (not ſo much for hatred to the Townesmen, as to make it leſſe fit for the Piſans retreite, at any other time) ſailed towards Modona, determining to meete with thoſe ſix ſhips of Piſa, and to fight with the other which were gone from Pola to conuoie them. It was not long ere they were deſcried; and making towards them, they fought almoſt in the view of the Citie, where the Tuſcan conuoie being broken and put to flight, two of the Marchant-ſhips were taken. Soone after, they made peace with the Piſans.

The Piſans take Pola.

The Piſans defeated by the Venetians.

Some Venetian Hiſtorians, not mentioning this peace, do affirme, How the ſame yeare that they fought before Modona, the Piſans, back't by the Brunduſians, did hinder the Venetians free Nauigation on the Adriatick Sea. Whereupon Giouanni Baſilio and Thomaſo Phaledrio beeing ſent againſt them with great forces, did in ſuch ſort terrifie them, as they enforced them ſpeedily to forſake the Seas: and going after-

wards against the Brundusians who had assisted them with men and victuailes, they did constraine them to sue for peace, the which was granted by the Venetians.

Peace granted to the Brundusians.

Pellegrino Bishop of Aquileia did at the same time make a new league with the Venetians, thereby the better to enable himselfe against Treuiso, whose open enemie he was. And by that meanes being made a Citizen of Venice, he did purchase diuers lands in the Citie, and did by this agreement promise the Common-wealth all aide and assistance when need should be. For his sake the Treuisans were forbidden anie more trafficke with the Citie.

About the same time the Venetians had a new occasion presented them to enlardge their dominions. Isaac at the same time commaunded the Grecian Empire, who was a great friend to the westerne Christians, and had, not long before, liberally receaued and welcomed (which his ancestors before him had neuer done but against their willes, for the naturall hatred which that Nation euer bare to all Christians of Europe) all the French and Almaigne Captaines which were going into Asia. This man had a younger brother named Alexis, whom he had euer so deerely loued, as (the name of Emperour excepted, which he reserued to himselfe) he liued in equall command with him. Isaac had moreouer not long before paid to the barbarous enemie (who had by his owne rashnesse taken him prisoner) a great weight of gold for his ransome. But this most vnthankefull brother, forgetting all these benefits, tooke his brother Isaac by treason, pluckt forth his eies, and being blinded shut him vp in prison: And not therewith satisfied hee would haue done as much to his nephew, his brothers sonne, a childe of twelue yeares old. But the young boy by the aduice of his friends, and by discretion farre aboue one of his age, (as it is reported) saued himselfe by flight. The Venetians forces were at the same time verie great. For at the beginning of the spring-time the same yeare, Boniface of Montferrat, Baldwin Earle of Flanders, and Henrie Earle of S. Paul, were arriued at Venice, and with them the Duke of Sauoy, intending to march against the Turkes and Sarracens. Some Authors saie that they sent their Ambassadours. But the most part affirme, that the Princes came themselues in person and compounded with the Venetians for the passage of eight thousand foot, and foure thousand fiue hundred horse with their baggage, & victuailes, vnto Saint Georges arme, by which way all the Christian Princes had still passed ouer their forces; because there was no likelihood of anie other safer way into Asia, as also, for that Germanie and Hungarie were not quiet, and likewise in regard of these newes stirres at Constantinople, the which daily encreased, by reason of that which had hapned.

Great ingratitude and cruelty of a brother.

The Christian Princes arriued at Venice.

The Venetian Chronicles make mention of nine and twentie thousand foot, of whom nine thousand were Targuetiers, the which is more credible. For it is not probable, that foure so great Princes, vndertaking so long and dangerous a voyage, would leuie but twelue thousand fiue hundred men, seeing that anie one of them could easily haue furnished as many. It is reported that they promised a verie great summe of money for the transportation of so great an Armie.

The number of the Christian Armie.

Now the Shippes of warre being readie, because the Souldiours arriued later than it was expected, the iourney was put off till Haruest. By meanes whereof the Princes and Captaines hauing spent all they had brought with them for that voyage were constrained to borrow of the Venetians. It is reported that the Venetians in sted of lending did freely giue them the money which they demaunded, to the end to tye them vnto them, hauing determined to make vse of them, promising to vse greater liberalitie towards them, if they would lend them their forces till such time as they had reduced the Prouince of Histria vnder their obedience, & recouered the Citie of Zara which had so often rebelled, the which for a few years had bin possessed by the King of Hungarie. This being freely granted, they made an accord betwixt them for a yeare, That the Venetians should only set forth threscore Gallies at their owne costs to ship their Souldiours, and that all the towns and booties, which should be taken, should be equally diuided betwixt them and the Venetians,

The Venetians bountie to the christian Princes.

Agreement betwixt the Venetians and forraine Princes.

Dalmatia

(Dalmatia and the adiacent Ilands excepted, which they acknowledge to be a part of the Venetians Dominion.) Duke Henrico, albeit he were euill diſpoſed of his perſon, & his ſight much impaired by the malice of the Emperor Emanuell, would neuertheleſſe for the loue he did beare his Countrie, make one in the number. Therefore he departed from Venice before any of the reſt, the 15. day of October. The morrow after, they all followed him. The Nauie conſiſted of two hundred and fortie Ships of warre. For, beſides the threeſcore Gallies promiſed firſt to the French; they made ready threeſcore and ten Ships of burthen, to embarke the forraine Soldiours, and ſixeſcore other Veſſels, vulgarly called Vrſerions, for the cariage of the victuals, horſe and furniture of the Armie.

The number of the Ships for the Voyage.

The Trieſtines, and other the Inhabitants of Hiſtria, accuſtomed to robbe at Sea, amazed to ſee ſo mightie a Fleete, did ſpeedily ſend to the Prince for peace, which was granted them on theſe conditions; That thoſe of Humaga, and the Trieſtines, ſhould pay to the Venetian Prince a yearely tribute for each of them, of fiftie hogſheads of Wine. And to this purpoſe they ſent Commiſſioners to Venice, to ſweare to this conuention before the Senate, and to remaine euer after loyall to the Venetians, as their Anceſtors had done. From Hiſtria the Armie came to the ſiege of Zara. This ſiege, (by reaſon that the Citie was well victualled and furniſhed with Souldiers) laſted longer than was expected. The Citie being often aſſaulted, with great effuſion of bloud on either ſide, was in the end after ſundrie loſſes recouered, and foorthwith diſmanteled on that part next to the Sea. The chiefe Citizens deſpairing of pardon in regard of their continuall rebellion, ſaued themſelues by flight.

Hiſtria reduced to the Venetians obedience.

The recouerie of Zara.

The Winter in the meane time was very much ſpent, by reaſon whereof and through the ſharpneſſe of the weather, they were conſtrained to tarie there. At what time, yong Alexis, who had eſcaped from the bloudy hands of his Vnkle, arriued at the Campe, and came into the preſence of Duke Dandulo, and the French Princes, that Wintered there. This yong boy, after hee had with teares greatly complained on his Vncles crueltie, of his Fathers blindneſſe, darke Impriſonment, bonds, and ill vſage, and of his owne baniſhment, able to draw pitie from his enemies, he did earneſtly intreate them, in regard of the ancient friendſhip which his Father had euer borne to the Venetians, for the fidelitie, alliance, hoſpitalitie, and other benefits which all Chriſtendome had receiued from him, as well at Conſtantinople, as in other parts of the Empire, to relieue him in his affliction, and not to ſuffer his Father any longer to languiſh in darkneſſe, more obſcure than his blindneſſe: And declared how that himſelfe being yet very yong, depriued of his Fathers helpe and counſell, and of all his friends, being baniſhed, poore, needie, and ignominiouſly driuen out of his Fathers Empire, was conſtrained miſerably to beg his bread: After all which hee promiſed to giue them a great weight of Gold, with other great rewards ſo ſoone as by their meanes he ſhould recouer the Empire.

Yong Alexis cometh to the Armie.

The complaint and requeſt of yong Alexis.

Yong Alexis his promiſes.

The teares of this yong child did greatly moue all the aſſiſtants; his age likewiſe, and his cauſe, were found to be iuſt and reaſonable, the which all men did willingly fauour. Then the great promiſes which he made in this great danger, did ſhew that he had beene taught what to ſay, by thoſe who attended him in his flight. For hardly could a man of riper yeares (much leſſe one like himſelfe, who was not yet out of child-hood) haue of himſelfe inuented thoſe things which he promiſed them. It is reported that he promiſed, ſo ſoone as he ſhould be alone, or with his Father, reſtored to the Empire, he would make the Church of Conſtantinople ſubiect to that of Rome, and giue the Venetians and French-men, a certaine weight of gold in recompence of the loſſes which they had ſuſtained in times paſt, and at ſundrie times by the Emperour Emanuel: And moreouer, to giue vnto the Venetians a great ſumme of money, which the forraine Princes had promiſed them at the firſt, for the tranſportation of their ſouldiers. Vpon theſe conditions and promiſes, the Venetians and French departed from Dalmatia at the beginning of the ſpring, determining ning to saile with a direct course to Constantinople, if a contrarie winde did not hinder them. The Bandetti of Zara in the meane time, so soone as they had notice of the Venetians departure, made rodes and incursions all along the Sea-coasts of Histria and Dalmatia; against whom a new Armie was intended. Rayniero Dandulo, Sonne to Duke Henrico, a braue and couragious yong man, did command in the Citie as Lieutenant to his Father: He, hauing armed certaine ships of warre, passed ouer into Dalmatia against those banished Zaratins. He caused a Fort to be built in the neareſt Iſland to Zara, which was called Euill Councell, to resist the incursions and desseignes of the enemies: The Bandetti being backt by the aide of the King of Hungarie, came on a sodaine and surprised the Garrison within it, and razed the Fort: whereupon a greater fleete was set forth, sufficient to represse the incursions, and rash attempts of those Pirates. The which being knowne to them, they humbly sued for peace and obtained it on these conditions; That (the chiefe of them hauing giuen their children in hostage to the Venetians) all the Bandetti should returne home into their Countrie; and should obey the Venetian Magistrate, and the Church, (that of Grada) and should besides send euery yeare to the Duke of Venice a thousand Connie-skins.

The Venetians and the Princes resolue to goe to Constantinople.

Incursions of the Bandetti of Zara

Agreement with the Bandetti of Zara.

Whilest these things were done in Dalmatia, the Venetians and French-men after they had first crossed the Ionian Seas, and afterwards the Ægean and the Hellespont, arriued at the Bosphorus of Thrace, called S^t. Georges arme. But wee must speake somewhat briefly here, of the place and situation of the Citie, for the more easie vnderstanding of what shall be hereafter set downe.

Description of the Citie of Constantinople.

Bizantium (named, as all men know, Constantinople by Constantine, who much augmented it, and did there establish his Empire) yea builded (as saith Trogus) by Pausanias King of Sparta, is seated in so pleasant and commodious a place, as the Megarians, who a long time before were the founders of Calcydonia, which is right ouer against it, were esteemed by Apollo's Oracle of small iudgement; because they refused so goodly and fertile a Countrie, as is that where Bizantium was afterward builded, and chose a barren and desert soile.

The streight of the Sea is fiue hundred paces in breadth, and waxeth still more narrow, as it draweth neerer to the Bosphorus of Thrace (so called for the vsuall and easie passage of Oxen) called at this day S. Georges arme. This Citie on the North side hath the Sea of fiftie stadij in length, and the maine drawing towards the West. At the mouth of this streight in a small distance stands Constantinople on one side, and Pera on the other, so called in Greeke (as I thinke) for the small space that is betwixt them, being opposite one to another. Alexis had shut vp this space with a great yron chaine, and placed a strong Garrison at either end thereof, to hinder the enemies entrance.

Now whilest this great fleet staied there; the Ambassadours of the Isle of Candie came with two Gallies in the name of the whole Island, to acknowledge him for their Lord. This yong youth, after he had louingly receiued them, gaue the whole Island to Boniface of Montferrat, a valiant man, and his neare Kinsman. The chaine in the meane time could not be broken, vntill that a very great ship, called the Eagle, furnished with great yron tongs, and driuen forward by a North-winde, strake vpon it, and brake it in peeces. Presently hereupon the Venetians entred the streight and landed all the forraine troupes, which done, the Citie in an instant was besieged both by Sea and Land. But so soone as the Campe arriued, Theodore Lascaris, sonne in law to the Emperour, made a sodaine sallie with his forces on the Pilgrims, (for the French-men and they on this-side the mountains departing to the warres of Asia, would at the first be so called) to trouble their incamping. The fight at the first was very bloudie, and doubtfull, but at the last, the Greekish furie being abated, Theodore with his forces was constrained with great losse to retire into the citie. The Venetian fleet on the other side attempted to winne the Hauen, but they spent two whole daies in breaking the chaine which lockt it. And this fight was so much the more Yong Alexis giueth the Isle of Candie to Boniface of Montferrat.

Constantinople besieged by Sea and Land.

Theodore Lascaris sallies foorth on the Christian Pilgrims.

more difficult to the Venetians, by how much the Garriſon of the Hauen was ſtronger than that of the ſtreight, whereof we haue ſpoken. Twentie Gallies on a front being tied together by great yron chaines, lay at the entrie thereof, to keepe out the enemies; and it was dangerous to come neare them, in regard of the great number of arrowes which flew from them againſt thoſe which came formoſt. Yet neuertheleſſe the Venetians valour ouer-came this: For after they had likewiſe broken it, and furiouſly aſſailed the enemie, the hauen was wonne in an inſtant. The Gallies being forſaken at the very firſt brunt by Alexis Souldiers, fell into the poſſeſſion of the Venetians.

A great fight at the Hauen.

After this victorie, they reſolued to aſſault the Citie with engins on all ſides, and after they had diuided the portions betwixt them, the Venetians did forth-with erect diuers warlike engins againſt the Citie on the Hauens ſide. Then they tooke two great maſts of ſhips, and tying them together they made a bridge vpon them, from whence they ſhot into the Citie at their pleaſures, by reaſon the bridge was much higher than the walls. They did moreouer caſt fierie lances vpon the neareſt houſes, which lighting vpon drie matter kindled ſuch a flame, as thoſe who defended the wall being therewith terrified, in great confuſion forſooke their places; which the Venetians mounting on ladders, did forthwith poſſeſſe. Alexis at this ſodaine rumour came running thither with three thouſand Souldiers which were of his guard, and made ſhew at the firſt, as if he would haue aſſailed the Venetians, vſing thereby a Greekiſh pollicie, to make ſhew of nothing leſſe than flight. But becauſe all was loſt, not only in that place, but likewiſe on the land-ſide, where Laſcaris had beene beaten into the Citie with great loſſe, Alexis made a ſtay, as though he would haue deferred the fight till the morrow. But the Venetians purſuing the victorie, did alreadie in a manner fight in the very Citie. Whereupon Alexis at the entrie of the night holding all for loſt, left his wife and children, and committing great treaſures which hee had drawne forth of the ground to the keeping of his Daughter Irene, who was a Nunne, about midnight he left the Citie and fled.

Conſtantinople ſtreightly beſieged.

An aſſault giuen to the Citie.

The flight of Alexis.

His flight being openly knowne, Iſaack was forthwith taken out of priſon, and the Citie-gates being ſet open, the yong Alexis was with great ioy receiued by all the people: Both of them were ſaluted Emperors: Great was the ioy on either ſide, but not without teares, to behold the wretched blind old man, who did greatly praiſe the pietie, and good nature of his ſonne, and reioyced with him for this happie ſucceſſe, exhorting him couragiouſly to maintaine the Empire which hee had by his vertue recouered. The child on the other ſide was no leſſe ioyfull, to ſee his Father freed from the priſon of his wicked brother; and that ſo perfidious a perſon, hated of God and Men, being driuen iuſtly both from Empire and Countrie, was compelled to vndergoe ſo ignominious a baniſhment: ſaying, that his owne happineſſe did not ſo much content him, as to ſee his Father reuenged on his enemie; That hee did not doubt, but that this wretched Alexis was greatly troubled in his minde, knowing his enemie to command in the ſame place, from whence himſelfe had beene ſhamefully expulſed. After all theſe reciprocall complements, Iſaac did in open aſſembly confirme & ratifie all that which his ſonne had granted to the Venetians and French-men, the Protectors of his ſtate. And all the good old mans thoughts were, how, and by what meanes hee might pay the Venetians, and French, that which had beene promiſed them: when falling ſodainely ſicke, hauing (as it was thought) taken the aire too ſoone, he died in few daies after. The Sonne, no leſſe mindfull than the Father, to acknowledge the benefits which he had receiued, did meane, not only to effect what he promiſed, but to releeue thoſe that paſſed into Aſia, with victuals, men, and all other neceſſaries. But this vngratefull Citie, accuſtomed euer to ſeditious noueltie, did croſſe his deſeignes. For a ſodaine commotion being raiſed in the Citie the people with great noiſe ranne to the Palace, where after diuers reprochfull ſpeeches vſed to the yong Alexis, they told him that he was a fooliſh boy, ſmally experienced in affaires of conſequence; who deſirous to pay a great ſumme

Iſaac deliuered out of priſon.

The mutuall comfort of the father and the Sonne.

Iſaac ratifies what his Sonne had promiſed.

Iſaac dieth ſodainly.

Sedition againſt the yong Emperour.

A discreet answere of the yong Emperour.

summe of money foolishly promised to a couetous Nation, enemie to the Greekes, made no matter of ruining & despoiling his Citie of her wealth. But the yong man fearing in that tumult to be slaine, and being more discreet than one of such yeares, he told them aloud, that he would therein be ruled by his subiects. By this popular answere he appeased the tumult for that night. The next day, so soone as hee had debated the matter with diuers of his friends, by their aduise he sent to his Cosen Boniface, entreating him to come to his aide about the third watch of the night following, with all the forces hee could bring, acquainting him in what danger hee was among his owne subiects; the Empire not being alone in hazard, but his owne life likewise. Therefore he did earnestly entreate him, not to forsake him in those tender yeares, being his neare kinsman, and wholly destitute of all helpe and counsell, further certifying him that he would giue order, that one of the Citie-gates should be open against his arriuall.

Myrtillus issued from meane Parents.

Among those who knew this secret, was one called Alexis, surnamed Myrtillus, or (as other say) Murciphon, whom the Emperour Isaac had preferred from a meane estate to diuers places of honour. This man being ambitious, and sodaine in his attempts, discouered the whole matter to certaine of the contrarie faction, whom hee knew to be of great authoritie in the Citie, and procured them to raise a new stirre at the houre appointed of the night following. This was accordingly effected. Now therefore in the middest of the vproare, hee counselled the yong Alexis, trembling with feare, to hide himselfe in the most secret place of the Palace; and making the danger to be much greater than it was, he in a manner enforced him so to doe; and hauing hid him in a sure place, hee committed him to the keeping of some of his owne trustie friends. Hereupon he came forth, as though hee would haue quieted the tumult, the which he had promised to doe. The beginning of his speech was, in declaring vnto them in what termes the affaires of the Empire stood, & the imminent danger which threatned them from those couetous Nations, (for so he termed them) and enemies to the Greekes, and therefore hee said it was most necessarie to haue a man of iudgement, valour, and discretion; and not a child, if they desired to redresse these mischiefs. He obtained at that time what hee so much desired. For the whole multitude, crying out confusedly; some said he should be gouernour of the Citie, others Generall of the men at Armes, and the third sort called him Emperour. And thus in this tumult being followed by a troupe of Souldiers, and by some of his kinsmen who assisted him, he made himselfe Master of the Imperiall Palace, where with his owne hand he cut yong Alexis throate. Then after he had appeased the tumult, and raised great forces, his first resolution was to driue the French and Venetians forth of the Empire; and afterwards for his better safetie, to put all Alexis Friends and Allies to death.

The treachcrie of Myrtillus.

Myrtillus speech to the people.

Yong Alexis murthered.

In this resolution hee forthwith marched out of the Citie, and embattailed his Armie, whom he conducted against the enemie, after this maner. In the Front hee placed Priestes bearing Images in their hands, who at the beginning of the fight should sing certaine spirituall Hymnes. I know not whether hee did this to draw his enemies to some deuotion, or whether hee thought by beginning with diuine Action, the sooner to obtaine the victorie. The first charge lighted by chance on the Earle of Flanders quarter, who like a valiant and carefull Captaine, did with a few sustaine the furious assaults of the Greekes, vntill that an armed Legion came to his rescue, and soone after all the rest. Whereupon, the fight in an instant being equall, and his enemies very much shaken, Myrtillus altogether dismaied fled a pace towards the Citie, and was so narrowly pursued by our men, as himselfe and his troupes had like to haue beene taken vnder the Wals. The Italians and French held as a token of good lucke, the taking of an Image of the Virgin Marie from the Greekes: imagining that it did foretell their victorie, in regard such a diuine power had forsaken the Greekes and was come vnto them. They did afterwards consult whether it were best to besiege Myrtillus in the Citie. All men were of opinion that

A new Greekish inuention to deceiue the Christians.

The Greekes put to flight neare the Citie.

it

it was lawfull and iuſt to kill a wicked man, who had not onely defiled himſelfe by an execrable murther, but had likewiſe ſeized on the Empire which was engaged to them by couenant for great ſummes of money.

A new agreement betwixt the Venetians and the Princes.

The Venetians and French contracted new alliance, wherein it was expreſly mentioned, That the halfe part of the Citie, Townes, and other matters which ſhould be taken perforce from the Grecian Empire, ſhould belong to the French, and the other halfe to the Venetians. Some Authors make mention of another kinde of diuiſion, wherein the Venetians had but the third part onely of whatſoeuer was taken. But the moſt part are of the former opinion: Hereupon, all of them prepared for the beſieging of the Citie, and they proceeded therein both by ſea and land with ſuch earneſtnes, as they neuer ceaſſed, vntill they had brought it in ſubiection to the French men, and the Venetians. Neuertheleſſe the victorie was not verie eaſie. For the ſiege, through the wilfull obſtinacie of the Greekes, laſted threeſcore and eight daies. The Venetians valour did greatly appeare in this ſiege; who, hauing aſſaulted the Citie after the ſame manner as they had done at the firſt, after they had driuen the enemie from the wals, entred the towne ſomewhat before thoſe, who in great numbers fought on the land-ſide. Myrtillus in the darkneſſe of the night departing with his wife and concubines, carrying with him a great weight of gold, auoided his deſerued puniſhment. The Citizens being reduced into euident danger, (for the victors who poſſeſſed the walles, amazed them on the one ſide, and Myrtillus flight diſmaied them on the other) did (neceſſitie enforcing them thereunto) ſue for pardon; and to this purpoſe, they cauſed the Cleargie to go formoſt with their relicks and Images, and themſelues after being vnarmed, who comming in view of the Venetians, which poſſeſſed the walles, began to crie for mercie: the which was eaſily granted them vpon the opening of their gates. The Venetians entring firſt, the French followed with all their troups which had fought by land. Now the Citie being taken, the chiefe of the Armie conſulted together to name fifteene men which ſhould haue authoritie to elect a new Emperour. And it was expreſly mentioned, That if the Emperor whom they choſe were not a Venetian, it ſhould be lawfull for the Venetians to appoint one of their own nation, whom they pleaſed to be Patriarch of the Citie. This thus concluded, the Venetians deputed fiue Electors, the Earles of Flaunders and Saint Paul as many, and the Dukes of Sauoy and Montferrat made vp the number. By theſe mens voices Baldwin Earle of Flaunders was declared Emperour; and Thomaſo Moroſino Patriarch of Conſtantinople by the Venetians: who ſoone after went to Rome, and was confirmed in his dignitie by Pope Innocent.

Conſtantinople beſieged the ſecond time.

Myrtillus flight.

Conſtantinople yeelds.

Fifteene men appointed to elect a new Emperour.

Baldwin of Flanders choſen Emperour of the East.

Thomaſo Moroſino Patriarch of Conſtantinople.

The Princes in the mean time deſirous to proſecute their voyage to the holy Land, vſing great liberalitie to the new Emperour, gaue him the moitie of the Citie, Prouinces, Tributes, and other matters, (fallen to them by agreement) of the Greeke Empire. And not ſatisfied with this good office, they added to this great liberalitie, That all the Cities, Caſtles, Forts, and Townes which they ſhould take depending on the Greeke Empire, ſhould be recouered as in his name, and reduced vnder his obedience. Some thinke that the fourth part of the Empire was giuen to him, and the reſidue being diuided into two parts, the one part thereof fell to the Venetians.

The Princes liberalitie to the new Emperour.

All things at laſt being quieted in the Citie, the Armie ſpeedily departed. Boniface of Montferrat, and Henrie the Emperours brother diſlodged firſt of all, who with great good ſucceſſe poſſeſſed Thrace which lies on either ſide betwixt Conſtantinople, and Adrianople, three daies iourney in length. And all that conqueſt, ſuch as it was, they reduced vnder the Emperour Baldwins obedience, according to their promiſe: Prince Henrico remaining at Conſtantinople, dealt with the Emperour to bound that part of the Empire which was fallen to the Venetians, becauſe it wholly almoſt conſiſted of Iſlands ſeated in the Ægean and Ionian Seas. And becauſe the Iſle of Candie belonged to Boniface by the gift of young Alexis: Bald- win, to take away all cause of strife, and that their fellowes should truly receiue whatsoeuer had beene promised them, he made Boniface King of Thessalie, and gaue the Isle of Candie, which he tooke from him, to the Venetians: And the better to confirme the matter, the Venetian Prince sent M. Sanuto, & Rabani Carcerio his Ambassadors to Boniface, who was encamped before Adrianople; and till they returned he sent an Armie to receiue all the rest. The Ambassadors sent to Boniface, arriuing at Adrianople, shewed him the Emperours decree; and offering him besides a good summe of money, he easily condiscended to their request, and made ouer to the Venetians all the right which he pretended to the Isle of Candie by vertue of Alexis gift.

Thrace reduced to the Emperors obedience.

The Isle of Candy giuen to the Venetians.

Thomaso confirmed Patriarch by the Pope.

In this meane time Thomaso, Patriarch of Constantinople, at his returne from Rome, where he had obtained whatsoeuer he demaunded, came to Venice, and after he had staied a while there, being readie to returne into Greece; hee tooke with him foure gallies which were sent for supplie to the Prince at Constantinople, with which he recouered Raguſa which was reuolted from the Venetians; and hauing repaired Durazzo, which the Greeke Emperours had abandoned, he left a good Garrison in it. Thence he came directly to Constantinople, where he was receiued of all men with great ioy: But nothing did so much hasten his returne, as the commaundement which the Pope had giuen him to crowne Baldwin Emperour of Greece. And that Coronation-day was beautified with a great assembly as well of Greekes, as of French-men and Italians.

The coronation of the Emperour Baldwin.

Scarse was the yeare expired wherein Constantinople was taken, but that all the Cities and strong Townes of the Greeke Empire, as well on the Sea coasts as on the firme Land, were reduced vnder the Emperours obedience: Adrianopolis excepted. But this fortunate successe was interrupted by his too sodaine death. Some affirme that hee died at Constantinople. And others say, that being incamped before Adrianopolis, he fell into an Ambush, and being taken by the enemies he died in Prison; and that, by his death, there was no Emperour in Greece for seuen yeares after. This is that which the Annalists maintaine. Those which alleadge the contrarie, say, That Henrie, his brother, was at the same instant saluted Emperour in his stead, who, being discamped from before Adrianopolis, which his brother had besieged, to effect his more speedie Coronation at Constantinople, receiued newes on the way of the death of Henrico the Venetian Prince; so as there was a small time betwixt the death of the Emperour Baldwin, and that of Henrico, who deceased the thirteenth yeare of his Principalitie, and was honourably buried in Saint Sophias Church.

The death of the Emperour Baldwin.

Henrie brother to Baldwin, Emperour of the East.

Prince Dandulo deceaseth.

It shall not bee amisse to set downe in this place certaine propheticke verses, which I find in some Historians to bee attributed to Sibylla, the which are reported to haue been common almost in euerie mans mouth, long time before the Frenchmen and Venetians tooke Constantinople: if it be so, I doe assuredly beleeue, that this Oracle was the only cause of that mortall hatred, which the Emperour Emanuel bare to the Venetians. And forasmuch as all that in a manner which hapned at Constantinople, since the time of the Emperour Constantine vntill Henrico the Venetian Prince, is comprized in these verses: I haue thought it fit to set them downe word for word, to the end that by them it may be knowne how well this woman possessed with a diuine furie, did prophecie of things to come; and that which Plutarch speaketh of the Egyptians is not altogether absurd, who thought that the spirit of diuination was easily communicated to women, They begin thus.

The cause why the Emperour Emanuel hated the Venetians.

A Prophecie found in Constantinople.

ÆNeadum gloria Bizantium deducetur, Eruntque
Danai in robore delicato vsque ad Leonem sexa-ginta

ginta pedum. Donec catulos eius Vrſus deuoret. Hunc Aquila diſpecta Vrſum diſsipet, Aquilam Hircus obumbret, Pullum voret Aquilæ, Fietque Potentum in Hadriaticis aquis congregatio. Cæco Duce Hircum abigent, Bizantium prophanabunt, Hircus non balabit amplius, Nec Gallus cantabit, vſque dum ſexaginta tres pedes, & pollices nouem diſcurrant.

Which may be thus Engliſhed.

Bizance ſhall riſe, the Romans glorie hight,
Græcia ſhall flow with fulneſſe of delight,
Vntill the ſixtie-footed Lion come;
Whoſe princely whelps with death the Beare ſhall dome.
The Beare ſhall by the roiall Eagle fall;
The Goat orethrowes the Eagle, Chick and all.
And in the mid'ſt of th' Adriatick ſtrond
Shall meete great States combin'd by mutuall bond
Againſt the Goat. They, led by Chieftaine blind, Shall quell his pride and tame his Tyger mind,
And Bizance ſelfe they likewiſe ſhall ſubdue.
So droops the Goat; And the ſhrill Cock that crew
So lowd of late, henceforth ſhall chant no more,
Till of a greater number kept in ſtore
Sixtie three feete, with thumbs thrice 3. times told,
By fading hence this myſterie vnfold.

The meaning of the propheeie.

The Roman Empire (ſaith ſhee) ſhall bee tranſlated to Conſtantinople: which came to paſſe in the time of the Emperour Conſtantine; and Grecia ſhal liue peaceablie in all delights, vntill the Emperour Emanuel his time who liued three ſcore yeares; Andronicus, whom Sybilla calleth a Beare, after hee hath ſlaine his children, ſhall vſurpe the Empire; Iſack ſonne to Emanuel, of whom none account was made ſhall put Andronicus to death; Alexis ſhall take his brother Iſack by treaſon; who wore a long beard after the Greekiſh manner: and hauing put out both his eyes, ſhall thruſt him into a darke Priſon, into which likewiſe, ſome ſay that young Alexis ſonne to Iſack was put, from whence eſcaping afterwards, hee came for ſuccour to the Venetians. That the Venetians at that time ioyned with the French ſhall paſſe into Greece vnder the conduct of Prince Dandulo, who by the enuie of Emanuel had almoſt loſt his ſight, as hath beene ſaid; and that Conſtantinople being taken by them, the honour of the Empire ſhallbee taken from the Greekes: For in the ſpace of ſixtie three yeares and nine moneths, there ſhall bee in Conſtantinople neither Emperour nor Patriarch of the Greeke Nation; whereupon Sybilla (if this Oracle be hers) calleth the one a Cocke, and the other a Goate. This is that which ſhee hath ſaid.

¶ Pietro Cyani, the 42. Duke of Venice.

Pietro Cyani, ſonne to Duke Sebaſtiano, ſucceeded Dandulo, & was Earle of Arba when he was created. The Venetians in the mean time, who were at Conſtantinople, becauſe they would not bee without a Magiſtrate, did create a Pretor to gouerne them; which creation neuertheleſſe was not to bee in force till it were confirmed and allowed by the Prince and Senate at Venice. The firſt who executed this new Magiſtracie in Conſtantinople was (as it is reported) Marini Zeno. Ambaſſadours were ſent to Conſtantinople to the Emperour Henrie to renew the league. Boniface of Montferrat on the other ſide, hauing conquered Theſſalie was called King thereof, according to the Emperour Baldwin his decree.

Boniface King of Theſſaly.

But whilſt theſe things were done in Greece, the Venetians after the creation of Cyani, to the end they might with more eaſe ioine all the places of the Greeke Empire to their State, which were fallen vnto them by the agreement made with the French and the other confederates, they publiſhed an Edict; That all the Citizens of Venice, or their allies, who could at their owne charges ſeize on the Iſlandes of the Ægean and Ionian Seas, and of other places neere thereunto, depending in time paſt on the Greeke Empire, (reſeruing certaine Iſlandes mentioned in the decree, which they were expreſly forbidden to attempt) ſhould claime them for their own, as lawfully purchaſed by right of Armes. Although at the firſt this may ſeeme not verie commodious for the Common-wealth, Yet conſidering it more neerely, it was neceſſarie to be ſo, as well for that the Citie was at the ſame time buſied about the affaires of Greece, as in reſpect of the great numbers of Pirats; who were ſo increaſed, whilſt the Venetians were imploied in the Thracian wars, as there needed a mightie fleete to repreſſe their incurſions: And therefore there was no poſſibilitie with any ſafetie to ſeuer the forces of the Common-wealth in ſo many places at once. It was then thought moſt conuenient, that the wealthieſt of them ſhould ſet forth one or more Gallies a peece, or other ſhips of warre for the ſame purpoſe: The which they preſumed diuers would doe for the hope of the propoſed gaine; and that thereby it might come to paſſe, that the Common-wealth hauing afterwards neede of thoſe ſhips of war, ſet forth at the charges of particular men, might make vſe of them, by vertue of her owne authoritie in ſuch caſes.

A Decree of the Venetians about the poſſeſſion of the Iſlands.

The cauſe of this decree.

Beſides, euerie one was bound to keepe at his owne Coſtes, the places which ſhould be poſſeſſed (which the Common-wealth could not doe without great expence pence) and to carrie thither their wiues and children, with all their wealth: And by this meanes, as by Colonies ſent from the Citie, the whole ſhould bee ſubiect to the Venetians obedience. But howſoeuer they had reſpect either to the one or other of the fore-nam'd occaſions, it is certain that diuers particular perſons did take Armes for this purpoſe. And to the ſame purpoſe before any of the reſt, the publike fleete of one and thirtie Gallies ſailed into the maine, conducted (as ſome ſay) by Rayniero Dandulo, and Rugiero Permarin: and others changing both the names make mention of none but Rayniero Permarin. All Annaliſts almoſt, and other authors likewiſe doe ſet downe the atchieuements of particular perſons before thoſe of the publik State: as though it were likelie that priuate perſons durſt haue attempted any thing on the Iſlandes, before that the Seas were freed from Pirats, with whom the commonwealths Gallies were enforced to fight, at the verie entrie almoſt of the Adriaticke Gulph.

The Venetians fleete againſt the Pirats.

And becauſe the continuall courſe of this buſineſſe doth ſo require it, wee will firſt of all ſet downe that which was performed by the generall Armie. They were ſcarce out of the Gulph, when they met with Leo Vetrano the Genoueſe, one of the moſt famous Pirats of thoſe daies, with nine Gallies; who being aſſailed by the Venetians, was eaſily broken, taken, and brought to Corfu, whither the fleet ſailed, where he was hanged. After the recouerie of which Iſland, the Venetians ſailed towards Modona firſt, & then to Corona, the two receptacles of theeues and Pirats, which they ruined. They are two Cities of Pelloponeſſus at this day called Morea. The one lies betweene Coriphaſium, and the mount Acrita, and the other on the Sea of Meſſina. Neere thoſe places the Ambaſſadors of Achaya and Athens came to the Generalls of the Armie promiſing to yeeld themſelues to the Venetians; but it is reported that their raſh reſolution was interrupted by a Captaine named Mega, who the ſame time poſſeſſed thoſe places. I thinke that theſe places were held by him, & by others, at ſuch time as the Venetians were buſied in the wars of Conſtantinople: At which time all the Iſlands and Sea-townes of the Ægean and Ionian Seas were expoſed for a prey to as manie as could winne them: the Empire beeing then verie much declined. Albeit I wil not denie but that he might be before then appointed Gouernour there by thoſe who did command Greece.

Modona and Corona receptacles of theeues and Pirats, ruined.

The paſſage of the Sea being in this ſort opened, all men haſted to theſe Iſlands as to an aſſured bootie. Marco Dandulo and Giacomo Viadre being ioined together ſeized on Callipolis. Marco Sanuto, accompanied with diuers Citizens who were at the Iſlands Cyclades, made himſelfe maſter of Naxos, Paros, Molos, Herma and Andros. Raban Carcerio with his nephewes tooke Euboea, called at this day Nigrepont, and Euripa neere adioining. Andrea and Henrico de Glaſſis, ſeized on Tenos, Micon (which the Modernes haue called Micolla) Schyros, Philocolion, (called in times paſt Philocandea) with Staliminium which is named Lemnos.

The names of the Iſlands poſſeſſed by particular perſons.

In this meane time Henrie, ſurnamed the Fiſher, Earle of that part of Morea which is called Mailla, aided by certaine Gallies of Genoa, attempted to take the Iſle of Candie from the Venetians. But Rayniero, Generall of the Armie, arriuing there vnlook't for, did not only preſerue the Iſland, but ſanke foure Genoa-Gallies that were found neere the ſhoare, in which ſome will needes affirme, that Vetrano was taken, and forth-with put to death. The Venetians ſoon after, to curbe the practiſes of the Greekes, ſent to Candace, called Candida by the vulgar, the head Cittie of the Iſland, a Colonie, namely horſemen of the order of Senators, and footmen of the common ſort of people.

Henrie the Fiſher maketh attempts on the Iſle of Candie.

The Venetians ſend a Colonie to Candace.

The Genoueſes in like manner did robbe and ſcoure the Seas, againſt whom Gionan Treuiſano was ſent with nine Gallies well prouided; He, hauing met with the Fleete of Genoa, aſſailed it with more courage than force, and tooke twelue of the enemies veſſels: By which loſſe the Genoueſes being daunted ſued for peace. Some Authours affirme, that, the Genoueſes hauing taken a ſhip from the Venetians, Treuiſano was commanded to purſue them with two Gallies and two ſhips of burthen; who, hauing ouertaken them in the Libian Sea, neere to the ruines of old Carthage fought with them, and tooke from them foure ſhips, and ſoone after, twentie eight more on the Sicilian Sea.

The Genoueſes defeated by the Venetians.

About the ſame time there aroſe great diſſenſion between the Venetians and the Paduans about a ſmall matter. The Treuiſans were at the ſame time by reaſon of a long peace, full of riches and delicacies, ſo as giuing them-ſelues ouer to all ſportes and paſtimes (as men commonly do in a proſperous eſtate) they inuented pleaſant recreations. They erected in the Market-place of their Citie a Caſtle, made of verie coſtly ſilke, compaſſed about with ſcarlet in ſted of Walls, within the which were placed the nobleſt maidens of the Citie, wearing Coronets on their heads in ſted of Helmets, and for Curaſſes verie rich Chaines and Iewels, who defended the Caſtle againſt yong Gentlemen of the like yeares. And the weapons on either ſide were ſmall artificiall apples, made of nutmegs, roſes and lillies, faſhioned round like a ball, with a ſodaine ſmall raine of roſe water, and diuers other ſweete odors. This great preparation being publiſhed abroad, cauſed diuers who were deſirous to ſee, (as the manner is) to come to Treuiſo. Diuers Venetians and Paduans being entreated to be of the number came to theſe ſhewes. But whilſt all men were buſied in aſſailing the fort, and in looking on what ſide they would begin, it hapned that a troope of yong Venetians ſeized on one of the Caſtle gates, & would forthwith haue ſet vp their enſigne there: which certaine Paduans perceiuing, who not farre off from thence did aſſaile the Damſells, fearing that the Venetians would carrie awaie the glorie of the fight, laid hands on the enſigne wherein was painted the picture of Saint Marke, and hauing pluck't it downe, did ſhamefully teare it in peeces: By reaſon of this braue there aroſe on a ſodaine a great quarrell; and they had fought in the verie place with great ſlaughter, If the Marſhalls of the field had not inſtantly broke vp the games. But the Paduans, not acknowledging their faults (for there was ſome likelihood that the Venetians would reuenge this iniurie) after they had made a league with the Treuiſans, making ſhew as if they had receiued the wrong (being vſuall with thoſe that will couer their fault) began firſt; and without any warlike ſummons, entring into the Venetians Territorie, carried thence much bootie. The Venetians ſending to demand that which they had taken awaie, the Paduans in ſted of hearkening thereunto, came and beſieged the Tower of Bebia, ſeated at the mouth of the riuer, which Prince Cyani had fortified with a ſtrong Garriſon, vnder the command of Marco Concano a valiant perſon.

Pleaſant games inuented at Treuiſo.

The Paduans & the Venetians quarrell at the games of Treuiſo.

The Paduans make roads on the Venetians.

The Venetians being moued as well at this ſecond as firſt affront, went to armes, and comming ſodainely to the Tower, they aſſailed, brake, and defeated them, and tooke more than foure hundred priſoners, with foure enſignes, which did highly content the diſpleaſed Citie of Venice. The Treuiſans, who were comming to aid their fellowes and allies, vnderſtanding that they were defeated, returned back all amazed. The yerely tribute which thoſe of Chioggia were wont to paie, was forgiuen them by a publike decree, becauſe they had valiantly behaued themſelues in that incounter.

The Paduans defeated.

Soone after this battaile of Bebia, by the mediation of the Patriarch of Aquileia, a peace followed, on condition neuertheleſſe, That the Paduans ſhould ſend to the Prince at Venice, fiue and twentie of thoſe which began the ſtir at the games of Treuiſo; who being deliuered, the Venetian ſent them home againe without any harme at all. This peace laſted not long, for both ſides fell on a ſodaine to Armes. The occaſion of this new warre grew about the confederates of both theſe people.

Peace betwixt the Paduans & the Venetians. A great curteſie.

A new ſtrife betwixt the Venetians and Paduans.

The Forlani were at ſtrife with the Treuiſans about their boundes, who preſuming on the Venetians aide, entred the Territorie of their new enemies. Bertoldo, their Biſhop by whoſe authoritie the whole matter was managed, went for ſuccour to the Paduans. But others ſaie that it was to the Venetians, who made him a Citizen of Venice, And that which makes me moſt to beleeue it, is the ancient alliance bebetwixt the Paduans and thoſe of Treuiſo. But they affirme that at the firſt beginning of the warre, Bertoldo and the Count Gorician came to Venice, where after they had agreed vpon truce for fiue yeares, the warre was finiſhed.

About the ſame time the Epiſcopall See of Malamoc, (as ſome ſay) was tranſlated to Chioggia. After that a great Earthquake did wonder-fully ſhake the Citie, whereby a part of Saint Georges Church fell downe to the ground, and diuers other priuate buildings. This hapned in the places neere to the firme Land. But the Venetians power did daly encreaſe in the Iſlands. Rabano Carcerio, who had ſeized on the Iſle of Nigrepont, fearing that he ſhould not be able at his own charges to keep ſuch an Iſland, did freely with his Nephews put himſelfe vnder the Venetians obedience, promiſing to paie a yearely tribute. Certaine Gentlemen in manner of a new Colonie were ſent to guard Corfu, among whom, were Pietro Michaeli, Stephano Foſcari, Sigiberto Quirino, and Giacomo Seiano. Guifred, Prince of Achaia, who did ſucceede his Father Mega, with Gallus the wrongfull poſſeſſor of Cephalenia, came, and ſhrowded themſelues vnder the Venetians protection.

The Bishops See at Malamoc, tranſlated to Chioggia.

A Colonie ſent to Corfu.

Whilſt theſe things were done in the Iſlands, and on the Sea-coaſts of Ionia, the Emperour Henrie made a league with the Valachians; and after hee had married the King of Valachias daughter, he did in ſhort ſpace by meanes of that new affinitie, recouer all the Townes of Greece, which by Baldwins death were reuolted; And all matters being peaceable abroade, he attempted a verie holy and pious matter in the Citie, by fauouring the Popes Nuntio ſent expreſly to Conſtantinople, to the end he might draw the Greekes to the obedience of the See of Rome. It was likelie to haue raiſed a great tumult in the Citie, all the Citizens crying out againſt Henrie that it was the part of a good Emperour to meddle with temporall, and not with diuine matters, that they had beene too much obedient to him, to haue endured that their Church ſhould bee termed ſubiect to that of Rome. Therefore Henrie, after he had left the Greekes to their wilfullneſſe, returned to the gouernment of the Empire and declared the ſonne of Boniface to be King of Theſſalie, and gaue euerie daie hope of greater matters. But hee was on a ſodaine preuented by death.

A ſedition of the Conſtantinopolitans, affirming their Church not to be ſubiect to that of Rome.

Whileſt theſe things were done in Greece, Prince Cyani ſent Ambaſſadours to the Emperour Otho, to congratulate his victorie obtained againſt his enemie Philip Duke of Sueuia, and his corriuall in the Empire, who freely granted them the confirmation of all their priuiledges and immunities. Angelo Phaledrio Procurator of Saint Marke, did greatly enrich with diuers ſorts of pretious ſtones, the golden Table which (as we haue ſaid) lieth vpon the great Altar in the ſumptuous Church of S^t. Marke. Prince Cyani (his firſt wife being dead) married Conſtantia Daughter to Tancred King of Sicilie. It is reported likewiſe, that he builded the Church of Saint Marie of Ieruſalem; which is at this day an houſe of Nunnes.

The Emperour Otho confirmes the Venetians priuileges.

Peter, Earle of Auxerre, after the death of Henrie, whoſe ſiſter hee had married, was, by a generall conſent, choſen Emperour of the Eaſt, who with his wife comming to Rome, was crowned by Pope Honorius in S. Lawrence his Church without the Citie. Afterwards he departed from Rome with Iohn Cardinall Colonna, (ſent by the Pope for Legate into Hungarie, to leuie forces againſt the Turke) and being come to Brunduſium, he there ſhipped his wife and children. But himſelfe entring into the Venetians Gallies, ſailed directly towards Dalmatia, determining to goe from thence by land to Conſtantinople.

Peter Count of Auxerre choſen Emperour of the Eaſt.

It is reported, that in the Venetians behalfe he would needs aſſaile Durazzo. Theodore Duke of Albania, commanded there, who tooke it from the Venetians, after they had rampierd it with ſtrong walls, where he placed a ſtrong garriſon of Albanians; ſo as the Emperours aſſaults were in vaine. This Theodore called himſelfe Emperour of Greece, and reckoned Emanuel, who had beene Emperour, in the liſt of his Anceſters. But feigning afterwards to be reconciled with Peter, he inuited him to a dinner in the Citie, where in the middeſt of the banquet he was murthered. Others

The Emperour Peter murthered.

thers say, that this perfidious wretch slew his guest neare to the groues of Thessalie called Tempe. Giacomo Tepulo was at the same time the Venetians Magistrate in Constantinople; who perceiuing the French forces halfe wasted and consumed in Greece, made a league with Theodore the Albanois for fiue yeare, and with the King of Turks for two yeare.

Robert sonne to Peter Emperour of the East.

In the meane time Robert, sonne to Peter, came through Hungarie, and Misia, to Constantinople, where hee was sodainly saluted Emperour. The Prince at the beginning did communicate diuers great affaires of the Empire to Marino Michaeli the Venetians Magistrate in Constantinople. In which faithfull league of friendship and confederacie, hee perpetually continued, so as in all the titles of his letters of state he called the Venetian Prince (as his Ancestors likewise before time had done) his most deere Colleague in the Empire: nor did he this, without a cause. For the ancient French forces beginning daily to decline in Greece, and no new succours nor supplies comming to them from any place, the matter was brought to that passe, as the whole burthen of the Empire lay only on the Venetians.

Great friendship betwixt the Emperour and the Venetian Magistrate.

The Emperour Robert his vnfortunate marriage.

A cruell reuenge of a subiect on his Emperour.

This Robert married the daughter of a rich Matrone, though of meane birth, formerly betrothed to a Senator: whose great heart not brooking so apparent iniurie, resolued presently how to reuenge it. Whereupon, accompanied with diuers of his faction, who were mightie, in a great rage they came to the Emperours Palace: which breaking open, and finding the Maiden, they cut off her nose with great cruelty: And eftsoones taking her Mother who had made the marriage, they threw her head-long into the Sea. Robert here-with vexed went presently to Rome, where after he had complained to the Pope of the wrong done to his wife, returning towards Constantinople he died In Achaia. Baldwin, his sonne, being left very yong, married the Daughter of Iohn King of Ierusalem, who by a generall consent was entreated to take vpon him the gouernement of his sonne-in-lawes Empire, who was yet in his Non-age. The Cardinall in the meane time who was sent by the Pope into Syria with great forces, arriued at Ptolomais. The chiefe in this enterprize was Andrew King of Hungarie, who (as it is reported) was aided by the Venetians in the transportation of his troupes and carriage, the which was easily granted him, by reason that he did renounce and giue ouer to them, all the claime which the Kings of Hungarie might pretend to Dalmatia. Some Annalists report, That Damiet in Egypt, neare to the Riuer Nilus, was taken in this iourney, and that they brought away thirtie thousand prisoners. Wee finde no other memorable matter to haue beene done in this action.

Andrew King of Hungarie cheife of the voyage into Syria.

Damiet in Egypt taken.

* * *

The end of the eighth Booke of the first Decad.

THE NINTH BOOKE OF THE FIRST DECAD OF THE HISTORIE Of Venice.

¶ The Contents of the ninth Booke of the first Decad.

THe ninth Booke containeth the full deſcription of the Iſle of Candie; The reuolt thereof from the Venetians; and the recouerie of it by them after they had chaced away Count Maillot. The Nobilitie of the Iſland goe from thence rather than they will obey the Venetians. The rebellion of the Citie of Candace. How after diuers warlike exploits, all the Candiots almoſt were reduced vnder the Venetians obedience. New ſtirres of the Iſlanders, appeaſed by force. The preparation of VATTASVS to ſeize on the Iſland, the Inhabitants hauing offered it vnto him. The puniſhment of the rebells after the enemies were driuen out. The Venetians victorie againſt the King of the Exagoni before Conſtantinople. VATTASVS defeated in the ſame place by the Venetians within few daies after. Truce with the Genoueſes for nine yeares. The warre of the Venetians by Sea and Land againſt the Emperour FREDERICK and ECCELIN. The Genoueſes victorie againſt FREDERICK, and the Piſans, neare to the Iſle of Cirna. The fifth rebellion of Zara, and the ſpeedie recouerie thereof. The declaration of the Aſſemblies which are made for the Creation of a Duke. The Paduans are ſet at libertie by the Venetians, by the helpe of Pope ALEXANDER, ſo ſoone as ECCELIN was driuen forth of the Citie. Twelue thouſand Paduans murthered at Verona by the command of ECCELIN.

THe continuall reuolts in the Iſle of Candie, happening almoſt one after another, which for a time greatly troubled the Venetians affaires, doe enforce vs a little to digreſſe from Italie: whereunto the ſubiect alone doth not inuite vs being filled with various matter, but the fame of this Iſland ſo much renowned for the greatneſſe and antiquitie thereof. That therefore ſuch as are ignorant of antiquitie may not erre in the knowledge of her name, it is the ſame Creta, which the vulgar at this day call Candie, by the name of a Citie (as I thinke) which is of late ſo called therein. Doſiades thinks that it was called Creta by the Daughter of Heſperides: And Anaximander ſaith, by King Curetus: Philiſtides and Crates ſay, that it was firſt called Acria, and after Cureta; from whence we may eaſily gather that her name was in the future deriued.

Deſcription of the Iſle of Candie.

Eudoxus

Eudoxus (to speake somewhat of her situation) thought it to be seated in the Ægean Sea. But the most curious Authors saie, that it is enuironed with diuers; namely the Ægean, Cretan, Libian, Ægyptian, and Carpathian Seas. Apollodorus saith that it is in length, two thousand, and three hundred stadij. Artemidorus setteth downe foure thousand and one hundred, extending from the East to the West, where her out-stretched proportion is longest. Some account but two thousand, and her breadth to be much lesse. Plinie thinckes that no part thereof doth exceed fiftie thousand paces in breadth, two hundred threescore and tenne thousand in length, and fiue hundred fourescore and ten thousand in compasse. Her territorie, besides, is verie closely compacted, full of mountaines, and verie fertile vallies. The hilles towards the West are of a meruailous heigth, not giuing place any iotte to mount Taygetus in Laconia. In the middest thereof where the hills seeme highest, mount Ida is to be seene, so much celebrated in the fabulous Poets.

Mount Ida.

Ephorus writes That the most ancient inhabitants of the Island were first instructed by Radamanthus to build Cities, and to lead a more ciuill life; and afterwards by Minos his successor, strictly to obserue Iustice: hauing established lawes and ordinances for the same purpose. The same Author, and Plato likewise, did thinke, That this people, and the best-mannerd of Greece, especially the Lacedemonians, haue beene followers and obseruers of these lawes. But (as Strabo saith) all things being altered from bad to worse, this holie kind of life vanished, and mens manners being wholy depraued, it was first troubled by Pyrates; and soone after being inuaded by the Romanes and subiected to their dominion, it was for a time vnder their protection in peace and quietnesse. At length that Empire beginning to decline, after Constantine had translated the Imperiall seate to Constantinople; & afterwards vpon the diuision of that one entire Empire into twaine, hauing two Emperours; one for the affaires of Greece, and the other of Italie; this Island was euer reputed as a part of the Greeke Empire.

Radamanth and Minos Lords of Candie.

In this passage of time it was not onely molested by the Barbarians, but at sundrie times greatly afflicted; And notwithstanding all oppositions, after the Empire of Myrtillus, which lasted not long, it was taken from the Greekes, and ioyned to the Venetians dominion. But such is the disposition of this Nation and their desire of noueltie so great, as the Venetians a long time had much trouble to containe them vnder their obedience. Whereupon I will here beginne to speake of their turbulent commotions.

What mooued the Genoueses to attempt on Candie.

Enuie which euer waites on prosperitie, so soone as the Venetians possessed Candie, did incite the Genoueses repining at their greatnesse, to imploie all their forces (which at that time were great and mightie) and by some meanes or other to snatch it from them. For the Island was as yet scarcely fortified with Garrisons, when they attempted by some of their Nation, with armed Gallies for the purpose, to conquere it: but afterwards with greater force, when they vnderstood what was befallen to Petrano their countrie-man, whom the Venetians had put to a shamefull death: wherewith being througly vexed, this æmulation was conuerted into open hatred, and they assayed by all meanes to winne the Candiots to rebellion. Which they being readie to put in practise: Count Mailloc tooke armes to trouble the affaires of the Island. This man beeing couragious and sodaine in his attempts, presuming on his assurance of the Genoueses forces, did in a short space reduce the whole Island in a manner vnder his obedience.

Count Mailloc his enterprise vpon Candie.

The Venetians, who from the beginning were resolued to keepe that Island by all meanes whatsoeuer, did set forth a great Fleete. And in the meane time diuers were of opinion, after it should be recouered, to dismantle all the Cities, Castles, and townes that were strong either by nature or arte; alleadging diuers reasons for the confirmation of their saying. But Rayniero Dandulo who was a man sodaine and verie rich, did presently offer to keepe what soeuer should be recouered, at his owne costs. At which offer of his all the assistants blushed, so as no man afterward durst durſt ſpeake of razing of Cities, fearing thereby they ſhould ſeeme vnable to keepe the Iſland vnder their ſubiection. The Armie being readie, departed vnder the command of the ſame Rainiero, according to ſome Annaliſts, who had more mercenarie Souldiours out of Lombardie, than of their owne allies and confederates. At his arriuall inthe Iſland, the Metropolitane Citie of Candace which at this day is the beſt (for Marchants traficke) of the whole Iſland; was forthwith recouered, and after all the other townes and Caſtles. Count Mailloc being brought to verie meane tearmes in a Fort, and being enforced to yeeld vpon compoſition, departed out of the Iſland.

The Venetians Armie in Candie.

The Candiots were alreadie brought to a reaſonable good paſſe when as certain ſeditious Greekes did by their commotions interrupt the peace of the Iſland. Rayniero ſpeedily oppoſing himſelfe againſt theſe combuſtions was ſlaine with an arrow, ſhotte through his body, who being carried to Candace, was buried in Saint Georges Church. His death being reported at Venice, Giacomo Longo and Leonardo Nauigaioſo were ſent with ſpeed to guard the Iſland; and with them Giacomo Tepulo for the Iſlands Gouernour. And in another place, Raphaeli Zeno ſailed towards Morea to the reliefe of Coron and Modon. Giacomo Longo meeting by the way not farre from Candie, three Shippes of Genoa, ſuncke them and gaue chaſe to diuers others. Moreouer ſeeing in regard of the leuitie and inconſtancie of the Greekes, there was no likelihood of abilitie to quiet the ſtate of the Iſland, without a great ſtanding Garriſon, they reſolued to ſend a Colonie thither: namely horſe-men of the order of Senators, and foot-men of the common ſort of people. Vnto whom, being ſcattered here and there in Candace and other places of the Iſland, were great inheritances giuen; to ſome for terme of life, and to others in perpetuitie. Howbeit ſome Authors affirme That the Colonie was ſent thither preſently vpon the Iſlands recouerie as hath beene alreadie ſpoken in the precedent booke.

Rayniero Dandulo his death.

Tepulo Gouernour of Candy.

A Colonie ſent to Candie.

Soone after the arriuall of the Colonie, the Hagio Stephani (who for Nobilitie and riches were the chiefe of the Iſland) being deſirous of noueltie, did reuolt from the Venetians, and ſeized on Mirabeau and Sethia. Giouanni Tepulo to appeaſe theſe ſtirres called Marco Sanuto to his aide from the neighbour-Iſlands; promiſing well to reward thoſe whom he ſhould bring to his ſuccour For I know no better meanes that he had to deale with a Venetian than vpon reward. The Hiſtorians make no other mention wherefore this reward was promiſed him at his arriuall. The Authors of the rebellion were in an inſtant chaced thence and the townes recouered: But in the meane ſpace, there aroſe ſome ſtrife betwixt the commanders which gaue fit occaſion to a miſchieuous fellow called Seuaſtus who was deſirous of innouation, and watched for nothing more than how hee might diſturbe the peace of the Prouince; the which reuolted on a ſodaine.

Sedition in Candie.

Sanuto comes to aide the Venetians in Candie.

It is reported, that becauſe ſufficient order was not taken for the prouiſion of victuailes in the Citie, there was no bread to be ſold on a market-day (as was wont to be) in the market-place. This Seuaſtus, who with others deſired to diſturbe the State, would not let ſlippe ſuch an occaſion. But hauing drawne together a great multitude of people, they all ranne firſt to Sanutos lodging, as to him who delt not with the Cities buſineſſe (but diuers thinke that Sanuto had concluded with them ſo to doe, who becauſe he would not ſeeme to partake in ſo wicked an enterpriſe, nor to take armes to trouble the State, but vpon neceſſitie, was contented (as hath beene ſaid) that they ſhould firſt come to him) and then afterward they came with great rumour to the Palace, and the Citie was ſodainely taken by a few Souldiours fore-appointed for the ſame purpoſe.

A new commotion in Candace.

Tepulo perceiuing all this to tend to a rebellion, retired himſelfe in diſguiſe to the houſe of Marco Toniſco his friend; and imagining that, the Towne being taken, it might endanger his life if he ſhould be found there, he was ſecretly in the night let downe by a corde from the Citie walles in womans attire. This ſodaine flight cauſed him to take his iourney towards Themenum, a verie ſtrong Citie; where thinking thinking himselfe in safetie, hee resolued to remaine, after he had a little fortified the place a new, because he would not seeme by too much despaire to abandon the Prouince. Some saie, Tepulo being driuen forth of the Citie, Sanuto became Captaine of the Rebelles, who forgetting his Countrey and the benefits that hee had receiued of the same, did in hast with those of his faction runne vp and downe the Island, causing it to reuolt from the Venetians: And that after he had left Stephano Sanuto his kinsman to guard it, and ioyned all the Greeke and Italian troupes together, he did in short space reduce all the Cities and strong places (in a manner) of the Island vnder his commaund. Some likewise saie That he came and besieged Temenum whither Tepulo had retired himselfe, who with those that were come to his aide did brauely defend the Citie: For diuers who remained loyall to the Venetians, so soone as they vnderstood that the Gouernour was at Temenum, ranne thither to succour him. The siege before Temenum being raised, the Gouernour in few daies recouered Montfort and Lasitha.

The Gouernour of Candie flies, being diſguiſed like a woman.

Sanuto chiefe of the rebels.

Thus stood the affaires of Candie, when as Dominico Quirino, and Sebastiano Bethanio being sent as Prouidatori, with great forces of horse and foote arriued in the Island. The Gouernour who till then durst not rashly attempt ought against the enemie, who was much stronger than himselfe, after he vnderstood of the Prouidatoris arriuall, (who, besides the forces they had brought into the Island, were well furnished with weapons, money, and victuals) being thrust forward with hope to effect some great matter, departed from Temenum, and came and lodged with his troopes at Panosobrita, a verie fit place to execute an enterprise, where hauing fortified his campe, he did in hast build a fort. Sanuto being aduertized of Tepulos departure, and of the place where he was incamped, did with his Armie forthwith march thither. The Gouernour being somewhat daunted at the sodaine comming of his enemie, had certaine notice by his spies what forces he had in his campe. And being strengthened with new supplies, which (as I thinke) were mingled among the Islanders, he was not slacke to embattaile his troopes readie for the fight, if the enemie were so pleased. Sanuto on the contrarie, imagining that which was true, That by temporizing he was able to ouercome him, made none account hereof. For besides, that his souldiers in regard of the commoditie of the places did greatly annoy the Tepulans, he saw new forces daily to arriue at his owne campe from the Citie of Candace, and from all other parts almost of the Island; and on the contrarie, that time would bring so many discommodities to the enemie, as he would be at last enforced to die by famine, or by some other violent death, or else wholly to forsake the Island.

Venetian supplies in Candie.

Sanuto narrowly followeth his enemie.

Sanuto his desseigne.

Tepulo soone discouered the purpose of his enemie; and not being able to draw him to battaile, he left a strong garrison in the fort newly builded, raised his campe, and returned to Themenum: From whence soone after departing in great silence, he came to Candace, and about midnight setting vp ladders against the Citie wals, he gaue entrance to all his troopes, without noise or slaughter. The Citie being thus recouered, Stephano Sanuto who commaunded there, with diuers others were taken prisoners. The enemie being troubled with these newes, resolued to giue eare to a peace, the which he obtained of Tepulo on these conditions, That after he had retired all his Garrisons which he held in the Island (for all the countrey in a manner from Milopotamus vnto the Promontorie of Spatha, was possessed by his souldiers) he should leaue Candie, and get him home into his Islands with one Galley, and a little ship for the passage of his troopes, or with more if neede were, not of his owne, but of hired ones for that purpose. This agreement being made with the Gouernour, and assurance giuen on either side, Sanuto embarked his troopes, and by his sodaine departure gaue peace to the Candiots.

Candace taken by Tepulo.

Accord betwixt Tepulo and Sanuto.

This is in a manner all which some Authors set downe of the second rebellion of the Island, which may yet rather be termed a ciuill warre. For it is not credible that Marco Sanuto did euer beare Armes with an intent to take the Island from the Venetians;

Great reasons in Sanuto his behalfe.

Venetians; but onely to driue thence the gouernour, who was his mortall enemie. For vpon what ground or what aſſurance ſhould he beare Armes againſt his countrymen and countrey? And what ſhould moue him to riſe againſt a people, till then inuincible? ſeeing he knew for a certaine, that if the Venetians were once his profeſſed enemies, they would not onely haue taken Candie from him, but all the other Iſlands which he had formetly wonne by right of warre.

Beſides, what ſimplicitie had it beene in him to intend the ruine of thoſe, with whom he reſolued afterward to ioyne himſelfe. For he would neuer haue gone about to haue drawne Count Mailloc forth of the Iſland, if he had in any ſort deſired to haue taken it from the Venetians. But it is farre more ptobable, that it was for ſome iealouſie or ſecret grudge happened betwixt the Gouernour and himſelfe after the battaile, becauſe that either of them enuying one another, would ſeeme more affectionate to his countrey, and to deſerue better of the Common-wealth, than his fellow, and that at laſt he would haue driuen him out of the Iſland by force, determining after he had chaced him thence, to giue the Venetiãs a ſufficient proofe of his loyalty, in deliuering the Iſland vnto them peaceable, and at quiet, being defended by his aide. Other reaſons likewiſe may perſwade vs to beleeue, that it was vpon ſuch occaſions as I haue ſet downe. For perceiuing by the new ſupplies, that they purſued him as an enemie, he would not (of ſet purpoſe) fight, and though he poſſeſſed diuers places in the Iſland, he neuertheleſſe freely abandoned them, & departed forth of the Prouince. If he had marched as an enemy againſt the Venetiãs, there wanted not thoſe, who would haue repoſſeſſed him in the Iſland. The Genoueſes would willingly haue accepted it, who were iealous and enuious of the honour and fame of the Venetians. But he did rather giue place to the publike peace, than helpe his enemie Tepulo. Some Hiſtorians referre to the ſame time that notable victorie obtained by Giouanni Treuiſano ouer the Genoueſes, whereof we haue made mention in the precedent booke. Candie remained not long quiet. For a new commotiõ, much more terrible than that whereof we now ſpake, did trouble the whole Iſland, the which growing from a ſmall cauſe, kindled ſuch a flame, as the whole Prouince felt it. The common report is, that by the counſell of one named Pietro Philameno Gouernour of the Caſtle of Boreparitano, the horſes of a certaine Candiot Gentleman were ſtollen: Which being told to Paulo Quirino, who at that time was Gouernour of the Iſland, he commaunded reſtitution to the Iſlanders of that which had beene taken from them. Now becauſe it was not done with that ſpeed as they would haue it, the Greeks who were ſet on by others, tooke occaſion to ouerrunne, vnder the conduct of Petro Scordillo, (who did owe the ſtollen horſes) all the countrie of Reparitana, from whence they carried away great ſpoiles. The Candiots vpon this ſtir being deſirous of nouelty, complotted forthwith a reuolt, whereupon in ſhort ſpace all that lieth from Milopotamus vnto the fartheſt part of the Iſland towards the Weſt, rebelled againſt the Venetians.

Great reaſons in Senato but halfe.

A new commotion in Candie.

The Gouernour, to ſtay theſe new inſurrections of the Greekes, ſpeedily ſent Pietro Thoniſto, and Giouanni Gritti, with great forces beyond the ſtreights of Milopotamus: who paſſing through the forreſt of Pſieuroneſſus, not ſending out their diſcouerers, were aſſailed and defeated by Conſtantine Scuaſti, & Theodore Mileſin, who lay in ambuſh for them, being accompanied with great multitudes of Greekes. Many Venetians were there ſlaine by them, who knowing the waies of the forreſt did meete them ſcattered heere and therein amazed troupes. Giouanni Gritti one of the Captaines, died there, who was an induſtrious and couragious perſon, with Nicolao Balaſtro, Marco Bono, Andrea Thealdo, and Vendramino of Aquileia, with a greate numbet of ſouldiers. A few of thoſe which eſcaped the ſlaughter, hauing throwne away their Armes, came by verie ſtrait and narrow waies to the Gouernour: In whoſe place ſoone afterward ſucceeded Dominico Delfino, vnder whom peace enſued betwixt the Venetians and the Greekes. To ſome of whom, to winne them by bountie, (as to Scuaſto, and his companions Authors of the reuolt) reuolt) were giuen in perpetuitie certaine Lands on the hither ſide the Riuer Muſella, towards the Weſt.

The Venetians defeated in Candie.

Agreement betwixt the Venetians and the Greekes.

There be likewiſe in the Iſland certaine Lands poſſeſſed in olde time by the ancient men at armes called by the common people Knight-ſhips. Some of theſe were giuen at the ſame time to the chiefeſt of the Greeks, as ſome other of them likewiſe to Theodore and Michaeli Meliſſini, ſo ſoone as they were receiued into fauour. This is all which we finde to haue hapned as well abroad as at home during the gouernment of Prince Ciani: who after he had commaunded two and twentie yeares, being become vnprofitable to the Common-wealth by reaſon of his olde age, did willingly depoſe himſelfe, and dyed fortunately ſoone after in Saint Georges Monaſterie, whither he retired himſelfe for deuotion ſake. His bodie was buried in the Monument of his Anceſtors.

Ciani willingly depoſed himſelfe

¶ Giacomo Tepvlo, the 43. Duke of Venice.

Iacomo Tepulo was by the fortie elected in his place. Candie in this Princes time was not verie quiet; whereof I will briefly mention ſome paſſages, before I touch anie other matters, which hapned as well abroad as elſewhere during this Principalitie. The Venetians too much lenitie towards the Candiots, was the cauſe that the Grecks (who are by nature light-headed and inconſtant) in ſted of yeelding loue and obedience to the Venetians, did ſhew themſelues altogether ſtubborne and peremptorie: For a baſe minde doth rather abuſe an other mans patience than make any good vſe of it; and is ſooner brought to his dutie by ſeueritie and exemplarie puniſhment, than by meekeneſſe and fauour.

Sedition in Candie by ouermuch libertie.

Thus the Scordili and the Meliſſini through too much licentiouſneſſe hauing giuen themſelues ouer to all manner of vices, and laying aſide all ſhame, beganne firſt to diſturbe the common quiet by ſecret theſts, and afterwards by open robberies to make hauocke in all places. The Gouernour being mooued with theſe vnſeemely actions, did forthwith leauie Souldiours, and ſent to entreat Marco Sanuto, with the greateſt forces he could raiſe to come ſpeedily into Candie, for the more ſpeedie expulſion of thoſe theeues and enemies; ſaying That the Iſlanders did incline to an open rebellion; and that if their deſſeignes were not ſodainely preuented and reſtained by force, hee ſtood greatly in feare of the whole Iſlands reuolt from the Venetians.

Sanuto

Sanuto eſteeming delay in ſuch a caſe dangerous to the Common-wealth, with all ſpeed poſſible aſſembled his forces and then waſted ouer into the Iſle of Candie. Where to bridle the Rebelles hee cauſed a Caſteil to be built in a verie comodious place. At the ſight whereof the enemies beeing daunted, though not giuing ouer their wilfull headineſſe, ſent to Iohn Vattaſius (who held Lesbos an Iſland of the Ægean Sea, and who poſſeſſed at that time diuers places of the Greek Empire, entitling himſelfe Emperour of Greece) promiſing him by their menſſengers the entire dominion of the Iſland, after the Venetians ſhould be driuen thence, ſo as hee would in time ſend them ſufficient aide to expell the enemie.

Sanuto commeth to the aide of Candie.

The forces of Vattaſius were at that time verie great. For he was in league with the King of the Hexagons, who likewiſe in the places neere adioyning to the Ponticke Sea, called himſelfe Emperour of Greece, determining at eithers charges to aſſaile the Empire of Conſtantinople. This King was angrie becauſe young Robert, ſonne to the Emperour Peter, had by the aduice of his counſell preferred the alliance of the King of Hieruſalem (who had but the title of that Kingdome) before his. Vattaſius, being drawne on by theſe promiſes, ſent thirtie Gallies to aide the Candiots. At their arriuall Marco Sanuto being wonne by Vattaſius (as it is reported) departed out of the Iſland with all his forces. Whereupon the Generall of Vattaſius his Armie reſolued to beſiege the Cities; and entring Rethimna, he conſtrained Marco Quirino to yeeld himſelfe: The like did Margareto Foſcari at Milopotamus, and Conrad Millenius at Caſtel-nouo. Yet all theſe places did not yeeld at the firſt ſummons, but after they had fought and valliantly defended themſelues for a time. Cataldo Auenali, who had ſeized on the Fort of Boniface with a good troope of Souldiours, did valliantly defend that place till the comming of the Gouernour, who was with an Armie ſecretly departed from Candace to relieue his owne Souldiours and to raiſe the ſiege; whereby the enemie being conſtrained haſtily to diſlodge left behind him diuers engins of warre: And becauſe the victorie ſeemed not ſo eaſie as the Candiots had perſuaded him it would be, perceiuing withall that the warre was more troubleſome to him than the Venetians, he determined to returne to Lesbos. Wherefore after he had ſhipped all his forces, he left Candie to the Venetians, and ſailed thence. His fleet ſoone after, being verie great, was in ſuch ſort toſſed and beaten by a tempeſt neere to the Iſland of Cithera, as they were all caſt away, three ſmall veſſels excepted. Nicolao Mutatio and Marin ſurnamed Marini, being ſent Ambaſſadours into Greece about a peace, ſuffered ſhipwracke in that tempeſt. The Gouernour Nicolao Toniſto, who ſucceeded Giouanni Storlato, and Bartholomeo Gradonico his ſucceſſor, did recouer certaine townes.

Vattaſius Armie ſuccoreth the Rebels in Candie.

Vattaſius Armie leaues Candie. And ſuffers ſhipwracke.

Nicholas Senaſtus and Michael Moleſini, Authors of the rebellion and ſo many miſchiefes, being delt with by Gradonico, returned to the Venetians obedience; and he gaue them all the territorie which lies from Petræa to the mount Athis; on condition, That they ſhould ſend euerie yeare fiue hundred pound weight of Wax for the vſe of Saint Markes Churche; and likewiſe pray vnto God for the Venetian Prince, and perpetually beare Armes againſt the Rebelles, till they were all reduced vnder the Venetians ſubiection. There remained no more Rebelles at that time but thoſe that inhabited along the Riuer Petræa euen to the mount Summonium. Gradonico dyed in the meane time, and by his death the Prouidatori tooke the gouernment into their owne hands. For to euerie Gouernour two Prouidatori were giuen. Giouanni Ardizino and Marco Molino, had this place in the Iſland when the Gouernour dyed. Molino being at the ſiege of Sithie, a Sea-towne, perceiued on a ſodaine twelue Gallies, who with full ſailes came from the maine towards the Iſland: Which Vattaſius ſent for ſupplies to the beſieged. Whereupon, fearing if this Fleet ſhould enter the Hauen, that the inhabitants preſuming on this new aide, would make ſome ſalley forth vpon him, whom he ſhould not be able to repell by reaſon his forces were very few; or if they ſhould faile to Candace, they might at the very firſt take it: he ſpeedily raiſed his Campe, and in all haſt returned to the Citie,

An agreement with the chiefe Rebels of the Iſland.

Gradonico dyeth.

Two Prouidatorij giuen to euerie Gouernour.

Vattaſius ſendeth new aide to Candie.

from whence he sent Ardizino with those shippes of warre which he had readie in the Hauen for the same purpose to hinder the enemies landing, if he found it to be necessarie for the Common-wealth. Vattasus forces in the meane time were entred into the Hauen of Suda, where the Venetian Gallies, arriuing as soone as they, did with great cries assaile the enemie, who already possessed the Port. The Greekes forthwith prepared for the fight, which they could not fitly doe by reason of the streightnesse of the place, so as they attempted to repulse the enemies fleet by their warlike engines and shott. The inhabitants bordering that place, who at the first noise came running to the aid of their Countrimen, did greatly helpe the Greekes. For all the shoare was filled with townes-men and peasants, who without intermission assailed the Venetians. The fight lasted from morning till noone, when as Ardizino the Prouidator beeing sore wounded commanded to sound the retreate: The Venetians determined the next day to renew the fight; which the Greekes fearing, about midnight they left the Hauen, and sailed thence into the maine.

The Venetians fight with the enemies.

Whilst the Prouidatori executed these warlike exploits, Angelo Gradonico arriued in the Island as Gouernour. By his wisedome the Subriti were reduced to the Venetians obedience, neuertheless vpon condition, to deliuer aliue into their hands Emanuel Draconopulus and Constantine his brother; or if that could not be done, to kill them, as the chiefe authors of all the Rebellions, Because so long as they should liue, there was no likelihood that the Island would euer be at quiet: Besides, that the Caleothetes, and the Anatoliks (who boasted to be issued from the Emperors of Greece) should be banished; & that thirtie of the Noblest families of the Subriti, should come and dwell in the Towne of Boniface. The Candiots and their affaires being thus pacified. they which held the Citie of Nicella, (for there were diuers of Vattasus garrisons still in the Island) did forthwith yeeld.

Angelo Gradonico Gouernour of Candie.

Agreement with the Candiots.

But it is now time to leaue the Candiots, and to returne to other matters hapned at the same time in Greece, as well in the firme Land, as in the Islands neere adioining, which being of greater importance, haue more troubled and molested the Venetians. For so soone as the new agreement or new affinitie (as it was said) betwixt Vattasus and the King of the Hexagoni was knowne abroad, and that the rumor was, that both of them ioining their forces together, would assaile the Greeke Empire, Iohn King of Ierusalem, Gouernour of Constantinople, beeing troubled with these newes, began to consider by what cunning meanes he might preserue and defend the Empire committed to his charge; in which busines the Venetians were they alone from whom he expected aid: The which hauing imparted to Theophilo Zeno the Venetian Magistrate at the same time in Constantinople, they both sent to Prince Tepulo, to acquaint him with the League and affinitie of these two mightie Princes, who by the report of all men were in Armes for the inuasion of the Greeke Empire, and that therefore they had need of aide with all expedition, which is a chiefe point in Martiall businesse, saying, That they knew of a certaine, that both of them were verie busie in leuying a mightie Armie: They entreated him therefore to hasten the succours, if they desired to haue Constantinople preserued; And not sparingly to send them this or that, but all things whatsoeuer they knew to bee necessarie for the maintenance of so great and dangerous a warre, Alleaging this further caution, That they were not to delaie the matter, for feare least the enemies (which God-forbid) should surprize some places fitt and commodious for the wars, which afterward when they would they should not be able to remedie, to the great preiudice of them and their confederats.

Request made to the Venetians for the preseruation of the Greek Empire.

The Citie gaue a willing eare to this aduertisement, and being moued by the imminent danger, they commanded forthwith to leuie a great Armie. Whereupon 25. Gallies were in short space made readie to set saile, who departing from the Port vnder the command of Leonardo Quirini, and Marco Gussoni, sailed directly towards Constantinople, when newes was brought them that the Citie was besieged and enuironed with a mightie Armie. The Generalls of the Armie, being troubled at this report report, made all the haſt they could, for feare leaſt ſome miſhap might in the meane time befall the Citie.

The Venetian fleete commeth to the aide of Constantinople.

Leo Gaualla, a man well experienced in marine matters, did command the enemies Nauie, who hauing notice of the Venetians approch, ſhifted his place, and brought his Gallies nearer to the ſhore, where the land-armie was encamped (for the Citie was alreadie beſieged by land.) But this deſeigne of the enemie could not make the Venetians change their firſt reſolutions, who at their firſt arriuall did ſo furiouſly aſſaile the Greekiſh Nauie, as in a moment they ſuncke foure and twentie of their Gallies, and put the reſt to flight, in the view of the amazed enemies. The victorious Venetians entring the citie, which they freed from the ſiege, were ioifully enterteined by all men, but chiefly by their Countrimen who dwelt there: And after they had perſwaded them euer to hope well, and to feare no harme ſo long as the ſtate of The Common-wealth ſhould proſper, they remained there a few daies, and then returned into Italie.

The Armie of the Greekes before Conſtantinople.
The Greekes defeated.

The victorious fleete returned to the Citie ſooner than was expected, to the exceeding pleaſure and contentment of the people. They tooke great delight to heare, that their Countrimen were deliuered from ſo great danger; and their ioy was not ſmall for that ſo proude an enemie had been ſo ſodainly defeated, who was as ſoone ouercome as lookt vpon.

The Venetians ioy at the returne of their Nauie.

But the vanquiſhed could not long remaine quiet. For Vattaſus who on the other ſide had armed fiue and twenty Gallies (becauſe the former fleete as ſome ſay was ſent from the frontiers of the Ponticke Sea by the King of the Hexagoni) came againe and beſieged Conſtantinople, with greater numbers of ſmall veſſels. But how great ſoeuer the Armie was, it could not diſcourage Giouanni Michaeli Magiſtrate at that time for the Venetians in Conſtantinople, who with ſixteene armed Gallies in the Hauen for guard of the Citie, gaue a furious aſſault to the enemies Campe. Vattaſus Armie did not long endure the furie of the fight. For the affrighted enemies did forthwith inuent meanes how to eſcape: and fortune ſoone after beeing aduerſe to their partie, they openly began to flie. Tenne of the enemies Gallies being taken, and the reſidue put to flight, gaue the Venetians a goodly victorie, and thoſe of Conſtantinople free paſſage of the Sea. The ſiege beeing raiſed Vattaſus fell ſick, and ſoone after died in the Citie of Nymphea. He left behind him a ſonne named Theodore, begotten on a daughter of Theodore Laſcaris, whom he married when they were both verie young. Other Authors affirme that beſide one and twentie Gallies taken from the enemies before Conſtantinople, diuers others were taken from them at the ſtreights of the Rhodian Sea, among which were diuers of Syria.

Conſtantinople beſieged againe by Vattaſus.
Vattaſus Nauie put to flight.
Vattaſus dieth.

About the ſame time, at the intreatie of Pope Gregorie, truce was concluded for nine yeares with the Genoueſes. His Holineſſe knowing the little loue which the Emperour Fredericke did beare towards him, thought it much auaileable for his partie, If, after hee had reconciled theſe two the mightieſt people of Italie, hee could oblige them to him by ſome good offices. Whereupon (as it is reported) hee entreated the Venetians to ſend their Ambaſſadours to him to treate of a peace with the Genoueſes: Some ſay that Stephano Iuſtiniano, and Marino Moroſini, were ſent thither; and others ſet downe Giouan Cornari, and Paulo Molino. Diuers Authours affirme, That the matter was debated at the Councell held at Lyons; and others ſay, That the truce was concluded at Rome. Among ſundrie Articles ſet downe for the aſſurance of both parties, it was ſpecially mentioned, That it ſhould not be lawfull for either of them, to purchaſe new enemies, nor yet new alliance, nor to denounce warre againſt any, nor to aid any one, without the mutuall conſent of either partie. The Pope thundered diuers great excommunications againſt thoſe, who, in contempt of that agreement, ſhould doe any thing contrarie to the ſame.

The Articles of the truce betwixt the Venetians and the Genoueſes.

Blondus ſaith, That this treatie was ended before the Venetians ſuccored Conſtan-nople; and by that means they were thought to haue infringed it, whereof afterwards grew such grieuous wars twixt these two people: But neither he nor those which believed this, did consider, that the Venetians did as they ought in bearing Armes against the King of Hexagons and Iohn Vattasius, who inuaded that which belonged vnto them: For the Venetians had purchased right and title in part of Constantinople, whither in the name of the Common-wealth they had beene sent from the beginning, vnto whom to denie aide and helpe in so great a danger, they humbly craving the same, had beene as ill done, as for them to infringe an agreement, how holie soeuer: The Venetians raised the enemies Campe before Constantinople, Because it was iust and reasonable so to doe; seeing it is lawfull for euerie man that hath power and meanes, euer to keepe and defend his owne. For it is as cruell and inhumane a matter to hinder any one from repelling an iniurie done to him, as to wrong an other man. And the Genoueses themselues, if any man should haue inuaded ought that had belonged vnto them, would they haue forborne to take armes, till they had receiued aduise and consent from the Venetians? Besides, it is to be thought that the Genoueses by meanes of this treatie, did deale but craftily with the Venetians. For, imagining that it would come to passe by meanes of this agreement, whereby they held the Venetians bound as with a chaine, that they would delay the aide, either by determining, or making shew to prepare forces, vntill the enemie (whom perhaps they had stirred vp) had taken Constantinople: because they could not draw the Venetians to this follie, they beganne to crie out, as though they had broken the accord so holily sworne to. But so farre off was Pope Gregorie (who was the meanes for the truce) from the least thought that the Venetians had in any thing at that time broken their faith, as on the contrarie he euer remained firme and constant in their friendship and alliance. Nay, moreouer, I find, that about the same time, or soone after, the selfe-same Genoueses did demand aide of the Venetians, as of their faithfull friends and companions, against the Emperour Frederick, and the Pisans, which was freely granted them: But of this wee will speake elsewhere.

The reason why the venetians succoured Constantinople.

It is lawfull for all men to defend their owne.

The craft and subtiltie of the Genoueses.

It is reported that Pope Gregorie, at the beginning of the truce, did request the Venetians and Genoueses, with all the other Potentates of Italie, to take Armes for the recouerie of the holy Land; and that the same had beene done (because they had all freely promised so to doe) had not the Popes sodaine death broke off that notable enterprise. The Venetians at the same time had friendly composed certaine differences betwixt themselues and the Genoueses: diuers Commissioners for the same purpose being sent from either side. But a cruell tyrannie, which had then crept into the Citie, did in a manner interrupt the whole treatie alreadie concluded, which would not haue proued very necessarie, in regard of that which afterward happened.

The Popes intretie to Arme against the Turks.

Eccelin, a man basely descended, and whose grand-father of the same name, comming like a poore Souldier out of Germanie, had followed the Emperour Otho the third into Italie, being made rich and raised to honour by the Emperour Fredericke the second, (whom he very much resembled) did by little and little commit great tyrannie in Italie, whilest Frederick being armed against the Pope, ouer-ranne the greatest part of Italie, and chiefly Lombardie; where diuers famous Cities were greatly vexed, vnder a colour only (as I finde) for that at the beginning of the controuersie betweene Pope Gregorie and Frederick, they had remained Neuters, not taking parts as others did. Eccelin by goodly promises solicited the Paduans, and in hope to preserue their liberties, constrained them to follow the Emperours part. These men vnder a gentle kind of bondage, were soone after held very short by him: who laying vpon them an vnusuall yoke, beganne openly to tyrannize. Then might you haue seene Gentlemen; some led to punishment, and others to prison; from whence being brought forth, they were either condemned to death, or perpetuall banish-

What Eccelin was with his coming into Italie.

Eccelin in Padua

wonderfull cruelties of a Tyrant baniſhment; their goods ſpoiled, Noble Maides, and Matrones rauiſhed and deflou-red: In a word, all deteſtable actions which a proude conquerour is accuſtomed to vſe towards poore captiues, was executed by this new Prince on the wretched Paduans: Diuers fled away for feare; Diuers likewiſe being deſtitute of all meanes, and baniſhed the Citie, with their wiues and children, came to Venice, as to the only Sanctuarie of freedome.

All Lombardie on the other ſide did tremble at the Armies of Frederick. It is reported that Pietro Tepulo, ſonne to the Venetian Prince, commanding certaine troups of Milan againſt Frederick, was vanquiſhed neare to the new Court, and taken priſoner with great loſſe, together with ſundrie men of note. Frederick, in hatred to the Father and to the Venetians, whoſe enemie he was alreadie profeſſed, ſent him firſt to Piſa, and afterwards into Apulia, where (as it is reported) he was miſerably murthered. The Hiſtorians make no mention why hee put him to death in that Prouince. But I thinke, he did it to gratifie thoſe of Apulia, who about the ſame time had beene greatly afflicted by Giouanni Tepulo, brother to Pietro. For the Venetians in the Popes behalfe had ſent fiue and twentie Gallies into Apulia, vnder the command of this Giouanni Tepulo, to inuade the Cities of that Prouince, which tooke part with Frederick. This Tepulo hauing at his arriuall chaced away the Garriſon of the Prouince, ſeized on Thermida, then on Campo Marino, and ſoone after on Beſtica. But whileſt he was buſied in razing and ruining the taken Towne, word was brought him that the Barze, (the goodlieſt ſhippe, which at thoſe daies ſailed on the Seas, carrying a thouſand Souldiers, and which had fought at Sea for Fredericks partie) was entred into the Hauen of Siponto, called at this day Manfredonia; whervpon he ſailed thither with his Gallies, where for his owne aduantage finding the ſhip in the Hauen, hee aſſailed it, tooke it with great eaſe, brake it in peeces, and burnt it in the enemies ſight. For this cauſe it is likely that Frederick ſent Pietro Tepulo to be executed in Apulia. Whileſt theſe things were done abroade, or at leaſt ſoone after, diuers good decrees were enacted in the Citie: They eſtabliſhed firſt the Court of Requeſts, with three Iudges, to decide euery mans controuerſies. And next the ancient Lawes and Statutes of the Citie were examined, and being againe confirmed, were ſet downe in better termes, and reduced into another quantitie. Some Authors referre to theſe times, this ſecond battaile of Giouanni Michaeli, where he defeated with a few Gallies, the great Armie of Vattaſus. Frederick after hee had obtained this victorie at the new Court, in the ſtate of Milan (as wee haue ſaid) where Tepulo was taken priſoner, came to Padua, alreadie ſubiect to the cruell tyrannie of Eccelin, where keeping the Feaſt of Eaſter, newes was brought him, how the Pope had a while before excommunicated him, and all thoſe which followed him, or in any ſort did giue him aſſiſtance: wherewith being incenſed, like a man beſide himſelfe, he forthwith fell on the Venetians Territories, and being come as far as S. Hilaries Church (where a little before Eccelin had builded a Fort in the view of the Venetians) he cut ſhort his iourney, and turning on the right hand, hee marched with ſpeede towards the Tower of Bebia. This Tower for the hard acceſſe thereunto, by reaſon of the water which enuironeth it, did brauely ſuſtaine the enemies aſſault, vntill that a great number of light veſſels being come to the releefe thereof, enforced him to diſlodge.

Pietro Tepulo defeated and taken priſoner.

The Venetians take Fredericke great ſhip, called the Barze or Cethea.

The Court of Requeſts eſtabliſhed

The Pope excommunicateth the Emperour Frederick.

Frederic againſt the venetians,

It is certaine that ſundrie occaſions moued Frederick to warre on the Venetians: For firſt, he would reuenge the iniurie that hee had receiued, by the burning of his Barze, and becauſe the Venetians had made a league with the Pope. But that where with he was moſt moued, was, becauſe he ſaw great numbers of Paduans were retired to Venice for refuge, thereby fearing, if they dwelt ſo neare, the Citie of Padua would not long remaine in the ſame ſtate it then did. And that which makes this ſeeme to be true, is, that at his departure from Padua, hee carried thence with him the chiefeſt and richeſt Citizens, vnder colour of ſending them to the warres, confining them farre from home.

The

The Genoueſes about the ſame time ſent to the Venetians according to their agreement, entreating them ſpeedily to aide them with a nauall Armie, ſaying; That they vnderſtood how the Piſans, aſſiſted by Frederick, had armed more than one hundred Gallies againſt them, and that their affaires could endure no delay, being well aſſured that the enemie would ſoone be with them, with whom they were not reſolued to fight, without the aide of their Confederates. Hereupon the Venetians ſpeedily ſet forth threeſcore Gallies; which being giuen in charge to Andrea Tepulo (who was the Dukes ſonne likewiſe) he was commanded to make haſt to the ſuccor of their friends. This man ſayling directly to Pola, condemned the Polans in a pecuniarie fine, for not furniſhing a Galley which they were bound to doe, and did beſides beate downe a part of their walls. From thence with a faire winde hee ſailed to Durazzo, where he vnderſtood that the Armie of Frederick, and the Piſans, was defeated by the Genoueſes, neare to the Iſle of Cyrna. At theſe newes Andrea returned to Pola. For he had notice that the Polans ſoone after his departure were reuolted from the Venetians; whereupon, at his arriuall hee recouered it, ſpoiled, and razed it.

Andrea Tepulo ſent to aide the Genoueſes.

The Citie of Pola taken and ruined.

The fifth rebellion of Zara.

Zara likewiſe remained not long in quiet; for ſoone after that the Armie was returned to Venice, it reuolted the fifth time, and chaced away Giouanni Michaeli their Gouernour: For the recouerie whereof a mightie Armie was appointed, and fiue and fortie Veſſels were armed, whereof fiue and twentie were Gallies, and the reſt ſhips of burthen. Rayniero Zeno was made Generall of the Armie, who arriuing with his forces in Dalmatia, came and beſieged this ſo often-rebellious Citie: where after he had ſtaied two whole Moneths, and executed ſundrie exploits, the ſtubbornneſſe of the Inhabitants being qualified, at laſt they yeelded.

Zara recouered.

The Citie being recouered, they concluded to ſend Ambaſſadours to the King of Hungarie. Whereupon ſoone after Stephano Iuſtiniano, and Pietro Dandulo, were ſent thither. Theſe men dealt in ſuch ſort with King Bella, as hee renounced and made ouer to the Venetians all the right which himſelfe or any other Kings of Hungarie might pretend to that Citie; and becauſe this deede of his might be more firme and authenticall, they would haue it to be ſet downe in writing.

The agreement with the King of Hungarie for Zara.

At this ſtay ſtood the affaires of the Venetians, when Prince Tepulo deceaſed, in the twentieth yeare of his gouernement. He was honourably buried in the Church of S. Iohn and S. Paul the Twinnes.

¶ Marino Morosini, the 44. Duke of Venice.

Marino

Marino Moroſini ſucceeded him, by a new manner of election, according to ſome Authors. We haue ſet downe the forme of the Princes election vſed till thoſe daies; which was indeede without deceit, and ſuch, as if they, who liued in thoſe times, had beene ambitious, it would haue eaſily miniſtred occaſion to them to haue done much euill. But that which hath followed ſince, is much more certaine than that ancient manner, and much more different. For firſt of all, when queſtion is of electing a Prince: before the Electors come to any caſting of lots, fiue men, appointed for this purpoſe, doe in the name of the Common-wealth acquaint the future Prince with that which he is to obſerue, as well concerning his owne dignitie, as for the honour and profit of the Common-wealth. For of neceſſitie the ſame muſt bee publiſhed in the great Councell, and be approued by them. After his approbation, all thoſe who haue attained to the age of thirtie yeares, are commanded to come to the generall aſſembly: There, as many little round white Balls, as there bee Gentlemen in the Roome, are caſt into a great veſſell, among which are mingled thirtie that be gilded: I meane, that being ſo mingled together they make vp the iuſt number of the aſſiſtants, there being neither more nor leſſe than they were in number at the beginning. Then being called in order, euery man draweth forth one, and thoſe which haue lighted on the gilded ones, are led into another chamber neare to the ſame: And this is called the firſt lot of the thirtie Balls: Then againe they put thirtie Balls into a Veſſell, to anſwere the number of thoſe who firſt drew, nine whereof are gilded, and thoſe nine who draw the golden ones, doe name fortie men, whereupon theſe men be called the Electors of the firſt election. Theſe fortie thus named, returne againe to the lot, after they haue put as many Balls into the Veſſell, twelue whereof are gilded: the twelue of this number that draw thoſe are called the ſecond Electors. Theſe men name fiue and twentie, who againe draw as many Balls, nine whereof are gilded, and the reſt white: Theſe nine which haue drawen the gilded ones chooſe fortie fiue, who returning againe to the lot, draw out of the whole number eleuen gilded ones, & they which light on them, doe laſt of all name one and fortie, which haue abſolute power to elect the Duke and Soueraigne Magiſtrate of the Common-wealth.

The forme of electing the Venetian Princes.

Sabellicus ſaith, That he learned this manner of election (for there is no mention heereof left in writing by any Authors) of Benedicto Treuiſano, whom he accompanied from Venice, at ſuch time as he was ſent to be the Magiſtrate at Verona. Hee learned then of him, that theſe one and fortie Authors of the Princes election, doe ſhut themſelues vp in that part of the Pallace, where the Senate doth commonly meete euerie day: and then at their entring in, they chooſe three among them, exceeding the reſt in age and authoritie, as Princes of the whole aſſemblie, whom they name Priors, vnto whom after they haue giuen the chiefeſt place, the reſt of the companie diuide themſelues into foure parts, from whence they are called one by one to giue their voices, and it is lawfull for euerie of them to chooſe in what place of the foure he will be.

Benedicto Treuiſano.

Now thoſe that be called from anie one of the foure parts (for that it is not materiall) come before theſe three, euerie one carrying in his hand a little folded ſcrole, wherein is written the name of him whom they chooſe for Duke. They lay them all downe in a certaine place, and returning to their ſeats, two Secretaries who ſtand before theſe Priors, doe in their preſence read, how many voices euerie of them hath. The names of them that are appointed for voyces are put into a cap, and being well mingled together, they are drawne forth one by one at all aduentures, and according as they are drawne, they are likewiſe in the ſame order with their ſuffrages afterwards committed to lots. But this lot is not ſo much for the creation of the Duke, as to know how euerie man ſtands affected. Now, thoſe names being gathered vp in order, are againe put together; then they begin to caſt lots for him, who by chance is firſt drawne, who if he be in the companie, is forthwith commanded to depart, and to withdraw himselfe into a place not farre from thence. But before they come to cast lots, those that be there present are demaunded, whether any of them can alleadge any matter against him for whom they are readie to cast lots, and it is lawful for euerie man freely to speake his mind. If there be then any one who will taxe him with some crime, he riseth vp, and declareth all that he knowes against him, which may make him vnworthie of such a dignitie: This man as faultie is called forth of that secret place before the Lords, who commaund him to purge himselfe if he can of that which is obiected against him, which hauing done, he is sent backe againe to that priuate place. Then they aske againe if any man will impugne that which he hath spoken, & in the same manner as often as he is taxed with any thing, hee is called to iustifie himselfe. But we haue learned, that vpon one or two iustifications at the most, the whole matter is concluded.

to

Thus after he hath made his last excuse, they begin againe to cast lots for him, and they cast into vessels, one for the consent, and the other for the refusal, their smal bals marked with a certaine caracter to auoid deceit. Then they heedfully reckon the balles of the consent, which if they amount to the number of fiue and twentie, he for whom they drew is declared Prince, if they are lesse, they fall to cast lots for him, who was drawne for the second place. Against him likewise, and so the rest, it is lawfull for euerie man to speake what he thinketh good, and the like for him to to refute their accusations: and this man shall be Prince, if the number appointed for the voices be full, if not, they proceed to the third, then to the fourth, and so to all the rest. He saith, That it is a rare matter if the Duke be not created at this first Scrutino, as they call it. And therfore if by chance there proue no creation at the first time, the first voices are crossed out, & after proceede to new casting of lots for those which are shut vp in the same manner as we haue said. And the same is reiterated vntill such time as they haue a new Duke.

Since when the forme of electing the Prince hath beene in vse.

This is that which Sabellicus hath set downe, vnder the authoritie of so notable a man, concerning the Princes election, which I haue of purpose mentioned, to the end that all men may know what was the ancient manner, and what the new forme now is of electing the Venetian Princes, whereof we haue hitherto spoken, and shal hereafter speake as occasion is offered: As also because that Morosini was the first that was created in this sort. But howsoeuer this manner of election were then or since in vse, it is certaine that the Venetians haue of a long time obserued it in the creation of their soueraigne Magistrate.

The Popes Legate commeth to Venice against Eccelin.

Now to returne to Morosini his gouernment: In his time Philippo Fontano Bishop of Rauenna, came (as some Authors say) to Venice, as Legate from Pope Gregory or (according to others) from Pope Alexander, who vsing spirituall Armour propounded euerlasting life as recompense for all those who should take Armes with him against the tirant Eccelin, who was proclaimed enemie to the Church of Rome. Eccelin at the same time laid straight siege to Mantua: Philippo to breake his forces, determined with such troups as he could leuie to trouble and disquiet those townes which he had possessed. Diuers men being called to so holy an enterprise by so great a recompence, came and met him at Venice: But the Venetians power did greatly further the businesse. For besides the great number of souldiers wherewith they furnished Philippo, they relieued him with Armour, ships, and victuals, and they generally caused all necessaries to be carried speedily to the camp, which they thought to be expedient for the warres and besieging of townes.

An Armie at Venice against Eccelin.

The Armie departed from Bebia, (which was the Rendez-vous for all the troups) to march against the enemie, and came on a sodaine to Corregiola. Ansedin nephew to Eccelin, and gouernour of Padua, was alreadie come thither with certaine troupes, who being aduertised of what had passed at Venice, had caused the ordinarie course of the riuers Brente and Bacchillion, to be turned backe, so as he did in a manner draw drie all the lakes which were neere thereabouts being wont to be filled by the flowing of those riuers, to the end the Venetian ships might not come

The riuers Brent & Bacchillion turned backwards.

neere

neere the firme Land to Land the Armie. This did in ſome ſort make the Nauigation more difficult. For when they came to the mouth of Corregiola finding the ancient channell almoſt without water, and ſo ſhallow as it could not beare any great veſſels, they were conſtrained to vſe ſmall boates & barks. In them they paſſed ouer firſt the Archers to beate back the enemies which ſtood vpon the bancks oppoſite againſt them; and afterwards they landed the reſidue of the Armie, which marched directly to the citie of Sacco, which being ſtrengthned by Anſedin with a ſtrong Garriſon was valiantly defended.

The Biſhop of Rauenna did on a ſodaine raiſe his Campe, and ſeized on ſome ſmall townes not farre from thence, Anſedin beng aduertiſed thereof, after he had committed the guard of Sacco to the Towneſ-men, came ſpeedily to Padua. Philippo and the Venetians hauing receiued the Sacceans vpon their faithfull promiſe, purſued the enemie. Padua at their arriuall was ſo ſodainely aſſailed, as they had (in a manner) taken all the ſuburbes of the crooked bridge, ere they in the Citie heard the aſſault. Philippo and the Venetians, waxing more hardie by this fortunate ſucceſſe, did more furiouſly aſſaile the enemie at the Port Altina. The Paduans bluſhing to ſee ſo excellent a citie, ſo fully furniſhed with men and all neceſſaries, to bee loſt by their fault, beganne couragiouſly to reſiſt the enemie. The fight was eager on both ſides: theſe men fought for their countrie, the other for renowne: the loue to their countrie did animate the one, and the hope of victorie the others. At the laſt the obſtinacie of the Towneſ-men being ouercome, the citie was entred by force at that gate. Whereupon Anſedin thinking all loſt, fled with certaine of his friends on the other ſide of the citie. His flight being knowne, the towne was forthwith yeelded. The caſtle which at this day is to be ſeene in one part of the citie, within foure daies after did the like.

Sacco taken by the Legate and the venetians.
An Aſſault giuen to Padua.
The flight of Anſedin.
Padua taken.

Eccelin all this while being ignorant of what was done at Padua, and ſeeing that he loſt his time before Mantua, reſolued to bring backe his troupes to Verona. Hee forthwith therefore raiſed his ſiege, and camped on the Riuer Myncia, where hee had determined to tarrie three dayes. But he was conſtrained to alter his purpoſe vpon the newes of the loſſe of Padua, which he little expected. And albeit it did greatly mooue him, yet kept he his griefe verie ſecret, diſſembling it vntil he came to Verona, whither after theſe newes he marched by great iournies. But being entred into it with his troupes, he did commit (as it is reported) incredible crueltie. For by ſundrie exquiſite torments he put twelue thouſand Paduans to death which were in his Armie, who were not mercenarie men, or of the common ſort, but all Gentlemen, and ſome of them of great account. We find not that euer any man did the like, (except Cornelius Scilla) in ſlaughtering at one time ſo many men ſubiected vnder his obedience. Of whom it is reported, That at one time and place he put twelue thouſand Preneſtines to death, becauſe they had fauoured Marius partie, not pardoning any one of ſo great a number, but onely one that had beene his Hoſte: who perceiuing by that meanes the flower and choiſe of his countrey to bee extinct, did boldly refuſe his mercie; and in ſaying that he would not thanke him for that curteſie, he caſt himſelfe into the throng of thoſe who were put to execution.

Eccelin before Mantua.
Eccelin his crueltie againſt the Paduans.
Twelue thouſand Pueneſtines ſlaine by Sylla in cold bloud.
A Noble courage of a Preniſtine.

It is not to be thought ſtrange, or vntrue which we haue deliuered touching ſo many thouſands of men at one time ſent forth of Padua to the warres: For it is certaine by the teſtimonie of a verie credible Author, That there hath beene reckoned at times in Padua foure hundred families, all Gentlemen; and that which is more, ſixſcore thouſand men ſent thereout to the warres at one time.

Eccelin, after the maſſacre of the Paduans, hauing ſhut vp with great Rampiers a little belowe Vincenza the Riuer Bacchillion, diuided it into diuers ſtreames, and by that diuiſion he made the Citie more ſtronge, and made diuers vſes of it, chiefely for Milles. The Biſhop of Rauenna on the other ſide cauſed a great ditch to bee made round about the walles of Padua, and by that meanes in ſuch ſort fortified the the Citie as it needed no more to feare the attempts of Eccelin. Then he marched ſodainely being well accompanied, to that place where the Riuer Bacchilion was ſhut vp: The Gouernour of Vincenza, equall to the Biſhop both in ſtrength and courage, ſallied with the troupes which Eccelin had left there in Garriſon. The fight beganne ſpeedily and held out long time without certaine knowledge which ſide had the better. But word being brought in the heat of the skirmiſhe, that the Rampiers of the floud were broken downe, and that the Riuer with great force was returned into the ancient channell, the Biſhop ſodainely ſounded the retraite. Diuers warlike attemps were afterwards performed on either ſide, but they are not fitting to be here ſet downe.

Some Authors affirme that the Pope, in acknowledgement of the aide and ſuccour which the Venetians ſent him in his action, graunted them that the Deane of Saint Markes golden Church ſhould in high ſolemnities, vſe a Mitre and paſtorall ſtaffe, which none of their predeceſſours could euer till then obtaine. The Prince being oppreſſed with age, after hee had fortunately gouerned the Common-wealth, deceaſed the fourth yeare of his gouernment. His bodie was buried at the entry into the golden Church. Rainicro Zeni was named Prince in his ſted.

* * *

The end of the ninth Booke of the first Decad.

THE TENTH BOOKE OF THE FIRST DECAD OF THE HISTORIE Of Venice.

¶ The contents of the tenth Booke of the first Decad.

THE occasion of the first warre against the Genoueſes is handled in this tenth Booke. Why the Venetians did ſeize on the Citie of Acre. The Venetians victorie against the Genoueſes betweene Acre and Tyre. Aide ſent by the Venetians to BALDVVIN Emperour of Conſtantinople. PALEOLOGVS ſeizeth on the Greeke Empire, and expells BALDVVIN. The Genoueſes take three Venetian ſhipps at the Boſphorus of Thrace. The Venetians deſeate the Genoueſes, and take foure ſhippes from them neere to the Hauen, called the ſeauen Swine. The Venetians beſiege Tyre in vaine. MICHAEL DORIA taketh certaine Venetian ſhippes at the going out of the Adriaticke Sea. The notable victorie of the Venetians ouer the Genoueſes in the view of the Sicilians neere to Trapani. PALEOLOGVS in league with the Venetians. Genoueſes take Sydonia in the Iſle of Candie. A popular tumult in the Citie, wherein the Prince is wronged. Eight Gallies of Genoa taken neere to Cyprus, which are brought to Venice The Venetians victorie againſt the Genoueſes in Syria at the ſame place almoſt where they wanne the firſt victorie. The Venetians are denied victuailes by their neighbours. Truce with the Genoueſes: warre with thoſe of Bologna almoſt for three yeares ſpace at the mouth of the Riuer Po. Warre likewiſe againſt thoſe of Ancona for the impoſtes at Sea. The Common-wealth hath a new warre by reaſon of the troubles in Candie. The rebellion of thoſe of Cape Hiſtria. The Acoonitans, after the Venetians had driuen them from Sea, haue recourſe to the Pope. A great Earthquake in the Citie: diuers incounters in Hiſtria for a while againſt the Patriarche of Aquileia, and the Prince of Goritia. The Citie of Acre is ruinated and ouerthrowne by the King of Babylon.

¶ RAINIERI ZENO, the 45. Duke of Venice.

The Citie of Ptolomais called Acre.

THERE was in Phænicia (one of the Prouinces of the Kingdome of Siria) betweene mount Carmell and Sydon, a Citie in times past verie famous, called at first Ptolomais, afterwards Acon, by a more vsuall name. Some Venetian Historians haue set downe Acre for Acon, following therein the vulgar, who so call it. The Venetians, at such time as the Christians tooke Hierusalem, with a part of Syria, had by an agreement purchased a kinde of title in that Citie; and not the Venetians alone, but likewise the Genoueses and Pisans, who sent nauall Armies for the assistance of that warre. Now the Venetians and Genoueses had in the same Citie a Church common to them both, albeit they had otherwise a particular place and street a-part. These being first prouoked with iealouzie and afterward with mortal hatred, beganne to striue about the possession of the same Church.

The originall of the warre betwixt the Venetians and Genoueses.

The Venetians alleaged, That by couenant made with Baldwin not onely a street, but the third part of the Citie belonged to them, and so consequently that Church was theirs which was dedicated to Saint Saba. The Genoueses insisted on the contrarie, not yeelding either to the couenants or to their fellowes; and there was likelihood that some great mischiefe might befall the affaires of the Christians in Syria in regard of that contention. But to take away all occasion of future diuision, the whole matter was referred to Pope Alexander the fourth, who louing equitie as well as peace, did forthwith conclude, That seeing the diuine seruice was common to them both, the Church likewise ought to be so. The Genoueses hauing notice of the Popes sentence sooner than the Venetians, presuming on the good will which Philip of Montfort a French-man by Nation, did beare vnto them, who was Gouernour of the Citie, they came not staying for the Popes answere, and seized on the place, and speedily fortified it in manner of a Castle. Philip also vnto whome the Venetians complained, was so farre off from redressing the same, as on the contrarie, vpon their speech, That the third part of the Citie belonged vnto them, he commanded them (to giue the people contentment) to depart thence.

Their difference referred to the Pope.

The Popes sentence.

The Venetians commaunded to leaue Acre.

The

The Venetians, diſdaining to digeſt ſuch an iniurie, made a ſpeedie league with Manfred, King of Sicill, againſt the Genoueſes; But whileſt they were buſied in preparing their Armie, the Prince of Antioch, and the Patriarke of Ieruſalem, did ſharply by their letters rebuke Philip, counſailing him to gouerne himſelfe more diſcreetly; and aſſured him, that if the Venetians were not reconciled to the Genoueſes, from whom they were ſeuered by his pride and their owne, the affaires of Chriſtendome were like to receiue a great affront in Syria, by reaſon of that quarrell. The Venetians vnderſtanding the ſmall account that Philip made of thoſe aduertiſements, and that it was certaine, that he would not change his determination, either for admonitions or threats, but that he would continue willfull in the hatred which he had already conceiued; They being wholly impatient by reaſon of the hainouſneſſe of the matter, ſet preſently forth thirtie Gallies well prouided, which they had in readineſſe at the ſame time in the Hauen of Tyre. The Venetian Hiſtorians ſay, That they were ſent from Italie, vnder the command of Lorenzo Tepulo; and that comming to the Hauen of Ptolomais, after they had broken the chaine which ſhut it in, they furiouſly charged three and twentie Genoueſes ſhips of burthen, and two Gallies, being there by chance in the harbour, which were as eaſily taken as vnawares aſſailed; and that afterwards hauing deſpoiled them of all their tackling, they burnt them all in a moment. With the ſame violence likewiſe they came to S. Saba's Church, which the Genoueſes had fortified, the which being likewiſe taken, was for the moſt part ruined.

Acre taken by the Venetians.

Whereupon the Genoueſes, rather incenſed than daunted with this loſſe, hauing armed two and thirtie Gallies at Tyre, came to meete with the Venetian Nauie; but it was in vaine. For the Venetians leauing the Syrian warres, for the care which they had of the affaires of Greece, ſailed into the Pontick Sea, to the aide of their Countrie-men, which dwelt in Conſtantinople, whom the warres of Vuttaſius had entangled. In the meane time the newes of that which had beene done in Ptolomais, being come into Italie, did in ſuch ſort ſtirre vp the Genoueſes, who alreadie did not greatly affect the Venetians, as they reſolued to leuie a mightie Armie, to reuenge this wrong: Therefore, after they had armed fortie Gallies, and ten Argozies, they ſent them into Syria.

The Genoueſes reſolution.

The Venetians likewiſe in Italie fore-ſeeing the dangerous warre, which they were to make with the Genoueſes, did with a meruailous ſpeede arme fifteene Gallies, and ten ſhips of burthen, of which Andrea Zeno was made Generall; And with like celeritie, thoſe Venetians which were in Ptolomais made readie about fortie leſſer ſhips, commonly called Vaccetes, and ten Argozies.

At this ſtay ſtood the affaires of the Venetians and Genoueſes in Syria, when in Italie Pope Alexander, vpon tidings what had paſſed at Ptolomais, and conſidering how great either of their forces were, & that by their mortal hatred, ſome horrible miſchiefe was threatned thoſe Chriſtians which at that time were in Syria, had an eſpeciall care to giue audience to both their Ambaſſadours ſent to him for that purpoſe, and for that cauſe would needes haue the Piſans to be preſent at that audience, whoſe Ambaſſadours he had ſent for out of Tuſcan, to be as it were Vmpiers, and Procurers of the peace, betwixt theſe two people. And (without doubt) by the Popes mediation peace would ſoone haue enſued, if they had not in the meane time fought together in Syria. The newes of this encounter did greatly trouble the deſeignes of the Pope. For ſo ſoone as both the Armies arriued in Syria, the Venetians albeit they kept a ſtrong Garriſon in Acre, had not forſaken Tyre, where the Genoueſes and Philip Montfort remained, who vndoubtedly would haue offered violence to the Venetians which held a part thereof, had not the Gouernour of the Citie expreſly forbidden any attempt whatſoeuer, within the circuit of the Citie, or in the Hauen. But the condition of the Venetians ſeemed in ſome ſort better: who alone held Acre, and yet neuertheleſſe had not abandoned that which they poſſeſſed in Tyre.

The Popes diligence to make peace betwixt the Venetians & the Genoueſes.

The treatie of peace broken.

Wiſedome of the Gouernour.

The Genoueſes hereat being more incenſed, came on a ſodaine forth of the hauen, and ſailed directly towards Ptolomais. Andrea Zeno and Lorenzo Tepulo, Generals of the Venetian Armie, being aduertized of the enemies proceeding (for diuers Venetians were in Tyre, as hath beene ſaid, mingled among the enemies) imagined the truth, to wit, That the Genoueſes meaning was to come thither, thinking in the ſame manner to ſurprize them, as their owne men had beene of late ſurpriſed by the Venetians. For which cauſe on a ſodaine they drew all their veſſells forth of the hauen, ſo as theſe two mightie fleets met one with another. Vpon the firſt kenning of each other, they quickly put themſelues in order of battaile, and then ranne furiouſly one vpon another, being armed indeed more with hatred than with force; after which enſued a bloudie fight. But the Venetians from the beginning of the fight had the moſt aduantage, as being the ſtronger, and greatly fortified by the aide of the Piſans, with whom they were then in league; In the end the enemies being broken and defeated, and diuers of their Gallies ſunke and taken, to the number of fiue and twentie: the reſt trembling with feare eſcaped to Tyre. The Venetian brought backe his victorious Armie to Ptolomais, dragging after him the taken Gallies, and ſome thouſands of Genoueſes.

The Genoueſes defeated by the Venetians.

This notable loſſe of the enemies did not yet appeaſe the Venetians furie, but on the contrarie did the more inflame it: For that ſoone after this victorie they ouer-threw all the buildings, as well publicke as priuate, which the Genoueſes poſſeſſed in Acre: they ſpoiled their ſtore-houſes and moueables, and expelled at the laſt their Criers and Beadles, with their other Officers, and all other ſignes of their ancient fortunes, which they had till then enioyed in that Citie.

Moreouer, two thouſand ſixe hundred Genoueſes who were taken in the fight, and brought thither (as hath beene ſaid) were by them made Galley-ſlaues. It is reported that the Pope was greatly troubled with theſe newes; and that he would not diſmiſſe the Ambaſſadours of Genoa, who were called home after the loſſe of the battaile, till the Venetians had granted, that all the Genoueſes Souldiers which were taken priſoners, ſhould be ſet at libertie.

Thus were the Venetians affaires entangled in Syria, whileſt in Greece they were little better, being now vexed by the Greekes, then by Vattaſius, and another while by Theodore his ſonne. For the power of Baldwin was ſo decaied, as if the Venetians had not at times come into the Pontick Sea to bring him aide, the Greeke Empire would not ſo long haue remained in the hands of the French-men: which they hauing often done at other times, did not ceaſe to continue, ſo ſoone as they were become Maſters of Ptolomais, notwithſtanding their cruell war with the Genoueſes. For they ſailed into Greece, as forgetting their affaires in Syria, to giue Baldwin timely ſuccours. But vpon newes of the death of Theodore, which was thought to haue happened opportunely for the quiet of Greece, the Venetians returned into Syria, whither they were called by ſundrie meſſengers.

The power of the French much decaied in Greece.

The death of Theodore ſonne to Vattaſius.

In the meane time, Michael ſurnamed Paleologus, who was left Protector of Theodore his children, with the abſolute gouernement of the Empire, had at the beginning giuen hope to all men of a happie peace: For he made ſhew to bee contented, and highly to reſpect the children, and to preſerue and defend that which Theodore had left them. But ſoone after, hee did not only defeat Baldwins forces, but wholly chaſed them thence: whereunto, how, and by what meanes he attained, I will briefly ſet downe. Yet I will make mention by the way of that which ſome Authors doe report, to wit, That Theodore did not leaue Paleologus as Protector to his children, but one named Gregorie Imiſole, whom Paleologus cauſed to be ſlaine, as hee was hearing diuine ſeruice, and that hauing by his death taken vpon him the charge of the children (for beſides his neare kindred, hee had euer ſhewed himſelfe a faithfull friend to the late Theodore) ſo ſoone as he had aſſured his owne eſtate, hee cauſed them miſerably to be put to death.

Michael Paleologus.

Great treachery of a Greeke.

This man being inſtalled Protector, begatne the warre againſt William, King of Achaia, William Prince of Achaia.

Achaia; a French-man by nation; and he ceaſed not to purſue him till hee had conſtrained him to fight, wherein being ouercome, and taken, he confined him to priſon. Being proud of this victorie, hee came & aſſailed Baldwin. The Emperour being aduertiſed that his enemie approached with his forces, reſolued to guard the ſtreights of the Ponticke ſea, and to driue him if it were poſſible, far from the hauen. So ſoone therefore as he had prepared a nauall Armie, with the greateſt forces that he could leuie, he gaue the command therof to Marco Gradonico the Venetian, who was then Magiſtrate in Conſtantinople, determining either to hazard all or elſe to diuert that haughtie enemie from his purpoſe. For being deſperate of all aide, he knew not by what inuention elſe he could bee able to keep Conſtantinople, hauing beene till then ſo extremely impoueriſhed, firſt by Iohn Vattaſius, and after by Theodore his ſucceſſour, as hee was enforced to Pawne Philip his ſonne (who had afterwards committed to ward in Venice) to the Merchants of Bruges, who was lent him a great ſumme of money, & to ſell the gutters and couerings of leade of the publike buildings and the pretious relicks of Saints: ſo great was his want of money.

To what extremitie Baldwin was brought.

Thus being compaſſed with miſeries, and almoſt diſtracted, he ſent all his forces, to the guard of the ſtraite and paſſages of the Sea, not leauing any garriſon in the Citie. But whileſt he ſought meanes to keepe out a forraine enemie, he was ouerthrowne by domeſticke treacherie. For certaine Greekes (who by nature were light-headed and inconſtant) being wearied with ſo many miſeries, (or rather as I thinke glutted with the French gouernment) thinking that for want of a garriſon in the Citie, they might eaſily deliuer the ſame to the enemie, ſent diuers whom they might truſt to treate with Palcologus, and to will him to come at a certaine houre of the night, with what forces he beſt pleaſed, promiſing that without doubt they would bring him in, and make him maſter of the Citie without the loſſe of any one man. Paleologus would not ſlip ſuch an occaſion, but came about midnight, with great troupes of ſouldiers through by-waies for feare of deſcrying. Hee was no ſooner come to the walles, but the traitors receiued him into the Citie, without the ſlaughter of any one except of thoſe which had the guard of the gate. Baldwin, and Pantaleon Iuſtinian the Patriarch, being awaked at the firſt noiſe of the ſurpriſe, in great feare fled to Euripus, called at this day the ſtrait of Nigrepont, with certaine of their friends, carrying with them the moſt rich, and precious things, that ſo ſodaine a nightlie terrour would permit them, where taking ſhip, they ſailed thence with a direct courſe to Nigrepont.

Treachery of the Greeks againſt the French.

Paleologus taketh Conſtantinople.

Some Authors ſay, that Baldwin and his troupes were abſent when Paleologus tooke the Citie. But whether he were there or no, it is certaine that the Citie of Conſtantinople was loſt in this manner the eight and fiftie yeare, (or as others ſay) the threeſcore and third yeare after it was taken by the Venetians and French-men. The Venetians diſpatched meſſengers with ſpeed to the Pope; and Baldwin ſent to Lewis the French King: but no aide was either giuen or denied by any of them both. Yet notwithſtanding, in regard it was very likely that Paleologus would not ſtand ſtill in ſo faire & euen a way, they concluded to ſend Marco Michaeli with eighteene gallies to guard the Iſlands, & all the Sea-coaſts, with expreſſe charge not to let ſlip fit occaſion to diſturbe Paleologus. The which was ſo valiãtly executed, & with ſuch dexteritie, as all men did aſſuredly beleeue, that Paleologus was at the point to leaue Conſtantinople in deſpair, had not the Genoueſes in hatred to the Venetians readily offered him their aid. For hauing made a league together they ſent their whole armie out of Syria into Greece, which of a certain was much more ſtrong and mightie than that wherewith they fought betwixt Tyre and Acre.

The Venetians ſend a fleete to guard the Iſlãds

Paleologus ready to leaue Conſtantinople.

The Genoueſes league with Paleologus.

Paleologus truſting to his owne forces, attempted to enlarge the bounds of his Empire towards Morea: And the better to effect it, he ſet William at libertie, (who as we haue ſaid was by him impriſoned after his defeate) on condition to deliuer the Citie of Epidauro in Morea into his hands (ſo was this Citie called in olde time which ſtandeth almoſt in the middeſt of Greece, called at this day, by corruption ruption of the language Maluasia) being assured, that with this Citie he would greatly molest the Venetians by sea and land. But the Venetians hauing notice thereof, with little difficultie drew William to their partie, and sware perpetual friendship with him, who serued them afterward verie faithfully in this warre. They sent moreouer eight and thirtie Gallies with supplies, to their Armie which was alreadie in Grecia.

William Prince of Achaia, ſet at libertie.

The Citie of Epidauro called at this day Malualia.

The leagne of Achaia with the venetians.

But whilest this mightie Armie was preparing against Paleologus, diuers ships of warre at sundrie times departed from Venice; as ships of burthen fit for the fight, and Gallies well appointed, not so much for the guard of their owne frontiers, as to spoile whatsoeuer they could find belõging to the enemy, & to frustrate his atempts. Which happened at the same time when that great ship called the Lion, which had two hundred marriners, and an hundred souldiers in her departing from Venice with two Gallies, met neere to Tenedos with twentie Gallies of Genoa, which in steed of flying from she gaue chase vnto, & pursued them almost to Constantinople. It was not long after when that great fleet of thirtie seuen Gallies sent with supplies (as aforesaid) arriued in Greece, where they met by chance on the Sea of Thessalonica with threescore saile of Greekes and Genouoses, who durst not meddle with them. Neither would the Venetians assaile them, in regard of their great multitudes; but passing quietly by them, they came into the Isle of Nigrepont, the which for the most part was possessed by the Venetians, after they had driuen thence Anfosius, bastard (as some say) to Fredericke the third, King of Sicily, who hauing a part thereof by contract of marriage with Marulla, daughter to Boniface of Verona, held the partie of Paleologus.

The venetians in the isle of Negrepont.

The enemies fleete sailing forth of the Sea of Thessalonica met with three Venetian ships of warre neere to the Bosphorus of Thrace, returning from scouring the Seas, almost as farre as Constantinople. These ships being taken, all the prisoners which fell to the Genoueses were forthwith murthered, and they which happened on Paleologus, had their eyes plucked out. The Venetian nauie feeling winter draw on, and the enemie not stirre, returned to Venice. About the beginning of the next Spring, Gilberto Dandulo departed from Venice with two and thirty Gallies, and being come into Greece, met vpon the way neere the hauen called the Seauen swine, the same fleete of Genoueses which the Venetians the yeare past durst not deale withall, as they came forth of the Bosphorus to spoile whatsoeuer they could light on belonging to the Venetians. Being come in sight one of another, they presently put themselues in order of battaile readie to fight, running one vpon another with great furie. The fight was verie sharpe at the encounter, but it lasted not long, by reason of the smal number of the vessels, neither was it verie bloudie. For the Genoueses with losse of foure of their ships escaped away by strength of their oares, putting themselues into the hauen of Maluasia. But the Genoueses soone after made their losse good, by the sodaine surprisall of three Venetian ships, laden with victuals and munition.

Cruelties of the Greeks & Genoueses.

Now albeit the maine warre was neere to the Islands of the Ægean Sea, and along the coast which runneth from Morea to the straite of Gallipolis, yet the affaires of Syria were not altogether quiet. For all the Italians (in a manner) that were in Ierusalem did so much fauour the Venetians in Acre, as it was plainly seene, that they did more affect them than they did the Genoueses: whereas on the contrarie, those of Tyre held altogether for the Genoueses. By this meanes all the Christians which were then in Syria, were diuided in factions one against another for the partie of these two mightie people: and those Cities which in times past had beene with so much labour and bloud freed from the cruell Empire of Mahomet, were in an instant by this vnnaturall warre filled with murther and sedition. Neuertheless the Venetians that they might not seeme careless of what more neerly concerned them the third or fourth yeare (according to some Authors) of this first Genoan warr, set forth fiftie Gallies, or (as some say) seuen and thirtie against their enemies the

The Genoueses put to flight.

The Christians in Syria diuided into factions in regard of the Venetians and Genoueses.

Genoueses

Genoueſes, who being come into the maine directed their courſe to Sicily where the Genoan fleet was reported to ride. And not finding the enemie there, they ſailed into Syria, where neere to Tyre they tooke an Argozie of the enemies. After this they entred the hauen, determining to force the Citie: But Andrea Barofio, a diſcreet and valiant Captaine was gouernour of the towne, who although the Venetians had ſent to Ptolomais for ſupplies to girt the Citie with a ſtreighte ſiege, both by ſea and land, did neuertheleſſe with the garriſon thereof verie brauely defend it.

A new venetian fleete in Syria.

Tyre beſieged by the venetians.

The Genoueſes in the meane time were not idle: For vnderſtanding by their ſpies, that a great ſhip called the Strong Caſtle, with ten other ſhips of burthen laden with marchandize, were to come forth of the hauen of Venice, bound for Aſia, they lay in ambuſh for them behinde a Rocke at the iſſue of the Adriaticke Gulph. But the marchants being thereof aduertized by a ſmall boate which went before for diſcouerie, affrighted with the newes, made preſently to land. And vnlading their ſhips on the ſhoare, where lay a garriſon of Albanians, they left the emptie veſſels to the enemie, who perceiuing themſelues diſcouered, and knowing the Venetians meaning, forſooke their ambuſh, and ſhewed themſelues. Some hiſtorians affirme that Michael Doria commaunded that Genoan fleete, and how they fought at Sea, as alſo that the Venetians truſting to the ſtrength and greatnes of an Argozey returned to Venice, after they had loſt the other ſhips laden with marchandize.

The Genoueſes ambuſh diſcouered.

The Venetians in ſted of being diſcouraged at this loſſe, were the more animated to reuenge; ſo as not long after they ſent Giacomo Dandulo into Dalmatia with ſeuen Gallies, with full power (If it ſhould be expedient for the Common-wealth) to ioine with thoſe whom hee ſhould finde there for the guard of the Iſlands. Whereupon after he had taken three from Zara, hee ſailed into the Sea of Sicilie, where receiuing three other Gallies of Candie, and not long after foure from Nigrepont, ſtrengthened with theſe ſupplies hee ſailed to Raguſa, where hee met Marco Gradonico with tenne Gallies; Theſe two fleetes beeing ioined together, ſailed into Sicilie; where after they had coaſted all that part of the Iſland, which looketh towards the Eaſt, and almoſt all that which lieth from Mount Pachino toward the South, they tooke neere to Lilibeum three Genoa-Gallies conducted by Lanfranc of Bourbon. This loſſe beeing reported at Genoa, eight and twentie Gallies were ſodainly ſet forth, to reuenge this iniurie; who ſailing into Sicilie with a direct courſe to meete the enemie, found the Venetians at Ankor in the Hauen of Trapani. Some write, that the two fleetes met by chance before Trapani: But whether it were ſo or no, it is certaine that the Gallies on either ſide ſailed in order of battaile readie for fight.

Three Genoueſes gallies taken by the venetians

It is reported that the Genoueſes came too eagerly to charge, and ſo by conſequence too vnaduiſedly. For after their comming from Genoa they feared nothing ſo much as to miſſe the Venetian: ſo that their hatred concurring with their power the fight began ſodainly. Hatred on the one ſide, and deſire of glorie on the other, did greatly augment eithers forces: And as well the one as the other, would manifeſt to the Sicilians, (in whoſe ſight they fought) which of them was beſt experienced in Martiall diſcipline, & who were beſt Sea-men. They fought a long time with vncertainetie of victorie. But the Genoueſes fortune at laſt declining, their wilfulneſſe was ſuch, as rather than to eſcape with diſhonour they choſe there to die fighting. In this fight were taken foure and twentie of their Gallies: and the reſidue burnt or ſunke. Aboue two thouſand fiue hundred were taken priſoners, and more than twelue hundred ſlaine: the reſt were drowned.

The Genoueſes defeated by the venetians before Trapani.

The victorie was not vnbloudie to the Venetians; but their ioy to haue ſo brauely vanquiſhed the enemie, would not ſuffer them to thinke on their great loſſe. And becauſe that by this ouerthrow the Genoueſes power was thought to be wholly abated, Paleologus, who till then had taken their partie, made truce with the Venetians

The inconſtancie and lightneſſe of the Greekes.

A new Venetian Armie sent to Modon.

ans for fiue yeares. The Senate after the battaile of Trapani, sent one and twentie Gallies to Modona for the guard of the Sea-coast, because (as I thinke) they were aduertised that the Gallies of Genoa made incursions on those places.

It happened by chance that certaine of the enemies ships being come at the same time as farre as Modon to rob & spoile, so soon as they vnderstood of the Arriuall of the Venetian Armie, presuming on their swiftnesse on a sodain like run-awaies they turned their backs. The Venetians holding themselues not deceiued in their enemies flight, forthwith followed them: But the Genoueses beeing still daunted with their former losse receiued in Sicilie, and determining from the beginning not to fight, did escape by strength of their oares into the Hauen of Rhodes: from whence soon after departing, they tooke a Venetian ship laden with verie rich Marchandize in the Channell of Nigrepont: some say it was not in the Channell, but in the Hauen of Hiericon. The Genoueses after that, sailed sodainly into Candie, where after they had coasted the greatest part of the Island, they tooke Cydon a sea towne (called at this day Canea by corruption of speech) which for the most part they spoiled and ruined.

The Genoueses come into Candie.

Canea in Candie ruined by the Genoueses.

During these exploits in Greece, there arose a great commotion in Venice which did threaten the Commonwealth with euident danger. The expences of this long warre had till then so exhausted the publike treasure, as the Senate was constrained to inuent new subsidies for the entertainment of the Armie: Whereupon they laid a new impost on white meates. Which beeing commanded to bee published, the people at that time wearie of so great burthens, came running to the Palace with great noise and menaces: Wherewith the Senators being amazed, Prince Rayniero came forth, to the end by his soueraigne authoritie, either to dant the popular furie, or else to pacifie their tumultuous spirits by some gentle admonition: But this manie-headed beast, without any respect at all to the ducall dignitie, did forth-with cast stones at the Prince: who being affrighted gaue place to their furie. No sooner was the Duke retired, but the Authors of the sedition hauing found a fit occasion for their theeuish intents, did by force enter into diuers gentlemens houses which they ransackt, and spoiled. At the last the tumult being appeased, sharpe information was made against those who had done outrage to the Soueraigne dignitie, and were the Authors of this popular sedition; whereupon the delinquents being apprehended were seuerely punished.

A popular commotion in Venice.

The people beare small respect to their Prince.

The seditious punished.

It is reported that about the same time all the streets and places of the Citie were paued with bricke, and that the bridge of Rialto was with great cost new builded, with more cunning workmanship than before. All this notwithstanding the ruining of Cydon, and the taking of the ship so richly laden, did greatly discontent the Venetians; Therefore, three and twentie well-furnished Gallies were giuen to Mirco Gradonico, to saile to Acre, with expresse commandement to espie a fit time when with most aduantage he might fight, and when it should bee offered, to employ all his forces by some warlike enterprise to represse the pride and rashnesse of the enemies, which was of late encreased by reason of some fortunate successe. Some Authors thinke that these Gallies were sent to serue for a conuoy to those, which at the same time went into Asia about traffick of merchandize, and that they met with eight shippes of Genoa, neare to Rhodes, laden with merchandize, which they tooke and sent home to Venice; of which successe the people were very ioyfull. I greatly wonder at that which some doe write, touching fiue ships of Pisa, that were brought to Venice with those of Genoa, seeing that some few yeares before the Venetians, consorted with the Pisans, fought with the Genoueses in Syria, and that soone after they were comprehended, as friends and allies to the Venetians, in the truce made with the Genoueses by the mediation of king Philip: Others which make mention how the gallies were sent to reuenge the ruine of Cydon and the taking of the rich marchant-ship, affirme that they did not fight neere vnto Rhodes with the Genoueses fleete of eight and twentie gallies, but betwixt Tyre and

A new Venetian Armie against the Genoueses.

Certaine Genoa ships taken.

The Venetians victorie against the Genoueses.

and Acre, and that they went more couragiouſly to the charge, in regard of the places of retreat which either of them had, though neuertheleſſe at the laſt the Venetians there likewiſe got the vpper hand, hauing taken fiue of the enemies Gallies.

Whilſt theſe exploits were done at Sea, Prince Zeno died in the ſeuenteenth yeare of his gouernment.

¶ LORENZO TEPVLO, the 46.
Duke of Venice.

LOrenzo Tepulo ſonne to Prince Giacomo, ſucceeded him. At this Princes entrie Pope Clement the fourth after he had diſcreetly conſidered how great miſeries the French-men, with others who till then were in Syria had endured, and were likely ſtill to endure by meanes of the wars betwixt theſe two potent people, he did by his Ambaſſadours entreat the Venetians and the Genoueſes, to liſten to a ſuſpenſion of Armes, if they could not on a ſodaine conclude a peace. And the more eaſily to effect it, he entreated either of them to ſend their Commiſſioners to him to Viterbo. The Kings of France and Sicilie, did requeſt the like, offering freely to employ themſelues to mediate a firme peace betwixt them Commiſſioners were ſent to the Pope, but certaine moneths after, they returned to Venice without concluding any thing. About the ſame time there hapned great ſcarcitie of victuals in the Citie, by reaſon that the paſſages into Sicilie and Apulia for corne were ſhut vp from the Venetian Marchants: For the Genoueſes ſcouring all the Seas, there was no man that would vndertake to relieue the Common-wealth. There needed a mightie fleete to ſerue for Conuoy to the Marchants ſailing to and fro. But that could not eaſily be brought to paſſe in ſo troubleſome a time. Wherefore they determined to haue recourſe to their neighbours. They ſent to Treuiſo, Padua, Ferrara, and to the neighbour Cities, who, beſides the great abundance of monie offered vnto them, were entreated, That if euer the Venetians had done any pleaſure to their neighbours, as well to others, as to the Paduans of freſh memorie, (as thoſe who not long ſince by their means had ſhaken off the yoke of ſeruitude, when (to al mens knowledge) there were no forces greater or readier than thoſe of the Venetians for the ouerthrowing of Eccelins tyrannie: They would in ſo great neceſſitie relieue that Citie which had ſo well deſerued of them. Howbeit if in their preſent neceſſitie they would not remember curtiſies receiued, yet at leaſt for humanitie-ſake to grant their requeſt. But neither intreaties nor monie being able to ouercome the ingratitude of their neighbours, prouiſion of corne was in all places denied them.

The Pope endeuoreth to accord the Venetians and the Genoueſes.

Great ſcarcitie of victualls in Venice.

Ingratitude of the neighbours.

The

The Venetians disdaining to be thus vnworthily dealt with, to the end that all men might know, (and chiefly they who had so wilfully refused them) how gently they had dealt with them in time past, they made a decree which continueth till this day, That all marchandize passing between the Gulphe of Fana, and the mouth of the Riuer Po, should pay a certaine tribute to the Common-wealth; And to this purpose should come to Venice where their merchandize should be rated, if it so pleased the Officers thereunto appointed. And to preuent all deceit herein, they created a new Magistrate, who had certaine ships of warre appointed him, carefully to looke to the Sea-coasts: This caused (for it was likely that the Neighbours at the first report of this new Edict would oppose themselues against it) the league to be renewed with the Pisans for fiue yeares.

Truce graunted betwixt the Venetians and the Genoueses.

About the same time the Genoueses and the Venetians, as well in their owne name as the Pisans their associates, made a truce by meanes of Philip the French King, who succeeded Lewis, being then greatly desirous to releeue the distressed French-men in Syria. Wherewith (as it is reported) he was so greatly affected, as he kept with him at Cremona the Ambassadors of either of these people so long, sometimes entreating the one, and anone exhorting the other, appeasing and promising so much, as at last all sorted to his owne desire: And this was the eleuenth yeare (according to some Authors) since the beginning of the warre against the Genoueses. Now there are some other Venetian Historians, who seeme to augment this number, saying, That Rayniero Zeno ruled seuenteen yeares. Others set downe only sixteene, and affirme, That the warre beganne at Ptolomais in the beginning of his 1260. Principalitie, which was the yeare of our saluation 1260. and continued till the time of Lorenzo Tepulo. But in my opinion this incertaintie of times hath chiefly hapned through the negligence of Writers, who for want of due obseruation haue (perhaps) attributed longer time to Zeno than he raigned. Or else it may bee that the warre was not commenced in the beginning of his Principalitie. For their confusion herein is so great, as a man can hardly discerne the truth of the matter: wherefore, following the opinion of Blondus, a most exact obseruer of times, I thinke that this first Genoan warre endured but eleuen yeares.

New war against the Bolognians.

Now truce being concluded with the Genoueses, the Venetians had new warre in Lombardie. Those of Bologna, who at that time possessed the greatest part of the Countrie of Flaminia, being grieued that by the new decree of Impost lately, as aforesaid, made by the Venetians, their Merchants were excluded from their traffick, prepared with all secrecie a new warre, to open them a passage for their nauigation. Being therefore readie to set forward, they sent their Ambassadours before to Venice, who, concealing their warlike preparations, should treate with the Venetians about the abolishing of that Decree, and dismissing of their Garrisons on euery side, to the end that their Merchants might haue free passage. Whereunto if the Venetians should refuse to consent (as it was likely they would) they were without other termes to denounce warre. Tepulo soone discouered the fraude of the Bolognians: Whereupon he fell to his subtilties, which were no lesse pollitick than theirs, and speedily sent out nine Gallies to preuent the enemie. It was most certaine that he who could sooneste discouer the others pollicie, and first seize vpon the place, would make all things after very difficult for his enemie. Wherefore the Venetians came with speede to the mouth of the Po, which is called Primario, neare to Rauenna: where at their arriuall perceiuing the Bolognians to build a Fort on the other shore, they likewise with speede seized on S. Alberts, which they instantly fortified by helpe of the Souldiers.

The Bolognians intent discouered.

Within few daies after, Prince Tepulo came thither with Sea-forces, the better to restraine the enemies attempts: There, and in other places they often fought with great effusion of bloud; and the Bolognians did still for the most part preuaile, in regard of their great numbers. For their Armie was reported to be fortie thousand fighting men, and all of the same Prouince: which the Celtique Gaules had in part possessed,

What was the number of the Bolognians Armie.

poſſeſſed, (a moſt warlike race and almoſt not to be conquered) and in part the Senonians, (who for certaine Moneths held the Citie of Rome) which was afterward called Flaminia, and at laſt Romagniola. Whereby may bee coniectured that the ſame Prouince doth not at theſe daies bring forth men wholly different from thoſe whom it nouriſhed in former times, but very couragious, and of great ſpirits, and ſuch (in a word) as it was not ſaid without cauſe, That a red Italian, a blacke German, and one of Romagniola with his haire of two colours, are commonly froward fellowes. A vſuall prouerb

Now, this dangerous warre was drawne out at length, till the third yeare after, when at laſt they fought with all their forces, vnder the conduct of Marco Gradonico, where the victorious Venetian brake and defeated the enemie with great loſſe. The Bolognians hereupon being diſcouraged, ſued for peace, which they obtained on theſe conditions, That hauing ouerthrowne their Fort at Primario, being permitted to carrie thence certaine things with them, they ſhould leaue the entrance of the Po, free to the Venetians. The Bolognians defeated. Peace granted to the Bolognians.

The Anconitans, by the example of thoſe of Bolognia, durſt attempt to take armes: and ſent to Pope Gregorie the tenth to complaine on the Venetians. The Pope entreated the Venetians not to ſtop their nauigation: This entreatie they did neither obay nor reſiſt, But becauſe they would not ſeeme (againſt their cuſtome) to contemne the Popes commandement, they ſent Ambaſſadours to him, who alleaging now one thing, and then another, ſaid, that the Anconitans had not done well, by falſe reports to traduce the Venetians before the Pope, and that their accuſations were vntrue; Theſe and ſuch like allegations of the Venetians, by little and little ended the matter. And the Pope herein was ſo farre off from conceiuing any diſpleaſure againſt them, as hee rather procured the truce before then concluded at Cremona betweene them and the Genoueſes, to bee renued for two yeares more. Thoſe of Ancona complained to the Pope of the Venetians. The Anconitans cõplaints ended. The truce betweene the Venetians and Genoueſes prolonged.

Theſe things thus ſucceeding in Italie, certaine Lords of Nigrepont, who as yet poſſeſſed the third part of the Iſland, contrarie to the will of Andrea Dandulo, Gouernour of the Iſland, with ſixteen Gallies inuaded that part of Aſia the leſſe, which then was vnder obedience of Paleologus: from whence hauing carried away great bootie, they prouoked this Prince to warre vpon them. So ſoone therefore, as his Armie was readie he came to Nigrepont and beſieged Orea. The Lords of the Iland, to free their people from the ſiege, came with twentie Gallies to draw the enemie to fight: wherein being broken and put to flight, Paleologus, in a manner, bereft them of all their fleete, and brought away diuers of the chiefe as priſoners. But fiue hundred Venetians, found in the fleete of thoſe Lords, hee committed to his Lieutenants, to bee ſent home to Venice, with commandement to renew the league for fiue yeares following. Paleologus defeateth them of Nigropont. The league renewed betwixt Paleologus and the Venetians.

I cannot but exceedingly meruaile, in that it is ſaid, that thoſe Lords of Nigrepont made warre on Paleologus, againſt the will of Dandulo. Thoſe of the Iſland might, perhaps, refuſe to obay the Magiſtrate, but that the fiue hundred Venetians, who were found (as hath beene ſaid) in the fleete, ſhould ſo doe, it is very vnlikely. Let them, which ſo report, conſider by what meanes the ſame could poſſibly come to paſſe.

On theſe termes ſtood the affaires of Venice at ſuch time as Tepulo deceaſed, the ſixth yeare of his gouernment: who was buried in the Church of the Twinnes, in the monument of his Anceſtors. Giacomo Contareni was choſen in his place.

Giacomo

¶ Giacomo Contareni, the 47. Duke of Venice.

The warre like to haue beene renewed with the Genoueſes.

AT the beginning of his gouernement it was likely that the warre would haue beene renewed with the Genoueſes, becauſe an Argozie of Venice laden with merchandize, was taken by two of Genoa. It was ſuppoſed to haue beene done by the publike command, and therefore they beganne to prepare a new Armie: yet neuertheleſſe they determined (following the cuſtome of their Anceſtors) to demand firſt of the Genoueſes, in the name of the Common-wealth, that which had beene taken from them, which if they refuſed to doe, it was not queſtionable, but that the Venetians would vſe all manner of hoſtilitie. The Ambaſſadours, who for this purpoſe were ſent to Genoa, after they had receiued what had beene taken from them, returned ſoone after to Venice well ſatisfied, where finding the whole Citie prepared for a new warre, they freed them from all care, in bringing them home peace from Genoa.

The popular ſedition which happened in the Citie in the time of Tepulo, by reaſon of the Impoſt on the Mills, was wholly extinct vnder this Princes gouernment. But things being thus pacified at home, a new warre ſprung vp abroade. The inhabitants of the Cape of Hiſtria, of whoſe affection towards them the Venetians had better conceiued than of all the reſt in that Prouince, were ſodainly reuolted. Andrea Baſſeio was ſent thither with great troupes to reduce them to their obedience. Whereupon perceiuing the Sea and Land to clatter with the ſound of the Venetians Armes, they ſent to Forli, to entreat the Patriarke of Aquileia, in regard of their mutuall amitie, to come to the ſuccour of a Neighbour-Citie, and to take Armes to repell the Venetian who highly menaced them. He being moued with their entreaties, in haſt leuied forces and ſent them to their aide. The Hiſtrians relying on theſe ſuccours, attempted by diuers meanes to diuert the Venetian from the ſiege. But neither thoſe, nor yet their owne forces, did greatly auaile them; for being vanquiſhed, they were conſtrained to returne to the Venetians obedience; Rayniero Moroſini was ſent Gouernour into the Prouince to containe them in their dutie.

New warre with thoſe of Capo d'Hiſtria.

The Patriarke of Aquileia ſuccoureth the rebells.

The rebells ſubiected.

Rayniero Moroſino.

The Venetians being freed from the warre of Hiſtria, were ſodainely troubled with that of Ancona; and yet I know not whether this beganne before the other was ended. For the Annaliſts handle this matter ſo confuſedly, as wee can hardly tell what to beleeue of it. Beſides, very few Hiſtorians make mention of this warre

New warre with the Anconitans.

of

of Ancona: And they which doe mention it, ſay, that the Venetians beſieged Ancona in the time of Pope Iohn the one and twentieth, whoſe Papacie laſted no longer than the firſt yeare of Prince Contareni his gouernment. They affirme moreouer, that the warre beganne vpon occaſion of the decree for the new impoſt, made certaine yeares before, which to aboliſh they had made meanes to Pope Gregorie but without effect. The better therefore to annihilate this decree, they cauſed certaine merchandize to be ſecretly tranſported into the Sea of Hiſtria, and to other places neare to the entrance of the Riuer Po. The Venetians being therewith incenſed, (for the Anconitans abuſing their lenitie and patience, became daily more inſolent) forthwith armed ſixe and twentie Gallies, to the which they added certaine ſhips of burthen for carriage of victualls and munition, with all other things neceſſarie for the ſiege of a Citie. But before they made this warlike preparation, it is to be ſuppoſed that they ſent to demand their cuſtome of the Anconitans, which was denied them. The Venetian at his firſt arriuall did furiouſly aſſaile the hauen, from whence being beaten backe, and the fleet hauing no place of ſafetie to ride in before the Citie; nor being yet come to an Ankor; there aroſe a terrible tempeſt, which did caſt and beate part of their veſſels in peeces vpon the Neighbour-ſhore. Sixe Gallies ſtriking vpon the Rocks of Senegaillo, were wholly loſt, and the reſidue of the fleet being driuen forward by violence of the tempeſt ranne vp into the maine. Afterwards new forces, with ſupplies of ſhips and Gallies, were ſent from Venice, for whom (ſailing at Sea) the enemie laid a new kinde of Ambuſh. Hee ſet vp the Venetian enſignes on his Gallies, which he had taken from them at the aſſault of the Hauen, framing in the beſt manner he could, the reſt of the tackling after the Venetian faſhion. Then from as farre as he might diſcerne them, he beganne with great ioy and clamour to haile them as their friends and companions. By this pollicie on a ſodain they grapled with two of the formoſt which they tooke, and dragged to the Citie, to the great contentment of the Inhabitants: But we doe not finde who commanded the Armie at the ſame time. Howbeit, it is certaine that by his negligence and want of experience in martiall matters, the Venetians receiued two great ouerthrowes in ſhort time, and that for his labour, hee was called home from the Armie, and committed to priſon.

The Anconitans ſeeke to defraud the Venetians of their Impoſts.

The Venetian fleet before Ancona.

The Venetian fleet ſcattered by tempeſt.

The Anconitans pollicie to ſurpriſe the Venetians.

The Generall of the Venetian Armie puniſhed.

They did better afterwards than at the firſt. For they reſolued to tame the ſtubbornneſſe of the enemie by a ſiege: whereupon within a few daies after, Ancona was againe beſieged. At which time the inhabitants fore-ſeeing what might happen, and that by the perſeuerance of their enemies they might fall into ſome manifeſt danger, they ſent to Pope Nicholas the third, newly elected; to animate him againſt the Venetians, and to acquaint him chiefly with that which their enemies had till then done to them, and did daily more and more; and beſides, to declare vnto him, that they had alreadie by the Venetians means endured all the miſeries, which thoſe who were a long time ſtreightly beſieged, were wont to ſuſtaine, and they were likely to endure much more, if they were not ſpeedily releeued by ſome forraine aide: In regard whereof they beſought his Holineſſe to compaſſionate the miſerie of ſo ancient a Citie, and ſo affectionate to the Church of Rome, and that it would pleaſe him to deliuer them from ſo great a danger.

The Anconitans ſend to Pope Nicholas the third.

The Venetian Ambaſſadours were come at the ſame time to Rome, to congratulate his aſſumption to the Papall dignitie: who, after they had a long time attended there, and not being called, as were others, to the publike congratulation, they doubting the matter, that the Pope by reaſon of thoſe of the marches was offended with them, ſent word thereof to Venice. The Duke and Senate taking it in bad part, did by their letters call home their Ambaſſadours, who being on their way from Rome, were by the Popes commandement brought backe, who, after he had ſharply rebuked the Venetians for ſo ſtreightly beſieging the Anconitans, being feodaries of the Church of Rome, forbad the Ambaſſadours (who would haue defended the cauſe) to ſpeake. It is reported, that the ſame day they returned to Venice,

The Venetian Ambaſſadours at Rome.

The Venetians diſcontented with the Pope.

The Venetian Ambaſſadours brought backe to Rome.

The venetians send new supplies before Ancona.

nice, eight Gallies with ſupplies were ſent to the Camp before Ancona: I know not whether it was done vpon neceſſitie, or elſe in hatred to the Pope, for vſing their Ambaſſadours with ſo ſmall reſpect. The enemie thereby perceiuing, that in ſted of raiſing the ſiege, the Venetian did more ſharpely oppreſſe them, abating their courage, they became ſuiters for peace. The matter being debated without any reſolution, the Commiſſioners returned home without any peace: So ſoone as they were gone, they reſolued to ſtrengthen the Armie with fourteene Gallies; two of which ſtragling by the way were by the enemie ſurpriſed, who lay in wait to catch what he could: Neuertheleſſe, he bought his peace at no meane rate.

The Duke willingly depoſeth himſelfe.

The Duke being alreadie old and decaied, not able for his age to attend the publike affaires, by conſent of all men depoſed himſelfe, and ſoone after died: His funeralls were great, and were followed by multitudes of people, to the Church of the Friers Minors, where he was buried. Giouanni Dandulo, then abſent; was choſen in his place.

¶ Giovanni Dandvlo, the 48. Duke of Venice.

SOme Authors affirme that vnder this Prince the peace was concluded with thoſe of the Marches, becauſe (perhaps) this warre ended at the beginning of his gouernment. They ſay beſides, that it was expreſly mentioned in the Treatie, that the decree of the impoſt ſhould remaine firme without any contradiction.

Great ouerflowing of the Sea, with an earthquake.

About the ſame time the Sea did in ſuch ſort ouerflow the Citie as it was in a manner held for a prodigie: Whereupon, ſoone after enſued a great earthquake. They began likewiſe at the ſame time to ſtampe diuers ſorts of golden coine in the Citie. A new warre was kindled againſt the Patriarch of Aquileia in regard of the Hiſtrians, whom he eſpecially maintained againſt the Venetians. Certaine people of that Prouince were reuolted, whom the Venetian would reduce vnder his ſubiection, and to that purpoſe had ſent an Armie into the Prouince. The Patriarch ſpeedily came to their aide: but conſidering with himſelfe that his forces were not ſufficient to hinder the Venetian, he yeelded without any further trouble, making ſhew for a while, that he deſired nothing ſo much as peace: and thus in the meane ſpace the Hiſtrians were by little and little reduced vnder the Venetian gouernment. But this Patriarch ſo ſoone as he had ioyned his forces with thoſe of Count Gorician, being ſtrengthened with the new alliance of this Prince, he returned againe

A new warre with the Patriarke of Aquileia.

The Patriarke alieth himſelfe with Count Gorician.

to

to diſquiet Hiſtria. Theſe new commotions were followed with rebellions of diuers Cities. The Venetians hauing notice hereof were conſtrained ſodainely to arme themſelues and to re-inforce their Armie. It was commonly reported that the enemies Armie conſiſted of ſix and thirtie thouſand men, among whome were great troupes of horſe. The rumour of ſo great numbers cauſed the whole Citie to bee verie carefull for the preparation of this new warre. They prouided therefore a great number of ſhips of ſpeciall choice which were manned with the third part of all ſuch as were able to beare Armes.

The Venetians preparations for Hiſtria.

The Armie being gone from Venice, and arriued in Hiſtria, did ſodainely encampe before Thrieſte. For among others in this inſurrection this Citie likewiſe did reuolt. Now the Venetian reſoluing to beſiege it, in few dayes built ſundrie Fortes about it, furniſhing them with ſtrong Garriſons to hinder the enemies incurſions. Afterwards with other Engins they began to batter the Citie; but hauing a ſtrong Garriſon within it it could by no meanes bee taken. Whereupon, becauſe it was not for the Common-wealths profit to entertaine ſo great forces without action before the walls of Thryeſte; hauing ſmall hope to take it; and ſuppoſing the Fortes builded at their arriuall to bee ſufficiently furniſhed with Souldiers and victuals to continew the ſiege; the reſidue of the Armie marched into other places. But whither they went, or how they were imploied, the Authours whom we follow make no mention.

Thrieſte beſieged by the Venetian.

Not many dayes after, the enemie came thither, and at his arriuall aſſailed the Fortes; which were not only well kept and defended, but thoſe likewiſe which were within them hauing made a ſallie vpon the enemie, skirmiſhed fiercely neere to the Rampier where diuers on both ſides were ſlaine, and among others, the Nephew of Count Gorician, a valliant and braue young man. The retreit being ſounded, truce was taken for a day. In the meane time Gordiano, a man of authoritie, and who till then had held an honourable place in the Venetian Armie was ſuſpected of treaſon. The ſpeech was that he had ſecretly practiſed with the enemie to yeeld the Forte vp into their hands. Being apprehended and put to the torture he confeſſed his wicked intent; whereupon the next morning by breake of day, he was tied hand and foot; and put into a warlike engin, wherwith he was throwne into the enemies Campe; who now perceiuing that hee could neither preuaile by force nor cunning, being out of all hope to ſurpriſe the Fort, hee returned without effecting any thing.

The Patriarcks Armie comes to Thrieſte.

A Traitor puniſhed.

The enemie being gone, the Venetian troupes returned ſoone after. Now whether they had retired themſelues of ſet purpoſe becauſe they would not fight with the enemie, whom they knew to be much ſtronger than themſelues, and that in the meane time the fleet rode at anchor in the maine, or elſe in ſome hauen hard by, vntill they had newes of the enemies retreate; or rather whether after they had left ſtrong Garriſons in the fortes to maintaine the ſiege, the reſt of the Armie not willing to ſpend the time in one only place, went to beſiege other townes not farre off; and that at the firſt reporte of the enemies comming, they returned to relieue their fellowes, I cannot certainely determine. But the Venetian being againe returned to aſſaile the Citie, was beaten from the walls with great loſſe. The Armie afterwards departing thence, the ſiege was continued by thoſe who lay in the fortes vntill ſuch time as they vnderſtood of the enemies returne. Vpon the firſt tidings whereof they abandoned the ſame (whether through feare, or wearineſſe to tarrie ſo long in a place I know not) and retired themſelues to their gallies. This is all (in a manner) that was done for two yeares ſpace in Hiſtria.

The Venetians Armie comes againe before Thrieſte.

Thoſe within the fortes retire to their ſhippes

But in Syria the Venetians which were in Acre, made truce with the King of Babilon for two yeares, who had at the ſame time ruined Tripolie, a very famous Citie, and had cauſed Tyre, Sydon, and Berithon to vndergoe the ſame fortune. It is reported that hee made truce with the Venetians and the other Chriſtians which were in Acre, to the end that his ouermuch proſperitie might not ſtirre vp al

The Venetians take truce with the King of Babilon.

The Pope exhorteth the Christiã Princes to vndertake the voiage into Syria, with his offer.

Europe to take Armes against him. Howbeit the same did not keepe them backe: For Pope Nicholas by Letters and Ambassadors excited all the most famous Princes of Europe, to succour the afflicted Christians in Syria. And for his owne part hee made offer of fifteene hundred armed Horse: And for their passage into Asia, the Venetians offered him twentie Gallies, together with victualls for the Marriners, who were to be paid by his Holinesse: for the expedition of which businesse, the Bishop of Tripoli came to Venice.

The Venetians offer, for this voiage.

The Venetians being moued at the Popes instant pursute, added to these twentie Gallies, which were promised, fiue more, armed at their owne cost, because they would not seeme careless of the affaires of Christendome; of the which fleet Giacomo Tepulo was declared Generall, with the Popes Legate. But the other Princes of Christendome not appearing, all this great preparation of Gallies and Armes, was to no purpose. For the time of the truce being expired, the King of Babylon hauing notice of what was done in Europe, sent his sonne with a great Armie to besiege Acre, who sodainly enguirt it on euery side with furious assaults: The Venetians with the Popes Souldiers, for a time did brauely defend it. But no supplies comming out of Europe, those which could escape by Sea slipping away one by one; the Citie was at the last taken by a few, spoiled, and razed downe to the foundation. In this manner was the Christian name wholly extinct in Syria, the yeare of our saluation 1290. and after that great and notable voiage vnder-taken by the meanes of Pope Vrban the second, at that time when Ierusalem with a part of Syria was taken, one hundred ninetie sixe yeares.

Acre taken by the Infidels.

At what time the Christians were driuen out of Syria.

1290.

Prince Dandulo, after all these miseries happened in his time, deceased (the tenth yeare of his Gouernment being scarce expired) and was honourably buried in the Church of the Twinnes. It is reported that his funeralls being ended, there arose on a sodaine a great tumult, and how the people flocking on euery side, vsed many threatnings and reprochfull termes to the Senators, and by name demanded Giacomo Tepulo for their Duke. This man being vertuous, and a louer of the publike peace, after he had sharply reprehended the peoples rashnesse, secretly departed the Citie, and came to Marroco; where he remained vnknowne, vntill (the tumult being appeased) Pietro Gradonico was by consent of the Senate declared Prince of the Common-wealth.

A popular tumult about the creation of the Duke.

The end of the tenth Booke of the first Decad.

THE FIRST BOOKE
OF THE SECOND DECAD
Of The Historie
Of Venice.

The Contents of the firſt Booke of the ſecond DECAD.

THe warres of the Venetians and Genoueſes compared with thoſe of the Romans and Carthaginians. The ſecond warre with the Genoueſes, after the truce expired. The Venetians burne Pera. GIOVANNI SOVRANZA looſeth diuers Sea-companies through extremitie of cold, after his atchieuements on the Pontick Sea. The Venetians are defeated at Cortu, where they looſe a great Armie. They receiue the like loſſe ſoone after, at the ſtreight of Gallipolis. A new peace betwixt the Venetians and Genoueſes. The Commonwealth greatly endangered by the conſpiracie of BVCONIO. The Venetian fleete brings a great bootie out of Greece. Trafficke euerie where prohibited to the Venetians, becauſe they had taken Ferrara. The publike libertie in danger to be loſt by meanes of a cruell conſpiracie of her Citizens. Warre for a time in Dalmatia about the rebellion of Zara. The Church and Couent of S. DOMINICK builded in the Citie. The Citie freed from the Popes interdiction by the meanes of FRANCISCO DANDVLO. The ancient Port beautified and enlarged. A new rebellion of the Candiots quickly appeaſed. The Venetians free the Paduans againe from the yoake of bondage. The warre begunne againe in Hiſtria, cauſeth the Venetians to take Armes. The voyage againſt the Turke concluded, and ſoone broken through the default of the French. The Venetians and Florentines make a league againſt thoſe of Eſcalla.

¶ Pietro Gradonico, the 49. Duke of Venice.

The Venetians & Genoueles compared to the Romanes and Carthagenians.

IN writing the Venetian Hiſtorie, diuers matters offer themſelues vnto vs, ſo conformable to thoſe of the Romanes, as it is not poſſible to ſee any thing more like, as well in counſell, trauaile, accidents of fortune, as other ſundrie euents. But among all, which (as I haue ſaid) are verie many, the Venetians warre with the Genoueſes, ſeemes in my iudgement to haue great reſemblance with thoſe which the Romans had in times paſt with the Carthaginians. For the neere neighbourhood (as it oftentimes happeneth,) did not beget that emulation which was betwixt them, nor was cauſe of the warre, becauſe they were as farre diſtant one from the other, as is the ſpatious bredth of the Tirrhene and Libicke Seas betwixt Italie and Affricke, by this meanes farre enough remoued the one from the other. Theſe in like manner, are not neighbours. For if we conſider the breadth of Italie, we ſhall find the one to be ſo farre off from the other, without going forth of Italie, as it may be wondered at. For Italie as (Strabo ſaith) is a promontorie ſtretching from

The ſituation of Italy.

the Alpes, whoſe height on the North ſide extending towards the South, ſerues for a Rampier. It is beſides watered towards the Weſt with the Liguſticke and Tirrhene Seas, and on the Eaſt with the Adriaticke and Ionian Seas. And from thence the waues begin to mingle themſelues together; and to make it more ſtrong, they would faine ſhut vp the Alpes more cloſely, but it cannot be. In this deepe Gulph ſtands the famous Citie of Venice: On the other ſide, the Liguſticke Sea laboureth to hold faſt the feete of the Appenine hils which it almoſt doth, and within this turning likewiſe lieth the Citie of Genoa, enuious of the Venetian greatneſſe, in ſuch ſort as they are almoſt one oppoſite to the other. Prudent nature did ſet betwixt the two former a great vaſtneſſe of Sea, which might ſerue for a barre, if they ſhould at any time happen to inuade one another, thereby to quench their mortall hatred, and coole their boyling furie: But to theſe ſhe hath not alone oppoſed the bredth of Italie, but the very tops of the Appenine hilles, ſtretching from Liguria to Ancona, from whence being beaten backe by the waues of the Sea, they ſoone turne towards the mount Gargan: then on a ſodaine, as if they feared the Sea, they go on to the fartheſt parts of Italie, to ſubdue in a manner the waues which they haue ſo often often ſhunned. But neither the diſtance of Sea could reſtraine the wrath of the former, nor the difficult acceſſe of the Appenin hilles that of theſe people.

The diſtance betwixt the Venetians and Genoueſes.

From whence the Venetians are deſcended & from whence the Genoueſes.

The Romans held themſelues deſcended from the Troians. The Venetians boaſt of the ſame originall. The Libians mingled themſelues with the Phœnicians; and the Genoueſes were likewiſe mingled with them. Emulation of great atchieuements did firſt ſtirre vp thoſe men, and afterwards the deſire of rule: And on theſe two points onely hath the warre growne betwixt theſe people: Thoſe for Sicilie, and theſe (as hath beene ſaid) for the Citie of Acre. The Romans who were victors, were often times in greater danger than the Carthaginians whome they vanquiſhed. The Venetians haue runne the ſelfe-ſame fortune, notwithſtanding that they haue wholly defeated the Genoueſes. Thoſe two Nations fought aboue one hundred yeeres together, with equall hatred, and oftentimes with equall forces: Theſe likewiſe with great care and trauaile haue long time fought with one an other, ſo that like thoſe men, theſe being wearied with the warre, haue at times giuen intermiſſion to their Armes, but not to their enmitie. If the end were not like, yet neuertheleſſe hath it not beene wholly different. That great Carthage was razed downe to the grounde, and this proude Genoa, wanting further abilitie, hath at length giuen place to the victorious Venetian.

The Ligaſtick and Lybick wars had almoſt one ſelfe ſame end.

But the better to continue the diſcourſe of theſe warres, which the Venetians had afterward with theſe proud people, we muſt firſt of all ſet down certain matters which ſome Hiſtorians haue formerly mentioned, to the end we may be the better enabled to quote the times which the cõfuſion of Authors maketh otherwiſe doubtful, and withall to reduce thoſe things to our memorie which haue formerly beene ſpoken vpon this ſubiect.

Gradonico at the ſame time commaunded Hiſtria, when hee was choſen Prince of the Common-wealth. Being called home to Venice hee tooke poſſeſſion of his charge, which hee beganne with diuine matters, commanding the day and feaſt of Saint Katerine to bee yearely ſolemnized, vnto whome when he was but a priuate perſon he was much deuoted. I beleeue that the Senat in fauour of the Duke did make a decree for this purpoſe; by meanes whereof this holie Virgin was afterward highly reuerenced in Venice, her feaſt beeing before that time but a working day. But it may be that he did it not ſo much for particular deuotion, as becauſe he was (as ſome thinke) choſen vpon the ſame day.

Andrew King of Hungary commeth to Venice.

It is reported that about the ſame time, Andrew King of Hungarie ſonne to a Venetian woman of the familie of Moroſini, and to Stephen the Kings ſonne, came to Venice, where he was ſo farre off from contemning his mothers houſe, becauſe it was a priuate familie in a free Citie, as hee would needes appropriate to himſelfe the ancient Armes of the familie, by adding thereunto onely a white Croſſe with a circle; to the end that by that difference, thoſe of the ſame familie might bee knowne from the other Moroſini. Stephen his father was borne in Ferrara, whither his mother, daughter to the Prince of Ferrara after the death of her husband had retired herſelfe being left with childe, but being come to age hee could neuer recouer his fathers Kingdome, which was poſſeſſed by his neere kinſ-men. And being deſirous (as I thinke) to put himſelfe vnder the Venetians protection, he married Thomaſina Moroſini, by whom he had this Andrew, who in time got title of Gouernour of the Kingdome; and afterward that of King. Some Authours referre the ruine of Ptolomais to theſe times; but the greateſt part of them affirme that which we haue reported thereof in the precedent booke.

A new warre with the Genoueſes.

The truce being expired, the warre againſt the Genoueſes was more fiercely than euer renued. But the Venetians good fortune was not ſo apparent in the next Lyguſtick warre, as diſaſtrous by the occurents of the yeeres enſuing. For by how much more the power of both theſe people were alreadie manifeſt to euery eie; by ſo much greater were the warlike preparations made by either partie. It was likewiſe euident that this their contention, was not about the ſimple poſſeſſion of

Ptolo-

Ptolomais, nor for a ſtreet or Church onely, but to acquire the abſolute command or dominion at Sea. In this quarrell the Venetians were the firſt in field. But I thinke it was not in reſpect of the Genoueſes aſſailing the Piſans at that time, who after they had taken the hauen of Legorne from them, and burnt it, ſuncke diuers ſhippes of burthen full of flint ſtones and grauell in the hauen thereby to take the vſe of the Sea from them: For the Piſans forces had beene alreadie before that time greatly weakened, chiefly by that notable loſſe which they ſuſtained in the Iſle of Lamel, where twelue thouſand of their people were ſlaine or taken by the Genoueſes, with the loſſe of fiue and twentie Gallies. Now the Venetians, to draw the Piſans forth of this danger, who had in times paſt ſo faithfully releeued them in the firſt Liguſticke warre, and to alter the courſe of the Genoueſes victorie, made haſt to get before them, with a great Fleet, (as ſome ſay) of threeſcore and ſix Gallies which ſailed into the Ponticke Sea vnder the command of Rogero Moroſini, to ſpoile and deſtroie whatſoeuer belonged to the Genoueſes. Others make mention of fortie ſix onely: and others affirme that there were no Gallies in this Fleet, but diuers ſhippes of all ſorts. Their firſt charge was againſt thoſe of Pera. This place neere to Conſtantinople, which I thinke was at the ſame time but a village, had beene fortified by the Genoueſes, and was much frequented by Genoa Merchants trafficking the Ponticke Seas, who for the neere neighbour-hood thereof to Conſtantinople and for tranſportation of their merchandize to and fro had the commodiouſneſſe of the place in ſingular recommendation. Whether they had then determined to doe that which afterward they did, to wit, to encloſe that place with ditches and walles, knowing how fit it was not onely for the vſe they then made of it, but likewiſe for the warre, I confeſſe my ſelfe ignorant. This place therefore being not yet fortified, was ſoone taken by the Venetian and conſumed to aſhes. From thence the Armie ſailed to the old Forts which the Genoueſes held, which being take were for the moſt part burned. The Genoueſes in the meane time laie quiet without action. Giouanni Souranza the next yeare following was commanded to holde the ſame courſe with fiue and twentie Gallies. At his arriuall hee tooke the Citie of Capha by aſſault in Cherſoneſſus of Tauris: where being ouertaken by winter he was conſtrained to tarrie. In this countrie being extreame cold (for it doth not onely incline to the northward, but lieth directly vnder it) he loſt nine companies of Souldiours with the extremitie thereof, and the reſidue of his Armie likwiſe was greatly afflicted. The fennes Meotides which are not far thence, together with the Cymerian Boſphorus, are ſo congealed with extreame cold, as it is moſt certaine that in thoſe places where in Sommer men fight with Gallies, in Winter they combat on horſe-backe on the Ice.

The Piſans vanquiſhed by the Genoueſes.

Rogero Moroſino Generall of the Venetians Armie.

Pera taken and burned by the Venetians.

A wonderfull matter in the fennes Meotides.

The Genoueſes likewiſe thinking it time to be ſtirring, ſailed into the maine with threeſcore and ſix Gallies, or threeſcore and ten (according to ſome Authors) vnder the conduct of Lampadio Doria: who deſirous to reuenge the loſſes receiued on the Pontick Sea, entring tumultuouſly into the Gulph of Venice, had directly come to the Citie, if vpon report of the comming of ſo great a Fleet, they had not bin encountred by the Venetians with greater forces than at any time before. The Venetians at the ſame time hauing foureſcore and fifteene Gallies, and vnderſtanding that the Genoueſes were at Corfu, ſailed thither with an intent to fight with them. For now being in number of veſſells ſuperiour to the Genoueſes, they would not refuſe the fight, being thereunto alſo encouraged by remembring what had paſſed in former expeditions: They knew well enough that they were to fight againſt the ſame enemie, whom they had vanquiſhed in the battaile betwixt Tyre and Acre: And the remembrance of that notable victorie at Trapani, did more animate them, where though they were much inferiour to the Genoueſes, yet in a manner they had broken them: neither did they forget how often the Genoueſes (who at that time did ſo greatly deſire the fight) had ſhamefully fledd from them; whereupon they openly ſaid, That the enemies did not ſhew themſelues ſo

The fleet of the Genoueſes in the Adriaticke Sea.

deſirous

deſirous of fight, for any aſſurance they had of their owne forces, or for that they were ignorant of the Venetians valour, but only through their owne naturall obſtinacie, the which at laſt, by right or wrong, would ouerthrow them.

The Genoueſes on the other ſide hardly digeſted, that in the former warres they had ſeemed at times to ſtrike ſaile, and to yeeld to the Venetians, Beſides, a freſh griefe at wrongs receiued on the Pontick Sea, for the ſpace of two yeares, did greatly moue them; but nothing did ſo much animate and encourage them, as for that about the ſame time they had ſo abated the power and forces of the Piſans, as they (who not long ſince had been verie mightie) had nothing left them beſides the bare ſhadow of their ancient name. With theſe hopes and incouragements, both parties came brauely to the fight. Carolo and Andrea Dandulo (as diſcreet as valiant) commanded the Venetian Armie; who hauing omitted nothing which might helpe to the obtaining of the Victorie, did boldly and valiantly receiue the enemie comming towards them. In the beginning the fight was doubtfull, and the ſlaughter verie cruell, ſuch indeed as could not but happen at the encounter of two ſo mightie armies: There was nothing heard but the frightfull clamours of marriners, and ſouldiours, incouraging one another: All the Sea rang with the noiſe of broken veſſels claſhing together. Thus the battaile laſted a certaine ſpace with great ſlaughter: but at laſt the Venetians were defeated. And the victorious Genoueſes holding them ſtreightly to it, filled euerie place with bloud and ruine. All the Venetian Hiſtorians (one only excepted) confeſſe that the loſſe of this battaile was verie great, and that the Venetians Nauie was wholly defeated and loſt. But all of them iointly conceale the number. Whereby wee may rightly preſume, that of ſo great a Fleete ſcarce one veſſell was ſaued (which is credible enough) or verie few, The fore-excepted Authour ſetteth downe the matter ſomewhat more at large. For hee (quite contrarie to the reſt) ſaith, That the Genoueſes, beeing beſieged by the Venetians in Corfu, would haue deliuered all their ſhippes of warre to the Dandulo's ſo they might haue beene ſuffered to depart thence with liues and baggage; And that vpon deniall, their feare turning to deſpaire, they ioined battaile. At which time the Genoueſes ioining pollicie with force, laid fifteene Gallies in ambuſh, which comming forth vpon the Venetians in the heat of the fight, did (without all doubt) giue them the victorie: moreouer, that ſix Genoa Gallies, and two and thirtie of Venice did not fight, which either for feare, or (according to others) being driuen an other waie by force of the winde, could not come neere the fleete, but that the reſidue did fight brauely, where manie more Genoueſes than Venetians were ſlaine; ſo as at the beginning the Genoueſes had the worſt, and were readie to flee, if the fifteene Genoa Gallies comming forth of their ambuſh with great noiſe, had not reſtored the battaile, & put the Venetians to rout. Foure thouſand Venetians were taken with Andrea Dandulo one of the Generals of the Armie, who with ſorrow and ſhame, during the time that they carried him priſoner towards Genoa, did ſtrike his head ſo often againſt the Gallies ſide, as hee died by the way. Ricoaldo of Ferrara writes, That the Genoueſes fought there with foureſcore and eight Gallies, and that thirtie Venetian Gallies eſcaped from the battaile, hauing kept aloofe from the beginning of the fight: likewiſe that fiue thouſand priſoners were brought to Genoa: where by reaſon of the great ſlaughter of their owne people, they ſhewed ſmall ioie for the victorie, ſo as it was reported euerie where, that the Genoueſes had loſt more at Corfu than the Venetians.

The Venetians and Genoueſes reſolution.

Carolo and Andrea Dandulo generalls of the Venetians Armie.

The Venetians defeated at Corfu.

Sundrie opinions touching the battaile at Corfu.

A ſtrange death of one of the generalls of the Venetian Armie

This was the ſucceſſe of the battaile in Dalmatia. The report of this loſſe brought great feare and ſorrow to the Citie. But the feare of imminent danger cauſed, That (all griefe beeing laid apart) they determined ſpeedily to raiſe new forces, thinking that the victorious enemie (no armie being in readineſſe to beat him back if he ſhould ſaile towards Venice) would be ſhortly roaring at their gates: But I thinke hee went forthwith into Greece, or rather home, becauſe wee finde not that the Genoueſes after the battaile of Corfu, performed any warlike action at Sea, or in Dalmatia.

Now

A new Army of the Venetians.

Now the Armie being furnished, fearing least the Islands and Sea-townes of the Ionian and Ægean Seas should be vnfurnished of Garrisons, fiue and twentie Gallies were sent thither vnder the command of Marco Bassetio. These likewise scuffling with the enemies on the Hellespont, called at this daie the streight of Gallipolis, the issue thereof proued as vnfortunate, as the other at Corfu: The fight is reported to haue beene cruell, and that after great effusion of bloud, the Venetians good fortune altered, and how they lost sixteene Gallies, with their boates and mariners, who were taken by the Genoueses, and how the rest scatteringly scaping from the midst of the throng, speedily fled out of the Genoueses sight. This new losse was much lesse than that at Corfu, by reason they did not fight with so great number of vessels. But, like as to an ill-disposed bodie, euerie accesse of an ague (how little soeuer) is verie dangerous: euen so this new sorrow which followed the other at the heeles, did meruailously afflict the Venetians: and because the publike good fortune should bee else-where as successelesse, the victorious Genouese soone after the battaile of Hellespont sailed into Candie, where at his arriuall he tooke the Citie of Cydon. But in the middest of all these misfortunes, the Venetian was not discouraged. For after he had oftentimes renued his forces, he fought sundrie times with the enemie with different successe.

The Venetians defeated at the streight of Gallipolis.

Cydon in Candy taken by the Genoueses.

But neither the Historians whom we follow, nor the Annalists make any mention, in what place, or at what time, or with what successe it happened: so as we may truely saie, that no remarkeable thing was done all the rest of this warre, other than that which hath beene heeretofore spoken of. All Authors with one voice affirme that after all these reciprocall losses, receiued on either side, hauing in this cruell war (almost) wasted their forces, the mindes of either parties inclined to peace, rather of necessitie, than any true affection. For though their Armes were sequestred, their hatred still continued. Albeit the Authors whom we follow make no mention how long this Ligusticke warre lasted, neuertheless I gather by diuers obseruations, that it lasted not halfe so long as the former. Yet sure it is, though it were much shorter, it was more cruell: whereupon (as hath beene said) both parties did willingly listen to a peace, not with an intent wholly to lay by their Armes, but only because at that present they could doe no more. Now the Common-wealth beeing wearied with so manie garboiles, and scarcely freed from this warre, was assailed by two dangerous conspiracies of her owne Citizens: But as the Authors thereof were different in qualitie; so was the danger nothing like. For as the one was acted by people of meaner condition than the other, it was likewise the more easily broken; Such was that of Buconio, which happened before the other of Tepulo, beeing much more cruell.

An enforced peace betwixt the venetians & the Genoueses.

There dwelt in the Citie at the same time one named Marino Buconio, who was neither of the Senatours degree, nor yet of meane estate, but holding a middle ranke, and other-waies audacious and prompt to all mischiefe. This man being impatient of the publike libertie, or rather of the quiet which the Citie then enioied, determined with himselfe to kill the Prince, and some other principall persons of the Senate. Being thus resolued (in regard he durst not vndertake it alone) he imparted his designe to diuers of his owne quallitie, whom he knew of a long time to haue participated the same discontent, who without any more delaie approoued the deed, and freely promised him their assistance. It is most certaine that they had determined to kill the Prince and diuers of the Senate. But it is not knowne whether they did it to vsurpe the Segniorie, or else for enuie to see Gradonico in such a dignitie, who some yeares before had been elected by the Senators against their wils, and therefore had determined to murther him with the Authors of his creation. This conspiracie being discouered to the Prince, did greatly amaze him: but the danger neerly cõcerning him, he had no greater meanes speedily to quench it, than to seize on the body of Marino and his complices, who being taken and conuicted of the deed, were according to their deserts hanged betwixt the two Pillars.

Buconio his conspiracy.

The conspirators dessegne.

The punishment of the guilty.

There

There happened againe certaine ſtrife with the Paduans, who had fortified a place in the Lakes, which lie betwixt Chioggia and Albana, named Patabubula. For it is certaine that the Paduans intended ſo ſoone as they ſhould haue builded the Fort, and left garriſon therein, to make goodly ſalt-pits thereabouts in deſpite of the Venetians. But the Senate hauing ſent certaine troupes of ſouldiers thither for the purpoſe, did forthwith raze the Fort. The Paduans tooke this heinouſly, but daring not to ſtirre at that time, they did for a while ſhew themſelues neither friends nor enemies to the Venetians.

New contention with the Paduans.

Some Authors write, that at the ſame time they made warre on Paleologus Emperour of Greece, becauſe he refuſed to pay the Venetians a great ſumme of money which he ought them, but they tell not how that money was due: The fleet being readie for this purpoſe, (the ſupplies of Candie and Nigrepont being comprized therein) was of ſeuen and twentie Gallies, whereof Iuſtiniano was made Generall, who ſpeedily ſailed into the Ponticke Sea, where he tooke diuers Greeke ſhips (I know not whether it were by fight or ſurprize) and hanged vp all the Greekes that he found in them, becauſe (as I thinke) by their malice the Venetians and Baldwin were certaine yeares before driuen from Conſtantinople. From thence ſpoyling all along the Sea-coaſt, which lieth from Pera to Argire, he put all to fire and ſword, whereat the enemie was ſo amazed, as hauing paid the ſumme which was due, he in a manner with heaued-vp hands obtained peace of the Venetian. The victorious Armie returned to Venice with fifteene thouſand priſoners.

The Venetian Armie againſt the Emperour Paleologus.

Peace with Paleologus.

This victorie had in ſome ſort reſtored the Commonwealth, which languiſhed after the loſſes receiued in the ſecond Liguſticke warre, and by her home-bred conſpiracie, with hope of better fortune hereafter: at what time the troubles of Ferrara did throw it headlong into a greater danger. It came to paſſe by the Emperours ouerlong abſence out of Italie, that diuers new Lords had ſeized on the moſt famous Cities of Cis-alpine Gaule, as thoſe of Eſcalla on Verona, the Gonſagos on Mantua, and thoſe of Eſte on Ferrara. VVhoſe aneeſtors threeſcore yeares before this happened, hauing driuen Salinguerra from them, did in the Popes name gouerne the Citie; then being become maſters of Modena, and of the places neere adioyning, their power increaſed in ſuch ſort, as Charles the ſecond, King of Naples, married his daughter Beatrice to Azzon of Eſte, who at that time was verie famous. This man had a baſtard named Friſco, whom he had by another man's wife, who the ſame yeare that his father married Beatrice, ſurprized him by ambuſh, and ſhut him vp in priſon where he died. Azzon being dead, this deteſtable young man being fauoured by the Biſhop of the place, and by certaine Ferrarois, would haue aſſured to himſelfe the principalitie of Ferrara, gotten by parricide, and ſeizing almoſt on all, could not make himſelfe maſter of the Caſtle which was ſeated on the riuer of Po, on Bolognia ſide. To beſiege the which (becauſe that without ſhips he could not ouercome the garriſon within it for the neere neighbourhood to the riuer) he had recourſe to the Venetians: and hauing receiued a fleete from them for his aide, he did ſtraightly beſiege the place, ſo as the Venetians being encamped on the water, there was ſome likelihood that it would ſoone yeeld. The Popes Legate who lay then at Bolognia, ſo ſoone as he vnderſtood what had paſſed at Ferrara, ſent ſpeedily to the Venetian General, and earneſtly entreated him to deſiſt from his enterprize. And by chance as the Legates meſſengers arriued, a furious aſſault was giuen the Caſtle, which was the cauſe, that by meanes of the noiſe of Armour and ſhot, they could haue no audience. The Ferrarois in the meane time being moued (as it is to be thought) by the preſence of the meſſengers of the Popes Legate, and being diuided among themſelues, cried out that they would relie vpon the Legates promiſe, whereupon followed a great tumult of ſuch as fauoured the partie of the Church, and their owne libertie: This ſodaine alteration of the inhabitants, did greatly trouble the reſt, and principally Friſco: But the Venetians were ſo farre from being amazed with this new tumult, as on the contrarie hauing on a ſodaine fired the Ferrarois

How great miſchiefs the Emperours abſence out of Italy hath cauſed.

A deteſtable act of a baſtard.

The venetians help the baſtard.

The Venetians maſters of Ferrara.

rois ships, which the tyrant had assembled to besiege the castle, & giuen a more sharp assault, they ceased not, till hauing broken the bridge they entred the Fort of Thealdo: Frisco being incensed against the Ferrarois, for that they had so sodainly forsaken him, sent from the strongest places horsemen into the Citie, who set fire thereon in diuers parts. The townesmen then seeing themselues inuironed with Armes and fire: so soone as the tumult was appeased, they submitied themselues to the Venetians, making no mention of Frisco, whom they hated to the death. So soone as they yeelded, they had no more outrage done to them.

The Fort taken by the venetians

The Venetians albeit they would willingly haue kept the Citie for themselues, which they had receiued vnder their protection, neuertheless because they would not seeme to breake their promise with Frisco, they kept him in the Citie: Pope Clement who was then in France, after that he had vnderstood the misfortune of Ferrara, being vexed to see a feudatorie Citie of the Church of Rome to be so vnworthily handled by a tyrant, and at last made subiect to the Venetians, he forthwith imployed spirituall Armes against them, and excommunicated them, publishing ouer all Europe, that it was lawfull for any man to kill the Venetians whersoeuer they could finde them, as being excluded from the Communion of Christians, and enemies to the Church of Rome. This doe the Annales make mention of. But that which strangers write thereof, as it is more gentle, so is it likely to be more true; That the Venetians were interdicted from the vse of the Sacraments: his Holinesse adding that any man should do wel, who hauing any Venetian prisoner, should sell him as a slaue. This was the cause that in all the faires almost of France, the Venetians marchandize of great value, were by commaundement of the Princes and Lords miserably spoiled: As likewise in Calabria, and the marches neere to the Sea. In such sort as the Venetians hauing euerie where lost all that they had, were verie badly intreated, and some of them likewise slaine. Whereupon it happened during that time that they abstained from trafficke with strangers.

The venetians excommunicated by Pope Clement.

The tenure of the excommunication.

What miseries this excommunication brought to the venetians.

The Popes Legate in the meane time, after he had leuied great troops, and receiued certaine companies of horse from the Florentines, marched to Ferrara against the Venetians and Frisco. The townsmen at the first newes of the comming of the Papall Armie, reuolted from the Venetians, and let the Legates troopes (who were at their gates) into the Citie: The slaughter was great on both sides, but much more on the Venetians, who being chaced by the great number of the enemies, did speedily enter the Fort of Thealdo. The towne being recouered, the Legate sodainly commaunded to besiege the Castle. The Venetians (notwithstanding that they had alreadie sent to the Pope to treate with him about the yealding vp of Ferrara, and that the businesse could not sodainly be effected in regard of the distance of the places) fearing to receiue some greater losse, did freely yeeld vp the Castle which held out with a strong garrison.

The Citie of Ferrara recouered by the Popes Legat.

The Commonwealth being thus afflicted, was assailed by a cruell conspiracie, the which was likely to haue ouerthrowne both the libertie and the state. Baiamonti Tepulo, issued from a noble and illustrious family, but bearing a diuelish minde towards his countrey, and such peraduenture as did Catiline in time past to his, making vse (as it is to be thought,) of the times calamitie, wherein he perceiued the commonwealth to be tossed vp and down with so many miseries, conspired against it, together with diuers of the same qualitie and meanes, whom he had dealt with, and made partakers of his desligne. It is reported that they concluded at a certaine day appointed for the purpose to enter the Pallace by force with all their friends and confederates, and then, the Prince and Senators being in an instant murthered, to make themselues masters of the Commonwealth, and after the diuision betwixt themselues of the lands and offices of the state, to exercise open tirannie. This mischiefe was accompanied by another, for that diuers of the common people, wonne by faire promises, or set forward by a desire of noueltie, were in pay with the conspirators, vnto whom it is not likely that so great a designe was euer imparted, but that shew was made of some other matter.

The conspiracie of Tepulo.

The conspiraters purpose.

It

It is reported that vpon the appointed day (as if heauen would be the foreteller of of ſo damnable an enterprize) there aroſe a horrible tempeſt, intermingled with haile and raine, the ayre being filled with lightning and thunder. But the conſpirators making vſe of this prodigious tempeſt, in ſteed of being amazed therat, ranne armed with great noiſe to the Pallace. The enterprize being a little before reported to the Prince and Senate in great feare, did much amaze them. The alarme was ſodainly giuen ouer the whole Citie by men ſent for that purpoſe, who cried out aloud, that it behoued all men to take Armes, and to runne ſpeedily to the Pallace to the reſcue of the Prince and Senate, if they deſired to preſerue the Commonwealth. They ran thither from all parts, but the conſpirators in the meane time had filled the great and large market-place of Saint Marke with armed men, & without delay aſſailed the Pallace. Then the Senators (for diuers were with their weapons alreadie runne to their reſcue) did not onely ſuſtaine the conſpirators aſſault, but did valiantly repulſe them. There was a ſore fight. Libertie was the marke they aymed it: On the one ſide, theſe traytors had their weapons in hand againſt it: And on the other, the Prince and Senate would either die or preſerue it. In troth it was a lamentable ſpectacle to behold a Citie founded in libertie, growne vp in libertie, to maintaine the which thoſe ancient Venetian Fathers founders of the ſame, had ſo often fought with barbarous and cruel nations, and ſhed ſo much bloud by Sea and Land, to haue at laſt taken Armes againſt it ſelfe, and to deſire by thoſe Armes to ruine it ſelfe, and to call that libertie in queſtion among themſelues, which all men eſteemed ſo deare & pretious. It is to be thought that this pretence alone held them in awe. The Senators by exhortations to defend it, & the wicked Citizens with ſhame, and reproche. And the fight ceaſed not vntill ſuch time as the Senate getting the vpper hand, the conſpirators were beaten backe from the Pallace. It is reported that in this tumult Baiamont perceiuing it not good for him to tarrie there, as he was going home to his owne houſe through the Mercers ſtreete, a woman forth of a window threw a morter on his head, with which blow he fell halfe dead to the ground, and being there ſtayed by his hurt, was ſlaine outright by thoſe which purſued him, who ſoone after returned to the Pallace. Some of the conſpirators which were Patricians by birth being taken on the Dice-bridge, and brought backe into the Princes preſence were forthwith beheaded. Whereupon that place hath euer ſince borne the name of Maupas. And that the memorie of theſe wretches might be vtterly extinct, it was decreed in all places to deface the Armes of Baiamont and his complices: and that on paine of life no man to be ſo hardie as to keepe or ſet them vp in any place whatſoeuer. Their houſes were razed to the ground, and all their goods confiſcate: Some ſay that Baiamont his Pallace ſtood in the ſame place, where at this day the Hall of the ſhambles of Rialto ſtands. There was likewiſe a penſion appointed out of the publike treaſurie for the woman and her heires, who with the blow of the morter ſtayed Baiamont. The Citie was deliuered from this conſpiracie (as ſome ſay) on the day of Saint Vitis the martyr, whereupon in memorie thereof euerie yeare on the ſame day, the Cleargie doe go in proceſſion to Saint Vitis Church being accompanied by the Prince and Senate, to giue thanks to God for the preſeruation of the Commonwealth, and at their returne, a ſolemne banquet is made in the Pallace. Some Authors ſay that the iſſue of this conſpiracie was different from that which we haue ſpoken of, and that the Prince was aduertized of the whole matter before they went to Armes. VVhereupon Michaeli and Guido Canuto were ſent from the Senate to Baiamont, to entreate him not to attempt any thing againſt his countrey, and that the conſpirators did hardly ſuffer theſe men to returne with their liues. And after they had taken armes, and burnt and ſpoiled certaine places, they fought openly (as hath beene ſaid) but at laſt the conſpirators being roughly repulſed with great ſlaughter, the Senates partie proued the ſtronger: and that after the arriuall of Hugolino Iuſtiniano (who at the ſame time was Podeſtate of Chioggia, who came with troups of ſouldiers to the reſcue of the Prince) Baiamont & his adherents (who Strange prodigies happened that day that the conſpiracie ſhould haue beene executed.

The conſpirators aſſaile the Ducall pallace.

The death of Baiamont.

The puniſhment of the conſpirators.

A pention giuen to the woman who ſlew Baiamont.

Another opinion concerning the iſſue of the conſpiracie.

fortified themſelues on the other ſide of Rialto) being daunted, did yeeld themſelues vpon the Prince and Senates word, on condition, that all thoſe who were guiltie ſhould depart forth of the Venetian territorie, and by that meanes there was almoſt no Citie of Ciſalpine Gaule, nor village on all the Sea-coaſt of Flaminia and Forli, wherein ſome of theſe baniſhed conſpirators were not. But the former opinion is moſt true.

The ſixt rebellion of Zara.

Thoſe of Zara preſuming on theſe calamities did reuolt the ſixt time, hauing chaſed away Michaeli Moroſini the Gouernour. They forthwith ſent forces to recouer it vnder the command of Belletto Iuſtiniano. In the meane time the Prince deceaſed in the twelfth yeare and ninth moneth of his gouernment. His bodie was honorably buried in Saint Cyprians Church.

¶ MARINI GEORGIO, the 50. Duke of Venice.

MArini Georgio ſurnamed the Holy, did for his wiſdome ſucceed him. All the time of his Principalitie which laſted not a full yeare the Venetians were interdicted by the Pope by reaſon of the affaires of Ferrara, which cauſed the Common-wealth to receiue many diſcomodities as well at home as abroad. For we haue alreadie ſaid in what danger the conſpiracie of Tepulo had put it: And then ſoone after, the Armie had no good ſucceſſe before Zara.

Bellet was gone into Dalmatia with the Venetian troupes, among which were a thouſand horſe, who by the Senats appointment were commanded by Dalmaſio a Spaniard, a valiant man, who being at Ferrara in the Popes paie, had conſtrained the Venetians to leaue the Citie, and to retire into the Caſtle with great loſſe. The Venetian Armie being encamped in the next Iſland to the Citie, this Dalmaſio landed all his Cauallerie on the firme land, & encamped verie neere to Zara, fortifying his campe with good Trenches and Rampiers. Bannus commanded in the Citie with a good Garriſon. He comming forth of the Citie likewiſe with his troupes, did lodge within a mile of Dalmaſio. The whole Summer was almoſt ſpent without any memorable action: And Harueſt alreadie drewnere without any hope alat to tak the citie, when Bannus propounded certaine triuiall conditions of peace: which taking none effect, he beganne to vſe his cunning, and dealt ſecretly with Dalmaſio, to make him leaue the Venetians partie and to enter into the Citie, ſaying, That ſo ſoone as he ſhould come thither, he ſhould receiue ten thouſand crownes, and ſhould command mand therein with great entertainement ſo long as he would; and that the inhabitants ſhould defray his charges for corne and all other neceſſaries for his expence. And that when he ſhould pleaſe to returne into Italie or elſe-where, they would furniſh him with ſhippes, for himſelfe, his followers and their baggage.

This thus concluded. Dalmaſio made ſhew to be wearie of ſo long a ſiege, and determined the next day to giue a generall aſſault to the Citie: then hauing imparted his deſigne to diuers of his truſtie friends, hee willed them that when they ſhould come to the aſſault, they ſhould ſecretly bring from the Camp whatſoeuer they made moſt account of, and ſhould place it and themſelues in the formoſt ranckes, to the end that without any impediment they might retire into the Citie. The next morrow ſo ſoone as he had put his troupes in battaile, and was come to the Citie, to enter it at the firſt ſignall giuen he, beganne to ride towards the enemies Fort, whereat the Venetians were much amazed, when to the great contentment of the inhabitants, he entred the Citie.

Dalmation the Spaniard proued a traitor to the Venetians.

All men did infinitly wonder (as hath beene ſaid) of this ſodaine change of Dalmaſio, and were afraid leaſt this perfidious Traitor had practized ſome worſe matter againſt them, whereupon in haſte, for that they would receiue no greater loſſe, (for it was to be feared that thoſe of the Citie ioyned to the troupes which Bannus commanded not farre from thence would make ſome ſallie vpon them) they retired all their Cauallerie to the ſhippes. Dalmaſio being come into the Citie, and to ſhew that he was no fugitiue, but had ſome iuſt occaſion to doe what he had done, would needs take vpon him the part of an vmpire to treate of peace betwixt the Dalmatians and Venetians: wherein after he had a while laboured, and perceiuing he could doe no good by reaſon of the difficultie of the Articles propounded on either ſide, knowing beſides how the Venetians did hate him, for that he had forſaken them, and vnderſtanding likewiſe that the inhabitants did ſuſpect him, leauing off his negotiation of peace, and not deſiring to endanger himſelfe any longer there, he embarqued himſelfe in the veſſells which were promiſed him by the agreement, and ſailed towards Apulia. But being in the maine Sea, a terrible tempeſt aroſe on a ſodaine, by the which being toſſed here and there, and part of his ſhippes being daſht againſt the rockes, he loſt his followers and his goods: receauing by this meanes the deſerued guerdon of his treacherie. Hauing eſcaped ſhip-wracke, perceiuing all things to be contrarie vnto him, fearing with the loſſe of his meanes, to incurre the danger of his life, without making any long ſtay there, hee ſhipt himſelfe in a ſmall boat, and went into Italie. The ſmall time that the Principalitie of Marini laſted maketh me thinke, that the ſiege of Zara was not diſcontinued, but that it held out till they yeelded: which was (as I finde it) vnder Prince Souranza. Marini in the meane time builded at his owne coaſt a great Church and Couent to Saint Dominicke, where he founded a Colledge for ſtudents in diuinitie: He built hard by that place an Hoſpitall which he endued with rich rents, to the end that thoſe who ſhould celebrate diuine ſeruice there, together with the ſicke people, might be releeued and entertained by the Procurators of Saint Marke, vnto whom for theſe purpoſes he left the managing of all his wealth. After theſe godly workes accompliſhed, he deceaſed the tenth moneth of his gouernment, and was buried in the Church of the Twinnes.

The treatie of peace broken.

Dalmation diuinely puniſhed for his treacherie.

The godlie deeds doone by Prince Marini.

¶ GIOVANNI SOVRANZA, the 51. Duke of Venice.

Zara reduced vnder the Venetians obedience.

Iouanni Souranza a man of a verie ancient family, gentle & courteous, was choſen in his place: ſoone after his election, he receaued thoſe of Zara vnder his obedience, but with ſuch libertie & gentle conditions, as diuers thought, that thereby he miniſtred matter vnto them of a ſeauenth reuolt. Vitalis Michaeli was ſent thither as Gouernor. About the ſame time the number of the Procurators of Saint Marke was encreaſed to ſix, being before then much leſſe. It is ſaid likwiſe that at the ſame time the foundations were laid at Capeſalina as farre as the Church of the Trinitie: & that at the ſame time thoſe of Nona, Spalatra, Trahu, and Sacca, returned vnder the Venetians obedience.

The Authors diſcourſe on the doings of the Pope and Dandulo.

The Citie, which till then was interdicted by the Pope, was freed from it by the moſt charitable affection of Franciſco Dandulo ſent for that purpoſe to his Holineſſe. This man (as it is reported) being with great difficultie admitted to the preſence of Pope Clement (who did infinitly hate the Venetians about the Ferrara buſineſſe) by a wonderfull example of pietie towards his countrie, and with zeale to Religion, continued a long time proſtrate on the ground before the Popes table, with an Iron chaine about his necke like a dogge, vntill his wrath being appeaſed, he tooke away that note of infamie from his countrie, whereupon, euer ſince, hee was ſurnamed the Dogge, which title was giuen him abroad and at home, becauſe he was tyed like a dogge with an Iron chaine to the Popes table. But if it be lawfull for Hiſtorians, to cenſure of matters iuſt and vniuſt, and freely to vtter what they thinke thereof, we ſay that the act of Dandulo was not ſo religious, as that of the Popes was bitter, (I will not ſay proud) to ſuffer (not being moued thereat) a noble man, ſent from the moſt Chriſtian people, the nobleſt of Italie, to entreate him to blotte out a publike infamie, to couch ſo long like a dogge at his feet. Sure I am, the example of our heauenly King (whoſe Vickar and Vice-gerent he named himſelfe) might haue mooued him, who did not denie pardon to the miſerable theefe, ſo ſoone as he demanded it. It may bee thought that the Venetians had endured miſerie enough for ſeizing on the Caſtle of a neighbour citie (though peraduenture incited thereunto rather by the law of Nations, Friſco being their Allie, than vpon any promiſe or deſire of bootie) hauing beene lamentably robed and ſpoiled in all the faires of Europe, loſt a great quantitie of gold, and (which is worſe) diuers among them brought into bondage, and diuers likewiſe murthered. He ſatisfied his

The great pietie of Franciſco Dandulo.

haughtie

haughtie wrath, with the infamous eſtate of this man. But whether he were ſatisfied or no by this act, poſteritie neuertheleſſe ſhall for euer much more extoll the patience of the one, than the ouer-great ſeueritie of the other: He dealt hardly with him (as I haue ſaid) becauſe it was in his power ſo to doe, and this man made a religious vſe thereof, for that it ſo pleaſed him: Some peraduenture, but not verie many, will approue the Popes deed; but aſſuredly all men will not onely preferre this mans pietie, but highly admire it.

The Citie likewiſe was not vnthankefull to him, but gaue him publicke demonſtration, that it held nothing at ſo high a rate in her Citizens as meeknes and clemencie. They were not long ere they recompenced him. For they dealt ſo carefully, that ſoone afterward, he who not long ſince was ſeene for his countries ſake to endure ſhame and reproach, was inueſted with the markes and enſignes of the ſoueraigne magiſtrate. Clement, his wrath being appeaſed, ſhewed himſelfe afterward truly meeke and clement. For, beſides the aboliſhing of the interdiction, he decreed likewiſe, That the Venetians ſhould neuer afterward be excommunicated by the Popes for the like occaſion, or for any other whatſoeuer. And his pleaſure was that this his declaration ſhould be enregiſtred.

Dandulo his pietie acknowledged

About the ſame time Iuſtiniano ſurnamed Iuſtinian, went to Sea with foureteene Gallies: Hee had commiſſion to ſcoure the Sea and to meete with eleuen Gallies of Genoa, (who as it was reported) had runne to diuers faires in Europe to repriſe, and ſpoile the Venetians good: But being come to the Ponticke Sea, he drew neere to the Citie of Capha, where diligently enquiring whether the ſame were true which was reported of the Genoueſes, he found it to be a falſe report giuen out by ſuch as deſired noueltie, and to ſee theſe two people at oddes. The Genoueſes who dwelt in that Citie, fearing vnder this pretence that the Venetian would hurt them, promiſed him by ſolemne oath all aide and aſſiſtance. Iuſtiniano thinking it moſt vniuſt to hurt thoſe who had not offended them, without offering them any hurt brought backe his Armie ſafely to Venice.

Falſe reports againſt the Genoueſes.

A deed worthie of a Generall of an Armie.

This was done abroad. But in the meane time at home in the Citie, they beganne ſomewhat to enlarge the olde Arcenall, which being ſince then greatly augmented, hath beene in our daies ſo much enlarged, that the circuit thereof, being walled in, ſeemeth a farre off a little Citie, ſo that it may be more properly called a Repoſitorie of all things, than an Arcenall: For, beſides an hundred Gallies, which are there alwaies readie, & haue neuer yet wet Ankor, but are onely ſupported by their bridges, there is to be ſeene almoſt as many halfe made vp, and ſome of them almoſt made vp, with an infinite number of other ſmall boates, and ſo great quantitie of of all kind of Armor and munition, as a verie huge Armie may be eaſily furniſhed therewith.

Deſcription of the Arcenall.

It is thought that about the ſame time a nauall Armie was ſent forth for the guard of the Iſlands and Sea-coaſt of the Ionian and Ægean Seas, which neuertheleſſe performed nothing worthie of memorie. Iuſtiniano who certaine yeares before had beene with a Fleet in the Cherſoneſſus of Tauris, was commanded the twelfth yeare of this Princes gouernment to goe forth with fortie Gallies againſt the Genoueſes: who ſailed into the Ponticke Sea, where he ſunke diuers ſhippes of warre of Genoa to the number of foure and thirtie, who had inuaded the dominions belonging to the Venetians. Thoſe of Pera being danted at the ruine of their fellowes, and deſirous quickly to fortifie themſelues, filled certaine ſhippes full of earth and other weightie matter which they ſuncke before the Citie. Iuſtiniano neuertheleſſe came and beſieged the towne, and cauſed woodden caſtles and other engins of warre to be ſet vp in the ſhippes, to batter it. Which the Genoueſes perceiuing, and well weighing the great danger which threatned them, turning their defence to entreaties, they beſought the Venetians to ceaſe the batterie; ſaying that they would recompence the loſſes which the Venetians had ſuſtained by them, together with the

A new Armie againſt the Genoueſes.

Thoſe of Pera conſtrained to ſue for peace.

the expence of that great Armie. On theſe conditions peace beeing graunted the Armie returned ſafe to Venice.

New ſtirres in Candie ſoone ſuppreſſed.

Much about the ſame time, or ſoone after, there aroſe a new rebellion in Candie. Iuſtiniano, who in the laſt voiage to Greece made an approach to Pera with the Venetian Gallies, commanded the Iſland. So ſoone as hee had leuied all his forces againſt thoſe new tumults, hee vſed ſuch diligence, as in a moment he ſuppreſſed them, and reduced the fearefull Candiots to their former obedience. In the interim of theſe affaires in Grecia, they treated in Italie with the Paduans, about the turning back of the ordinarie courſe of the Brent into the Sea. The Paduans were at the ſame time moleſted by Maſtin of Eſcalla. Wherefore the Venetians ſought by all meanes to free them, as their neighbours, from this warre, quite forgetting the iniuries receiued from the Paduans in their aduerſitie. For during the interdiction of Pope Clement, the Venetians neuer had worſe enemies than the Paduans: And becauſe ſince then, there had beene no reconciliation betwixt them, the Paduans, being vanquiſhed by thoſe of Eſcalla, were brought into bondage: But the Venetians neuer ceaſed, till they had driuen the Tyrant forth of the Cittie, and reſtored the Paduans to their ancient libertie, committing the gouernment of the Citie to Marſilio Carrario, who afterwards did carefully cheriſh the friendſhip and alliance of the Venetians. This is all which happened abroad or at home during the Principalitie of Souranza. Some neuertheleſſe ſay, that in his time there was a conſpiracie againſt the Common-wealth. But we finde no ſuch matter in the principall Authors. His gouernment laſted ſixteene yeares and ſix moneths; and hee lieth buried in that Chappell of Saint Markes Church where the Font ſtandeth.

The Venetians reſtore the Paduans to their libertie.

¶ Francisco Dandvlo, the 52. Duke of Venice.

Francisco Dandulo ſurnamed the Dogge (as hath beene ſaid) was choſen in his ſted.

At the beginning of his gouernment, victualls beeing verie deere in the Citie, hee diſpatched certaine Gallies and ſhippes of burthen into Sicilie to fetch Corne vnder the conduct of Nicholao Phalerio, who brought home ſuch quantitie of wheat, as in few daies (to the peoples great contentment) the ſcarcitie ceaſſed. At the ſame time eight Gallies of Genoa tooke two of Venice, returning from France in trade of Marchandize. The goods within them were taken by the Gehoueſes : but the ſailers, and marriners (for that they muſt either die or bee taken priſoners) leapt into the Sea, and by ſwimming ſaued themſelues on the neighbour-ſhoares : The Polani and the Valeſians, who had bin along time ſubiect to the Patriark of Aquileia, did voluntarily yeeld themſelues to the Venetians: whereat the Patriarch beeing incenſed, did ſpeedily leuie troupes of Souldiers to ſurpriſe them: The Venetians on the other ſide (becauſe they would not ſeeme to abandon thoſe who of their owne motion had lately come to their obedience) ſent great forces into Hiſtria vnder the command of Iuſtiniano ſurnamed Iuſtinian. The Patriarke of Aquileia, knowing himſelfe not of force ſufficient to with-ſtand the Venetians, did without any memorable fight, reſigne vnto them Pola, and Valles, vpon certaine conditions whereof the Authours make no mention.

Abundance of Corne in the Citie.

of

The Polans and Valeſiās brought vnder the obedience of the Venetians.

Agreement with the Patriarke of Aquileia.

Six Genoa Gallies fought with eight of Venice conducted by Thomaſo Viari, deputed for the guard of the Iſlands and Sea-coaſtes ; in which fight the Venetian was defeated with the loſſe of fiue Gallies, and the other three eſcaped, and came home to Venice. With this loſſe the Senate was much diſpleaſed : who being informed that it hapned by the negligence of Viari, committed him to priſon, where (as it is reported) he ended his daies.

Viari confined to perpetuall priſon.

The Turkes in the meane time not ſatisfied with driuing the Chriſtians forth of Syria, by their ordinarie incurſions became likewiſe Maſters of the Sea, and had ſo ſpoiled the coaſtes of Candie, Ciprus, and Rhodes, as there was no ſafe ſailing into the Leuant.

The great incurſions of the Turkes.

The Venetians at the purſute of Pope Iohn the two and twentieth, had dealt with the French King, vnto whom were ſent Philippo Bellegno, Blazio Zeni, and Marino Moroſini, to conclude a voiage againſt the Turkes. Some Annalles in ſted of Pope Iohn ſet downe Pope Nicholas ; but they erre greatly therein, ſeeing that from Pope Nicholas the fourth till that verie time, there was no Pope of that name.

In this Treatie made with the French King concerning the recouerie of Syria, and reſiſting the attempts of the Turkes, it was concluded, That he ſhould ſend twentie thowſand horſe, and fifteene thowſand foote ; and that the Venetians ſhould furniſh an hundred veſſells, among which ſhould bee diuers Armed Gallies, with foure thouſand Souldiours, and beſides, diuers Marchant-ſhippes to carrie the victualls, munition and other neceſſaries for the Campe. But the French-men failing (for thoſe Tramontani are held to bee ſlow and negligent in vndertaking ſuch remote iournies, albeit they are valiant and couragious to execute haughtie enterprizes, and (which is moſt commendable in this Nation) are verie affectionate to Chriſtian Religion) the preparation of this goodly enterpriſe by little and little vaniſhed into ſmoake. The Barbarians waxing more inſolent by this ſlackneſſe, and negligence, did in a manner by their ordinarie incurſions, keepe the Seas, as it were beſieged. The danger neuertheleſſe which daily increaſed, enforced the Pope and ſome Chriſtian Princes to take Armes againſt them. The Venetians firſt of all ſet forth a great number of ſhippes, of which Pietro Zeni was made Generall. This man purſuing the Barbarians in all places, did with meruailous good ſucceſſe free the whole Sea-coaſtes and the Iſlands neere to Syria, from the incurſions and ſpoiles of the Turkes : Diuers others likewiſe did with good ſucceſſe fight for Chriſtendome with that cruell Nation ; but cheefly the Venetians, who tooke from them an infinite number of ſhippes, when by Zeni his command all the Priſoners were forthwith hanged. Hauing thus aſſured the nauigation, he brought back his victorious Armie to Venice.

The enterpriſe againſt the Turkes broken.

The Turkes put to flight by the Venetians.

It is reported, That at the ſame time the Sunne ſuffered a meruailous eclipſe at

A wonderfull eclipſe.

at noone-date for the ſpace of three houres. Prince Dandulo cauſed a new coine to bee ſtamped, called Meàtani. The power of thoſe of Eſcalla was at the ſame time wonderfully encreaſed, in ſuch ſort as all men farre and neere ouer all Lombardie ſtood in awe of them: For beſides Verona, Vincenza, and Breſſia, which they before poſſeſſed, they had newly ſeized on Parma, after they had by treacherie driuen thence the Roſsi: And they had alreadie ſurprized Feltre, Belluna, and Ceneda from Iohn King of Boheme. Treuiſo likewiſe (according to ſome Authors, namely thoſe which haue written the Venetian Hiſtorie) did obey them. Blondus neuertheleſſe ſaith, That Treuiſo belonged to the Venetians, at ſuch time as they began the warre againſt Maſtin of Eſcalla. But I can hardly approue his opinion, becauſe we do not finde that the Venetians did then poſſeſſe any Towne of the firme Land: ſeeing if it were ſo, it would appeare in ſome ſort, at what time, and in what manner the Venetians had taken ſo famous a Citie. For my opinion, The contrarie (reported by others) is farre more probable: to witte, That the Venetians tooke it in this warre which they had againſt Maſtin; whereof wee are to ſpeake. They had likewiſe (to the end that nothing might bee wanting to their happineſſe) ſubiected the Citie of Padua, a little before the warre began. For Marſilio, named by others Ybertino Carrario, beeing not able to preſerue that Citie in her ancient libertie, by reaſon of their ciuill diſſenſion, ſuffered it to fall into bondage; whereunto becauſe hee had ſo eaſily conſented, Eſcalla permitted the Carrarians to command the Citie in his name. Maſtin waxing proud with this good ſucceſſe (following humane couetouſneſſe, which knowes leſſe how to behaue it ſelfe in proſperitie than in aduerſitie) reſoluing to diſturbe the Venetians, ſpeedily built a Fort in the lakes neere to Petabubula, which he manned with a ſtrong Garriſon. The Venetians, knowing whereunto his deſſignes tended fortified a place likewiſe which they held, not farre from thence. Afterwatds they conſulted by what force or meanes they might tame and daunt this infeſtuous Tyrant, who hauing ouerthrown the neighbouring forces panted (as it were) with deſire to maſter theirs. And therfore there was ſome likely-hood, that after he had aſſured his owne eſtate, he would forthwith make warre on the Venetians.

The power of thoſe of Eſcalla.

The courſe of the warre with thoſe of Eſcalla.

To preuent Maſtin of his purpoſe, (for hee was the eldeſt of all the familie of Eſcalla) the Venetians haſtened the warre. His forces, as they were the greateſt of all his neighbours, ſo were they the moſt maligned: For worldly matters haue this propertie, That there is nothing which ſo much procureth enuie and hatred, as too great felicitie. Although the number of thoſe who enuied him were verie great, The Venetians neuertheleſſe, had leaſt cauſe of all men to looke after him, in reſpect that holding nothing as yet in the firme Land, they had till then ſatisfied themſelues with being ſtrong at Sea, not caring for more, eſteeming their fortune great enough, in regard of their Sea-traffike: This then being truth, the Venetians had no cauſe to feare the Tyrant, although his forces were terrible to others, as to Obiſſo of Eſte, Philippo Gonzaga, Azzo Viſ-conte, and the Florentines in Tuſcanie: who becauſe he had taken the Citie of Luca not far from them, ſtood in great feare of his power.

Pietro Roſsis of Parma, with his brethren, all valiant and braue men, were capitall enemies to the houſe of Eſcalla, for that Maſtin, vnder pretence of future alliance, had driuen them forth of Parma, & laid plots for their liues, which they hauing notice of, fled to Pontremolla, where Maſtin did ſtreightly beſiege them, at ſuch time as the Venetians with others, confedered them-ſelues againſt him.

League and alliance againſt the familie of Eſcalla.

After diuers Ambaſſages ſent from partie to partie, the Florentines and all the Princes of Tranſ-alpine Gaule, who were iealous of the forces of thoſe of Eſcalla, ioined themſelues with the Venetians againſt Maſtin and his whole familie: But ſome Authours affirme that the Florentines alone did allie themſelues at the beginning, aud that the reſt came after the warre was begun. Iohn King of Bohem did likelikewiſe ioine with them, for the recouerie of the Cities which were taken from him in Italie: Yet for all that the Venetians were the firſt motiues of the warre. It is reported that they neuer vndertooke warre with more courage; not for feare or enuie to them, beeing free from both theſe paſſions, (as hath beene ſaid) but becauſe they thought it well beſeeming people, borne in libertie, mightie and rich, to defend as well the libertie of others, and chiefly of their neighbours, as their own.

What moued the Venetians to make warre on thoſe of Eſcalla.

10

()

The end of the firſt Booke of the ſecond Decade.

20

30

40

50

THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE SECOND DECAD Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the ſecond Booke of the ſecond Decad.

PIETRO ROSSIS, the Parmeſan, being made Generall of the Armie of the League, defeateth the Cauallerie of thoſe of Eſcalla, neare to Luca in Tuſcanie. ESCALLA recouereth Vderza, which hee had a little before loſt. ROSSIS, ſo ſoone as he had receiued the Enſeignes of S. MARKE, comes and encampeth before La Mot. The Venetians mercenarie Souldiers ſlaine by trecherie at Meſtra. ROSSIS, hauing with his Armie paſſed the Riuer Brente, ſeizeth on the enemies camp. The Venetian Armie ſcattered here and there about the Countrie neare to Padua; with the encounter which it had neare to Verona. Thoſe of Cognilian yeeld to the Venetians. Sedition in Padua. Diuers Ambaſſadours arriue at Venice at one time to treate of peace. Padua reſtored to her ancient libertie; the faction of ESCALLA being driuen thence. The Gouernement of the Citie of Padua giuen to the Carrarians. PIETRO and MARSILIO DE ROSSIS, ſoone die one after another. Diuers battailes wonne from the enemies on the confines of Vincenza, and Cremona. GALEAS Viſconte taketh Bergamo and Breſſia, from thoſe of Eſcalla. Peace with thoſe of Eſcalla after the loſſe of the Citie of Treuiſo, and diuers other places. The Citie afterward protected from a great inundation at the interceſſion of S. MARKE.

Warre concluded againſt thoſe of Eſcalla.

THE league againſt the Tyrants being concluded, the Senate commanded that all thoſe who were able to beare Armes, ſhould be enrolled. It is reported that at the ſame time, aboue fortie thouſand men, from the age of twentie yeares to threeſcore, were enrolled, with ſuch willingneſſe, as many of all ſorts and ages, did voluntarily follow the Armie, without any publike or particular pay, but only pricked forward with a deſire to extinguiſh this tyrannie which was ſo neare them. Notwithſtanding, they were not of opinion to aſſaile the enemie with all their forces at the firſt, but following their ancient cuſtome, to beginne ſleightly, and then to continue it feruently. Now, whileſt theſe two mightie people of Italie were preparing their Armies, it is ſaid, That vpon the report of this warre diuers ranne thither, out of France and Italie, to ſerue them, who being deſirous to take the Venetians pay, after they had trauerſed Tuſcanie and Flaminia (the paſſages through Lombardie being ſhut vp) arriued at Rauenna. For all places on this ſide and beyond the Po, with whatſoeuer ſoeuer lieth vnder the Alpes, (Bologna and Ferrara excepted) were againſt the Venetians. For neither Luchin Viſconte who commanded in Milan, nor Philippo Gonzaga, had as yet ſhewed themſelues to bee againſt Eſcalla. And albeit the Bolognians were at the ſame time diuided among themſelues, and excommunicated by the Pope, becauſe they had driuen the Legate Apoſtolicall forth of the Citie, they did neuertheleſſe freely ſuffer the Venetians, to leuie Souldiers in their Territories, with whom ſoone after, they alſo ioyned their forces.

People come from all parts to the Venetian Armie.

Oſtaſio Polentano, at that time Lord of Rauenna, affecting the Venetians, did willingly receiue the French-men, who arriued in the Citie, and ſent them ſpeedily in ſmall boats to Venice. There was prouiſion made in the Citie, neare to the Church of Mendigotis (which is one of the fartheſt parts of the Citie) of lodging for thoſe which came thither, and of victualls, and other neceſſaries, vntill ſuch time as the Armie were readie to march againſt the enemie.

Pietro Roſsis declared Generall of the Venetians Armie.

There liued at the ſame time Pietro Roſſis of Parma, accounted among the Nobleſt families of Italie, a man moſt skilfull in martiall diſcipline. The Venetians (notwithſtanding he was abſent) elected him Generall of their Armie. This man albeit he was ſtreightly beſieged by Maſtin, imagining neuertheleſſe that the time was come, with other mens forces to reuenge the wrongs done to himſelfe and his brethren, determined becauſe he would not looſe ſuch an occaſion (for the Venetians had alreadie entreated him by letters to come thither) to paſſe in diſguiſe through the enemies Campe, (not being able to eſcape thence by a forcible ſallie) and to goe to Florence, and from thence to Venice.

There liued with him his wife, a very vertuous and chaſt Ladie, who loued her huſband dearely, and was not ignorant of his moſt ſecret affaires. Shee conſidering with her ſelfe, into what danger he expoſed his life, and how great the attempt was which he vnder-tooke, caſting her ſelfe weeping at his feete, entreated him after this manner.

The complaint of Pietro Roſsi's VVife.

FOr Gods ſake (deare husband) and by the loue and bond of Matrimonie, deſiſt from this dangerous enterpriſe, and weigh with your ſelfe how your eſtate ſtandeth, and in what place you leaue my wretched ſelfe with your Daughters. (It is reported that he had ſixe Daughters, who comming all about him, drenched in teares, made the ſame requeſt like their Mother.) Alas (ſaid ſhee) what ſhall become of me, if, thou being taken by the enemies ambuſh (which God forbid) I ſhould loſe thee, and of theſe poore wretches likewiſe, who beſides God, haue none other hope but in thee? Doe you thinke the arrogant enemie will omit ſuch an opportunitie, or will not rather attempt by ſome ſodaine aſſault, to winne both this place and vs, deſtitute of thine aide? who doubteth but he will ſoone winne all? But, alas, what ſhall then become of me, and theſe poore Wenches? Doeſt thou thinke they will ſpare the honour of thine, who haue not ſpared thy life. This vnruly enemie will leape for ioy, when he ſhall haue power to quench his hatred towards thee by the diſhonour of thy Daughters, or elſe hee will command his Souldiers to torment them: He will ſpoile, robbe, and burne, thoſe poore meanes which Fortune hath left vs. Who doubts but that then their condition will be better, which ſhall not liue to ſee any of theſe miſchiefs. I poore wretched and vnhappie creature ſhall ſee it. But what did I ſay? ſee it? nay, rather ſhall feele whatſoeuer poore priſoners are wont to expect from a cruell and mercileſſe enemie. If the feare of thine owne life moues thee not; this at the leaſt which I haue ſpoken ought to moue thee: All this which I haue ſpoken, I doe as verily beleeue will come to paſſe, as I hold that to be true which I ſee before mine eies: Tarrie then here ſtill, deare husband, and with thoſe ſmall meanes thou haſt continue to defend thy ſelfe and vs, let me entreat thee to put off thy iourney till our affaires ſtand on ſurer termes. I hope ſo ſoone as the enemie ſhall haue notice that the Venetians haue entred his territories beyond the Po, that he will ſpeedily depart hence, and then thou maieſt ſafely go to thy charge. Thus did ſhe ſpeake.

Pietro

Pietro Rossis answere to his wife.

THe husband being moued with her teares, albeit he was valiant and couragious, gaue her few words: he knew all that she had said was true, but to comfort her thus afflicted, & to put her in hope. He entreated her to be comforted, to hope the best, telling her that she should shortly see him returne with place of commaund to ouerthrow the power of those, who by treason had driuen him from his dignitie, and had attempted against his life, and those of his familie. That he did verily beleeue that the enemie would soone depart thence, but in the meane time he entreated her to remaine firme and constant, and to looke carefully to his children, and to the affaires of his house: As for the Guard of the Fort, he told her, that he did repose so much trust in the fidelitie and valour of his owne souldiers, as that they would sufficiently defend her, and maintaine the siege so long, as the enemie should at last whether he would or no be enforced to raise his campe: Besides, that he was of necessitie to make hast, least he should seeme to contemne so honourable a charge, That the passing through the enemies campe was not so dangerous a matter as she thought; For diuers great Captaines had in times past, not onely gone through their enemies campe in disguise, but had likewise stayed there for a time till they had carefully enquired of the state of the enemie: He willed her then to cease weeping and lamenting, and no more to entreate him to the contrarie, because he was of necessitie to depart. He said moreouer, that men being incited by vertue, did attempt diuers great enterprises, but that necessitie made them to execute greater: And thus after he had recommended her, himselfe, his children, & houshold, to his friends whom he left in Garrison, he gaue order for his departure.

Sentence of a great Captaine.

Some Authors say, that he left one of his brethren to guard the place, and others thinke that he sent them before to Venice, where after that their brother was chosen Generall, they were made Gentlemen of Venice. Thus after that he had embraced all his people, about midnight he departed in disguised habite, accompanied with one onely faithfull and valiant friend, and went through the enemies campe to Florence, where he was receiued with great ioy of all men. But being diligent, and an enemie to sloth, he would needs go vpon some enterprize. Whereupon soone after he marched with the Florentines forces to the countrey of Luca, where putting all to fire and sword, he rode with a few troupes, euen to the gates of the Citie, From whence carrying great bootie, and being come forth of the enemies countrey, into a countrey of safetie, he fell into an Ambuscado.

Rossis departeth in disguised habit.

Fiue hundred horse sent by Mastin to guard the Citie, sallied forth on the other side of the towne, and came galloping into a forrest, through which they knew the enemie must passe at his returne, where they ambusht themselues. As he returned, those of the Ambuscado breaking forth with great cries amazed those in the Vantguard, who conducted the bootie, and did defeat and put them to rout: diuers were slaine there, and the ensignes of the Vantguard taken. Newes of this encounter being brought to the Captaine, who led the Rereward, and diuers of those which fled being alreadie come to their fellowes, saying that all was lost, Rossis being very quick and sodaine, after he had sharpely rebuked them for their flight stayed them, and commaunded them to follow his ensignes, and take courage; then did he brauely receiue the enemie, who being ioyfull for his imaginarie victorie, came towards him. The fight began verie cruell, but the Captaines presence turned the feare of his souldiers vpon the enemies, who with great slaughter were defeated, and pursued to the Citie, where the bootie and ensignes were not onely rescued, but those of the enemies were taken, the which Pietro returning victorious to Florence, commaunded to be dragged through the Citie. The victorie did greatly encrease his first reputation; there was nothing spoken but of his valour and prowesse; all men said that the vnbridled boldnesse of those of Escalla should by his conduct be in short time abated, iudging him worthie of the place which was giuen him.

Roffis first exploit.

Pietro Rossis his first victorie.

In

In ſuch reputation was Roſsis: who being readie to march towards Venice, tarried for the troupes which the Florentines promiſed by their agreement to ſend, when as the Venetians in the meane time had begun the warre, but not with ſo good ſucceſſe as was done in Tuſcan. Gerard Caminenſis, an allie of the Venetians, hauing taken armes againſt thoſe of Eſcalla, departed about midnight from the Citie of Metta, (commonly called the Motte) and ſeiſed on Vderza. Maſtin vpon report of the taking therof (ſome ſay that it was Albert, who made this iourney) marched ſpeedily with his troupes towards the enemie: and being come into the territorie of the Vderzans, he ſent his beſt armed horſe before the Citie, and himſelfe with the reſidue of his troupes followed a farre off, with an intent to encloſe the enemie if he came forth vnaduiſedly to fight. Theſe forerunners being come neere to the walles, were ſodainly repulſed by thoſe of the towne, who neuertheleſſe returned againe to the skirmiſh of ſet purpoſe to draw the ememie farre from the Citie. The which hauing done, and being come to the place of ambuſh, thoſe of Eſcalla ſodainly iſſued forth, and enforced the Garriſon to flie towards the Citie: Then the horſemen by the tyrants commundement alighted, and aſſailing the Citie on euerie ſide, they greatly amazed thoſe that were within, who were few in number, in reſpect of the largeneſſe of the place: ſo ſoone then as thoſe of Eſcalla came to the aſſault, the Garriſon diſtruſting their owne ſmall number, forſooke the walles and fled: Then the aſſailants, after they had broken vp the gates, entred and ſlue the enemie in all places. There were few priſoners taken, and among others, Gerard made one of the number.

Girard Caminenſis taketh Vderza.

Vderza being recouered, the enemie marched towards Camino, which he likewiſe tooke in few daies, after that he had corrupted the Garriſon with money: It is thought that if he had gone to the Motte, he might with eaſe haue taken it. But by his negligence which commonly followeth a great conqueſt, the ſouldiers wanting victuals and a warlike Leader to conduct them, running heere and there without obſeruing martial diſcipline, forſooke their enſignes. The Venetians in the meane time ſtirred not. For Marſilio, who at the beginning came to Venice, deputed by his brother, was leauying forces, and being not yet ſtrong enough, he durſt not march againſt the enemie, for feare leaſt at the firſt he ſhould commit ſome error. Some Authors affirme, that Marſilio was left by his brother in Pontremolle to ſuſtaine the ſiege. And the Venetian Annaliſts write, that he was at the ſame time in Venice.

Albert of Eſcalla recouereth Vderza.

Want of a Generall.

Maſtin of Eſcalla ſent commiſſioners to Venice to demannd a peace, offering to withdraw his Garriſon, and to raze the Fort which he had builded in the lake neere to Petabubula. But they obtaining nothing of the Venetians, returned without any peace. Roſsis in the meane time with fifteene hundred horſe, namely eight hundred which he had receiued of the Florentines, three hundred from the Bolognians, and the reſidue of Obiſſo of Eſte, paſſing through the countrey of Ferrara, came to Chioggia, where embarking himſelfe with a few of his followers, he came to Venice. A troupe of Senators at his landing went to receiue and gratifie him, and brought him directly to the Prince, who ſpake thus vnto him.

Maſtin beggeth peace of the Venetians.

Pietro de Roſsis arriueth at Venice.

The Princes ſpeech to de Roſsis.

GEnerous Pietro, thine excellent vertue ſo much renowned euerie where, hath bene the cauſe, that being to make warre on the Lords of Eſcalla for diuers iniuries receiued from them, we haue eſteemed thee alone among all the Captaines of Italie, worthie to aſsiſt vs, chiefly in ſo difficult a buſineſſe. We haue thought it fit from the beginning to elect a Generall, to whoſe hands we might commit our forces to fight on the firme land. But according to the common report, we haue found no man, I will not ſay that ſurpaſſeth thee, (for that cannot bee) but that can in any ſort equall thee, either in counſell or valour. We therefore haue choſen thee being abſent,

abſent, and buſied in a troubleſome warre, to commaund all our forces: Being aſſured that it will come to paſſe if thou be ſuch an one as all men report thee, and we hope that thou wilt proue, that ſo ſoone as thou ſhalt haue ſubiected vnto vs this proud enemie, thou wilt free both thy ſelfe and thine from this warre, and brauely reuenge all the wrongs which thou haſt receiued from him. It is almoſt incredible to tell how great the hope is which we haue conceiued, that our affaires will proſper, hauing thee for our Generall in this warre, which haſt as much reaſon to fight for vs as for thy ſelfe. It is no matter whether an enemie be ouerthrowne by reward or hatred. His ruine then being as profitable to thee as to vs, this our exhortation may ſeeme needleſſe. We intreat thee neuertheleſſe well and faithfully to gouerne what ſhall be committed to thy charge, as becommeth an aſſociate and a good Generall. Opportunitie the mother of all things will ſhew thee time and place fitter for thy deſignes: And we on the other ſide will furniſh thee with ſouldiers, victuals, munition, and abundantly with the principall ſinue of warre, which is money. Take then theſe publike enſignes which to thy ſelfe and to the Commonwealth likewiſe we pray may proue moſt fortunate, the which ſhall follow thee whereſoeuer thou ſhalt commaund, and thy ſouldiers them. And we beſeech God to fauour thy proceedings, to the end that thou mayeſt bring them backe vnto vs, not onely ſafe, but victorious.

Roſsis receiueth the enſignes of Saint Marke.

So ſoone as Roſsis had receiued the ſignes of his office, he anſwered in few words the Princes ſpeech, leauing behind him a greater hope of himſelfe, than if he had vſed many words in his owne praiſe: and preſently he departed with all his troupes. Blondus writeth that he came firſt to Treuiſo: thinking thereby that the ſame Citie was then ſubiect to the Venetians: Others thinke, that it was on the confines of Padua and Treuiſo: and ſome who are moſt worthie of beliefe (for the enemie then held all thoſe places which they name) affirme that the Rendeuous of the whole Armie was at the Motte. In that place he made the generall muſters of his Armie, and found that he had, beſides the ſuccours of the Allies, foure thouſand fiue hundred horſe, and ſixe thouſand foote, beſides great numbers of victuallers, ſouldiers boyes, and ſuch like people which follow a campe. The Earles of Colalta, who before had held the partie of Eſcalla, came to the campe well accompanied, as did diuers others from the confines of Forli, from beyond the mounts, and out of Germanie, who being come thither vpon the report of this warre did greatly encreaſe the Venetian Armie.

A generall reuiew of the Armie.

Maſtin, ſo ſoone as he vnderſtood the departure of Pietro Roſsis, and what he had done at the ſame time before Luca, whileſt he remained at Florence, raiſed his camp from before Pontremolle, and reſolued firſt of all to ſuccour the Luquois, and to put a ſtrong Garriſon into the Citie, for he feared leaſt his furious enemie ſhould ſnatch that towne from him. But hauing notice that he was called to Venice, and learning by his ſpies what abundant warlike preparations the Venetians made, he ſpeedily came to his Armie at Verona. Albert brother to Maſtin, had in the meane time placed a ſtrong Garriſon in Padua, and did nothing without the aduice and counſell of Vbertino Carrario, whereby we may perceiue that it was Albert, and not Maſtin, who was farre from thence (as all authors affirme) which recouered Vderza. Thus Maſtin being carefull to eſpie all meanes how to fruſtrate the Venetians firſt attempts, or if that could not be, at leaſtwiſe to foreſlow them by ſome hindrance, not being able to doe it by open force, had recourſe to deceit.

Maſtin raiſeth his campe from before Pontremolle,

A certaine man called Thomaſino commaunded at the ſame time in Meſtra, an inward friend of Spineta Maleſpina, who was in Maſtins campe, in whoſe name he held that place, ſituated on the Treuiſan territorie neere to the lakes of Venice. This man by the counſell of Spineta, enterpriſed a villanous act againſt the Venetians. He agreed and promiſed to yeeld the Citie to the Venetians, prouided that they would giue him fiue thouſand crownes, and gaue for aſſurance thereof his wife and ſonne for hoſtages: And the day of the execution being come, Albert and Spineta entred the towne at midnight with certaine troupes of horſe and foote. The Venetians, albeit they held the traitor ſufficiently bound vnto them in regard of the hoſtages hoſtages, thinking that they ought not to be ouer-credulous, would not ſuffer any naturall Venetian to be of that night-enterpriſe. Fiue hundred ſtranger-Souldiours were ſent thither, vpon whome ſo ſoone as they entred the Citie a little before daie, the Souldiours of Eſcalla breaking forth of of their Ambuſhe made a furious aſſault. The number of the priſoners was few: as thoſe whoſe liues, fortune and danger had rather ſaued, than the intent of the enemies; all the reſt were ſlaine: Then cauſing his Cauallerie on a ſodaine to ſallie forth on thoſe which were without, verie few eſcaped. Albert thinking he had giuen the Venetians a great blowe, leapt for ioy, and mockt the priſoners, as if they had beene naturall Venetians. But when he vnderſtood by the priſoners that there was not one Venetian in all the companies, but all mercenarie Souldiours and ſtrangers of farre Countries, he was verie ſorrie for that which he had done, and blaſpheming God and men, being aſhamed of the murther he had commited in the night, in a rage with his fellowes he made haſte to Padua.

Treachery practiſed by Maſtin

Roſſis in the meane time being in the Treuiſan territorie, readie to march againſt the enemie, ſpake to his Souldiours in few words, exhorting them chiefly to ſhew themſelues in all occurents, valiant and couragious, and diligently to obſerue martiall diſcipline, ſaying that he deſired no mutinous or careleſſe Souldiour, but ſuch as were valiant vpon the enemie, patient in trauell, and obedient to his command: And therefore if there were any amongſt his troupes that would not bee ſuch, hee counſelled them to depart and goe on no further, ſaying that hee had rather ouercome with few, worthie and valiant Souldiours, than to be vanquiſhed in the companie of many cowards: willing thoſe that were ſuch to tarie behind and heare tell of their fellowes braue exploits, rather than by their preſence to trouble the whole Campe.

Peitro Roſſis his oration to his ſouldiors.

Maſtin being aduertized that the enemies were diſlodged, fearing leaſt they would ſeize on the ſuburbes of Meſtra, commanded them all to be burnt vpon a day, to the great griefe of the inhabitants. Roſſis after he had paſſed the Riuer of Anaxus, marching through the Treuiſan, and perceiuing a farre off the flames and ſmoake of thoſe ſuburbes, ſaid aloud, That hee aſpired to greter matters than to lodge in the ſuburbes of Meſtra. At that time ſome counſelled him to beſiege Treuiſo, but he made anſwere, That he made haſte to fight with the enemie; whome hauing once ouercome he would afterwards obtaine diuers goodly victories.

The ſuburbs of Meſtra burnt by Maſtin.

The Venetian Armie was alreadie on the bankes of the Riuer Brente, when newes came ſodainely to Padua, that the enemie approched. The Paduans hereupon beganne to murmure, and ſcorning the Tyrants tolde them, that they ſhould doe well to goe and take armes to hinder the Venetian from paſſing the Riuer, if they would be accounted ſo valiant as they made ſhew for; They on the other ſide being loath to giue any token of feare, commaunded the Souldiours forthwith to arme themſelues. Albert hauing made choiſe of a ſelected troupe marched forth of the Citie, to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the enemie. But Roſſis after he had paſſed the Riuer by night, had raiſed his Campe before day from the further ſide thereof; and afterwards marched cheerefully in order of battaile againſt the enemie, who was ſaid to approach, thinking that the houre was come wherein he ſhould reuenge ſo many iniuries receiued from thoſe of Eſcalla, or elſe in performing the part of a good Captaine die valiantly fighting. Albert hauing certaine notice of the enemies paſſage, and that he marched towards him with an intent to fight, being therewith daunted did ſodainely turne backe: which being perceiued by thoſe that were with him, diſperſing themſelues here and there, they forſooke their Campe which was newly victuailed in aboundance. The Venetian, after hee had made good cheere therewith, ranne furiouſly to the verie gates of the Citie, burning and ſpoiling all places neere about, the Generall hauing forbidden his Souldiours to murther or rauiſh. But whileſt they thus ſo ſpoiled farre and neere, thoſe of Pieue de Sacco came weeping to the Venetians, beſeeching them to take compaſſion on them, offering Braue reſolution of a greate Captain.

Albert of Eſcall fleeth.

The Sacceans yeeld to the Venetians.

to doe what ſoeuer they ſhould command, and freely to furniſh the Armie with victuailes. The Sacceans being receiued vpon their oath were enioyned to bring victuailes to the Campe which laie neere their Citie: From thence Roſſis ſent an Herald of Armes to Maſtin, (who vpon the report of the Venetians march was come to Padua) to acquaint him with his deſire to fight with him with diſplaied enſeignes: And that if he were ſo valiant and experienced in Armes as he boaſted of, he would wiſh him not to refuſe the battaile, but rather to come foorth into the field, and to make proofe which of them were moſt valiant. Maſtin made no reply to this challenge.

Roſſis challengeth Maſtin.

Roſſis perceiuing he could not draw his enemie to fight: without any longer ſtay raiſed his Campe, after he had ſet fire to the towne of Corania; but the Venetians afterwards repaired it ſpeedily, and placed a ſtrong Garriſon in it: All this hapned in a Moneths ſpace. But about the fifth of Nouember, the Campe approaching the village of Bouolenta, the Florentine troupes with the other aſſociates, which had taried at Chioggia, ioyned themſelues by litle and litle to the Armie. This place is almoſt on euery ſide enuironed with water. It is thought that Antenor the Troyan laid the firſt foundation thereof.

Anthenor laid the firſt foundations of Chioggia

Diuers report, that ſo ſoone as Roſſis was knowne to be in the field, the cauallerie which ſtaied at Chioggia was mightily encreaſed, and that the Rendezuous of the Armie marching on the firme land was at Bouolenta. Roſſis reſolued not to ſtirre from thence till he had in ſome ſort diſcouered the enemies intent, whom hee knew to be ſo politicke, as he would attempt nothing but vpon ſound aduiſe. The Annals affirme that which wee firſt ſaid, and further adde, that by the aduiſe of Roſſis they builded a Fort at Bubulente, wherein they left a ſtrong Garriſon, both by land and water. For hee had obſerued that the ſituation of that place was very commodious for the Warres, as it fell out by experience. For the Venetians from thence did many times make roades on the Territorie of Padua.

The Venetian build a Fort at Bubulente.

Roſſis departing thence gaue an alarum to Padua, and riding neere to the Gates and Wals of the Citie, hee called the enemies to the fight, and with reproachfull ſpeeches hee taxed their cowardiſe. But the enemie keeping himſelfe within the cloſure of his Wals, and not daring to come forth, he paſſed on, and tooke the lower way towards Cap-darger, to goe from thence to beſiege the Fort of the Salt-pits; where Marco Lauretano was arriued, with the nauall Armie: whereupon by mutuall conſent the ſiege was aduanced. The Garriſon within it were firſt ſounded, whether they would voluntarily yeeld without enforcement; which they refuſing to doe, the Venetians did furiouſly aſſaile them. The engines were already planted againſt the Wals, and the Souldiers mounted on the enemies Rampire, at ſuch time as Spirituello Gouernour of the place hauing receiued an hurt, ſodainely died thereof. They of the Fort being amazed at this accident, craued truce for eight dayes, with determination that if Maſtin came within that time to raiſe the ſiege, they would ſtill hold it for him, and withall faithfully promiſing, if they were not releeued before the Truce were expired, that they would yeeld it vp to the Venetians. This being graunted, they ſent to Padua to intreate Maſtin to come himſelfe and to raiſe the ſiege, or if he could not come, at the leaſt, to ſend forces ſufficient to conſtraine the enemie to raiſe his Campe: But he promiſing them nothing, but willing them rather to ſeeke their owne ſafetie, the Caſtle was yeelded, which was foorthwith razed by the Venetians.

The Venetians beſiege the Fort of the Salt pits.

The Fort of the Salt-pits taken.

About the ſame time thoſe of Cognilian, yeelded to the Venetians, and were the way-leaders to diuers other Cities, and aſſociates of Maſtin to reuolt from thoſe of Eſcalla, as it afterwards happened. The tyrants at the beginning had made great leuies of Souldiers, and among others, of three thouſand Lanſquenets. It is ſaid theſe men did very roughly intreate the Paduans, as well by ſpoyles and robberies, as by deflowring of maidens and rauiſhing of wiues: ſo as it is to bee thought that theſe vilanous actions were the firſt and principall motiues of the Paduans rebellion.

Great inſolencies of the Lanſequenets.

on. Maſtin being thereby conſtrained to diſperſe them here and there, vnder ſhew of going to Garriſons, ſent fifteene hundred of them to Æſte, who by a meruailous vnruly licence, did outrage the inhabitants thereof. There aroſe likewiſe in Padua (for thoſe that remained there continued their old trade of life) a great ſedition, and the Townesmen and the Strangers were ready to haue fought in the middeſt of the Citie, had not Maſtin by his timely comming appeaſed the quarrell already begun. It is certaine that the Paduans were by this iniurie meruailouſly withdrawne from the friendſhip of thoſe of Eſcalla, and that by reaſon thereof, they alreadie tended to rebellion.

The cauſe why the Paduans reuolted from thoſe of Eſcalla.

Maſtin was determined to call backe the Garriſon at Æſte to the Citie, had not his brother Albert diſſwaded him from it, ſaying that hee ought not to charge the citie with any more ſtrange Garriſons, and that he had no cauſe to feare the Paduans nor Marſilio, whoſe truth and fidelitie he held for aſſured. Roſſis in the meane time fought with good ſucceſſe againſt thoſe of the Garriſon of Æſte, and taking three hundred of them, after he had ſtripped them, he ſent them away.

Thoſe of Eſcalla perceiuing their affaires exceedingly to decline, ſent their Ambaſſadours to demand aide of all their friends and allies, as well within Italy as abroad, and namely to the Duke of Bauiere. But the Paduans becauſe they would not ſeeme altogether to betray the tyrants, ſent at the ſame time their Commiſſioners to Venice, who (if it were poſſible) ſhould mediate ſome good agreement betwixt the Venetians and thoſe of Eſcalla. This they ſpake in publike: But they had ſecret commandement if they could not conclude a peace, to make a league with the Venetians againſt Maſtin. Threeſcore Ambaſſadours, from threeſcore Princes or Commonwealths, came at one time for this purpoſe to Venice. Marſilio Carrario was ſent thither from their enemies, who at his arriuall (as it is reported) was purſued by the common people and beaten with ſtones: But it was not ſo much in hatred to Marſilio, as to the tyrants whom the people mortally hated: ſome thinke that it was done of purpoſe, to the end that thoſe of Eſcalla ſhould haue no cauſe to diſtruſt him who came to ſpeake ſecretly againſt them to the Venetians, like the other Ambaſſadours. The Venetians demaunded that Padua, Treuiſo, and Parma ſhould be reſtored to their ancient libertie, and Luca in Tuſcany yeelded to the Florentines; but thoſe of Eſcalla thinking theſe conditions to be too baſe and ignominious, would not accept of them. Whereupon the Ambaſſadours were diſmiſſed without any concluſion at all. In the meane time the Ambaſſadours of Accio Viſconte, of Philippo Gonzaga, and others, made a league with the Venetians againſt thoſe of Eſcalla. Marſilio dealt ſecretly with the Prince about the yeelding vp of Padua, which ſoone after enſued. Some Authours write that in the preſence of all the Ambaſſadours, hee ſpake ſoftly to Dandulo, and ſaid, What wilt thou ſay Prince if we giue thee Padua? And that the Prince diſſembling at the ſame time both in geſture and ſpeech, that which was in queſtion, anſwered, We will make thee Gouernour thereof. This I rather beleeue, than that which is commonly reported, That a long time afterward an Ambaſſador from Carrario ſpake this openly at a banquet on the Feaſt day of Saint Vitis, (as the maner was) albeit I graunt it might well enough be ſpoken in a banquet. But the perſon of the Traitor diſcouereth the errour committed therein. For it is certaine that the Gouernment promiſed at the firſt, was afterward giuen to Marſilio; but he whom they nominate, had no recompence.

Ambaſſadours ſent to Venice to procure a Peace.

The Venetians propoſitions concerning a peace.

Secret pratiſe of Marſilio Carrario with the Venetians.

Whilſt theſe things were done at Venice, Roſſis tooke certaine Townes in the Territorie of Padua from the enemies, and then bringing his troupes neere to the Citie, he ſet fire on one of the Gates, called Al-Saints. Moreouer thoſe of Meſtra daunted a while after with a new ſiege, wherewith they were enuironed, yeelded. From thence comming to Treuiſo, he burnt in a night two of the Citie gates. The Inhabitants were ſo amazed in this night-aſſault, as diuers running fort[illegible] of the Citie in the darke, on that ſide where the enemie was not, ſaued themſelues by flight, but many of them hauing loſt their way, fell into the enemies hands, among whom Roſſis at the Gates of Padua.

Meſtra yeelded to the Venetians

Caminensis wife, slaine in the habit of a seruant.

the noble wife of Caminensis was slaine in the habit of a seruant. This being done, they made no farther attempt against the Citie, I know not whether it were because they despaired of taking it (being ignorant of the great feare and amazement of the Citizens) or rather because they would speedily goe to take Serrauall, which (according to some) came at that time vnder the Venetians obedience.

Serrauall vnder the Venetians obedience.

Mastin and Albert his brother hauing vnderstood that besides the losse of so many Cities in short space, their associates likewise had forsaken them, and taken armes to offend them: (for it was reported that Luchin Visconte hauing attained to the principalitie of Milan (by the death of Accion his kinsman) and Phillip Gonzaga were alreadie in the field against them, or else in a readinesse so to doe) being enuironed with so many mischiefes, knew not what to resolue on, nor what they ought chiefly to follow, or in what place to oppose themselues against the enemies desseignes, or by what meanes to relieue their Cities. But in this great incertaintie of their affaires, not being able to conclude on that which was most expedient for them, Mastin on a sodaine with the greatest part of his forces left Padua, committing the guard of the Citie to his brother Albert, and came to Verona.

In the meane time Marsilio Rossis, after hee had passed the Riuer Adice, marched with those troupes which hee had receiued from his brother directly towards Mantua, where ioyning with Philip Gonzaga, and Luchin Visconte, they consulted together of the whole matter, and after marched into the field, resoluing first to assaile Verona. Now hauing forraged the Countrie, they entred the Territorie of Verona, where they made great spoyle round about the Citie, which with great clamours they besieged; bringing thither all things necessarie for a siege. It is reported that Charles sonne to the King of Bohemia, lay at the same time before Feltre with a great Armie of Germans, by meanes whereof those of Escalla were at one time assailed in three seuerall places. Mastin being thus vncertaine by what meanes to oppose himselfe against the enemie, after hee had a while ruminated with himselfe, determined like a mad man to doe it by Armes, and to fight with any that hee should meete with. But before he would giue battell, he Knighted his sonne Francis who was yet very yong, Spineta Marquis, Guiao Corregiario, and Paulo Aligerio the Gouernour of the Citie; after which hee marched with great noyse and furie towards the enemies, and in their view put his Armie in order of battell, being resolued for his part to fight. Rossis made a retreat, so did the rest, not meaning to fight, thinking it more auaileable for them to draw the Warre out at length, the which by all likelihood Mastin could not long maintaine, than to hazard the whole by the euent of a battell. In this sort making a faire retreate, not giuing shew of any manifest flight, they held on their way towards Mantua.

The Territorie of Verona spoiled

Charles sonne to the King of Boheme encamped before Feltre.

Resolution of a desperate man.

A wise retreate

Mastin as proude of this retreate as if hee had wonne the battaile, returned speedily with three thousand horse and certaine foote companies to Padua, and from thence to Bubulente, where the Venetians Fleete lay. At his arriuall hee surprised twentie small Venetian vessels, left for the Guard of the munition, and made an attempt to take the Castle, the which being brauely defended, hee was constrained to depart thence, and hee encamped two miles beneath the Riuer, with an intent to shut vp the passage of the victuals which came from the Citie by water. It is thought that he might with more ease haue executed his determination if hee had encamped betwixt Bubulente and Mestra. Rossis, to cause him dislodge, commanded a great quantitie of woad (an hearbe belonging to Fullers) to be pounded and to be throwne into the Riuer, to make it vnsauorie and bitter to be drunke by those of Escalla. But victuals waxing scant in the Venetians Campe, by reason that the enemie lay so neere, the arriuall of Marsilio called thither for the purpose (as I thinke) was cause that the Venetians, strengthned by his comming, had free passage whither they pleased, being little inferiour to those of Escalla in strength.

Mastin encampeth to shut victuals from the Venetians.

Pietro Rossis likewise being often prouoked by the enemie to fight, did purposely refuse it: For he perceiued that Mastin could not long hold out, and that hee should

A discreet resolution of a Generall.

doe

doe vndiſcreetly, to hazard the fortune of a battel, knowing that the enemie was already haife vanquiſhed, and there was no doubt but that he would be ouerthrowne without bloudſhed. Whilſt he lay in Campe neere to Bubulente, thinking greatly to hinder the enemie by keeping of the paſſage of the Riuer from them, hee had notice that Luchin Viſconte had ſtreightly beſieged Breſsia, which newes he very badly digeited, and marched with ſpeede through the Territorie of Padua and Vincenza to releeue Breſsia, which whileſt hee attempted, more fearefull tidings were brought, that Padua was loſt & his brother taken priſoner with the whole garriſon.

Breſsia beſieged by Luchin Viſconte.

This loſſe did in ſuch ſort abate the tyrants pride, as hee neuer after hoped for better ſucceſſe. Marſilio Carrario, ſo ſoone as Maſtin was departed from the reliefe of Breſsia, had forthwith giuen notice thereof to Pietro Roſsis, and leauing open the Gate of the crooked Bridge, gaue entrance to him and his whole forces, which they of the Citie perceiuing (for there was no hoſtile act committed) all men with great ioy ranne to meete him, calling him their deliuerer, and infinitely praiſed him. But Roſsis with the generall conſent did in the Venetians name giue the gouernement of the Citie to Marſilio Carrario. Albert, and Riſſe Foramenſis with diuers other friends and ſeruants of the Tyrants were taken priſoners, and their goods ſpoyled. Albert was ſoone after brought to Venice. Roſsis gaue leaue to fiue hundred Almaine horſe that were found in the Citie, freely to depart thence with their Armes and Horſes.

Padua reuolteth from thoſe of Eſcalla.

Maſtin, being daunted with ſo many loſſes, receiued freſh newes that Charles had taken Feltre with other Townes; and anon after that Luca was beſieged by Orlando Roſsis, Captaine generall of the Florentines, and that it was not yet certainely knowne whether thoſe of Luca were reuolted or not. But that which did moſt of all afflict him, was, when he vnderſtood ſoone after that Breſsia whither he had ſo ſpeedily marched, was taken: and in this ſort bad tidings comming daily vnto him, the end of all was, that Luchin had ſeized on Bergamo.

The Citie of Feltre taken by the king of Hungary

Breſsia and Bergamo taken by Luchin Viſconte

Thoſe of Eſcalla being wholly chaſed from Padua, the Venetian Ambaſſadours came thither, namely, Marco Lauretano, Iuſtiniano ſurnamed Iuſtinian, and Andrea Moroſino; who comming into the Market-place where the people were aſſembled, Lauretano in the name of the Common-wealth, vſed this congratulatorie Speech vnto them.

The Venetian Ambaſſadors Oration to the Paduans.

WE cannot but exceedingly reioyce, that yee being now freed from ſo cruell an enemie, haue recouered your ancient libertie loſt by the malice of Maſtin: And therefore by the Senates appointment we conferre the gouernment of the Citie on Marſilio: whoſe courage and valour, by how much more it is famous and knowne to all men, by ſo much more doe the Venetians highly eſteeme it for the good and commoditie of the Paduans, adding thereunto his ſingular vertue and wiſedome, which cannot but bring great and deſired quiet to his fellow-Citizens. For the Venetians verie well know, and namely by experience, that a Common-wealth is moſt happie which is gouerned by a wiſe and diſcreet perſon. Attend therefore, and perpetually receiue your Citizen Marſilio, to obey his commaundements, and heartily to defend iuſtice, ſeeing ye are not ignorant how grieuous a thing tyrannie is: And thou likewiſe Marſilio, albeit we are all well perſwaded of thy vertue, thou art neuertheleſſe to thinke that we haue called thee to this place, not onely to commaund ouer thy countrey, but to bring it all helpe and ſuccour. If peraduenture thou ſhalt doubt what courſe to take for the well-gouerning thereof, and by what meanes to make thy ſelfe regarded without enuie among thine owne people: take example by the Magiſtrates of our Citie, which will eaſily teach thee: who whileſt they are in office, are reſpected for the honour of the Common-wealth, and their charge being expired, they liue equally with the meaneſt, knowing verie well that this equali-

tie

tie is the onely bond of a Commonwealth. It remaineth now, that this Citie following thine example, doe highly account, honour, and respect the friendship of the Venetians, as well in generall as particular. The which duly and religiously to obserue the nouelties hapned in your time may incite you, we hauing twice within few yeares freed you from the cruell yoak of bondage. For that man is no lesse fooliſh, than ingratefull, who cannot be moued by benefits receiued.

A notable sentence.

The exhortation of Lauretano being most true, was likewise most pleasing to the people, and chiefly to Marsilio; who after he had giuen great thanks to the Venetians, said. That he would in such sort rule, as no man in time to come should haue occasion to complaine of his gouernment, much lesse to desire (& if he were a louer of the publike peace) any change. And that aboue all thinges he would take order, that the Paduans should alwaies be such towards the Venetians, as those ought to bee who haue receiued benefits and good turnes, namely, with such acknowledgement and good offices as all men should say that the Venetians had well imployed their labour and cost. As for the present benefit which he had receiued from them, he would at all times, and in all places confesse, that he held his honour, dignitie, and all the rest of his meanes, onely from them.

Marsilio his answere to the Venetians.

This did he speake, which was with a generall consent approued by all the people: Then followed mutuall embracements and congratulations, the whole Citie leapt for ioy, all things on a sodaine were changed. For in steed of feare and enuie, wherewith it was before filled, nothing was then seene, but ioy and contentment.

The death of Pietro Rosſis.

But the course of the fortunate successe of the Venetians affaires was interrupted by an accident hapned to the two brethren of Rossus, who in few daies died one after another. For Pietro after the taking of Padua being come to the siege of Monceleſſe was mortally wounded: whereupon being carried to Padua, he died soone after to the great griefe of all men. He was a man of a goodly stature, a great warrior, and an excellent Captaine, being an enemie to crueltie, and when hee went to the warres, he forbad his souldiers to murther in cold bloud, and to enforce women. He was so well beloued of his souldiers for his gentleneſſe, as the Almaine horsemen, who were verie many in his campe, called him their father, and he was beside so liberall, as (his horses and Armour excepted) he gaue all his wealth among his souldiers. Diuers Italians and Almaines cloathed in mourning habite, did follow his funerall, and bewailed him a long time. He died in the prime of his age, being but six and thirtie yeares old. Marsilio his brother, who not long before was sicke of a feuer being brought to Venice, died there within sixe daies after, being fiftie yeares of age.

How highly Pietro Rosſis was lamented.

The death of Marsilio of Rosſis.

Their brother Orlando Rosſis, who at the same time held Luca straitly besieged, was in his absence chosen Generall of the Armie, and being sent for, came soone after to the campe at Monceleſſe. For the siege was not discontinued, although the Generall was dead: At his arriuall he tooke part of the Armie, and came by the confines of Este, and made roads on the territorie of Verona, where putting all to fire and sword vnto the gates of the Citie, he brought a verie great bootie to the campe: Not long after the Senate called him to Venice whither all the Agents of the associates were come to treate of peace. But because in this assembly the selfe-same conditions were propounded to Mastin as were in the former, and that he stoutly refused them, all the commissioners departed from Venice without any conclusion. Mastin perceiuing that he was not yet freed from this war craued aid of the Duke of Bauier, adding diuers great promises to his entreaties. This duke promised to send him great supplies, prouided that he might haue good caution for what he promised. Mastin deliuered into his hands the Citie of Pescara, with his sonne Francisco, and diuers other children of noble families. But the Duke failing of his promise, so soone as Mastin perceiued himselfe deluded, he came on a sodaine and recouered the Citie, with his sonne and hostages. Marsilio Carrario died in the meane time, leauing (by the consent of the Venetians) Vbertino his neere kinsman for his successor, hauing sent a hundred thousand crownes to Venice to build a Church in a part of the Iury, and to enrich it with diuers inheritances.

Orlando Rosſis chosen Generall of the Armie.

A treatie of peace broken.

Mastin implored the aide of the Duke of Bauiere.

At

At the ſame time the Armie approched Montfort, and from thence diuers roads were made on the territories of Vincenza and Verona. Maſtin in the meane time battered Montechia, whither Orlando came vnlooked for, defeated him, and draue him thence: Not long after Maſtin came into the field to execute a new enterprize, the which had as bad ſucceſſe, as that of Montechia. The Paduan and Almaine horſemen were encamped in the Iſle of Longare. Maſtin thinking to ſurprize them, did ſpeedily march thither with his forces. The Iſland being aſſailed by land and water, was not onely well defended, but with the loſſe of his ſhips hee was ignominiouſly driuen thence. Vbertino on the other ſide hauing with money corrupted the Garriſon of Moncelleſa, entred the Citie on the ſide of the Caſtle, which was within few daies after yeelded to the Venetians by Florentio the Gouernour therof. Maſtin in another place attempted by treacherie to recouer the towne of Montagnane, but this deſigne fell out vnluckily. Spineta Mariqus, and Guido Foranenſis were commaunded with great ſecrecie to goe with their forces to the appointed place: whereof the Venetians hauing notice, placed fiue hundred Almaine horſe not farre from Elte in ambuſcado, ſo that the enemies marching forward, (hauing ſent no diſcouerers before) were ſurprized and aſſailed by thoſe of the ambuſh, and at the firſt brunt (throwing downe their Armes) betooke themſelues to flight. The number of the ſlaine was great, but that of the priſoners greater, among whom were Guido and Gilberto his brother, and with them two hundred men at Armes. Andrea Moroſino, for that hee had valiantly behaued himſelfe in that encounter was afterwards knighted.

Maſtin defeated before Montechia.

Moncelleſa taken.

Orlando was at the ſame time in Padua, from whence he ſpeedily departed with his troups, and came to Vincenza, where approaching the citie neere to Saint Felix gate, he lodged in the ſuburbes. The poore inhabitants were then more terrified than before. For being on euerie ſide ſhut in by the enemie, they loſt all hope of getting any victuals, eſpecially from Verona, by reaſon the Venetians poſſeſſed Brendola and Montechia. Diuers with their wiues and children being driuen forth of their houſes by the men at Armes of the Garriſon were conſtrained to begge. At the laſt the Tyrantes pride being abated, peace enſued very opportunely.

The ſiege of Vincenza.

It is reported, that being not able to raiſe the ſiege before Vincenza, he harkened to a peace, about which hauing ſent his Commiſſioners to Venice, he obtained it on theſe conditions: That Feltre, Beluna, and Ceneda ſhould remaine to Charles of Boheme; Bergamo, and Breſſia to Viſconte, who poſſeſſed them; Treuiſo, with the villages and Caſtles of the Treuiſan, to the Venetians, with the Caſtles of Balde and Baſſan, with free libertie to trafficke on the riuer Adice; and foure Cities of the territorie of Luca to the Florenitnes.

Maſtiu being enforced, accepteth of peace on any conditions.

It is reported that the Florentines being diſcontented with this agreement, becauſe Luca which they demaunded was not yeelded to them, ſent to Venice about this buſineſſe, where the matter was rather debated out of wilfulneſſe than of any hope they had to obtaine it. But the Venetians inclining to peace, the Florentines conſented thereunto. All the aſſociate Lords which had taken part with the Venetians were likewiſe ſatisfied. Albert with the reſt of the priſoners were ſet at libertie. The Venetians gaue the Caſtles of Balde and Baſſan to Vbertino Carrario: whereby we may ſee that the Venetians did not ſeeke by this warre to enlarge their eſtate. For beſides the breaking of the tyrants forces, whom they could wholly haue ouerthrowne, and by armes haue appropriated all that to themſelues which they had taken from him, they gaue the renowned Citie of Padua (which they might haue held by right of warre) to Marſilio Carrario a priuate Citizen, and afterwards to Vbertino his ſucceſſor, two great Caſtles vvith their demaines taken from the enemy during the treatie of peace. But Blondus affirmes it to be moſt true, that the Venetians had neuer any deſire to increaſe their dominions, but onely to preuaile ſo farre (which hapned as they deſired) as to be able to abate the tyrants pride, & to make him glad to ſue for peace with heaued-vp hands, who a little before had diſquieted all Italie, and vpon what cauſe the venetians did make warre vpon thoſe of Eſcalla.

The Florentines diſcontented.

and who was not ſatisfied with the command of all which lieth on this ſide and beyond the Po, within the continent of the Alpes, but would beſides haue enthronized himſelfe in Tuſcanie, and haue attempted at the laſt, not to take away (for that he could not doe) but to moleſt the quiet poſſeſſion of the Sea, which the Venetians of a long time had purchaſed with much labour and trauaile.

This then is the fruite, as pleaſing as great, which they reaped by this victorie, thinking that they had done enough and very much, to haue troden the tyrants pride vnder foote, vnto whom in the end being daunted and baſely ſuing for a diſhonourable peace, his demand was not onely graunted, but they made him a Gentleman of Venice. Dandulo after he had fortunately abroad and at home gouerned the Commonwealth, deceaſed, in the eleuenth yeare of his Gouernment.

Maſtin is made a Gentleman of Venice.

¶ Bartilmeo Gradonico, the 53. Duke of Venice.

Artilmeo Gradonico was his ſucceſſour, and choſen by the fortie. I find in ſome Authours that about the ſame time the great Hall was builded, where euery eight dayes and ſometimes oftner, all the Gentlemen are aſſembled about the creating of new Officers: And that they began at the ſame time to ſend Magiſtrates to Poueggia, Paleſtrino, and Malamoc.

A prodigious ſtorme at Venice in a night.

Beleeue this who liſt.

Moreouer on the fiue and twentith of Februarie in the night, there aroſe a ſuddaine tempeſt, which cauſed ſuch an inundation in the Citie, as the waters ſtood three foote deepe, which was neuer till then ſeene. This being reputed a prodigie, gaue beleefe to that which a poore Fiſher-man reported to haue ſeene the ſame night: which was thus. So ſoone as he perceiued the ſtorme, in a great feare he drew vp his little Boate neere to Saint Markes Church, and ſtanding not farre from thence out of the raine and wind, three men came to him, who, as if they had ſome earneſt buſineſſe, entreated him in all haſte to Ferrie them ouer to Saint Nicholas Church on the ſhoare; which he refuſing to doe for feare of the ſtorme, they on a ſodaine went into his Boate, as though themſelues would guide it: which the Fiſherman perceiuing, entred into it, (though againſt his will) and guided the Boate. But being come to the Church, they turned towards the mouth of the Hauen: where they ſaw a Ship full of Diuels, which theſe three men ſudainely ſunke by the helpe of God. Whereupon the Sea in an inſtant grew calme. And then, one of them entred into the next Church; the other was caried to Saint Georges; and the third returned to the place where they tooke Boate: of whom the poore old Fiſherman (albeit beit in regard of what he had ſeene, he thought him ſome Diuine Perſon) demaunded his hire, who anſwered him: Thou ſhalt goe (quoth he) to the Prince and Senate, vnto whom hauing declared in order what thou haſt ſeene this night, they ſhall liberally reward thee. The Fiſherman replied, they will not beleeue me, and I know certainly that they will ieſt of me, and ſo I ſhall become the laughing ſtocke of the people for my raſh report: whereunto this diuine perſonage anſwered him, and ſaid: Take this pledge (and gaue him a Ring which hee had on his finger) let the Duke and Senate vnderſtand, that by our meanes the Citie hath beene this night preſerued from a terrible floud: And becauſe thou ſhalt not faile but doe this, know that he whom thou diddeſt ſee enter into his Church, is bleſſed Saint Nicholas, which yee Marriners doe ſo highly reuerence; the other is Saint George, who is gone to viſite his Church; and I am Marke the Euangeliſt the patrone of your Citie. This being ſaid he vaniſhed.

A wonderfull apparition to a poore Fiſherman

Who thoſe were that appeared.

The poore Fiſherman, emboldned by this pledge, ſo ſoone as it was day came to the Palace, where ſaying that hee would ſpeake to the Prince concerning ſome important buſineſſe, he was preſently brought into his preſence, who was accompanied by the Senate, where he declared in order all that hee had ſeene and heard; then for a witneſſe to his ſpeech, he drew foorth of his boſome the Ring which the holy Saint had giuen him ouer night: They were all greatly amazed at this miracle: then they cauſed diuers ſolemne Prayers to be made, as well in priuate as in publike in the Churches of theſe holy perſonages, by whoſe helpe the Citie had beene defended from the preſent danger: Beſides, they appointed the poore Fiſherman a yearely penſion out of the publike Treaſurie.

About the ſame time the Ambaſſadours of Edward King of England arriued at Venice, craning aide by Sea againſt Philip the French King, whom the Genoueſes fauoured with all their power, but notwithſtanding all their promiſes on their Kings behalfe, they could obtaine nothing: Their excuſe was, in what great danger their affaires ſtood at Sea, which they were conſtrained to defend from the ordinarie incurſions of the Turkes, who by the careleſſeneſſe of the Chriſtians were growne ſo mightie, as they could in a moment Arme two or three hundred Gallies if neede were.

The King of Englanſt craueth aide againg the French King.

At the ſame time certaine Lords of Candie reuolted, who being retired into ſome Fortes and Caſtles in the mountaines, did diſquiet the greateſt part of the Iſland. Nicholao Phalerio, Iuſtiniano ſurnamed Iuſtinian, and Andrea Moroſino, with good forces were ſent againſt theſe men, who were embarked in the Gallies which went to traffique in Ciprus. Being arriued in Candie they aſſailed the enemie in three places, and giuing them in a maner no time to breath, they tooke from them all meanes to robbe and ſpoile. They did moreouer propound great rewards to any whoſoeuer ſhould kill any one of thoſe Rebels, or could bring him aliue to the Venetian Magiſtrate, hauing ſet downe a certaine rate for euery head; but the Authours whom we follow mention not how much. They being by this meanes in few dayes reduced vnder the Venetians obedience, were puniſhed according to their deſerts, diuers of them were throwne into the Sea, but the moſt of them were hanged, which cauſed thoſe of the Iland, being terrified by the puniſhment of thoſe Lords, to returne on a ſodaine to their due obedience. The Iſland being quiet, the Generals of the Armie (Nicholao Phalerio excepted who died there) returned to Venice. Victuals were very deare in the Citie, during the principalitie of Gradonico, which was very ſhort; for it laſted but two yeares and nine Moneths, which time being expired he died. His body was buried at the entrie of Saint Markes Church.

Certaine Lords of Candie rebell.

Reward propounded againſt the Rebels.

Candie is appeaſed by the Rebels puniſhment.

Great dearth in Venice.

The end of the ſecond Booke of the ſecond Decade.

THE THIRD BOOKE OF THE SECOND DECAD Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the third Booke of the ſecond Decad.

A Great Armie prepared againſt the Turkes. The foundation of Saint Anthonies Church. The Venetians victorie neere to Zara againſt Lewis King of Hungarie. The reddition of Zara. The Citie of Venice much ſhaken by an Earthquake. The ſame Citie terribly afflicted by the Peſtilence. Truce for fiue yeares with Lewis King of Hungarie. Cape-hiſtria rebelleth, which cauſeth the Venetians to paſſe ouer thither. The cauſe of the third Liguſticke warre. The Venetians take ten Ships of Genoa in the Hauen of Cariſte. The Genoueſes take Nigrepont in the abſence of the Venetian Armie. The Venetian and Arragonian Fleete greatly toſſed by a tempeſt on the Ionian Sea. The proſperous battels which the Genoueſes had at one time againſt three mightie Armies neere the Boſphorus. The Venetians and Arragonians ouercome the Genoueſes on the lower Sea. The Genoueſes in anger contemne their libertie, who after they haue repaired their Armie, take Parenza. The Genoueſes take diuers Ships of burthen from the Venetians at ſundrie places. The Genoueſes defeate a great Armie of the Venetians in the Iſle of Sapientia. Prince Phalerio affecting tyrannie, is with his complices worthily puniſhed.

Andrea

¶ Andrea Dandvlo, the 54. Duke of Venice.

ANdrea Dandulo ſucceeded Gradonico, a man certainly of rare and ſingular learning, and as eloquent as could be wiſhed, in one of his yeares: For it is reported that he wrote the Venetian Hiſtorie in two ſtiles; the one more amply, and it may bee therefore leſſe eloquent, and the other more ſuccinctly, and thereby (as ſaith Caroſini) more beautified and adorned. Hee was beſides of a meeke and liberall diſpoſition, whereby hee purchaſed the ſurname of Comiſino: And that was the reaſon (as I thinke) why before he was of competent age, they made him Procurator of S. Marke, and ſoone afterwards Prince. For the manner was, not to name any one to that dignitie, but ſuch as were already of good yeares; and all Authors (almoſt) are of opinion, that he was not aboue ſixe and thirtie yeares of age, when hee was named for the ſoueraigne Magiſtrate. We finde in ſome Authors, that at the beginning of his Principalitie, according to the league made with Pope Clement, & other Chriſtian Princes againſt the Turke, the Venetians armed ſixteene Gallies, and gaue the command of them to Pietro Zeno, who after he had ſunke diuers ſhips of the Barbarians, did by a ſodaine aſſault take the Citie of Smyrna, and where hauing ſlaine the Inhabitants, he left a good Garriſon, and that ſoone afterward, not farre from thoſe confines, the Venetians accompanied with thoſe of Rhodes, and Cyprus, did oftentimes fight with the Turkes, where diuers of both ſides were ſlaine. But at the laſt the Venetians with their Allies being defeated and put to flight, part of them being afrighted eſcaped into the Citie, the reſt being encloſed by the Barbarians, were all ſlaine.

The Pope, the Venetians, and other Chriſtian Princes in league againſt the Turk.

Smyrna taken.

The Venetians, Rhodians, and Cypriots defeated by the Turke.

At the ſame time Nicholao ſurnamed Giouanni, was ſent by the Senate to the King of Babylon, to treate with him concerning the Venetian Merchants free traffick into Ægypt. The Barbarian granted their requeſt, bnt on certaine conditions, the which ſeeming not to bee allowed of, without the Popes permiſſion, it was not thought lawfull to trafficke with the enemies of the Chriſtian faith, Marini Phalerio Knight, and Andrea Cornario, were ſent to his Holineſſe, who granted that the Venetians ſhould for fiue yeares following traffick to Alexandria with ſixe Gallies: Souranza, by vertue of this permiſſion, was the firſt that vnder-tooke that voiage with two Gallies, wherein Pietro Iuſtiniano went Conſull.

The Pope permitteth traffick with Infidells.

Two yeares after, Iuſtiniano ſurnamed Iuſtinian, obtained of the Pope in the name of the Common-wealth to traffick into Syria, and the time of theſe two trafficks was prolonged for ten yeares. At the ſame time they beganne in the Citie to build S^t. Anthonies Church, (the beginning whereof is attributed to one Iannotto a Florentine, of the familie of Abbi) vpon a little Rocke, where was firſt builded a little Chappell of wood. In the ſame place at this day is to be ſeene a great voide place, or rather an Iſland, made by a continuall heaping together of earth, which the water in proceſſe of time hath brought thither; It hath a delightfull proſpect towards the Lakes, and beſides the Church which is faire and large, there ſtands neare to it a new ſumptuous building, which ſerueth for an Hoſpitall.

The building of Saint Anthonies Hoſpitall.

The ſeuenth rebellion of Zara.

About the ſame time thoſe of Zara reuolted from the Venetians the ſeuenth time. The report was, That they had ſent to Lewis King of Hungarie, to certifie him, if he would come into Dalmatia, they would deliuer their Citie, Hauen, Lands, perſons and meanes, as well publike as priuate into his hands.

The Senate preſently vpon theſe newes, gaue fiue armed Gallies to Pietro Canalis, who ſailed into Dalmatia. Being come neere to Zara, hee receiued Marco Cornari the gouernour with all his familie, and diuers other Venetians, into his veſſells, who were in the Citie when it reuolted, from whence hee preſently departed: For, to haue beſieged the Citie with ſo few veſſells, and by Sea only, would haue beene as fooliſh as vnprofitable. He firſt retired to Pague; the inhabitants whereof hauing receiued him into their Citie, deliuered the Gouernour into his hands which thoſe of Zara had ſent thither not long before, together with all thoſe which had aided or aſſiſted him, whom Canalis ſent to Venice. Soone after hauing fortified the place, he tooke with thoſe few Gallies which he had, diuers veſſells of the enemies which laie neere to the Iſlands: But whilſt by theſe meanes hee went about to hinder the Zaratines: Marco Iuſtiniano came by Land with his Armie, and encamped at the Fountaine next to the Citie, where he ſodainly cauſed his Souldiors to build a Fort. Then, from thence, he did with his engins batter the Citie, beat downe the walls, ouerthrow the houſes, and made all things verie incommodious to the enemies. If the Zaratines were ſtreightly beſieged by Land, by Sea they were no leſſe: For the Venetians hauing taken from them the Towne of Damiana, they did at times approch verie neere to the Citie, then they ſpeedily returned, and after ſome ſtay, came back with more furie to aſſaile the Hauen.

Zara inueſted by Sea and Land.

Thus ſtood the affaires of the Zaratins, when Andrea Moroſino and Simon Dandulo, the Princes brother, arriued at the Campe to prouide and take order for whatſoeuer ſhould be expedient for the Commmon-wealth: and I thinke, this was the cauſe, why from the beginning they called theſe Magiſtrates Prouiders; but we will alwaies call them Prouidatori. At their arriuall it was reſolued to giue a generall aſſault to the Citie by Sea and Land. It may be they had notice that Lewis King of Hungarie was not farre off with great forces. The Citie being aſſailed with great furie, the Sea-forces threw bridges from the Gallies vpon the walls, ſeeking by that meanes to enter the Citie. On the otherſide the Land-Armie drew neere the walls with their engins and other warlike inſtruments; But both ſides had no great ſucceſſe. Some were gotten vpon the walls, on the bridges from the ſhippes, who did greatly affright the inhabitants, & ſlew diuers of them. But ſoon after, the Townesmen waxing deſperate, did furiouſly fall vpon them and beat them from the walls, breaking the bridges, whereupon the Souldiours on that ſide were conſtrained to make a baſe retreat. The fight on the Land-ſide was as vnfortunate. For the engins of batterie breaking at their firſt approach, made all the Venetians attempts bootleſſe, which the Generall perceiuing, commanded to ſound the retreat. After this aſſault King Lewis ariued with ſix ſcore thouſand men, and encamped not farre from Zara; who, to free the Citie which was giuen vnto him from the ſiege, gaue a ſodain aſſault to the Venetian Campe. The Hungarians with fearefull cries made an attempt on the Venetians Fort, not thinking to meet with trenches and rampiers

A generall aſſault giuen to Zara.

The Venetians are beaten from the aſſault.

that

that were able to keepe them out. The Zaratines likewiſe made a ſallie, and together with them aſſailed the Fort. The Venetians did not only valiantly defend it, but repulſed the enemies farre from thence with great effuſion of bloud. In the meane time thoſe in the Gallies hearing the noiſe, and fearing that their fellowes were aſſailed, leauing a ſufficient number of Souldiors for the guard of their veſſells, they came on ſhore, and marched in a cloſe battalion to the reliefe of their countrimen: which they in the Fort perceiuing, preſently iſſued forth vpon the enemie. There was on either ſide a cruell fight neere to the Fort and much bloud-ſhed: But the Hungarians who at the Venetians firſt comming had begun by little and little to diſorder their owne rankes, being ouercome by this ſodain ſallie, betooke themſelues to flight, who were purſued and ſlaine heere and there by the Victorious Venetian. The Dalmatians perceiuing the bad ſucceſſe of the Hungarians retired with great amazement into the Citie. The King thus repulſed, with loſſe of a great part of his Armie, returned (in manner of a flight) into Hungarie. But becauſe it was ſcarce credible (to ſpeake truely) that ſo great an Armie ſhould be defeated by ſo ſmall a number: It is moſt likely that Lewis brought but twentie thouſand men into Dalmatia, and that the Printers and not the Hiſtorians haue greatly erred in the number: yet whatſoeuer their Armie was (for vndoubtedly it was great) the Venetians got that day a glorious victorie of the enemies: And beſides, the ſlaughter of the enemies was ſo great, as the aire beeing corrupted with the infection of ſo manie dead bodies, did in ſhort ſpace cauſe great mortalitie in the Campe. The ſiege neuertheleſſe was not diſcontinued, but the Venetians on the contrarie did more ſharpely vex thoſe Rebells by Sea and Land. In the end, the Venetians hauing broken the chaine of the Hauen, the Zaratines deſpairing of all forrain aid, and diſtruſting their owne forces, craued leaue to ſend to Venice, the which was freely graunted them: The meſſengers beeing come to the Citie, craued mercie, committing themſelues and their Citie to the mercie of the Senate. Zara beeing recouered Iuſtiniano was made Gouernour: The chiefe of the Citie who had beene the Authours of this ſeuenth Rebellion, were by the Senate for euer baniſhed the Citie.

King Lewis defeated before Zara.

The reddition of Zara.

We may by this gentle puniſhment perceiue how great the Venetians clemency hath ſtill beene, who were contented to puniſh a Citie that had ſo often Rebelled, and been thereby ſo troubleſome to the Common-wealth, by the only baniſhment of a few of her inhabitants.

The ordinarie iudges of the Citie of Venice not being able in regard of the multitude of cauſes which was dailie pleaded before them, to haue any fit leiſure to intend the appeales ſent vp by inferiour iudges to their audience: The Senate created three Auditors to looke to that buſineſſe, who according to the large extent of their iuriſdiction, were called the Ancients. Three others were likewiſe created to heare the cauſes of ſtrangers.

New magiſtrates created.

Beſides, Prince Dandulo cauſed all that which had beene aboliſhed from the ancient cuſtomes to be reduced into one volume, together with all the decrees made by the Senate, ſince the principality of Giacomo Tepulo, vntill that preſent, and hauing diuided them into Chapters, with a large Table, he named it The ſixth Booke of the Cities decrees. And hauing moreouer whilſt he was Procurator of Saint Marke carefully gathered together all the iudiciall acts and decrees of the great Councell, he ſet them downe in order, and noted, who had beene the Authour of euerie of them, and vnder whoſe Gouernment each of them had beene receiued and allowed.

The Prince cauſeth all the decrees of the Citie to be gathered into one forme.

There was at the ſame time great ſcarcitie of victualls in the Citie, which began in Gradonico his time, by reaſon whereof Gallies and other veſſells were ſent into Apulia and Sicil to fetch corne vnder the command of Marco Iuſtiniano. We may heereby eaſily perceiue that this voiage for corne, was before the ſiege of Zara, the which likewiſe ſome Authors do not denie. For it is certaine that this Iuſtiniano in that warre of Dalmatia was generall of the Land-Armie, and that after Zara was was recouered, he was made Gouernour of the Citie. Now (as all men know) it could not bee that one man alone could at one ſelfe ſame time execute two ſo different offices. It is reported that two ſhippes of thoſe which went for Corne were loſt by a ſodaine tempeſt as they returned homeward, and that they were neuer after heard of. Others ſay that foure only eſcaped out of this ſtorme. The reſidue of the ſhips laden with Corne, did fortunately arriue in the Hauen : by meanes whereof the dearth ceaſed.

A wonderfull Earthquake.

But this miſchiefe being taken away, an other preſently enſued : For vpon the day of Saint Paul his conuerſion, about one of the clocke after noone, there hapned a great Earthquake, which did in ſuch ſort ſhake the Citie, as diuers publike and priuate buildings were thereby throwne to the ground. The Steeples of Saint Silueſter, Vitalis, Saint Giacomo de Lorio fell downe, together with the top of Saint Angelo his Church, and the left ſide of that of Saint Baſil. The Babylonians thought, (for I ſee diuers that demaund from whence this fearefull motion of the Earth doth proceede) that it happeneth by the force of ſome Planet, meeting with the Sunne in the Region of the Earth. Anaxagoras hath thought that it is engendred in the Earth by proceſſe of time, and reſtraining of Aire. Poſſidonius affirmes that it is a winde ſhut cloſely vp in the bowells and concauities of the earth. Plinie ſaith, that the earth neuer quaketh, but when the Sea is very calme, and the aire ſo ſtill and cleare as birds can hardly beare themſelues vp therein, and at ſuch time as the winds are incloſed in the veines and entrails of the earth. By this ſpeech of Plinie it ſeemeth that the windes are the cauſe of this ſhaking, the which diuers Philoſophers doe likewiſe affirme. Hee addeth by and by after; An earthquake (ſaith he) is nothing elſe but as the thunder in the aire, or an ouerture or creuaſe in the earth, or as the lightning breaking forth violently from the middeſt of the cloudes, the wind encloſed therein ſtriuing to burſt forth by force. The Stoicks ſet downe diuers ſorts of earthquakes, opening of the earth, ſwelling of the water, and the boiling vp of the ſame, the which is very true. For at ſome time the earth falleth downe very low, at other times it is much lifted vp, and putteth forth great Mountaines; in this the Riuers doe ouer-flow on a ſodaine, in the other ſparkes of fire are ſeene to rebound, the waters to boile ouer, and ſometimes Riuers to leaue their ordinarie courſe. A fearefull ſound goeth before, and accompanieth this quaking, ſometimes like to the roaring of a Bull, and then like to the lamentable cry of ſome humane creature, or like the clattering noiſe of Armour, according to the qualitie of the matter which is incloſed, or according to the faſhion of the caue and hole through which this winde paſſeth, which reſoundeth (as it is ſaid) in vaulted and hollow places, waxeth hot in ſharp and drie places, and cauſeth great defluxions in moiſt and humide places.

Sundry opinions on Earthquakes.

Diuers ſorts of Earthquakes.

The ſignes which fore-runne an Earthquake.

Of all Earthquakes the agitation of the waters is moſt dangerous.

The Citie of Venice is not ſo much ſubiect to earthquakes, as ſome doe imagine, ſeeing among all the motions of the earth, that of the waues and flouds is the moſt dangerous: For lightning is not ſo hurtfull, nor the ſhaking of buildings, nor namely when the earth is puffed vp, or falleth downe by an interchangeable motion, becauſe the one keepeth backe the other. The ſafeſt buildings are thoſe vpon vaults, the corners of walls, and on bridges, leaning one againſt another. Beſides, bricke buildings are leſſe dangerous in ſuch accidents than are others: Thoſe which are at Sea can foretell theſe earthquakes, at ſuch time as they perceiue the waues to ſwell on a ſodaine without any winde, and thoſe which are on Land may likewiſe foretell them, when they ſee birds, as it were, in amaze to ſtay their flight, or when the water in Wells is more troubled than ordinarie, hauing a bad taſt and ſtinking ſmell, for theſe are (as it is reported) the true ſignes and preſages of future motions. Pherecydes the Syrian, drawing water out of a Well, foretold an earthquake which hapned there. Anaximander Mileſius did by theſe ſignes declare to the Lacedemonians, that an earthquake was at hand, for otherwiſe, hee was no God to know things to come:

How men may foretell an earthquake, either at Sea, or on the Land.

come: And the trueſt ſignes of all are, when the windes blow not, or when the Sea is meruailous calme. For an earthquake neuer happeneth, when the wind bloweth, or when the Sea ſwelleth with waues: for when it blowes, the motion ceaſeth, otherwiſe it laſteth fortie daies, and ſome times longer, ſome haue laſted two yeares. But this earthquake whereof wee ſpeake laſted fifteene daies more or leſſe, whereupon all Women that were with child, being touched therewith miſcarried, and died ſoone after of the contagious ſickneſſe that forthwith enſued.

How long the Earthquake laſted at Venice.

This dangerous ſickneſſe (as it is reported) came from Scythia, and from thence glided along the Pontick Sea, and the Helleſpont; and at laſt at the ſame time that this great earthquake happened, it infected, in a manner, all the Weſt. Some Authors call this diſeaſe, the euill of the groine, and I thinke the reaſon was, becauſe the firſt ſignes of that diſeaſe were ſmall kernells in the groine, then there followed an extreame heate with griefe and heauineſſe in the head, which cauſed loſſe of memorie, ſo as in three daies they died. And this infection was ſo ſharpe, as of one hundred that had this diſeaſe, foureſcore and ten died. At the beginning thereof there was nothing heard nor ſeene in Venice (which aboue all other Cities was greatly afflicted therewith) but teares and ſighes, euery where burialls, Phiſitions looking to their patients, Friends and Kinsfolks viſiting thoſe that were ſicke, Prieſts comforting them and doing their dutie. But afterward, this cruell diſeaſe encreaſing more and more, thoſe that were infected therewith, of what age and condition ſoeuer, fell downe euery where one vpon another, and ſodainly died, the Kinſman refuſed to ſuccour his Kinſman, the Friend to helpe his Friend, the Brother to viſit his Brother, the Siſter to releeue the Siſter, Parents forſooke their Children, and Children in the like manner their Parents, there was no more Phiſitians nor Medicines, euery man fled one from another; and in what place ſoeuer a man was ſtricken therewith, he there died without any helpe at all: Funerall Pompe was no more knowne, it was enough to dragge a dead body out of his own houſe, by reaſon of the ſtench, and to lay it in ſome poore boate which carried it without pompe or ceremonie, to be throwne haſtily into ſome pit: and it is thought that diuers were burned, who were not fully dead. This corruption of the aire begunne at the beginning of the Spring, and encreaſed daily till May-day, being then at the Prime, and ſo laſted to the great loſſe of all men till the Moneth of Iune, and then it beganne by little and little to decreaſe, namely when the number of the liuing was ſo few, as it found no more matter to worke on.

From whence the contagion came to Venice.

Great deſolation in the Citie of Venice.

At what time the infection began and ended in Venice.

The Citie being thus bare of Inhabitants (for there were none to be ſeene in the ſtreets) for the repeopling of the emptie and void places, which did greatly deforme the Citie, the Senate made a decree, That as many as would come and dwell at Venice, after they had remained there two yeares, ſhould bee held for Citizens of the ſame. The Senate moreouer fearing that Lewis King of Hungarie making vſe of this miſerie of theirs, would againe inuade Dalmatia (for he was come at the ſame time into Italie with a great Armie, to reuenge the death of his brother, whom Queene Ioane his wife, had put to death) ſent three Ambaſſadours to him, Marco Iuſtiniano, Andrea Moroſini Knights, and Nicolao Gradonico: who either by intreaties, or faire promiſes, did ſo alter the Hungarian, as he not only promiſed, not to attempt any thing againſt the Venetians, during their aduerſitie, but made a truce with them for ten yeares (as ſome ſay) or for eight according to other Authors.

Strangers that would come and people the Citie, were made Citizens of Venice.

Truce taken with Lewis King of Hungarie.

But becauſe the Venetians ſhould be neuer freed from ſome forraine war, thoſe of Cape-Hiſtria reuolted ſoone after the recouerie of Zara. The Venetians, though it were in a very vnfit ſeaſon, did neuertheleſſe leuie forces, and vnder the command of Pancratio Iuſtiniano, ſent both by Sea and Land into Hiſtria, to reduce them vnto their obedience, the which, ſo ſoone as he arriued in the Prouince, hee eaſily did. The Authors of the rebellion were ſent to Venice, and commanded on paine of life not to depart thence without the Senates leaue, becauſe they ſhould no more raiſe any new ſtirre in their Citie.

Thoſe of Cap-Hiſtria reuolt.

The Hiſtrians reduced to the Venetians obedience.

At the ſame time likewiſe, Albert Prince of Croatia, robbing, and ſpoiling the Prouince of Hiſtria, conſtrained the Venetians to take Armes againſt him. New forces were raiſed for that purpoſe, and the warre being thus proclaimed againſt Albert, two Senators were ſent thither for Generalls of the Armie. The Croatian being daunted at the firſt report of the marching of the Armie, demaunded ſafe conduct of the Generalls, and obtained it, that hee might goe to Venice to the Prince and Senate, where being arriued, he threw himſelfe proſtrate at his feete, who although they had iuſt cauſe to bee offended with him, yet neuertheleſſe obſeruing their ancient cuſtome, they pardoned him, after they had firſt taken certaine places from him, which by the Senats commandement were razed, to the end they ſhould be no more a retreat for theeues and robbers. Caroſino (who onely makes mention of this Dalmatian warre) ſaith, that thoſe two Generals at their returne to Venice, were condemned and depriued of their place of Senators, becauſe they had not in the ſame warre followed thoſe directions which were commaunded them.

Albert Prince of Croatia pardoned.

Thoſe puniſhed which did not follow the Senates commaundement.

Soone after enſued the third warre with the Genoueſes, but it is thought that the cauſe of the warre proceeded (as oftentimes before) from them. They poſſeſſed certaine Cities on the Ponticke Sea, and therefore euer ſince Paleologus draue the Venetians from Conſtantinople, they attempted by all meanes to depriue the Venetian marchants of the trafficke of thoſe Seas. Whereupon, there and elſe where, they offered them ſundrie wrongs, but eſpecially neere to the Citie of Protoſpera, which they held on the ſame coaſt. Meeting in that place with certaine Venetian and Candiot ſhips, they fel vpon them, & hauing taken them, they conſtrained them to returne by Capha to the great hinderance, and more ſhame of the marchants. Caroſin ſaith they were taken and ſpoiled in the hauen of Capho. The Senate ſent to the Genoueſes to demand reſtitution of that which had beene taken from them: which being denied, they prouided a mightie Armie againſt the Genoueſes: Some gallies were armed in Dalmatia, Candie, and Nigrepont, and diuers were likewiſe ſtayed at Venice, who were readie to go forth for trafficke; and Marco Moroſino the Admirall of the Adriaticke Sea being called home from Raguſa where he remained with certaine gallies, they made vp the number of fiue and thirtie, the which were giuen to Marco Rucino: but diuers Authors in ſteed of Rucino ſet downe Nicolao Piſano.

What was the occaſion of the third Liguſticke warre.

The Venetians Armie againſt the Genoueſes.

This man leauing Venice with an intent to aſſaile the enemies, who were reported to be abroad at Sea, was conſtrained by a ſodaine tempeſt to enter into the Hauen of Cariſte, which lieth towards Nigrepont. It fell out fortunately for the Venetians, that fourteene Gallies of Genoa rode there at the ſame time at an Ankor, laden with marchandize, and ſtore of Armour, with diuers ſouldiers, who were bound for Pera, to fortifie it, to the end that their countrimen who dwelt there, might be no more ſurprized (as at other times) by the Venetians: Others ſay that thoſe gallies returning homewards into Italie, entred that hauen. The Venetian Generall hauing deſcried them, commaunded his ſouldiers forthwith to prepare themſelues to fight: All of them ſpeedily obeying his commaundement, tooke their weapons, and turned the prowes of their gallies towards the enemie, and did ſhut in the iſſues and paſſages on all ſides ſauing towards the land, fearing to fall vpon the rocks. The Genoueſes reſolued to trie all meanes, rather than to yeeld. The Venetian then landed part of his forces, and ſpeedily fortified a place neere to the enemies, from whence with his engines he began to batter them, whileſt the gallies likewiſe ſhot continually vpon them. The Genoueſes being aſſailed on euerie ſide (perceiuing all things to fall out vnluckily on their ſides) watching the time, began to make their ſaile-yards in readineſſe. The Venetian perceiuing their intent, was at the firſt amazed at the ſtrangeneſſe of the matter: But vnderſtanding that the enemie went ſodainly to flie, did with great attention marke which way he would eſcape. They on the other ſide making ſhew as if they intended ſome other matter, hauing uing turned their prowes to that ſide which the Venetians had left without any guard, being aided by their ſailes and oares they betooke themſelues to flight: And foure of the Gallies had in this ſort eſcaped one after an other, when Marco Moroſino Admirall of the Adriatike ſea, being vexed therewith, commanded one of thoſe Gallies which he had receiued the yeare before, for the guard of the Gulph, to run athwart the fift Genoa Gallie which was readie to eſcape, which was ſo ſpeedily done, as the ſame being taken, the reſidue which were readie to follow being amazed ranne vpon the next rocks, and were eaſily taken: And becauſe they were laden with rich marchandize the ſoldiors & ſailers bourded them, & being buſied in pillage ſuffered the other foure to eſcape with eaſe (who were already in the maine Sea) not caring for the Generals commandement: who being angrie for looſing ſo goodly an opportunitie through the couetouſneſſe of his people, commanded to ſet fier on fiue of the Gallies which were taken, and had not been yet pillaged. He did it to the end to enforce his Souldiours, (who were thereby depriued of their hope of more ſpoile) to purſue the enemies. For ſo ſoone as they left off to ſpoile, they followed the chace.

Foure Genoa Gallies eſcape.

Ten Genoa Gallies taken.

A diſcreet act of the Generall.

The Genoueſes in the meane time were farre enough off, yet neuertheleſſe, tenne of their Gallies, with the Generall of their Armie, and threeſcore and tenne Gentlemen were taken, not accounting thoſe of meaner qualitie, who were many in regard of the number of the Gallies, The victorious Venetian after this victorie at Chariſte, ſailed towards Nigrepont, where he left the Genoa Gentlemen with a thouſand of the chiefeſt priſoners to be kept; the reſidue to the number of foure hundred or thereabout, were ſent into Candie, and there put to the chaine and oare. The newes of this victorie brought great ioy to the Citie. The Senate in the midſt of this mirth, being mindfull of Religious matters, decreed That the ſame day that the Genoueſes were ouercome at Chariſte, ſhould for euer bee ſolemnized among the holidaies at Venice. It is thought that vpon this occaſion; the day of the decollation of S. Iohn is till this day celebrated, which before then was no holiday. Others ſay that it was vpon S. Victors day the Martyr.

Why the feaſt of the decollation of Saint Iohn is celebrated at Venice.

The Venetians making no long aboade at Nigrepont, after they had ſcoured the Ægean and Ionian Seas, came on a ſodaine to haue beſieged Pera: But the enemie hauing notice of his comming by their ſpies who had brought newes of their late loſſe at Chariſte, and how the Venetian Gallies were at hand, had fortified all places round about the Citie, and chained the ſhippes together which lay in the Hauen with their Maſts and ſaileyards in manner of a Fort and Rampier, and prouided ſo carefully for all other matters, as the Venetians (who came thither ſoon after with great ſhoutes) perceiuing what the enemie had done durſt not aſſaile them: But tarrying certaine daies in the ſtreight of Gallipolis, they ſurprized diuers veſſels of Genoa.

The Venetians dare not aſſaile Pera.

In the meane time, thoſe foure Genoa-Gallies which had eſcaped from Chariſte, hauing ioined themſelues to ſix others which were conducted by Philippo Doria, hauing notice of the departure of the Venetian Armie, came with all ſpeed to aſſaile Nigrepont. Thomaſo Viari who at the ſame time was Gouernour of the Citie being affrighted ſo ſoon as he deſcried the enemie a farre off, fled, with the Prouidatori out on the other ſide of the Citie which lieth towards the Channell. The Genoueſe at his arriuall, hauing aſſailed the Citie, wondered at the ſodaine flight of the officers, and did in a moment take and ſpoile it; then after he had ſet the priſoners at libertie, and brought thence great numbers of the inhabitants, he burnt the Citie. Doria being exceeding glad to haue in this ſort reuenged their loſſe lately receiued, departed from Nigrepont, and from thence came ſoone after and ſeized on the Iſle of Chyos. The Generall of the Venetians after he had beene abroad fortie daies on this iournie, and being out of hope to take any greater prize, returned toward Venice: but on the coaſt of Dalmatia he met with tenne Venetian Gallies, which the Senate ſent vnto him, whom he there ſtaied, and cauſed them to returne with him

The Genoueſes take Nigrepont

to

to Venice. The report of the great bootie which the Armie brought home, and anſwered all mens expectation, made his returne moſt welcome. Some Authors affirme that the ſpoile which was brought to Venice, amounted to the valew of foure hundred thouſand crownes, and others ſay three hundred thouſand.

The Armie returneth to Venice with great bootie.

The Venetians in league with the King of Arragon.

The ſame yeare that the warre began, the King of Arragon, vnto whom the Venetians had ſent Mihaeli Steno, ioined his forces to theirs againſt the Genoueſes. The Senate being ſtrengthened by the alliance of ſuch a Prince, hoping to execute ſome great deſigne, commanded a verie mightie Armie to be ſet forth, and appointed fiue and twentie of the chiefe among them to make prouiſion in the Citie of all things neceſſarie for the warre. Nicolao Piſani being choſen Generall of the Armie, departed from Venice with twelue Gallies, and with him Giouanni Delfino, who went to Conſtantinople to make a League with the Greeke Emperour againſt the Genoueſes. Piſani being arriued in Dalmatia, receiued one Gallie from the Coricani, an other from thoſe of Raguſa; then he commanded three others of Venice to follow him, who met him at Nigrepont; Giouanni Delfino, who came from Venice with him went on his Ambaſſade to the greeke Emperour, who allied himſelfe with the Venetians againſt the Genoueſes.

Nicolas Piſani Generall of the Venetian Armie.

The greeke Emperour in league with the Venetians againſt the Genoueſes.

But whilſt the Greekes prepared their ſhippes of warre, thirtie Venetian Gallies departed from Venice vnder the command of Pancratio Iuſtiniano, Admirall of the Gulph, who ſailed towards Sicilie to ioine with the Armie of the Arragonois which was ſaid to be at hand: Theſe two Armies being there ioined together left Sicilie, and ſailed directly towards Greece intending to paſſe beyond Morea: But being on the maine, ſuch an horrible tempeſt aroſe, as in the memorie of man was neuer the like ſeene. The Fleet was meruailouſly beaten, and in great danger, one of the Gallies was drowned, and diuers others ſtriking on the ſhoare were ſplit in peeces, but without any great loſſe of men, by reaſon they were ſo neere Land. At the laſt the tempeſt ceaſing, they ſailed towards Modon, whither Nicolao Piſani came within a while after from Nigrepont. The Genoueſes a few daies before had giuen him chace with fortie Gallies, from the maine euen almoſt to Nigrepont, whither he ſpeedily retired himſelfe, and ſunke certaine ſhippes at the entrie of the Hauen, to barre the enemies entrance, beeing reſolute to defend that place with all his forces. The Genoueſes failed not, but came with great ſhoutes and aſſailed the Citie, which being manfully defended by the Venetian, all their attempts poued vaine: who beeing repulſed from Nigrepont, went and tooke the Citie of Philotea by force.

The Venetians ioyne with the Arragonois.

But whilſt theſe exploites were done about Nigrepont, a Gallie of Genoa left the Fleet and went before to diſcouer, who meeting with a Venetian Gallie which was commanded by Giouanni Moro (or Memo as ſome ſay) aſſailed one another, but the Venetian was ouercome, by whom the Genoueſes vnderſtood, that the Venetian and Arragonois forces were not far from thence, whereupon returning with ſpeed toward Nigrepont, they aduertized their Countrimen; That two nauall Armies ioined together were at Morea; the one of Venetians, and the other of Arragonois; that they were already vnder ſaile to come & meet them, or elſe that they would be with them very ſhortly. Pagano the Generall of the Genoueſes Armie beeing troubled with theſe news, left Nigrepont, and ſpeedily ſailed with all his forces to Pera.

The Genoueſes before Nigrepont

Pagano General of the Genoa Armie.

It is reported that before his departure thence hee reuewed his Armie, & found fifteene hundred men to be wanting, who for the moſt part had beene ſlaine before Nigrepont. Piſani being freed from the ſiege came (as hath beene ſaid) to Modon, where after he had conferred with Pancratio Iuſtiniano, & with Ponce Generall to the king of Arragon, concerning the ſtate of the war, & giuen order that all things neceſſarie for their iournie ſhould be in readineſſe, they came to Nigrepont: And from thence after they had fortified the Citie with men and victuals they ſailed towards Conſtantinople: But being yet on the Ægean ſea, by reaſon of the violēce of the wind

(for

(for it was in the middeſt of winter) they were conſtrained to remaine for a time in the ſame place, where the winde had ſtaied them. But victuailes beginning to wax ſcarce, they returned toward Candie; from whence, fortie dayes after, about the beginning of the ſpring, being furniſhed with victuailes and other neceſſarie munitions, they ſailed againſt the enemie.

The Venetian Hiſtorians ſay, That the two Armies paſſed on to Conſtantinople without any tempeſt; that being there ioyned with the Greekes forces, they went furiouſly againſt the enemie; that there was a bloudie fight neere to Pera; and that they departed one from another with equall vantage. But in this they haue verie negligently, (I ſay not licentiouſly) ſpoken againſt the Venetians reputation. For the moſt credible Authors affirme that the iſſue of this battaile was verie different, ſaying That they fought neere to the Boſphorus of Thrace, which is a ſtreight three miles diſtant from Conſtantinople, hauing Europe on the one ſide, and Aſia on the other, looking one vpon another by reaſon of their neighbour ſhoares, ſo as they may be perceiued to haue beene in times paſt but one Land, being diuided by an earth-quake, which made a verie ſtreight paſſage to the Sea. So Plato thought That Atlas hauing cut through Calpe opened the paſſage of the Ocean to the Mediterranean Sea.

What the Thracian Boſphorus is.

Now at the mouth of this ſtreight, (which in regard of the narrow ſpace therof that Oxen doe eaſily paſſe ouer, is called Boſphorus, ſurnamed of Thrace, by the name of the Prouince which lieth on the one ſide thereof) the Genoueſes ſo ſoone as they had intelligence of the enemies comming, who were newly departed from Gallipolis, did of purpoſe plant themſelues: fearing if they ſhould fight on the maine Sea, and at one time with three great Fleets, they ſhould be enforced to fight in a round forme, & therefore they thought it ſafeſt for them to receiue the Venetians and Spaniards in front at the entrie of a ſtreight, where it was impoſſible for ſo many ſhippes to fight altogether in front, and the Greekes Armie on their ſides whoſe forces they hoped to ſuſtaine with more eaſe and abilitie, if on their firſt approach they could but put them to flight as it afterward hapned. For the Greek Armie conſiſting of forty Gallies, ſo ſoone as the fight beganne, at the verie firſt ſhock of the enemie, baſely gaue place, and in a maze returned home. The Genoueſes being quit from them, turned all their forces vpon the Venetians and Arragonois, who fought in the front. They fought there (according to all mens ſayings) verie fiercely, & for two hours ſpace it was not diſcerned vnto which ſide fortune inclined. But at Sunne-ſet the winde aroſe, which greatly troubled the Genoueſes, who notwithſtanding would not giue ouer, but fought more couragiouſly; and for all it was night they would not leaue the battaile, chooſing rather to dye than to giue place. The Venetians on the other ſide being mindefull of their reputation, were aſhamed that they had not at the firſt ouercome them, being the ſtronger in ſhippes: For beſides fortie Gallies of their owne, the Arragonois had thirtie. Other Authors neuertheleſſe ſpeake not of ſo many, but ſay, That diuers Gallies being carried away by force of the winde, could not come to fight. Now this bloudie conflict laſted all night euen till day. The night made the dangers of the fight more terrible. There was nothing to be heard but groanes and pittifull cries, claſhing together of Gallies, and clattering of armour; and both the ſhoares ecchoed with the horrible noyſe. All that darke night as, hath beene ſaid, (and that which is moſt to bee admired) in winter, the fight continued. It is thought that in the darke, the Genoueſes ranne vpon their owne fellowes, the Venetians on Venetians, and the Arragonois, on their owne countri-men. But when it was daie, the Sea being dyed red with bloud of the dead bodies, made manifeſt how bloudie that night-encounter had beene on either ſide. The channell of Nigre-pont was couered with bloudie carcaſes, with the furniture of ſuncke Gallies, and with a great quantitie of arrowes and dartes, and with diuers abandoned Gallies which hulled vp and downe without Souldiours or conductors. At the laſt, Ponce Generall of the Arragonois being ſlaine and

The Greekes baſe flight.

A cruell night-fight.

The Arragonis Generall ſlaine in the battaile.

and they by reaſon thereof being retired, the Venetians likewiſe, (becauſe they were able to doe no more) quitted the place to the Genoueſes.

The enemie likewiſe being ſatisfied that they had giuen him place, reputing it for great honour, and imputing the victorie to himſelfe, did in like manner with his people retire to his Campe. In this battaile were ſlaine Stephano Contareni Procurator of Saint Marke, Giouanni Steno, Benedicto Bembo; and Pancratio Admirall of the Gulphe, dyed within few daies after of his hurtes. The Venetian Annaliſts affirme, That the one halfe onely of the Venetian Fleet fought at this battaile: which makes mee think that the ſtreightneſſe of the place was the cauſe thereof; and that therefore the Genoueſes would not ſtirre from thence. It ſeemes likewiſe the victorie was as bloudie to him; for the Venetian afterward, challenging him to fight, he durſt not accept it.

Who dyed on the Venetians ſide.

Giouanni Delfino who was preſent at this battaile (according to ſome Authors) reported at Venice, That the Venetians in this fight had the better; that they took eight and twenty of the enemies Galleis; that the Soldiours and Sailers in them were all ſlaine, with great numbers of others who diuerſly periſhed: & that the Venetians had loſt but foure Gallies. But forraine Hiſtorians report the matter to haue hapned in the ſame manner as wee haue alreadie mentioned at the Boſphorus of Thrace. But becauſe no man ſhould thinke that wee haue concealed or diſſembled ought, chiefly in that we ſaid that they fought all the night: Franciſco Petrarcha the famous Poet, ſpeaking of this cruell battaile, makes mention of it in theſe words. You haue ouercome (ſaith he, writing to the Genoueſes) content your ſelues leaſt it be thought that ye haue forgotten your ancient cuſtomes. Wee haue ſeene the Boſphorus to ſwell with the bloud of the Venetians your enemies, when at night a ſtrong wind ariſing, yee were aſſailed by three mightie Nations, betweene Conſtantinople and Nigre-pont, fighting with the enemies againſt wind and tide. This is that which he writeth, with other matters to the ſame purpoſe. Blondus beſides ſaith That the battaile continued all night euen till day without any intermiſſion, and that which is moſt to be admired, in the middeſt of winter. Soone after this battaile, Piſani ſurpriſed two Genoa ſhippes laden with victuailes which were going to Pera. Then perceiuing that he could not draw the enemie to fight, after hee had ſtaied there a while (victuailes beginning to faile) he retired with the Armie of Arragon into Candie, where at leiſure hee trimmed and repaired his Gallies. The Genoueſe in like manner brought backe his halfe-broken to Genoa. The newes of that which hapned at the Boſphorus being reported at Venice, did greatly afflict the Citie: But the Senators were more aſhamed than ſorrie, being highly diſpleaſed with the raſhneſſe of thoſe who would fight in ſo diſcommodious a place, beeing accompanied with the forces of two mightie Princes, and yet could not vanquiſh the Genoueſes whom they alone had ſo often ouercome, and which is worſt of all, they had quitted the place as though they had been vanquiſhed, with great loſſe. Wherefore, becauſe in time to come no more ſuch raſh faults might be committed, they decreed to ſend foure Prouidatori to euerie Armie, who ſhould in all matters aſſiſt the Generall, and with him giue order for whatſoeuer ſhould be expedient for the Common-wealth. Giouanni Delfino, Marco Cornari, Marini Grimano, and Marini Phalerio were ſent thither in the ſame nature. Theſe men being come into Candie, certaine Gallies were ſent to ſcoure the Ponticke Seas, who hauing ſurprized certaine of the enemies ſhippes laden with corne and other marchandize, returned into the Iſland. After whoſe returne Paulo Lauretano, ſurnamed the Great, was commanded to goe to Cyprus with nine Gallies, from whence he brought to Venice diuers Marchants with rich marchandize.

What Petrarch deliuereth concerning this battaile.

How the Senate diſdained the loſſe of this battaile.

Foure new officers created in the Armie.

Whileſt theſe things were done neere to the Iſlands, foure Genoa Gallies entring the Gulphe, came on boote-haling euen to Hiſtria: vpon theſe newes Marco Michaeli was commanded to haſten ſpedily thither with fiue Gallies to take them if it were poſſible: but whileſt he made preparations for his iourney the enemie went backe

The Genoueſes make roades to Hiſtria.

as

as ſpeedily as he came. Much about the ſame time eight Gallies were ſent to Sea vnder the command of Giouanni Sanuto, and not long after, nine others; of both which Piſani was made Generall. Who after he had ſailed the Ægean and Ionian Seas, and being come as farre as Pera, did with admirable ſpeede ſurpriſe diuers ſhips of Genoa, among whom were two Barzes, laden with rich merchandize, which were iudged to bee worth two hundred thouſand Crownes, wherein were nine Gentlemen of Genoa with diuers Merchants. This being fortunately atchieued, vpon report that the Genoa fleet was comming, Piſani thought it euer better to go and aſſaile the enemie, than to waite for him, and to make warre, rather in a forraine Countrie than at home. Wherefore hauing choſen out of the whole fleet twentie Gallies he left Marco Michaeli with the reſidue for the guarde of the Gulphe, and came with a proſperous winde into Sardinia, where he ioyned with the Armie of Arragon, which was of fortie Gallies and three Barzes, vnder the commaund of Bernardo Caprari. The Arragonois did at the ſame time beſiege Algiers: the two fleets being there ioyned together, came to the Sea of Caralitana.

Piſani Generall of the Venetian Armie.

Piſani ioyneth with the Arragonois.

The Genoueſes being puffed vp with pride for the battaile at the Boſphorus, departing from Genoa with three and fortie Gallies, commanded by Anthonio Grimaldi went to ſeeke the enemie. Some ſay they fought neare to Cyrna; and others, at Callaris, which is a part of the Iſle of Sardinia, from whence it is thought that the Gulphe tooke the name, and ſome ſay at Congeria. But whereſoeuer they fought, it is certaine, that ſo ſoone as the two Armies got ſight one of another, they forthwith fell into order of battaile, and ſet forward with great courage to the encounter. The Genoueſes calling to minde how that not long before they had vanquiſhed them, albeit they were ſtronger than they, thereby promiſed to themſelues the victorie: The Venetians attributed it to the incommodiouſneſſe of the place, rather than to the enemies valour; all of them reſoluing, that day to reuenge the diſgrace and loſſe which they had ſuſtained, or elſe to die in that place. Their Allies were of the like minde: wherupon they fought with as great courage as force. Some ſay that the Genoueſes hauing deſcried the Venetian enſignes, were afraide: For hearing that the Venetian was comming to ioyne with the Arragonois, they were deſirous to fight with the Spaniards, before the Venetians ſhould arriue. Now the Venetians with their Allies being ready to fight, determined to tie and make faſt all their Gallies together, (ten choiſe Venetian Gallies excepted) which were committed to Giouanni Sanuto, to execute ſome enterpriſe, if neede ſhould be. By this wee may eaſily imagine with what courage the Venetians fought that day. For hauing in this ſort chained their Gallies together, they had determined either to vanquiſh, or die there, hauing taken from themſelues all hope of flight. Some ſay that Giouanni Sanuto did firſt receiue the enemie with his ten Gallies, and that the maine Armie with the Barzes followed after, But it is not credible that ſuch a battaile was ſo ſleightly begunne, or that ten Venetian Gallies would oppoſe themſelues to three and fortie of Genoa, which would in an inſtant haue been inueſted by ſo great a number. It is more probable that theſe ten were ſet a-part to come to the reſcue, and that their Generall was commanded to runne a-thwart the enemie, when he ſhould perceiue him moſt buſied in the fight, and that by this meanes it fell out, that the Genoueſes being aſſailed in front and in flanke, were the more eaſily vanquiſhed. But how ſoeuer it was done either by pollicie or force, or rather by both of them together, it is not certainly knowne. Yet it is moſt certaine, that they fought the ſame day very fiercely, and that at laſt the Genoa forces being wholly broken, after they had valiantly reſcued Grimaldi their Generall, out of the thickeſt of the preſſe, they fled as vanquiſhed, and loſt fiftie ſhips of warre; which being in poſſeſſion of the Venetians and their Allies, were all (according to ſome Authors) with all their tackling, Mariners and Souldiers ſunke: becauſe they meant altogether, if it were poſſible, to extirpe the name of Genoa; which they affirme to haue read in the Genoueſes Hiſtories. But in regard the quarrell betwixt them was not about mens liues, but only for Grimaldi Generall of the Genoueſes.

In what place the battaile was fought.

In what manner the Venetians fought.

The battaile betwixt the Venetians and Genoueſes.

The Genoueſes defeated.

Great cruelties falſly imputed to the Venetians for enlardging of their Dominions, and that in all the time past it was neuer seene, that either of these people did inhumanely murther their prisoners, it is hard to beleeue, that they did put them to death, as is reported; but that rather they sought to couer their owne disgrace by other mens faults.

The Venetian Histories make mention of two and thirtie Gallies taken from the enemie, and of great numbers of men slaine in the fight: And as for the prisoners, among whom were diuers Gentlemen, That some of them were sent to Venice, and the rest of them into Spaine by the Arragonois.

Grimaldi with those vessells which he could gather together, retired with all speed to Genoa, where the report of that losse, being spred abrode through the Citie, caused so great sorrow and desolation, as though the Citie it selfe had beene taken. The two victorious Armies after the battaile, came and assailed Sardinia, where by force they tooke two Cities from the Genoueses; and afterwards departed the one from the other, they returned to their owne homes.

The great lamentation made at Genoa.

The Genoueses being daunted by this only ouer-throw, which was exceeding great, not being able of themselues to vp-hold their estate, had recourse to forraine forces. They sent their Ambassadours to Giouanni Visconte, who at the same time gouerned both Spirituall and Temporall matters at Milan. The summe of the Oration with the chiefe of the Ambassade made, was in a manner such as followeth: That the Genoueses fortune by one only defeate, was in such sort altered, as being in times past most great flourishing, was now weake and feeble, by being at last ouer-come by a mightier enemie, whom they had in time past often vanquished: by meanes whereof they were no longer able to make resistance. But, notwithstanding that all things failed them with their fortune, yet neuertheless their hatred to the Venetians, was no whit diminished, but rather on the contrarie encreased: That they had rather hazard their ancient libertie, than to yeeld to the force of their capitall enemie. And therefore they besought him (both for his profit and happie fortune) to accept of the Citie of Genoa her Inhabitants, Territorie, Sea, Hauen, Townes, and all other her Faculties, as well publike as priuate, and generally, all matters Diuine and Humane; All which they were commanded by the Genoueses to commend to his power and trust: earnestly beseeching him, that hee would bee pleased to preserue by speedy aide his Genoa, her Citizens, with all that which belonged to them, and by his power to defend from the wrongs of the Venetians, those whom he had once accepted for his subiects; who would euer so continue, to the end that all men might see that they had not in vaine requested his aide and fauour.

The Genoueses commit themselues to Giouanni Visconte, Duke, and Arch Bishop of Milan.

We cannot sufficiently admire and grieue, to behold the mightiest people of Italie nexe after the Venetians, and those who had purchased so much honour and reputation at Sea, thus on a sodaine through despaire, not only foolishly, but shamefully to haue subiected themselues, looling their ancient libertie, which from the beginning they had so carefully kept and maintained. But, of a certaine, the Stoicks opinion is most true, who say, That all other passions disquiet humane vnderstanding, but that choller alone doth wholly ouer-throw it: in such manner as it happened at the same time to the Genoueses, who through hatred and wrath became mad distracted.

The Authors discourse.

Visconte did willingly accept of their offer, and hauing curteously entertained the Ambassadours, hee entreated them to bee of good cheare, and told them that hee with his Allies would take an order, that so long as the Viscontes should prosper, the Genoueses should neuer repent to haue implored their aide: with this hope then he dismissed them, saying, That the assistance and aide of that familie, which they had so humbly craued, should neuer faile to beate back all forraine iniuries which should threaten them: And so the Ambassadours tooke their leaue.

Visconte his answere to the Genoueses.

These newes being brought to Venice, (there being some likelihood of great warre with the Viscontes, by reason of the Genoueses) the Venetians beganne forthwith with to fortifie whatſoeuer they poſſeſſed in the firme Land; and allied themſelues with the Carrarians, thoſe of Eſcalla, of Æſte, the Gonzagues, and the Florentines in Tuſcanie. Some Authors ſay, that Viſconte, as well in his owne name, as on the behalfe of the Genoueſes, did by his Ambaſſadours ſeeke to procure a peace, in which negotiation they nominated Franciſco Petrarcha for the chiefe Ambaſſadour, and that he could not obtaine it, though vpon great conditions; and they thinke that it ſo happened by the will of God, in regard of the famous and memorable victorie, which the Venetians ſoone after obtained of the Genoueſes in Morea. The Genoueſes, albeit that they had ſo vnfortunately fought, would neuertheleſſe perſiſt in their obſtinacie; For foure of their Gallies did within a while after enter the Venetian Gulphe, and on a ſodaine ſpoiled Fara, and Corfu, with certaine Iſlands of Dalmatia; where they ſurprized the Cities, ſpoiled and burnt them; being forth-with ſeconded by foure others.

The Venetians make new alliance.

Petrarke Ambaſſadour for the Milanois.

Victorie of the Venetians ouer the Genoueſes in Morea.

The Genoueſes make incurſions into the Adriatick Gulph.

The Senate being moued at theſe newes, commanded fourteene Gallies to bee ſpeedily armed, and Nicholao Piſani to haſten with them to meete the enemie: But the Genoueſe was gone forth of the Gulphe, before this Armie arriued.

Piſani, to the end his iourney ſhould not bee altogether vnprofitable, ſailed towards the Pontick Sea, where meeting with no memorable action, hee retired into Dalmatia. Ten Gallies which were armed at Arbi came to him thither, which being ioyned to the reſidue, made vp the number of foure and twentie. It was reported euery where in the meane time, that the Genoueſes hauing renewed their Armie (for a whole yeare was paſt ſince their loſſe on the lower Sea) had ſet forth fiue and twentie Gallies vnder the conduct of Pagano Doria; and that they were already departed from Genoa. Piſani hauing ioyned ten other Gallies of Giouanni Sanuto to the foure and twentie of his owne, ſailed ſpeedily into Sardinia to preuent the enemie. Doria, (whether it were that fortune would not haue the two Armies meet, or whether he did it of ſet purpoſe, which I rather beleeue) hauing ſhunned the Venetian Armie, ſo ſoone as the Venetians were gone from home, entred furiouſly into the Adriatick Gulphe, to warre rather on other mens ſtreames, than on their owne, where in few daies hee ſurprized diuers veſſells, who met him vnlookt for. From thence ſailing into Hiſtria, he tooke Parenza, which hee ſpoiled, and hauing taken thence the bodies of S. Mauro, and S. Charles, he burnt it.

Piſani the Venetian Generall retires to Dalmatia.

A new Genoueſan Armie commanded by Pagano Doria.

Doria ſpoileth the Adriatick Gulphe.

The Genoueſes take Parenza.

The enemies comming into the Gulphe, with the taking of Parenza, occaſioned a great feare and amazement in the Citie, no leſſe than if the Genoueſes had beene at their gates. Therefore, they ſpeedily chained vp their Hauen, and placed a ſtrong Garriſon there, becauſe they thought that the enemie would come directly to the Citie, who knew that their maine Armie was abroad. They planted Sentinells and Corps-de-guard ouer all the Citie, and ſent forth light boats to diſcouer the enemies deſeigne: and this feare laſted till certaine newes was brought that the Genoa Armie was diſlodged. Doria departing from Hiſtria, met with a Venetian Barze on the maine, he ſent three Gallies to encounter it, who became Maſters thereof; the Merchants were taken with their merchandize, which was a very great bootie; for it was eſteemed worth an hundred and eight and fortie thouſand crownes. Within a while after, three Venetian Gallies were likewiſe taken going to Candie, to bee armed there with men and munition.

The feare which was in Venice for the enemies comming.

The Senate were greatly vexed that the Genoueſes after ſo notable a loſſe receiued the yeare before, had in ſo ſhort time raiſed themſelues againe, in ſuch manner, as the Venetians could hardly aſſure any place abroade, nor yet their Gulphe at home. And becauſe they knew that the Genoueſes were thus ſtrengthened by the aide of Viſconte, they reſolued to wrap him in a Domeſticke warre, to cauſe him to forſake them. They determined then to renue their alliance with Charles King of Boheme, with whom not long before they were allied againſt Maſtin of Eſcalla. That being done, it was concluded that he ſhould paſſe with a mightie Armie into Italie againſt Viſconte. And in the meane time the Venetians exchanged priſoners with the Genoueſes.

The Venetian Senate diſpleaſed with Viſconte.

They make alliance with the King of Boheme.

Andrea Dandulo hauing gouerned the Common-wealth almoſt twelue yeares, deceaſed. After his death the Common-wealth was greatly afflicted abroade, and at home, during the moſt dangerous gouernment of Phalerio who ſucceeded him. For beſides the ſundry loſſes which it ſuſtained at Sea in his time, it was aſſailed by two inſupportable miſchiefs, famine, and peſtilence, and with terrible Earthquakes: And it eſcaped narrowly from looſing her liberty likewiſe, by his Deuiliſh conſpiracie. Dandulo died the ſixt of September, and was honourably buried in S. Markes Church, neare to the Font.

¶ MARINI PHALERIO, the 55. Duke of Venice.

Marini Phalerio Knight, and Earle of Val-Marine, being abſent, was declared Prince. He was at the ſame time Ambaſſador for the Common-wealth, to the Pope: At the ſame time as the Senate were buſied about the election of a new Prince, newes came that three Genoa Gallies were taken by the Venetians, neare to the Iſlands of Greece: The enemies Armie likewiſe entring the Adriatick Gulph tooke certaine Merchant ſhips, and hauing in a ſhort ſpace gotten a great bootie, departed as ſpeedily as they came.

The Venetian Armie in the Iſle of Sapientia.

After the election of Phalerio, Piſani who commanded abroade for the Common-wealth, and did alone at that time conduct that mightie Venetian Sea-Armie of fiue and thirtie Gallies, and two and twentie leſſer veſſells, hauing notice that the enemies were abroade came and caſt Ankor, and waited for them in the Iſle of Sapientia, neare to Morea. Doria, Generall of the Genoueſes came thither ſo ſoone as hee, with an intent to fight. Blondus ſaith, that they fought at Sea neare to the Iſland, and that after a long and dangerous combat, the Genoueſes got the victorie: Piſani being taken priſoner with fiue thouſand beſide. If they did fight, and imploied their whole forces, the fortune of Piſani and the reſt is to be excuſed, becauſe the euents of warre are diuers and vncertaine, and in mine opinion he is to be praiſed, in that he rather choſe to die, or to be taken, than baſely to flie. But the Venetian Hiſtories ſay, that the whole Armie was loſt that day without fight or ſlaughter, one Galley excepted, which eſcaped. If it be ſo, wee may aſſuredly thinke that the Venetians were ſurpriſed by the Genoueſes in the ſame manner, as the Venetians did the Genoueſes certaine yeares before at Chariſte, vnder the command of the ſame

The Venetian Armie ſurprized

Piſani,

Priſant, (as ſome ſay) and that he was taken in his owne ſnare, and that the loſſe was much greater to the Commonwealth than the enemie knew of.

It is reported that the day before this vnfortunate loſſe, diuers prodigies appeared to them, and among the reſt a great number of Crowes fought ouer the fleet, part of which were ſo beaten by their aduerſe partie, as the fethers and bloud dropped downe abundantly into the Venetian gallies: Beſides, a ſayler leaping out of one gallie into another, was on a ſodaine ſwallowed vp by a ſea-monſter. The Citie being troubled at the report of this loſſe, the people ſaid that they neuer receiued a greater: and they did beleeue that their ſtate would haue beene wholly ouerthrowne, if the victorious Genoueſes ſhould at that inſtant haue come directly to the Citie. Where was their Captaine? where their Gallies? where were their forces readie to haue beaten him forth of the hauen, and to haue defended the Citizens? They would haue beene wholly ruinated, if the enemie (as it often happeneth, not knowing how to make vſe of his victorie) had not ſailed ſome where elſe, as of a certaine it fell ſo out. For victorious Doria ſatisfying himſelfe with his fortunate exploite, returned with his whole Armie to Genoa: where being no leſſe admired for this notable victorie, than for the bootie of which he brought home, he was welcomed with great ioy, and generall applauſe of all men.

Prodigies appeare before the loſſe of the Armie.

Great diſcomfort in Venice.

The Genoueſes Generall his error.

But the Venetians (as their conſtancie in aduerſities hath euer beene admirable) did not ſpend this ſmall time of relaxation from warre in idlenes, but did forthwith leuie new forces, and in a ſhort ſpace did ſet forth foure armed gallies to guard the Gulph. Yet neuertheleſſe they were not ſo ſoone readie, but that three of the enemies gallies hauing before entred the Gulph, tooke certaine ſhips of burthen returning from Candie to Venice, which would haue greatly moleſted the inhabitants of Hiſtria and Dalmatia, if their attempts had not beene ſpeedily reſiſted.

The Venetians diligence.

Truce taken with Viſconte.

In this ſtate ſtood their affaires, when as on the land ſide truce was taken for foure monethes with Viſconte. But in the meane time a galley of Genoa called Grimaldi meeting on the coaſt of Morea with the ſame Venetian gallie, which as we ſaid did eſcape from Sapientia, tooke it, then ſoone after another wherein was Guido Trentſano the Gouernour of Candie, and ſoone after, another in the hauen of Fraſcane: And the boldneſſe of the galley was ſuch, as it ſailed from thence to get bootie euen as farre as Grada. The Venetians not being able to endure ſo great a diſgrace ſent forth three gallies, not onely to hinder her from committing any further harme, but to be reuenged for what had beene alreadie done. The charge thereof was committed to Nicholao Iuſtiniano, who with thoſe forces went to expulſe the enemie.

A great bravery of a Genoueſes galley.

Phalerio in the meane time hauing gouerned the Commonwealth nine whole moneths, was poſſeſſed with a deſire to make himſelfe king thereof, whereunto this wicked man had almoſt opened the way. This enemie to his owne countrey, and to the Senate who had elected him to the dignitie, did determine to ſeize vpon the ſeignorie, and to kill the chiefe of the Senate: And the more eaſily to effect it, hee had hired diuers of the common ſort to exhort this wretched murther, and ſome likewiſe (which is to be admired) of the nobilitie, ſo as miſchiefe doth euer find fauourers. The murther was committed to ſixteene euill diſpoſed perſons, who were of the chiefe of the conſpiracie, all which had a day appointed them to come to the Pallace with threeſcore more well armed. They concluded among themſelues that on the fourteenth day of Aprill, they would caſt falſe reports about the Citie, That the enemie was at hand, and that his gallies were alreadie before the hauen, at which rumour the Prince ſhould forthwith commaund all men to take Armes, and cauſe the great bell of the high Tower to be rung. At which ſignall, thoſe of the conſpiracie comming forth of their houſes well armed, ſhould by ſundrie waies come to the Pallace to receiue the Prince and Senates commaundement, where ſeizing on the gates, they ſhould kill all the Senators, with as many as were come thither to debate on matters concerning the Commonwealth, and generally the whole Nobilitie bilitie, and then Phalerio ſhould no more be called Duke but Lord. Some ſay that they reſolued ſo ſoone as they ſhould haue diſanulled the order of the Senators, to commit the gouernment of the Citie to the people.

The manner of Phalerio his conſpiracie.

A day appointed for the execution.

Ariſtocratia reputed the beſt of gouernments.

But it is moſt certaine that a Commonwealth well gouerned hath ſtill beene beloued of God, and much more when it is gouerned by iuſtice, ſo, as of all earthly gouernments, I thinke the ſame to be moſt pleaſing vnto him which Plato calleth Ariſtocratia, which doth not obey the commaund'ement of one alone, and which being moſt good, (as well in opinion of that learned man, as in the iudgement of all wiſe men,) hath euer beeene eſteemed moſt worthie of praiſe: Becauſe it is a true agreement and vnion of the chiefer ſort; and ſuch is the gouernment of the ſtate of Venice: which hauing beene oftentimes preſerued before by the diuine prouidence, was of a certaine much more at this inſtant. For ſuccour came to the Senators from thence where they leaſt of all expected it. There was a man called Beltrand a popular perſon, and one of the chiefe of the conſpiracie. He the verie night before this maſſacre ſhould haue beene committed, being prouoked (as it is to be thought) with repentance for ſo horrible a crime, came ſecretly the euening of the ſame night to the houſe of Nichalao Leon one of the Senators, and his goſſip, and hauing taken him aſide, diſcouered the whole matter: telling him, That being ſtirred vp with loue to his country, and with an exceeding great affection to the Senate, he could not conceale ſuch a miſchief. And after he had named the chiefe of the conſpiracie with Phalerio, he beſought him that he would haue him in remembrance, that it might not be imputed to him for a fault, that hee had at the beginning conſented to the conſpiracie againſt the Senate and his countrey. Leon was amazed, and with the heinouſneſſe of the matter, could not for a time make him an anſwere, but the feare of the publike and particular danger awaked him. Beltrand being gone home, he ſpeedily ſent for the chiefe of the Senat, thoſe of the councell of the ten, and other officers of the Citie to come to ſpeak with him. So ſoone then as the Senators were come to his houſe, and ſuch of the cõmon ſort as had not bene named by the accuſer to haue beene acquainted with the plot: thoſe ſixteene which were chiefe of the conſpiracie, were the ſame very night apprehended, and being conuicted of the crime, were murthered, and with ropes let downe from the top of the Pallace vpon the Columnes. It is reported that Philippo Calandriero was one of the number, who was one of the beſt architects and engrauers of his time, whoſe skill the Senate had vſed in their publike buildings. It is thought that the new buildings as well in the ducall Pallace as in the market-place, which doth much exceed the old, was of his workmanſhip. I would haue concealed his name, if I had not thought it a cruell deed to depriue ſo excellent a wit of his praiſe. For in this matter, whereof we now ſpake, I am ſo farre from mentioning the names of the conſpirators, as on the contrarie, I thinke thoſe that haue named them, to haue done indiſcreetly, who in thinking thereby to ſhame them, haue for euer made them inrolled. For there is no man how wicked ſoeuer, but doth in ſome ſort deſire to leaue ſome remembrance of himſelfe to poſteritie: witneſſe that vnknowne fellow, who of ſet purpoſe did burne the Temple of Diana in Epheſus, who being demaunded wherefore he did it; anſwered that he determined by ſome notable villanie (ſeeing by vertue he could not) to leaue ſome memorie behinde him after his death. It is ſaid, that for to raze out his remembrance, it was decreed that none ſhould ſet downe his name in hiſtories: The which was wiſely done. For it was a greater puniſhment to quench his memorie, than to take away his life. Domeſticke examples might haue remembred our Citizens of their dutie: For after Tepulo his conſpiracie, the Senate expreſly forbad, that none ſhould dare to write, paint, or engraue, the name or armes of Baiament, nor of any of his complices. And beſides, whereas our anceſtors would haue the effigies of all the Princes from the beginning of the Citie vntill that preſent time, to be repreſented in order in the hall of the great councell: to the end that the picture of wicked Phalerio ſhould not be ſeene in the ranke of Princes, they decreede that his place

By what meanes the plot was diſcouered.

The chiefe conſpirators puniſhed.

An excellent Architect puniſhed with the reſt.

Why the Author doth not name thoſe that were guiltie of the conſpiracie.

Phalerio his picture razed out in the great hall.

ſhould

ſhould remaine void, and be couered with a blacke vaile. Their opinion was that they could no ſharplier puniſh thoſe who had tranſgreſſed againſt the Commonwealth, than wholy to blot out their remembrance. And we in like manner, hauing named the authors of the conſpiracy, becauſe it ſhould be knowne who had in times paſt conſpired againſt the countrey, haue expreſly concealed the name of the reſt for to puniſh them thereby, as we haue done others.

Phalerio likewiſe was by the Senates commaundement the ſame day puniſhed with death, his bodie was carried into a little boate to the Church of the Twinnes, being accompanied by eight Sergeants, who carried torches. It is reported that commiſſioners who were appointed to enquire of this matter, did diſcouer in eight daies ſpace aboue foure hundred: A great many of them were put to death, ſome were hanged, others beheaded, and ſome were flung into the Sea. Diuers were pardoned, who had promiſed to aide the conſpirators, but they were not made acquainted with their practiſe: but they were ſo noted, as ſome for ſhame, and for feare, forſooke the Citie with their wiues and children, the number of whom was about fiue hundred: Phalerio his Pallace was giuen to the Church of the holy Apoſtle.

Phalerio is put to death.

Sundrie puniſhments of the conſpirators.

He which diſcouered the conſpiracie was not onely pardoned, but they gaue him a yearely penſion of a thouſand duckates, and beſides, a Senators place: But he thinking it a meane recompence for ſuch a peece of ſeruice, did publikely accuſe them of ingratitude, detracting from them in euerie place. The Senate being prouoked at his impudencie, had like to haue put him to death, but the remembrance of his late good ſeruice made them to abſtaine: whereupon, hauing taken from him the publike recompence, he was baniſhed for ten yeares to Raguſa. From whence departing before the prefixed time, hee died in his iourney towards Hungarie. During theſe troubles Marco Cornari gouerned the Commonwealth as Vice-Prince. Then at the next aſſembly Giouanni Gradonico ſurnamed Naſo, was choſen Duke.

The diſcouerer of the conſpiracie recompenced with his diſcontent.

Marco Cornari vice-Duke during the troubles

¶ GIOVANNI GRADONICO ſurnamed NASO, the 56. Duke of Venice.

ABout the ſame time Bernardo Inſtiniano, departed from Venice with ſeuen gallies: He hauing fortunately ſcoured the Seas for a time, did greatly moleſt the Genoueſes, and would haue done much more, if peace had not opportunely enſued for the good of either people, this warre hauing laſted fiue yeares. Order was diligently taken for both of them, and with their allies, and Armes were laid aſide, as well by Sea as Land, againſt Bernabo and Galeas Viſcount who ſucceeded Iohn. Then the priſoners taken in the warres were on each ſide ſet at libertie : whereupon the Genoueſes to the number of two thouſand being deliuered on the feaſt day of Marie Magdalen, went by couples, carrying each of them a burning taper in his hand to giue thanks vnto God at the Church of the ſame Saint. This ſpectacle moued the whole Citie to deuotion, ſo as euer ſince, that feaſt-day hath beene ſolemnized, which before then was not obſerued.

Peace betwixt the Venetians and the Genoueſes with their allies.

A religious and godly act.

The end of the third Booke of the ſecond Decad.

THE FOVRTH BOOKE OF THE SECOND DECAD

Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the fourth Booke of the ſecond Decad.

THe truce being expired, Lewis King of Hungarie allieth himſelfe with the Carrarians and the Patriarch of Aquileia, and at one time aſſaileth the Venetians in Italie and Dalmatia. The ſame King returneth into Hungarie, hauing ſpent ſome time in vaine before Treuiſo, and leaueth certaine troupes there to continue the ſiege. The Paduans forbidden to traſicke at Venice. A troupe of mercenarie Almans defeated by the Hungarians neere to the Riuer Brente. The Generall reuolt of Dalmatia from the Venetians in fauour of King Lewis: Peace with the ſame King. Two Venetian Ambaſſadours ſent to the Emperour, are taken in Germanie by theeues. The Duke of Auſtria reſcueth thoſe Ambaſſadours, and bringeth them backe to Venice. The Nobilitie of Candie reuolt from the Venetians. Lvchin Vermio goeth into the Iſland with great forces. The Venetians vanquiſh the Greekes neere to Mount Strombula, who retire to Candace. The Venetians recouer the Citie of Candace. The Iſland being quieted, Tilts and Turneyes were made in the Citie for ioy of the victorie. The King of Cyprus in the companie of the Venetian Armie taketh Alexandria in Egypt. A new ſedition in Candie worſe than the former, ſo ſoone as the troupes were gone forth of the Iſland. Thoſe of the Iſland being a long time very much moleſted, and their forces at the laſt broken, ſubmit themſelues to the Venetians obedience. The rebellion of the Thrieſtines. The Venetians victorie ouer the Duke of Auſtria at Thrieſte. Strife betwixt the Venetians and Paduans concerning their limits.

ARmes being laid aſide by Sea and by Land, and the Citie reſtored to her ordinarie trafficke, diuers ſhippes ſailed to Cyprus, and to other Faires and Martes of the Ægean Sea, who for their more ſafetie (for albeit they feared not the Genoueſes, yet the incurſions of the Barbarians kept them in much awe) had certaine armed Gallies for their conuoy commanded by Bernardo Iuſtinian, who hauing brought them to a ſafe Port, returned ſpeedily into Dalmatia: from whence hauing taken order for the affaires of the Prouince he brought backe his Armie in ſafetie to Venice. Giouanni Baldo was the firſt that was ſent to gouerne Val-marin: that Earledome being fallen to the Venetians by the death of Phalerio.

The Venetians reſtored to their vſuall trafficke.

The Earledome of Val-marin fallen to the Venetians by Phalerio his death.

This yeare about the Spring-time (becauſe the rumour was that Lewis King of Hungarie Hungarie made preparations againſt the Venetians) Marco Cornari, and Marin Grimani were ſent into Hungarie, from whence they returned within a while after, hauing found the Hungarian diſpoſed to Warres. Some Authors affirme that the cauſe of the Kings hatred to the Venetians, was, becauſe they denied him ſhipping for the paſſage of his Armie into Italie, at ſuch time as hee would haue made warre on Queene Ioane. But it is moſt certaine that this King was vanquiſhed by the Venetians at Zara, before that he beganne any warre in Italie. But whether it were on this occaſion, or for any other, as ſome ſay (for wee know not herein whom to follow) without all doubt the Ambaſſadours were ſent into Apulia to the Hungarian who (as ſome Authors ſay) made truce with him for eight yeares, and as others ſay for ten. But at the beginning of the Genoueſes warre, (albeit the time of the truce was not yet fully expired) he beganne to quarrell with the Venetians about Dalmatia, and there were preſumptions that hee would forth-with make warre vpon them, had not the mediation of the Emperour Charles the fourth cauſed him to giue ouer, who commanded him to ſtay till the truce was ended: whereupon he deferred the warre till this preſent: which the Senate plainly foreſeeing, made them (as it is thought) to haſten the peace with the Genoueſes, the which they had before denied them, when they ſtubbornely craued it: to the end that being freed from the Genoan warre, they might with more eaſe intend the other, as they had done.

The cauſe of the warre betwixt the venetians and the King of Hungarie.

Some Annales make mention how that Cornari and Grimani the Ambaſſadours, might at the ſame time haue eaſily ſhunned that warre, if they would in the Common-wealths name haue promiſed him, a white horſe, as a yearely tribute for Dalmatia. The Venetians not intending thereby to wrong their right to Dalmatia refuſed it, whereupon ſo ſoone as the truce was expired, hee entred furiouſly into Dalmatia, without farther denouncing of warre. It is reported that at his firſt comming, he brought ſo great an Armie, as at one time he beſieged Zara, Scia, Spalatra, Trahu, and Nona. The Venetians (who doe nothing raſhly) meaſuring the enemie by themſelues, did not imagine that he would ſo ſoone haue beene in the field, by reaſon whereof they had not furniſhed the Prouince with neceſſaries. But when they heard how that all the Cities almoſt of Dalmatia were beſieged by the Hungarians, they ſpeedily prouided ſhipping, Souldiers, munition, and victualls, and therewith furniſhed all thoſe Cities, and hauing taken this order, they thought that the Cities, Iſlands, and Caſtles, ſhould be ſo ſufficiently and faithfully defended by thoſe whom they had ſent thither, as in the end, the warre ſhould be tedious to the Hungarians: when on a ſodaine, becauſe he would keepe the Venetians occupied in ſundrie places, hauing ſecretly allied himſelfe with Franciſco Carrario, he paſſed into Italie with a hundred thouſand fighting men, without the great ſupplies of the Duke of Auſtria, and the Patriarch of Aquilea, and came and encamped on the Treuiſani. The Earles of Colalta with diuers other Lordes, did on a ſodaine take part with the Hungarian, who in a ſhort ſpace tooke Coniglian by compoſition, where Zacharie Contareno was Gouernour, after that Sacilla, and from thence he came and beſieged Treuiſo. The Venetians albeit they were ſufficiently buſied in Dalmatia, yet neuertheleſſe vpon the firſt newes of the Kings comming into Italie, they fortified Treuiſo with victualls and munition, and ſent thither Marco Iuſtiniano, Giouanni Delfino, and Paulo Loretano, that they might together prouide for the affaires of the warre. The King in the meane time hauing publiſhed the alliance with Prince Carrario, forbad on paine of life that none ſhould forrage or ſpoile the Territorie of Padua vpon any occaſion whatſoeuer.

What tribute the King of Hungary demanded of the venetians.

The King of Hungarie his great Armie in Dalmatia.

The King of Hungarie alleth himſelfe with Carrario.

The King of Hungarie beſieged Treuiſo.

The Common-wealth being thus wrapped in ſo great a warre, Prince Gradonico died, hauing gouerned one yeare and two Moneths, and was honourably buried in the Church of the Friers Minors.

Giouanni

¶ Giovanni Delfino, the 57. Duke of Venice.

Iouanni Delfino being abſent was ſubrogated in his ſted. He being called from Treuiſo, where he executed his Office, could not obtaine any ſafe conduct from the King, who lay in Camp not far from thence, for his free paſſage. We may hereby eaſily perceiue, how much this King was incenſed againſt the Venetians: yet neuertheleſſe hee came forth of the Citie at the ſame time, on the back-ſide thereof, being well accompanied. It is not certainly knowne whether the Citie were aſſailed before or after the Dukes departure: Thoſe whom we follow doe greatly varie herein: All Authors agree in this, that the King hauing made an approch, with his engines of batterie did furiouſly aſſaile the Citie; and that at this aſſault diuers of his Captaines died there, and among the reſt, one of his owne neare Kinſmen, and that the Citie was brauely defended by the Venetians.

The Duke of Venice is denied a paſſe-port.

Treuiſo brauely defended.

The King being wearied that his affaires went no better forward, and out of hope at that time to take the Citie, leauing certaine troupes to continue the ſiege, hee returned into Hungarie. The Venetians being incenſed againſt Carrario, called home Marini Moroſino their Magiſtrate from Padua, (for that Citie euer ſince it was freed from the Tyrannie of Maſtin, had ſtill a Venetian Magiſtrate,) they commanded moreouer that none ſhould carrie them any ſalt, and the Citizens were forbidden to traffick any more with the Paduans. Then they leuied forces in Germanie, the which being come through the territorie of Vincenza, were incamped on the banks of the Riuer Brente. This Riuer was ſwelled by reaſon of the raine, and growne ſo deepe, as it could by no meanes be Foorded, whereby the Almaine troupes were conſtrained to tarrie on the banks, till ſuch time as the water being fallen, that they might paſſe ouer and ioyne with the Venetians, whereof thoſe of the Camp being aduertized by their Spies, ſpeedily ſent certaine troupes of theirs to ſurprize the Almaines, who dreamed on no ſuch matter. Their attempt was not vaine: For the whole companie by the vnexpected comming of the enemies, was broken and put to flight, and the greateſt part of them ſlaine on the place.

The Venetians incenſed againſt Carrario.

The Almaines defeated through their owne default.

In the meane time Marco Iuſtiniano, ſurnamed the Great, was ſent to Treuiſo to command there in Giouanni Delfino's ſted. Not long after, fiue and twentie Senators were appointed to ouer-ſee the affaires of the Warre: And ſhortly after truce being taken with the enemie for fiue Moneths, Ambaſſadours were ſent into Hungarie to the King, to treate of peace, namely, Andrea Contareni, Michaeli Phalerio, and Benitendio tendio the Secretarie: But they returned without effecting what they went for. In this interim, the truce being expired, the enemie tooke Serrauall. But the Common-wealth receiued a great losse in Dalmatia. For the maine warre being in Italie, the Senate were constrained to draw the greatest part of their forces forth of the Prouince, and not being able by reason of their Domestick warre, to raise the siege of Spalatra, Sacco, Trabu, and of diuers other small Townes not far from thence, they were all yeelded to the King. Enona wherein Giouanni Iustiniano commanded was brauely defended, and famine it selfe could not daunt the courage of the generous Venetian, to cause him in any sort consent to yeeld. It is reported that the scarcitie of all necessaries was so great in Enona, as the Souldiers abstained not from eating all manner of meates, how vile and vnwholesome soeuer. The enemie likewise surprized Zara, and it was supposed to be done by the practize of Carrario; yet neuertheless the Castle held still out for the Venetian.

Peace refuſed on vniuſt conditions.

A citie brauely defended.

Now the Venetians holding the affaires of Dalmatia for lost, and those of Treuiso hauing beene a long time in great hazard, they resolued againe to send Ambassadours to the King to conclude a peace with him on such conditions as they could. Pietro Treuisano, Giouanni Gradonico, and the Secretarie Bontendio were sent thither, who obtained peace on these conditions, That whatsoeuer the Venetians had till then possessed from the Fanatick Gulph, euen to Durazzo, should remaine to King Lewis: and that the Venetians should wholly giue ouer their right to Dalmatia: As concerning the other Lands which lay neare to the Gulphe, and on the hither side thereof, the Venetians should haue the one halfe thereof, and that the King should redeliuer to the Venetians whatsoeuer hee had taken from them in Histria, in the Treuisan, and in the Countie of Ceneda: promising, not to suffer any Dalmatian to vse the trade of a Pyrate, nor to come into their Ports, & Islands, and that he would take order that the nauigation should be as free and safe along the coast of Dalmatia for the Venetians, as it had beene in times past. By reason of this peace more necessarie than Honourable, the Venetian Princes left Dalmatia forth of their Titles. Their Officers, which they had there, being called home, were not permitted to bring thence their goods, albeit it was expressly mentioned in the treatie of peace, that it should be lawfull for all Venetians who were then dwelling in Dalmatia, to ship away their goods and moueables, which they held in the Prouince. Herein the Hungarian infringed the Articles of peace, by not fulfilling the contents thereof: But the Venetians thought it best, in so dangerous a season, to dissemble that wrong, rather than to reuenge it by a new Warre.

The Venetians enforced to sue for peace.

A peace more necessarie than honourable for the Venetians.

The King infringeth the peace.

The Venetians wisedome.

Peace then being made with Lewis, three Ambassadors were sent into Germanie to the Emperour Charles; Marco Cornari, Giouanni Gradonico, and Lorenzo Celso. The Historians make no mention why they were sent. Two of them, hauing left Celso with the Emperour, returning home-wards without effecting what they went for, and passing through Germanie, were surprized by a Prince of the Countrie, and basely carried away by force into a Castle, an absolute place of retreat for theeues. Celso vnderstanding what had hapned to his fellowes, came by an other way to Seigna, and from thence to the Sea-side, from whence hee safely sailed to Venice. Within a while after he was sent with an Armie for the guard of the Gulphe: About the spring-time of this yeare, the contagious sickenesse began againe: The Sommer following, Prince Delfino died, the fifth yeare of his Gouernment scarcely expired: and was buried in the Church of the Twinnes.

The Venetian Ambassadours taken prisoners in Germanie.

Lorenzo

¶ LORENZO CELSO, the 58. Duke of Venice.

Lorenzo Celſo being abſent was choſen in his place. Twelue of the Senate were ſpeedily in the Common-wealths name ſent to congratulate him, and to bring him in a Galley to Venice. When he drew neare to the Citie, the whole Senate went to meet him, and receiued him in the Bucentauro. Victor Piſani was ſent in his ſted to guard the Gulph It is reported that the Princes Father did for a time forbeare to come and ſee his Sonne, becauſe he would not be enforced to ſalute him bare-headed, as though it had beene an vnſeemely and vnheard-off matter, to ſee a Father inferiour to his Sonne in dignitie. But hee behaued himſelfe herein, I will not ſay vndiſcreetly, though like an ignorant perſon: he was ſo vnskilfull in the affaires of the world, and cuſtomes of his owne Countrie, that hee did not vnderſtand that the ſame Honour was not giuen to his Sonne, but to the Majeſtie of the Common-wealth repreſented in him. It may be that he had heard (and ſo he was the more to be excuſed) the diſcourſes of morall Philoſophers, which make a queſtion, Whether a Father ought to giue place to his Sonne, being inueſted with ſoueraigne dignitie. Thoſe which are beſt learned in that diſcipline, ſay, That in publike he ought to doe ſo, but that at home and in priuate, the Sonne ought chiefly to honour and reſpect the Father.

About the ſame time, the Duke of Auſtria came to Venice with the Ambaſſadors, which were (as hath beene ſaid) ſurprized in Germanie. His comming thither was reported to be but only to ſee the Citie, which as hee had heard was builded on the mariſhes. The Prince with diuers of the Senate did honourably receiue him in the Bucentauro, and brought him to the Pallace of the Cornari, neare to Saint Lucies Church, prepared for him by the Common-wealth: who ſo ſoone as hee had ſeene the ſingularities of the Citie, and giuen them thanks both in generall and particular, for the curteſies which he had receiued, he returned into Germanie.

The Duke of Auſtria commeth to Venice.

In the Winter-time of the ſame yeare, the King of Cyprus attended by a Roiall traine, arriued with three Gallies at Venice; who being receiued likewiſe by the Common-wealth, and brought to the ſame lodging, where ſome few Moneths before the Duke of Auſtria had laine, did the morrow after in S. Marks Church Knight Andreola, ſurnamed Giouanni, who was appointed Gouernour of Treuiſo: Then departing for France, he was accompanied by Prince Celſo, with the moſt part of the Senate as farre as Marghera.

The King of Cyprus commeth to Venice.

In the Moneth of September the next yeare after that theſe two great Princes had

Great sedition in Candie.

had beene at Venice, a great rebellion hapned in Candie by the Venetians, who dwelled in the Island, whereby the Commonwealth had like to haue lost it. The Senate had decreed in regard of their exceſſiue charge for the wars to raiſe a certaine tribute on the Candiots. At the publiſhing of this decree, all the Gentlemen almeſt (a few excepted) did on a ſodaine reuolt, who laying hands on Leonardo Dandulo the Gouernour of the Island, and the Prouidatori, they ſurprized all the ſhips of burthen that were in the Hauen, which were come thither for the vintage, with all the merchants that were in it. In this tumult they haſtily choſe Marco Gradonico ſurnamed Bayardo for their Captaine, who was (otherwiſe) a verie diſcreete perſon.

The Gouernour of the Island impriſoned.

Dominico Michaeli, who at that time guarded the Gulph, hauing notice of this tumult of the Candiots, did ſpeedily ſend a Galley to aduertize the Prince and Senate thereof. Theſe newes did greatly grieue the whole Citie, and that worthily, becauſe the report was, that the Authors of the rebellion were of the chiefeſt families of Venice. What worſe act could the Greekes and the Islanders haue committed, which were neither borne at Venice, nor iſſued from the Venetians? It was to be feared that they would haue kindled a greater flame, and would become executioners of other mens furie, being glad to behold the dominion and ſtate of the Venetians to be diſſolued by their quarrels and diſſenſions, ſeeing by other meanes they could not effect it. It was decreed to ſend three of the Senate to the chiefe of the Colonie, who ſhould by exhortations and aduertiſements put them in mind of their dutie due to their countrey, and diuert them from their wicked deſignes, with ample authoritie to reduce them to their obedience, on ſuch conditions as they ſhould thinke moſt expedient. Pietro Souranza, Andrea Zeno, and Marco Moroſino were ſent thither.

Commiſſioners ſent into Candie to appeaſe the troubles.

It is reported that fiue more did ſoone after follow them: but the firſt and laſt Ambaſſages were to no purpoſe, thoſe of the Island not onely refuſing to giue them audience, but to receiue them. The Ambaſſadors perceiuing that warre muſt needs end the buſineſſe, determined to depart thence in the Venetian gallies, who returning from the Faires of Grecia, were by chance arriued there. The Captaine of the gallies being readie to hoiſt ſaile, did furiouſly ſeize vpon the inhabitants whom he found in the Hauen, and at Sea, and brought away three hundred of them priſoners to Venice.

The Senate vpon the returne of the Commiſſioners, reſolued by a generall conſent, to make warre vpon thoſe perfidious Colonies, and the reſidue of the Island, who had openly reuolted from their obedience, and did particularly baniſh diuers of the chiefe of the rebellion, whom they had proclaimed enemies to the Commonwealth: But firſt of all, they diſpatched meſſengers to the Pope, the Emperour Charles, Lewis King of Hungarie, Ioane Queene of Sicily, and to all Chriſtian Princes and people almoſt, to let them vnderſtand of the treacherous and vnworthie rebellion of their Colonie in Candie; & to entreate them if they would not giue them aide and aſſiſtance to reuenge ſuch an iniurie, at the leaſtwiſe not to hinder them from doing it, and that they would not aide their rebels, though they ſhould requeſt it; That they knew well enough that it was notorious to the whole world, that the Citie of Candace in Candie was a Colonie of the Venetians, and that the Venetians were ſcattered ouer the whole Island. That it was lawfull for Fathers when their children are ſtubborne and diſobedient, and that they cannot by entreaties nor threatnings reduce them to their obedience, to vſe the rod to chaſtice them. That the Venetians meaning was, ſeeing they could not by gentleneſſe and faire meanes bring the Candiots to the remembrance of their dutie, to attempt to doe it by Armes: the which they did ſoone hope to doe, if they were not aided by ſome forraine power. And that they ſhould performe the parts of good Princes and true friends to the Venetians, if they would permit that perfidious Colonie to receiue from their mother, vnto whom they owe their being, the chaſticement which it had deſerued.

Ambaſſadors ſent euery where againſt the Candiots.

Aduertiſement to Chriſtian Princes againſt the Candiots.

The

The Ambaſſadors were in all places friendly heard and entertained, and there was no man, but in deteſtation of the Candiots fact, did liberally offer them all aſſiſtance. In the meane time they leuied a mightie Armie, and made Dominico Michaeli Generall thereof, who was before, Prouidator of the Gulph; and the land-Armie was committed to Luchin Vermio of Verona who was expreſly ſent for to Venice for the ſame purpoſe: He hauing receiued his oath from the Prince well and faithfully to ſerue the Commonwealth, did forthwith receiue the publike enſignes: Great ſummes of money were leuied on the Citizens, as well to begin the warre as to continue it. Vermio, ſo ſoone as all the troupes were aſſembled, and the fleete readie, to the end he might not be ignorant with what forces he ſought, made a general muſter of his Armie, and found that he had a thouſand horſe, and two thouſand foote, not accounting the ſailers, and thoſe that rowed in the gallies.

The entertainement giuen by the chriſtian Princes to the Venetian Ambaſſadors.

Dominico Michaeli Generall of the venetians nauall Armie.

Luchin Vermio of Verona, Generall of the land-Armie.

The number of the land-Armie.

The fleete which conſiſted of three and thirtie gallies, and eight ſhips of burthen, leauing Venice on the ninth of Aprill, arriued about the ſeuenth of May at Freſca, a place verie neere to Candace. But during theſe preparations, certaine Gentlemen of Candace, hauing by chance vnderſtood what had beene concluded at Venice after the returne of the Commiſſioners, and being certified that they were not of the number of the baniſhed, hoping of pardon began ſecretly to fauor thoſe which remained faithfull and obedient to the Venetians. For diuers at the beginning not allowing of ſuch a wicked practize abſented themſelues from the Citie, and retired to their Caſtles and Houſes of pleaſure in the Iſland. The chiefe Authors of the reuolt, conſidering the great danger which threatned them, not onely from their enemies, but from their owne Citizens, were affraid leaſt thoſe whom they perceiued to wauer, would by ſome good offices practize ſomewhat againſt them by the aide of thoſe which were abſent. For there was likelihood that thoſe who at the beginning had oppoſed themſelues againſt their deſignes, would forthwith vpon the arriuall of the Venetian Armie fall vpon them: And notwithſtanding that many of them were of ſundrie opinions, yet no man durſt propound that which one alone by the aduice of one particular perſon muſt preſume to execute.

The number of the fleete.

The rebels feare

This man whoſoeuer he was, dealt with one named Calergo, the Pneumaticke, and hauing ſet before him the entire dominion of the Iſland, perſwaded him to kill all thoſe, who did continue in the Venetians obedience; and for this purpoſe to draw great numbers of Greekes to his partie. This Calergo conſented thereunto, and came firſt of all to Mopſilla, a pleaſant countrey houſe, where he aſſailed Andrea Cornari, and ſlew him. It is reported that Calergo had in times paſt beene his gueſt, and had beene euer ſuccored and defended by him: And that ſo ſoone as Cornari ſaw him come armed, he did on a ſodaine demaund wherefore he came: who made anſwere that he was ſent to kill him. Whereupon he put him in minde of his ancient hoſpitalitie, and other good turnes which he had receiued from him, for which, he entreated him not to kill the man vnto whom he was ſo infinitely bound. The murtherer extolling libertie, ſaid: That for it he would forget all hoſpitalitie and other bonds of friendſhip, and that he was come to deliuer his countrey (which men ſo deerely affect) from cruell bondage.

The miſerable death of Andrea Cornari.

The pretence of a murtherer to execute his enterprize.

After Cornari his death, he did in ſundrie places purſue diuers other faithfull ſeruants to the Venetians. Gabriel Veniero, Marini and Lorenzo Paſcalis were ſlaine, one at his farme at Pulla, and the other at Meliſſa; Lorenzo Gritti, at Peſtria, then Zannachio Iuſtiniano, & Leonardo Abraham with diuers others, who taſted the furious crueltie of the murtherer.

Diuers ſlaine by the ſame murtherer.

The Greekes waxing more bold by meanes of Calergo his executions, came with great arrogancie, & aſſailed the Nobilitie, ſaying, That they would haue ten naturall Greeks to be of the Senate, and that in their abſence nothing ſhould be determined or concluded. But this baſe multitude, who at the beginning were fooliſh, hauing at the laſt loſt all ſence and reaſon, did by their continuall clamors affright the Senate, and threatned to breake open the priſons, if they did not deliuer them all the Venetian priſoners that were there, that they might murther them.

Demaund of the Greeke multitude.

Threatnings of the Candiots.

In the meane time he that ſuborned Calergo, intending wholly to raze out the Latine name in the Iſland, ſent for his murtherer to come to a certaine place two miles diſtant from the Citie to conferre with him about the betraying of the Citie: wiſhing rather that the gouernment of the Iſland ſhould fall to Calergo and the Greeks than to the Venetians. Vpon the way he fell into the hands of thoſe whom Marco Gradonico the Gouernour had ſent for to take him. For the Gouernour with others, ſo ſoone as they heard tell that they had ſlaine the Venetian Gentlemen, whereunto not any but one man had conſented, did preſently ſend to ſeize vpon Calergo. For they feared that this Greeke hauing committed ſuch a villainous deede, would ſtill practize greater crueltie. This wicked man being taken, and brought to the Citie, in reuenge of the Venetian bloud which he had ſpilt, was thrown downe from the top of the Pallace vpon the point of ſwords, and his bodie being cut into diuers pieces, was caſt vpon the Citie dunghill.

Calergo the murtherer taken. Exemplarie puniſhment of Calergo.

The lightneſſe and inconſtancie of the multitude

This ſpectacle was verie pleaſing to the people. Whereby we may obſerue, how great the inconſtancie of a multitude is, which dependeth on the verie leaſt motions: and that their loue or hatred reſpecteth not the deed, but onely the fortune of him whom they follow. A little before, thoſe of Candace fauoured Calergo, but ſo ſoone as they ſaw him drawne to execution, they wholy forſooke him, and iudged him worthie of death. The nobilitie being daunted with thoſe miſchiefs and with the great warlike preparations which were made, the authors of the rebellion perceiuing that they could not of themſelues long hold Candie at that ſtay, and though they could, yet were not their forces ſufficient to reſiſt the Venetians, they began to conſult (for they reſolued not to returne to the Venetians obedience) into whoſe hands they ſhould commit the entire poſſeſſion of the Iſland. The Genoueſes alone were held fitteſt for it, as well for their power by Sea, as for the ancient enuie which they did beare to the Venetian greatneſſe. And therefore they concluded to ſend ten Ambaſſadors to Genoa, the one halfe Italians, and the other Greeks. Two of theſe being intreated to deliuer their opinion, did boldly anſwere that they thought it fitteſt to ſend to Venice to the Prince and Senate, offering (if they thought good) that they would not onely be of the Ambaſſade, but rather to take the whole charge vpon themſelues if need were, aſſuring them in ſo doing, they ſhould obtaine a generall pardon, to their great profit, and for the honour and dignitie of the Commonwealth.

The Candiots reſolue to yeeld to the Genoueſe.

A free ſpeech of two Senators of Candie.

Marco Gradonico murthered in the Pallace.

On the contrarie, others being moued with enuie ſaid, that it behooued them to ſend to Genoa. It is reported that Marco Gradonico, one of thoſe who was of opinion to ſend to Venice, being called into the Senate, vnder pretence of ſome publike matter, was murthered by ſome of the contrarie part, who were hidden in the Chappell of the Pallace. And the reſidue who did in any ſort ſeeme to leane to his opinion, were in danger likewiſe to haue beene murthered. They were diuers daies conſulting about this buſineſſe, but at laſt the contrarie faction preuailing, the Ambaſſage was reſolued on for Genoa. VVherefore hauing made readie a galley for the Ambaſſadors, it hapned by chance that Georgio Molino, Biſhop of Coron, a man of ſingular affection towards his countrey, was at the ſame time in the Iſland, who hauing vnderſtood of the Candiots reuolt, was come thither to procure (if he could) a peace, and as he was returning thence, (by reaſon he could not doe that he came for) one of thoſe who at the beginning were of opinion to ſend to Venice, did ſecretly wiſh him to aduertize the Prince and Senate, that they had ſent to Genoa to deliuer the Iſland into their hands.

The Candiots ſend Ambaſſadors to Genoa. Georgio Molino Biſhop of Coron.

The Venetian Prince and Senate ſend Ambaſſadors to Genoa.

This being knowne at Venice by Molinos letters, Ambaſſadors were ſpeedily diſpatched to Genoa, to entreate them not to meddle with the Iſle of Candie, according as they had before time promiſed. The letters being read in open Senate, they anſwered the Candiots, That the Genoueſes could not grant their requeſt without breach of their publike faith; that they were verie ſorie both in generall

The Genoueſes anſwere to the Candiots.

and

and particular, that it was not lawfull for them to ſuccour ſo noble an Iſland, and (as they vnderſtood by that Ambaſſade) which did greatly affect the Genoueſes. They wiſhed them therefore to depart, and to ſeeke aide elſewhere, and not to expect any from them: in regard they had ſworne to the contrarie.

The Candiots being diſmiſſed without any hope of aide, returned home to their houſes. The Venetians in the meane time had made haſt, and were come (as hath beene ſaid) about the ſeuenth of May to Freſca. Betweene that place, and the Citie, there is a verie high hill, called Strombula, and neere to it two others, ſo neere the one to the other, as a farre off you would not thinke them to be three hils, but one. Towards the Eaſt there is in it a rough way, but ſo narrow as two armed ſouldiers can hardly march in front, and on each ſide are deepe downefals, and ſo vneaſie to paſſe through, as the entrie of thoſe places being ſtopped, a few men are able to keepe out many thouſands. In one part of the mountaine which lieth beneath thoſe narrow waies, great abundance of ſalt water iſſueth forth of a caue, which commeth (as it is thought) by ſecret conduits from the Sea, which is not farre from thence: which place the Iſlanders call Almiron. Thoſe waters are reported in VVinter to be ſomewhat freſh, in regard of the ſtreames which fall downe into them from the neighbour mountaines, which make a ſmall riuer (ſeruing for the vſe of certain milles) which a mile thence on the North ſide entereth into the Sea. From the mouth of the riuer to the Citie by Sea, is but an open ſhallow Roade. The Armie peraduenture landing at this place, an hundred ſouldiers comming raſhly as farre as the milles were ſurprized by the enemie, and cut in peeces; from whom being dead, the Greekes pluckt out their tongues, and cut off their priuie members, tearing the one with their teeth, and wiping their hinder parts with the other. This reproach did more incenſe the Venetians againſt the Greeks, than the ſlaughter.

The venetian Armie at Freſca.

Almiron.

The Candiots crueltie to the venetians.

Michaeli ſo ſoone as hee had landed his troupes, went with the fleete, and beſieged the Citie. Luchin before he paſſed any farther, ſpake to his ſouldiers in this manner.

Vermio his Oration to his Souldiers.

I Perſwade my ſelfe that yee are not ignorant (hauing ſailed ſo large a diſtance of Sea) of the cauſe why at this time yee are ſent into this Iſland. We are come hither to puniſh the diſloyaltie of the new inhabitants of Candace, who haue ſtrayed from the naturall condition of Venetians, & alſo to chaſtice the audacious raſhneſſe of certaine Greekes. Now therefore by how much more the Venetians cauſe is moſt iuſt, by ſo much the more ought we to ſtriue to get the victory for feare (which I would be ſorie) leaſt if we be ouercome through our owne negligence, the Venetians cauſe will be reported to be no better than their Armie. Yee are to fight with an enemie, who by nature is no ſouldier, nor experienced in Armes, who hath not throwne himſelfe headlong into this warre for any truſt he hath to his owne forces, but by his owne retcheleſſe temeritie. Beſides, they haue neither cauallerie, Armour, nor forraine aide, nor indeed any thing wherein they may hope, ſauing in their owne folly, by which they will be as eaſily ouerthrowne, as they haue inconſiderately caſt themſelues into this danger. One thing we may feare, which is, that being ſhut vp in their walles, they will thereby for a while depriue vs of our victorie. But being as they are proud and preſumptuous, I hope they will ſallie forth, which if they doe, and you being ſuch as you ought to be, the victorie is ours. The place beſides where we are, doth conſtraine vs to fight: for this Prouince is enuironed with the Sea, and in it we haue no place of retreate. Our fleete ſo ſoone as we were landed, hoyſted their ſailes, and is gone to beſiege the Citie. We muſt then either die betwixt the ſhoare and theſe mountaines, or with victorie march to the Citie, to meete againe with our fleete. And yet I doubt not, if any gallies were heere, and ſhould ſee vs fight vpon the ſhoare, they would not receiue our fugitiue ſouldiers, but would rather put to Sea, and ſuffer vs to be ſlaine heere as baſe and cowardly people. I thought good to ſpeake this vnto you, to the end ye may vnderſtand, that we muſt not onely fight valiantly, (for our cauſe is better, and we are valianter than they) but, whether we will or no, if we deſire to liue, we muſt ſhew our ſelues courageous in regard of the difficultie of theſe places. Moreouer the wealth of this Iſland doth exhort vs to winne the victorie, whereof if we become maſters, we may hope for a moſt rich bootie. Furthermore, the Venetians are, and haue alwaies beene rewarders of braue and valorous men, who being mindfull of your worth, will ordaine perpetuall penſions for the beſt amongſt you, and indeed for all, if you doe all ſhew your ſelues worthie men. To conclude, if no other thing inuite you to play the men, yet ought the example of your Captaine to prouoke you thereunto. I commaund you then to goe out with the ſelfe ſame courage as ye ſhall ſee me your Captaine to march with. He is not worthie to be termed a ſouldier, but a baſe Biſonian, who whileſt his Captaine ſhall fight, doth ſhamefully retire from the battell. For my owne part, if I ſhall perceiue any one to march fearefully to the fight, I will be as great an enemie vnto him, as to the Greekes againſt whom wee fight.

Vermio hauing ſpoken thus to his Souldiers, commaunded euery one to bee in a readineſſe to march againſt the enemie. The Greekes in the meane time who were ſent to guard the ſtreights of the mountaines, waxing more proud for their laſt victorie (as I thinke) leauing the hilles with a deſire to fight, came downe into the bottome to aſſaile the Venetians. Vermio would not looſe ſo faire an aduantage, but ſodainely ſet his forces in order of battaile. The Candiots were at the firſt brunt in a manner broken, and ſo narrowly purſued by the victorious Venetian, who would not giue them time to knit their forces together (which they attempted to doe in thoſe ſtreights) as they ſought to eſcape by manifeſt flight. The Italians followed them at the heeles and ſlew them euerie where, ſo that more were ſlaine in the flight than in combat: diuers hauing throwne away their Armes eſcaped into the mountaines, but greater numbers did with an head-long race draw the enemie neere to the walles. It is reported that the Venetians followed them ſo courageouſly as they loſt many of their people at the Citie gates. Thoſe of Candace being daunted with this loſſe, and perceiuing themſelues to be beſieged by Sea and Land, deſpairing of forraine aide, began forthwith to treate of yeelding. Wherefore after they had taken the Venetians faithfull promiſe, that the poore inhabitants ſhould not be moleſted either in bodies or goods, they ſent by night the keyes of the Citie to Michaeli and to the Prouidatori. Vermio being commaunded to enter with a few troupes; the gates were ſhut after him, ſo as the Souldiers were deceiued of the bootie they hoped for. There had like to haue beene a mutinie in the Campe; and there wanted no ſetters on to cauſe them not only to mutinie but abſolutely to reuolt, accuſing Vermio, and Michaeli the Generall of the Sea-Armie, for depriuing the Soldiours of the bootie which they had wonne by their valour. But Vermuo hauing vnderſtood their diſcontentment, came amongeſt them, and after he had ſharpely rebuked the Authours of the mutinie, he ſo farre preuailed with the Prouidatori, as they preſently gaue them double paie, and by this meanes the matter was appeaſed. Diuers of the enemies finding themſelues guiltie of this rebellion, and deſpairing of pardon, would in this tumult haue taken Armes, but they were in a moment apprehended: The new Gouernour loſt his head, ſo did all the Authours of the rebellion and diuers others fled. The Ambaſſadours who at the ſame time were returned by chance from Genoa, falling into the Venetians hands, were puniſhed according to their deſerts.

The Candiots ernow.

The Candiots defeated.

The Citie of Candace yeelded

The Venetians Souldiers readie to mutinie.

Vermio appeaſeth it.

The rebells puniſhed.

Great ioy at Venice for the recouerie of Candy

The newes, firſt of the victorie and then of the taking of the Citie of Candace, did greatly reioyce the Senate and the whole Citie. Thanks was giuen to Almightie God in the Churches. priſoners were ſet at libertie; and diuers poore maides were married with the publique purſe. Tilts and Turnaments continued for certaine dayes in the Market-place of Saint Marke by young Gentlemen, with ſumptuous preparation, who were fiue and twentie in number, each of them furniſhing fiue hundred crownes for the ſcaffoldes and other expences. The King of Cyprus being returned forth of France was preſent at it, and fought at Barriers with the ſonne of Vermio, a braue young man, and of great hope. Some ſay that Vermio himſelfe was one of the Iudges at the Tilt. If it were ſo wee muſt not beleeue that this publique ſhewe was ſo ſoone made. It is reported that one named Paſcalis Aſyrot, who came with the ſonne of Vermio, wanne the glorie of the turney, and that the victorie was adiudged to him: which was a Crowne of gold, of the valew of three hundred and threeſcore Crownes.

the

Who wonne the honour at the turney.

The Iſland being quiet and reduced vnder the Venetians obedience, the victorious Armie returned to Venice. But the alliance made with the King of Cyprus, was the occaſion of ſetting forth a new Armie, wherewith the Cypriot ſoone after ſurpriſed and ſpoiled the famous Citie of Alexandria in Ægypt. But hee could not tarrie long there, by reaſon of the great numbers of Barbarians which daily ranne thither, whereupon the third day after his entrie, hee was conſtrained to diſlodge and brought backe his Armie to Cyprus, laden with ſpoile. Prince Celſo after he had gouerned three yeares and tenne moneths died. His bodie was buried in the Celeſtines. Marco Cornari was choſen in his place.

A new commotion in Candie.

¶ Marco Cornari, the 59. Duke of Venice.

AT the beginning almoſt of his gouernment a new reuolt happened in Candie, fiercer than that whereof wee now ſpake. Diuers Greeke Gentlemen, who in the laſt ſtirres had in ſome ſorte fauoured the rebells, were quiet till Vermio his troupes, and the nauall Armie were gone forth of the Iſland. For hauing then fortified the places which belonged to either partie, and then from day to day practiſing other nouelties, they did not ceaſe to diſturbe the peace of the Iſland, vntill they had cauſed all places to Arme againſt the Venetians.

It is reported that Iohn Calergo was the Authour of the troubles who was one of the nobleſt families of the Iſland. He hauing ſet vp the enſignes of the Greeke Empire proclaimed euery where, That it was done for the protection of the Iſle of Candie, exhorting all thoſe who loued their libertie to follow him. Diuers being amazed, tooke Armes. Thoſe which followed him, firſt of all ſware to deſtroy the nobilitie; after they came on the ſodaine and furiouſly aſſailed Nicholao Dandulo, and his brother; and hauing murthered them they ſeiſed on their Caſtels. Nicholao Iuſtiniano Prouidator, and Dominico Molino, leauing the Citie, to reſiſt Calergo his attempts, tooke certaine places from the rebels which they burnt. Thoſe of Calergo

Who was the Authour of the new commotion.

The death of Nicholao Dandulo and his brother.

The ſpoiles made by the Candiots. his faction on the other ſide being ſodainely come to the Suburbes of Caſtel-nouo which belonged to the Venetians, which were newly inhabited, burnt them to aſhes. But the Towne being brauely defended by Pietro Treuiſano the Prouidator, they were ſhamefully put to flight; and from thence they came and ſeized on Re-

Rethimna taken by the rebells. thimna: Thoſe which were within it for the guarde thereof, deſpairing of abilitie to defend it in regard of their ſmall number, leauing their horſes behinde them, went to Sea and came to Candie. The Greekes after they had driuen away the Venetians from diuers places who had newly inhabited the Iſland, purſued the courſe of their victorie, and ceaſed not till they had made all that which lieth towards the Weſt from Thalis vnto the Promontorie of Spatha, to reuolt from the Venetians: the Townes and certaine Caſtles excepted. This reuolt being reported at Venice put the Senate in meruailous care to begin the warre againe; which was the more grieuous vnto them, by how much they had thought the affaires of Candie to be ſafer than at any time before. The Prince and Senate commaunded thoſe who were in the Iſland to leuie forces from all partes, and to procure horſemen out of Licia, Caria, and Ionia, if they could get none elſewhere. They ſent likewiſe to the Pope (the which they eaſily obtained) to intreate him to grant plenarie Indulgences of all ſinnes commitred till that time, to all thoſe, who would take Armes againſt thoſe perfidious Candiots.

Why the Venetians were troubled at this new ſtirre.

The Popes indulgences againſt the Candiots.

This was done in Italie, whileſt the Iſlanders being vanquiſhed by Nicholao Iuſtiniano at the foote of the hilles Laſithes, with the loſſe of diuers of their troupes they were diuerted from their attempts. For their meaning was to haue ſeized on the mountaines; but I know not whether it were to ſaue and defend themſelues, or rather from thence to aſſaile their enemies by a ſodaine and vnexpected comming vpon them. Moreouer, the Greekes all the winter made ſundrie and different attempts, againſt which the Prouidatori did with great diligence opportunely oppoſe themſelues. Giacomo Bragadino, Paulo Loretano, Pietro Mocenigo, Lorenzo Dandulo, and Andrea Zeno were ſent into the Iſland as new Prouidatori: They had commaundement likewiſe to leuie Souldiers as well horſe as foote from all places.

The Cãdiots defeated.

New Prouidatori ſent with ſupplies to the Iſland.

Hauing receiued the old bands, and added new ſupplies to them, they were readie to march againſt the enemie, when newes was brought them, that after they had leuied great numbers of Souldiers, and attempted in vaine to take the Citie of Maluicina, they had ſcattered themſelues ouer the Territorie of Cydon, and had put all to fire and ſword which they knew to belong to the Venetians, and to bee newly inhabited. This was done on the Sea-coaſt, whileſt in the middeſt of the Iſland, fiue and twentie hundred of the enemies, came and incamped themſelues at one time neere to Agatia and Meliſſa. Giacomo Bragadino ſpeedily marched againſt them with foure hundred horſe and fifteene hundred foote; they fought there verie fiercely: where thoſe of the Iſland being broken and defeated, diuers were ſlaine in the battaile, but the number of the Priſoners exceeded who were all hanged; ſome few which fled in great feare, got into the next mountaines. The Venetian departed and ſet fire on the Farme-houſes and villages of the enemies ſpoiling euerie where round about.

The Candiots defeated and put to flight by Giacomo Bragadino.

Fifteene villages reuolt.

Thus ſtood the ſtate of the Iſland when on a ſodaine the inhabitants of fifteene Villages reuolted, who fearing to be defeated in open field retired with their wiues and children intto the mountaines of Laſithes where they were forthwith aſſiſted by the cheefeſt of the Rebellion. Diuers others did the like, who for their more ſafetie betooke themſelues to thoſe mountaines.

Great boldneſſe of the rebells.

The forces of the Greekes being thus augmented, they were not ſatisfied with defending themſelues, but truſting to their great numbers, they came cheerefully and ſpoiled the Countrie of thoſe who had continued faithfull to the Venetians: and entring into the bonnds of the Citie of Candace, they filled al the places round about with feare and terrour. Pietro Mocenigo perceiuing the whole Iſland almoſt to be infected with this furie, and to tend to a generall reuolt, and that he could by no

no meanes fight with the enemie who kept ſtill in the mountaines, brought backe his troupes to Candece, intending to keep the Citie and to repreſſe the enemies violent eruptions. Then he certified the Prince and Senate of the ſtate of the Iſland, and requeſted them to ſend more forces if they deſired to ſee the enemies trecherie daunted; that his fellowes and himſelfe had with much adoe gotten fiue hundered horſe out of Aſia; that they wanted greater numbers both of horſe and foot, which of neceſſitie muſt be ſent to them, if they intended to reduce the Iſland vnder their obedience. And therefore he beſought them to take ſpeedie order that ſupplies might be forthwith ſent from Italie.

Mocenigo his reſolution.

Before Mocenigo his letters came to Venice. Pantaleon Barba, Giouanni Zeno, Nicholao Trenſano, Andrea Zeno, & Nicholao Iuſtiniano, departed from the Citie with certaine troupes of footmen, who came into the Iſland as new Prouidatori. They being ariued the old ones returned home (Pietro Mocenigo excepted) who remained ſtill Gouernour. Thoſe that came laſt hauing receiued the olde troupes and aſſembled all the forces which were in the Iſland, cauſed them to be imbarked in three Gallies and two ſhippes of burthen, and ſailed to Milopotamus. From thence they forthwith marched towards the enemie; againſt whom, being ſhut vp in ſtrong and inacceſſible places, Andrea Zeno, one of the Prouidators, being couragiouſly prouoked with a deſire to fight, and entring with his forces into a dangerous place, was ſlaine by thoſe who defended the paſſage from aboue. Hee being dead, they made a retreate and brought backe the troupes to Milopotamus.

New Prouidatori and new ſupplies ſent into Candie.

The death of Andrea Zeno.

In this manner the new Prouidatori began the warre with the enemie, when a great number of footmen being come from Italie, in three ſhippes of burthen, did marueiouſly ſtrengthen the Venetian Armie. Whereupon, the Prouidatori made diuers attempts vpon the enemie, but of ſmall moment, for the Venetian could by no meanes drawe the enemie to fight. But the ſpoiles and burning vp of houſes heere and there in the Iſland, was the cauſe of a great dearth. Howbeit at laſt the ſcarcitie of victuals was much greater in the Candiots Campe than in that of the Venetian, becauſe the Venetian Gallies did from all partes bring them plenty of corne and all other kind of victuals. Whereupon, thoſe in the mountaines enforced by famine, hauing deliuered the Authours of the reuolt to Iuſtiniano, who lay incamped not farre from thence, they ſubmitted themſelues vnto the Venetians obedience. Thoſe that were guiltie were forthwith puniſhed. The reduction of theſe men did in ſuch ſorte daunt the courage of the Greeks, as all that which lieth from mount Strombulo ſtretching Eaſtward euen to the middeſt of the Iſland, did in ſhort ſpace yeeld to the Venetians: whereupon the whole burthen of the warre fell on a ſodaine on that part of the Iſland which lieth towards the Weſt. Diuers Venetians who had beene Authours of thoſe reuolts, to make themſelues more acceptable to the Greekes, renounced the Latine name and promiſed to obſerue the Greeke ceremonies.

The rebells enforced by famine yeeld to the Venetians.

Iuſtiniano hoping to doe ſome exploit, in regard of the enemies amazement, tooke on a ſodaine foure hundred Horſe and foote, of thoſe who had continued faithfull to the Venetians; and departing with them from Candace, he marched againſt the Siuerits, where hauing beaten downe the enemies Fortes and defences, which they had incompaſſed with a high Wall made without morter, the euent was fortunate. They fought with the like good ſucceſſe at the ſame time at Milopotamus and in other places: The Lithernians being prouoked by theſe attempts, did deliuer Alexis Calergo, with his brother and his children, to Creſcio Molino, who after Zeno his death at Milopotamus, came into the Iſland: Hee cauſed them to bee ſafely conducted to Candace, with Zannachio Molino a kinſman of his owne, who was thought to be one of the Authors of the rebellion, where they were all executed. The wife likewiſe of Georgio Calergo, and his children, falling at the ſame time into the Venetians hands, had the like end.

The Siuerites vanquiſhed by Iuſtiniano.

The Lithernians returne to the venetians obedience.

The rebells executed.

Iuſtiniano,

Iuſtiniano, and Nicholzo Treuiſano, deſirous to purſue the enemie who was halfe broken, ioyned their forces together neere to Anopolis, where were diuers enemies both Greeks and Latines. The place was ſtrong by nature, and the ſituation thereof inacceſſible. There was but one way to come to it; and but one onely meanes to batter the enemie: Namely, for the Venetians to ſeize on the Hill which commandeth the Towne. The which being ſoone done by the Prouidatori, in few dayes they became maſters of the place: Giouanni and Georgio Calergo with diuers Venetians of the number of the Rebels, were there taken and brought to Candace. It is reported that Georgio being found with his brother Giouanni hid in a Caue, did attempt by the ſhot of an arrow to kill him, who came foremoſt to ſurpriſe him; but that his bow brake. It is great folly to anger him in whoſe hands a man is ſure to fal. It was likewiſe a merrie anſwere which a ſimple Souldier mou'd to one of the chiefe of the Rebellion who was taken priſoner; and being ſore hurt, was caried to Candace to be put to death, who craued that hee might haue ſome Chyrurgion to looke to his woun ds; the Souldier who was next him, told him that his wounds needed neither Chyrurgion nor plaiſter, ieſting openly at the poore priſoner, who was ſhortly to looſe his head.

The ſituation of Anopolis.

Anopolis taken.

Rashneſſe of a rebell.

A merrie anſwere of a ſoldier to one of the rebells.

The enemies being euery where put to flight, Candie became quiet, whither came Giouanni Dandulo, Paulo Loretano, Pietro Moroſini, Giouanni Fuſcareno, and Thadeo Iuſtiniano, being ſent by the Senate to enquire of the ſtate of the Iſland, and to ſettle the affaires thereof: Theſe men hauing diſanulled certaine Lawes, eſtabliſhed new, and hauing razed certaine Fortes, they builded others. They commaunded likewiſe the inhabitants of Anopolis, to leaue the Towne and to dwel ſome where elſe, leauing the Towne deſolate and forſaken; forbidding on paine of life that none ſhould dare to goe thither to inhabite. Like prohibitions were made, not to build or till the earth on the mountaines of Laſithes. And after they had put ſome of the Rebels to death, who were here and there ſcattered in the Iſland, and baniſhed the reſidue for euer, they reſtored the Iſland to her ancient quiet. Such was the iſſue of the raſh reuolts of the Candiots. Prince Cornari being oppreſſed with age, hauing gouerned two yeares and eight moneths, died, and was buried in the Church of the Twinnes.

¶ ANDREA CONTARENI, the 60. Duke of Venice.

Andrea

Andrea Contareni ſucceeded him, who hy ſome apprehenſion of future matter did for a time refuſe this dignitie, and had of purpoſe retired himſelfe to a houſe of his owne in the territorie of Padua, reſoluing not to returne to the Citie vntill they had choſen a new Duke. But by no meanes yeelding to come to the Citie neither by the Senates letters, nor yet by thoſe of his familiar friends, certaine of his kinſmen were commaunded to goe and tell him, That if hee continued in his wilfulneſſe, the Senate determined to confiſcate his goods, and to baniſh him for euer from the Common-wealth. It is reported that then, the feare of his owne particular loſſe made him obey and returne to Venice. If he did this feeling himſelfe not to be fit for ſuch a charge, it was (as all men may perceiue) a verie profitable example: to the end that no man ſhould preſumptuouſly thruſt himſelfe into the gouernment of a Common-wealth: the profit whereof he ought chiefely to reſpect whoſoeuer he be that is called to ſuch a dignitie. For it ought not to be accepted ſo much for a mans owne particular gaine as for the common good. They therefore which aucupate publique honours, ought to examine themſelues what they are, and what their ſufficiencie is; and if they feele themſelues vnfit for ſuch place, let them know, that it ſhalbe as profitable for themſelues, as for the Common-wealth to make an honeſt excuſe. But Contareni was not guiltie of ſuch a fault who wanted neither wiſedome, nor skill to gouerne. But if he did it (as I perceiue) to auoide the labour and trauaile which accompanies ſuch dignities, he did not well; and I know not whether hee erred more in ſo doing, than if hee had raſhly thruſt himſelfe into the Throne. For that would haue beene accounted a follie, and this malice. It is certaine that in his time the Common-wealth was much afflicted by forraine warre, and that there was great dearth in the Citie.

How hardly Contareni accepted of his dignitie.

What thoſe ought to doe that are called to publick offices.

Contareni his fault not excuſable.

So ſoone as he had accepted the charge, the Thryeſtines reuolted. The Venetians kept an Armed Gallie in Hiſtria for the guard of the Toll. The Thryeſtines, who a long time before had hatched alterations, fell on a ſodaine vpon the Venetians who were there by chance, and picking quarrells with them, ſlew the Committie of the Gallie, and hauing hurt ſome others they would haue murthered the reſidue, if the Gallie had not preſently put to Sea. But not ſatisfied with this brauado they came on an holiday into the Market-place, and threw downe the Venetian enſignes which were ſet vp there (as the cuſtome was) tearing and treading them vnder feete, with reprochfull ſpeeches.

The Thryeſtines reuolt.

The Senate perceiuing whereunto the Thryeſtines dealings tended, and knowing that they ought no longer to temporize, did ſpeedily ſend an Armie thither; which beſieged thoſe mutinous people both by Sea and Land. The Land-Armie was committed to Dominico Michaeli; and that by Sea to Creſsio Molino. It was then the middeſt of winter. And becauſe it was to be feared that if the Venetians ſhould procraſtinate, the enemies might fortifie themſelues with ſome forraine aide, all that which was neceſſarie for the warre, was forthwith in a readineſſe. The Citie being at their firſt arriuall aſſailed, the Thryeſtines with the helpe of the Forlani did brauely defend it, and making a ſodaine ſallie, they did greatly trouble the Venetians neare to the walles with an vnexpected fight. Afterwardes likewiſe they fought diuers times with different ſucceſſe: but the Venetians perceiuing that it behooued them to haue greater forces, ſupplies were ſent thither, and new Prouidatori; Paulo Lorctano ſucceeded Dominico Michaeli; and Thaddæo Iuſtiniano, Creſsio Molino: who brought two thouſand Treuiſans to the Campe.

A Venetian Armie againſt the Thryeſtines.

New ſupplies comes to the Armie.

The Thryeſtines being daunted to ſee the Venetian forces daily to encreaſe beganne to bethinke themſelues whence they might bee releeued. They reſolued to haue recourſe to the Duke of Auſtria, to implore his fauour and aſſiſtance, and to deliuer their Citie, meanes, and eſtate into his hands. To this purpoſe they ſent Ambaſſadors to him, by whom they yeelded themſelues to his protection, and on

The Thriſtines reſolue to yeeld to the Duke of Auſtria.

The Duke of Auſtria brings aide to the Thryeſtines.

a ſodaine they ſet vpon the toppe of the higheſt tower the Dukes enſignes. The Duke ſoone afterward came thither with ten thouſand horſe, and great numbers of foote. The Venetian in the meane time hauing ſpoiled round about, had brought all the townes neare to the Citie vnder their ſubiection. The Almaines at their firſt arriuall came and beſieged the Venetians Campe with ſuch vehemencie as in a moment they ſeized on the trenches. The Campe would hardly haue ſuſtained this aſſault had not the Souldiers and Marriners who were a farre off hearing the noiſe ranne to the reſcue of their fellowes. Thoſe of the campe were ſo encouraged by their arriuall as they did not only driue the enemies forth of their trenches but with great loſſe conſtrained them to retire. Truce for a day was granted to the Almaines to burie the dead. Being afterwards put to flight in a skirmiſh, and perceiuing their bad ſucceſſe in releeuing Thryeſte, and that it was an hard matter to diuert the Venetian from his purpoſe, with great griefe he brought backe his troupes into Germanie. The Thryeſtines when hee was gone, deſparing of all other forraine aide, did on certaine conditions returne to the Venetians obedience, which being done, the victorious Armie returned to Venice.

A baſe retreate of the Almaines.

The Thryeſtines returne to the Venetians obedience.

A new warre with Franciſco Carrario. The cauſe of the warre.

The Citie was not long at reſt. For a new war was raiſed againſt Franciſco Carrario: the cauſe thereof proceeded (as is ſaid) from Carrario, who vſurped a certaine place neare to the lakes, the which belonged to the Venetian. The Venetians being moued with this iniurie did forbid the Paduans the trafficke and commerce of their Citie, which is (as all men knowe) an euident ſigne of future warre. The neighbour Princes being highly diſpleaſed that by the Paduans meanes the trafficke was likewiſe forbidden to their ſubiects, did endeauour all they might to quench this ſtrife and to make them friends. But all their attempts proued vaine. The King of Hungaries Ambaſſadours came afterwards for the Carrarians: (for they ſaid that they were vnder the protection of King Lewis) and thoſe of Florence and Piſa for the Venetians; and by their meanes truce was taken for two moneths. The Venetians deputed fiue commiſſioners: and the Carrarians as many, who ſhould debate the matter, and ſearch out their bounds in frendly ſort and afterwards marke their limits. But they could effect nothing.

Commiſſioners appointed on both ſides to enquire of their ſtrife.

Carrario his purpoſe diſcouered.

At the ſame time the Venetians were informed that the Tyrant had practiſed with certain bad perſons to murther diuers of the Senate. Diligent ſearch was made for them ouer all the Citie, and ſome of them were found and taken in the houſe of a poore woman named Gobba. The womans life was ſaued, becauſe ſhee had freely confeſſed the truth; but ſhe was confined to priſon for ten yeares. All the reſt were puniſhed according to their deſerts being drawn through the Citie with horſes, and then cut in quarters at the Columnes. Their hoſteſſe ſonne who had promiſed to ſhew the murtherers thoſe whom they ſhould kill, was hanged in the ſame place. Not long after, others being conuicted of the ſame crime were puniſhed in the ſame manner. The Senate fearing, that by theſe murtherers the Common-wealth might receiue ſome great miſchiefe, appointed that all thoſe who were known to be hated by Carrario, ſhould bee guarded by Armed men from their houſes to the Pallace. They commanded beſides to looke carefully to the welles, for the reporte was, that he intended to poiſon them, and by that meanes to vndoe the whole Citie.

Traitours in the Senate, knowne and puniſhed.

The Senate were not yet freed from care, when as a new feare ſurprized them. For they ſuſpected that ſome of their owne companie did by cloſe intelligence aduertiſe Carrario, of whatſoeuer was ſecretly done in the Senate. Enquirie hereof being made, they found certaine Senators to be guiltie of that fact. Whereupon thoſe who were found leaſt faultie were diſmiſſed from the Senate, and were declared to be for euer vnworthie to execute any publicke charge, the others were condemned to perpetuall priſon. In the meane time the Ambaſſadours who had beene ſent vp and downe from all ſides, could not preuent a future warre, which the Venetians perceiuing, they made ſpeedie preparations for the ſame.

Warre prepared againſt the Carrarians.

The end of the fourth Booke of the ſecond Decad.

THE FIFTH BOOKE OF THE SECOND DECAD Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the fifth Booke of the ſecond Decad.

RAYNIERO Generall to the Venetians, giues ouer his place ſoone after the beginning of the Warre with the Paduans. The Venetians receiue a great ouerthrow by the Hungarians, vpon the bankes of the Riuer Anaxus, called at this day the Piaua. The Venetians victorie againſt the Tranſiluanian, with the taking of him. Peace with the Paduans. The Duke of Auſtria beginneth a new warre with the Venetians. They fight with the Almanes neere to Longina: Feltre beſieged, and the ſiege forthwith raiſed by the comming of LEOPOLDE. The Auſtrian Marchants are priſoned at Venice. Peace with LEOPOLDE. The cauſe of the fourth Liguſticke Warre. The taking of the Iſle of Tenedos. The Venetians driue the Greekes and Genoueſes from Tenedos. The Venetians Warre (almoſt at one time) with King LEWIS, the Biſhop of Aquileia, the Genoueſes, and the Carrarians. The Genoueſes being vanquiſhed at Sea neere to Ancia, loſt diuers of their Gallies. The Venetians bad ſucceſſe in Cyprus at the ſiege of Famagoſta. The taking of Catharra by VICTOR PISANI. The Genoueſes refuſe to fight on the Sea of Tarentum. The Paduans beſiege Meſtra. VICTOR PISANI taketh Sabenico. Trahu is twiſe beſieged in vaine. How hardly they made prouiſion for victuals in the Winter, and the loſſe of a great part of the Venetian Armie by extremitie of cold. PISANI hauing loſt his Armie at Pola, is impriſoned at Venice. The Genoueſes being proude of this victorie, hauing greatly augmented their Armie, lay ſiege to Chioggia.

IT was very likely that in theſe great warlike preparations by land, there was neede of ſome one man who ſhould be well experienced, diligent, and a truſtie friend to the Venetians, vnto whome they might (as very often in former times they had done in the like troubles) ſafely commit the charge of their Armie. Whereupon they concluded for this purpoſe to ſend for Rayniero Vaſco foorth of Tuſcanie, one of the beſt Captaines of his time; and in the meane time to ſend Dominico Michaeli to the Armie to commaund there vntill his arriuall. They ſent with him Andrea Zeno and Thaddeo Iuſtiniano for Prouidatori. The Rendez-uous of all the troupes was at an appointed day, aſſigned at Meſtra. From thence the Armie firſt marched againſt againſt the Paduans. The Venetians entred the enemies Countrie, and hauing made diuers skirmiſhes with good ſucceſſe, they filled all places where they came with feare and terror.

Rayniero Vaſco Generall of the Venetian Armie

The rendezuous of the Armie at Meſtra.

In this meane time Rayniero arriued at Venice, where hauing receiued the publike Enſignes, he haſted with greater forces to the Campe, which he forthwith cauſed to march; and hauing paſſed the riuer Brente, he forraged and ſpoiled the Paduans Territorie which was next him, vnto the riuer of Brentello. Carroſino ſaith, that he could not foord that riuer, becauſe it was greatly ſwelled with the raine, and that therefore he led his Armie through the Territorie of Vincenza towards Padua, from whence the Souldiors brought back great bootie: And that from thence hee went and encamped neere to the Fountaines of Abana; but that victualls waxing ſcant, and ſtrife ariſing betwixt him and the Prouidatori, hee retired in manner of a flight towards Meſtra. Some Authours ſay, That beeing deſirous to paſſe the Brentello to bee the neerer to aſſaile the enemie, the Prouidatori would by no meanes ſuffer him to doe ſo: whereupon hee being moued with choller, that hee might not manage the warre as he pleaſed (ſaying that the ignorance of the Prouidatori did ſnatch a goodly occaſion forth of his hands) gaue ouer his charge, calling God and men to witneſſe, That their wilfulneſſe did hinder him from obtaining the victorie.

The retreate & diſmiſſion of the Generall.

The Prouidatori were ſuſpected to haue beene corrupted by the enemie, and by that meanes to haue endammaged the Common-wealth. Yet neuertheleſſe the Venetians affaires proſpering, and hauing taken certaine Townes from the enemie, that ſuſpition ceaſed. The enemie perceiuing that without forraine aide he could not long reſiſt the Venetians, called the King of Hungarie to his aide, with whom euer ſince the ſiege of Treuiſo he had beene in league: Some Authours thinke that this league was ſworne at the beginning of the warre. But the Venetians hauing notice that the Hungarian made preparations both by Land and Sea (which hee might eaſily do hauing taken Dalmatia from them) the Senate decreed to ſet forth beſides the Land-Armie, a fleete by Sea, whereof Michaeli Delfino was made Generall, and the Prouidatori were Pietro Iuſtiniano, Procurator of S. Marke, and Pietro Cornari. This fleete being gone to Sea, kept all the Sea-coaſts ſafe for the Venetians during this warre.

The Hungarians come to aid the Paduans.

The Paduans affaires ſtood at the ſame ſtay as I haue ſaid, at ſuch time as great numbers of Hungarians came to their ſuccour. Their firſt arriuall was on the Treuiſan, where they put all to fier and ſword, reſpecting neither age nor ſex, and their murther ſtill encreaſing, they fought at times with bad ſucceſſe. For Thaddeo Iuſtiniano at the firſt report of the enemies comming, to reſiſt their attempts did ſpeedily encampe on the riuer of Piaua: But the Venetians diſcouerers beeing ſurprized by the enemies, the Hungarians were ſooner ſeene than heard of: whereupon they fell vnlookt for to the fight neere to the riuer, and at the firſt, (becauſe the bodie of the enemies Armie was not yet arriued) the Hungarian was put to flight and purſued by the victorious Venetian euen to the riuers ſide, whither all the Souldiours did not follow Iuſtinian, who haſted after the fugitiue enemie, who hauing put themſelues in order on the riuer bankes, the fight began more cruell than before: whereupon the Hungarians became victors, and the Venetians beeing vanquiſhed, verie few of them eſcaped from the battaile: the number of the dead was great, and that of the priſoners ſmall.

The Venetians vanquiſhed by the Barbarians.

On the report of this loſſe, the reſidue of the Armie retired on a ſodaine to the Treuiſan: The enemie ſoone followed him thither, and in his view preſented him the battaile. But the Venetians keeping themſelues in their Fort, and the enemie not being able to conſtraine them to come forth, returned towards the Forlani, firſt through the confines of the Bellunois, and then of thoſe of Feltre, and encamped before Baſſan, a Citie belonging to the Vincentines. Belluna and Feltre did at the ſame time belong to Albert Duke of Auſtria, an Aſſociate of King Lewis in that war.

Some

Some Authors ſay that Carrario gaue thoſe Townes to Albert, to procure him to take Armes againſt the Venetians: wherein the German ſhewed himſelfe verie vndiſcreet, ſeeing that a while before, the Paduan in the treatie of peace had offered them to the Venetians, who refuſed them, becauſe they would not doe any thing to diſpleaſe the German.

Delfino Generall of the nauall Armie, hauing gone round about the Lakes in certaine light boates, commonly called Ganzarioles, came and builded a Fort at Lupa Podoana, and then an other neere to the ſame: by meanes of which, the Venetians might more commodiouſly breake the enemie, and offend him neere hand. The greateſt part of the Venetians Armie laie on the Treuiſan, where certain warlike exploits were executed, but vnworthy of mention. Diuers Soldiours were caſſed, and enforced to leaue the Campe, who by their thefts did more moleſt their own people than the enemie. Some Authors ſay that Rayniero Vaſco who (as wee haue ſaid) did voluntarily giue ouer his place, was ſhamefully driuen from it. Giacomo Moro being ſent to command the fleete, hauing ſtaied a while at the Forts which Delfino had builded, fell ſick, and was carried home to Venice.

The Venetians build two Forts on the Lakes.

Diuers opinions concerning Rayniero his diſmiſſion.

Rayniero being gon, Alberto Carrario came to command the Land Armie: At his arriuall with Leonardo and Andrea Dandulo, and Pietro Fontano Prouidatori, they fought in the Lakes with no great ſucceſſe. They fortified a place which was verie commodious for the Venetians verie neere to Delfino his Forts. Carrario came vnlookt-for, and draue them thence who wrought in thoſe workes. Diuers Gentlemen were ſlaine at the firſt brunt, and with them diuers Archers, the reſt fled ſpeedily to the ſhippes: But the loſſe was not ſo great there, as the fight was afterwards fortunate to thoſe of the Campe; For both Armies being come in view one of an other, the Venetians attempting to fortifie a place which lay betwixt the two Camps: Stephano the Tranſiluanian, Generall of the Hungarian horſe-men, marched in battaile againſt the Venetians to hinder their worke: Leonardo Dandulo went forth to meete him, reſoluing to fight with him if he had beene ſo contented: But the Tranſiluanian as if it had been of ſet purpoſe did the ſame day abſtaine from the fight. The morrow after, Pietro Fontano whoſe lot was that day to command (for he and Carrario commanded the Armie by turnes) did by the breake of day verie couragiouſly embattaile the Armie, the enemie for his part did the like. The battaile being concluded on, the Venetian commanded the men at Armes to alight from their horſes and to fight among the footmen, and as he was putting them in order, he exhorted and intreated all of them to reſolue either to die or get the victorie, proteſting to hold him for an enemie and to kill him which ſhould but only make ſhew of flight, and that himſelfe would be in the foremoſt rankes, not ſo much to encourage them, as to note and obſerue euery mans valour. The Souldiours being animated by this ſpeech, gaue a braue onſet, and fought ſo valiantly, and with ſuch feruencie, as hauing broken and defeated the enemie, they purchaſed that day a goodly and memorable victorie. Diuers were ſlaine in the fight, but more in the flight. The Tranſiluanian was taken with all the chiefe men almoſt of his partie. There were taken of the Italians Bonifacio and Antonio de Lupes, with diuers other Paduan Gentlemen. King Lewis his enſignes with thoſe of Carrario being throwne away in the fight, were taken by the Venetians.

Alberto Carrario in Rayniero his place.

The Venetians victorie ouer the Hungarians.

Fontano his exhortation to his Souldiours.

It is thought of a certaine that if the Venetian had narrowly purſued the enemie, he might haue entred Padua with him, and haue made a verie great ſpoile euerie where and gotten great booty. The Paduans being daunted with this loſſe, did accuſe the Carrarians as Authors of the warre, hating and deteſting them. Franciſco Carrario in the meane time, to hinder the Venetians, did by promiſe of great pay draw from them to himſelfe the greateſt of their Cauallerie: But they cauſed greater numbers than they had loſt to come from Milan & Pauia to their ſeruice. Giacomo Moro went to meet them as farre as Verona. Marſilio Carrario brother to Francis was with him, who after the loſſe of the battaile hauing offered himſelfe to the people to mediate a peace, could by no meanes cauſe his brother to condiſcend thereunto, whereupon he with diuers others did bend themſelues againſt him: But conſidering the great danger he incurred among his own people he fled to Venice: His flight encreaſed the peoples hatred to Franciſco, and did ſo greatly animate the Citizens againſt him, as he had as manie enemies in the Citie as abroad.

The Venetians error.

Marſilio Carrario forſaketh his brother.

The King of Hungarie reſolueth on peace.

King Lewis hauing notice of the loſſe of his people and of the Tranſiluanians fortune, ſent to command Carrario to harken to a peace vpon any conditions, and that he ſhould not hope for any more aide from him. The enemies obſtinacie being ouercome, hee ſued for peace, which he obtained on theſe conditions. That the Prince and Senate ſhould appoint fiue commiſſioners, to bound the limits, for which they were at ſtrife, as they ſhould ſee cauſe: That the Paduans ſhould preſently pay fortie thouſand crownes to the Venetians, and foureteene thouſand crownes euerie yeare for the ſpace of fifteene yeares: That Franciſco Carrario or his ſonne, ſhould come into the preſence of the Prince and Senate, and humbly craue for pardon: That Caſtelnouo ſhould be razed with all the Forts thereabouts: That the tower of Corania with ſeauen miles compaſſe round about ſhould remaine to the Venetians: That Marſilio ſhould enioy the poſſeſſion of his goods, and that his reuenue ſhould be brought him to Venice: That all priſoners taken in the warres ſhould be releaſed: That Carrario ſhould forthwith diſmiſſe all the forrain troupes that were come to his aide: That he ſhould yearely ſend to offer at Venice three hundred crownes on the high Altar of Saint Marke: That they ſhould reſtore to the Venetians all the inheritances with the profit receiued of them, which had beene taken from them on the Territorie of Padua during the war: That the Paduans ſhould not build within three miles neere to the mouthes of any Riuers: That he ſhould not fortifie any place nor maintaine any Garriſon.

Nouello ſonne to Franciſco comes to ſweare to the peace at Venice.

On theſe conditions peace was concluded with the Carrarians which they receiued as more neceſſarie than profitable. Nouello ſonne to Franciſco came to Venice to confirme and ſweare to it: who being brought into Saint Markes Church, ſwore vpon the high Altar, as well in his owne name as his Fathers, that hee did accept of whatſoeuer had beene of late agreed on by his Father and the Carrarians, that they would obſerue this peace inuiolably, and all the Articles therein contained. Such was the end the verie ſame yeare (as farre as we can learne) of the warre againſt the Paduans. About the ſame time the monaſterie of the virgins was burnt with diuers buildings neere to the ſame which were all repaired at the Common-wealths coſt.

The Duke of Auſtria maketh new war on the Venetians.

After this Paduan warre, the Common-wealth was three yeares at reſt. This quiet was diſturbed by a ſodaine comming downe of the Germans. Leopold Duke of Auſtria hauing entred Italie with foure thouſand horſe without any warlike ſummons, did tumultuouſly ſeize on the Treuiſan, where putting all to fier and ſword, he encamped before the Citie to the great terror of the inhabitants. It was not knowne vpon what cauſe he made this warre. The Venetians who at that time expected nothing leſſe being prouoked by the daily aduertizemenrs they receiued, requeſted thoſe of Æſt their neighbours to aſſiſt them, from whom receiuing ſome ſmall aid, they ſodainely marched againſt the enemie. It is not likely that the Venetians would goe to field with this aid alone, which was verie ſmall, but that at the report of this warre, diuers companies of footmen were leuied in the Citie, albeit the Authors whom we follow make no mention thereof. The German vnderſtanding that the enemie marched towards them, raiſed his campe and retired to the Territorie of Belluna.

The Almains retreate.

The Almain marchants impriſoned in Venice.

Giacomo Caballa Generall of the Venetians Armie by Land.

The Senate in the meane time being prouoked by this loſſe, cauſed all the German Marchants which were in Venice to be impriſoned and their goods to be ſeized on: They did beſides ſend for one Giacomo Caballa one of the beſt experienced Captaines of his time in the art Militarie to be Generall of their Armie. But whilſt theſe things were done at Venice, Pietro Hemo Gouernour of Treuiſo, ſent fiue hundred horſe

horſe and foot, to ſpoile the Territories of Feltre, and Belluna. Theſe being conducted by Marini Souranza to fetch bootie forth of the enemies Countrie, after they had made great hauock and carried away with them a great prey, retired into a place of ſafetie for feare of the enemies, whom they vnderſtood were marching towards them.

Giacomo hauing receiued the Generals place marched to Treuiſo, where he ſtaied a while till the troupes were leuied from all places, and till his Armie were compleat as he deſired, with which entring furiouſly into the enemies Countrie, he came firſt and encamped at Longina, where ioining fight with the Almaines hauing ſlaine diuers of them, hee went on his way as farre as the Piles of the victorie. There is on the hither ſide of the Forreſt of Feltre a verie narrow bottome, through the which the Riuer Piaua doth rather fall furiouſly than runne: vpon the right ſide where it runneth with greateſt force, it doth in ſuch ſort ſhut in the Feltrian Mountaines, as it leaueth a ſmall ſpace of ground. On this ſide then of the Mountaine, cut out euen to the Riuer bankes, a very old wall encloſeth all theſe ſtreights, which is called at this day The incloſure of the vanquiſher: The Venetian hauing likewiſe driuen the enemie from thence, came euen to this Incloſure of the vanquiſher, the which hauing couragiouſly aſſailed, hee forced, and tooke. It is reported that the skill and valour of Gerardo Caminenſis did greatly appeare in this aſſault.

The enemies put to flight before Longina.

Gerardo Caminenſis.

Leauing a Garriſon in this place, the Armie came towards Feltre: where at their firſt arriuall they tooke the Suburbes, and furiouſly aſſailed the Citie: Leopold hauing notice of the Feltrian danger, ranne ſpeedily with great forces to their aide to raiſe that ſiege. Vpon report of the enemies approach, the Venetian retired to Treuiſo hauing fired the houſes next to the Citie, wherein the Souldiours did lodge at their firſt comming. Leopold being come as farre as Belluna, vnderſtanding that the enemies were gone, was highly diſcontented, hauing loſt the opportunitie of a battaile: whereupon returning to recouer the Gallies which he had loſt, he attempted firſt to driue the Venetians from the Tower of Baldina, which Caballa had poſſeſſed during the ſiege of Feltre. Giacomo as ſoon as he had intelligence of the enemies purpoſe, ſent his ſonne a braue yong man with a troupe of choice Souldiours to ſeize on it and to keepe it. The Almain being aduertiſed by his ſpies of the yong mans iournie, departed from Belluna, and by an Ambuſh did on a ſodaine ſurprize this troupe which at the firſt he brake and put to flight: Their Captaine was taken with more than an hundred braue men, beſides the reſidue of the companie, but he ſuffered them forthwith to depart vpon their promiſe, that if peace did not enſue, they ſhould returne and become his priſoners: Then hauing recouered the Tower, he brought back his troupes to Belluna.

Feltre beſieged by the Venetians.

The venetian Generalls ſonne taken with diuers others.

The priſoners ſent home vpon their word.

At this ſtay ſtood the Venetians affaires, when by the mediation of King Lewis truce was taken for two yeares with Leopold: But in the meane time (as the mindes of men are variable and inconſtant) the King ſeparated himſelfe againe from the Venetians, and made a League with the Genoueſes, the Biſhop of Aquileia, and the Carrarians againſt them. The Senate hauing intelligence that a ſecret warre was practized againſt them, and that the truce with Leopold was almoſt expired, thought it verie neceſſarie to make an agreement with him, and to make a peace by all meanes, becauſe they would not bee intangled in ſo manie warres at once: whereupon Leonardo Dandulo, and Pietro Cornari were ſent to Leopold, who hauing yeelded vp vnto him all thoſe places which they had taken from him during the warres, and ſet the Almain Marchants at libertie, they concluded a peace with him. Soone afterward began the fourth warre with the Genoueſes: which being the cruelſt and moſt dangerous that euer the Venetians had vntill then, I do likewiſe finde it to be moſt amply deſcribed by Hiſtorians. But before we enter into the diſcourſe of the matter, we muſt ſet downe the cauſe why this warre was renued.

Truce with Leopold.

An abſolute peace with Leopold.

The cauſe of the fourth war with the Genoueſes.

The punishment of an vngratefull sonne to his father.

Caloianes was Emperour of Greece, and a great friend to the Venetians, who among other children had a sonne named Andronicus, who being conuicted for that he had maliciously conspired against his father, had his eyes put out by his commandement, and was for euer confined to Pera. The Genoueses who of a long time had badly digested, that Caloianes did more esteeme the Venetians than them, caused first of all this young man to bee lookt vnto by Phisitians, and then perceiuing that he had halfe recouered his sight, did vilely solicit him to seize vpon his fathers Empire. This rash and audacious young man, did willingly embrace this mischieuous counsell, whereupon, with the helpe of those of Pera who were in a manner all Genoueses, hauing on a sodaine seized on the old man with his kinsfolkes and house-hold seruants hee did inuade the Empire, causing his father and his whole family to be imprisoned. Some say that Caloianes was depriued of the Empire by Cantacusin a Greeke by Nation, and was afterward restored to his former dignitie by Francisco Catalusia a Genouese, and that the Emperour in recompence thereof gaue him the Isle of Lesbos. But those Authors whome we follow doe affirme Andronicus to be the Author and motiue of all these troubles, whome I rather follow, because it is most certaine that this young man was afterward besieged with the Genoueses in Pera.

Great ingratitude of a sonne to his father.

The Isle of Tenedos promised to the Genoueses

Andronicus had then at the first promised the Isle of Tenedos to the Genoueses, with whom being desirous to keep his word, he did write to those who kept the Fort of the Island to deliuer it with the whole Islande to the Genoueses. Two Gallies were sent from Pera to Tenedos for the same purpose. The Captaine of the Fort and all the inhabitants not making great account of Andronicus letters, answered that the Island belonged to Caloianes and not to his sonne, and that they would yeeld it vp to no man whatsoeuer, vnlesse he that ought it would command them. It is reported that the Empire being yet at quiet, the Gouernour of the Island and the inhabitants were commanded that if the old man should happen to bee driuen from the Empire (which God forbid) by any sinister accident, they should deliuer the Island to none but to the Venetians. Those of Pera being frustrate of their hope to get Tenedos, went to Constantinople. Marco Iustiniano was at the same time Admirall of the Venetian Gulphe, who vnderstanding what had befallen Caloianes, fearing least the Venetian Gallies who were gone on to trafficke towards the Ponticke Sea should in that changeable season receiue some displeasure by the Genoueses, hauing conuoied them to the verie entrance of that Sea, after hee had crossed the streight, arriued at Tenedos, resoluing to tarrie there till the spring time and to attend the returne of his Gallies. He staied there with the Fleet all winter. Then going at the spring to the Bosphorus of Thrace, to receiue the Venetian Gallies which returned, he went backe againe to Tenedos, where hauing acquainted the inhabitants with the dangers which threatned them, as well from the Genoueses as from others, the Island and the Fort were by a generall consent yeelded vp into the Venetians hands. Iustiniano leauing Donato Troni and diuers others there with forces to guard it, he returned with his Fleet to Venice.

The Gouernour of the Island refuseth to obey the commandement of the rebellious sonne.

By what meanes the Isle of Tenedos came into the Venetians possession.

The yeelding vp of the Island to the Venetians, being knowne euerie where, the Genoueses as wel for their ancient hatred and emulation, as for that they perceiued whilest the Venetians should possesse that Island, the free nauigation for their Marchants sailing into the Ponticke Sea would neuer afterwards be safe, did neuer cease to stirr vp Andronicus a-new against the Venetians, who was alreadie no great friend of theirs, to iniurie those who remained at Constantinople. He being prompt to all mischiefe, imprisoned Pietro Grimani with the Venetian Marchants, and seized on a Barze, lying in the Hauen which was returned from Tanais. Iustiniano being returned to Venice, it is said that discoursing of what he had done, and of the Island which he had of late brought vnder the Venetians subiection: the same was diuersly taken by the Senate; some not allowing thereof for feare of the warre; and others praising the deed for the commodiousnesse of the place, said that it was well done

The Venetians in Constantinople wronged.

Diuers opinions in the Senate concerning the taking of Tenedos.

done, whereupon two Gallies were appointed for the guard of the Iſland, wherein Antonio Veniero went for Gouernour of the Iſle, and with him two Prouidatori, Gionanni Gradonico and Pietro Cornari.

Whileſt the Iſland was mand with this Garriſon, the Genoueſes came on a ſodain with eleuen Gallies, and ſeized not in their owne name but in that of Andronicus on the Iſle of Lemnos which the Venetians had taken from the Greekes; ſo ſoone as they vnderſtood how the Emperour had wronged their countrie-men. Afterwards hauing made readie three and twentie Gallies neere to Pera, and with them two ſhippes of burthen, they departed from Conſtantinople and landed in the Iſle of Tenedos. Andronicus was there in perſon, by whoſe commandement the Genoueſes would ſeeme to doe all. Carolo Zeni was at the ſame time Gouernour there, a diligent and couragious perſon (for Veniero was not yet come thither, and I thinke Donato Troni was alreadie departed from thence) this man did not alone with great courage defend the walls, but made a ſally with certaine choiſe troupes, and diſordered the enemies whom hee did beate backe to their ſhippes with great ſlaughter: in ſuch ſort as Andronicus hauing loſt all his peeces of batterie was enforced to diſlodge to his great ſhame.

The Genoueſes ſurpriſe the Iſle of Lemnos.

The Greekes and Genoueſes defeated by Zeni at Tenedos.

It was thought that the Genoueſes beeing deſirous to ruinate the Venetians power, not being able of themſelues to do it, did ally themſelues with Lewis King of Hungarie, Franciſco Carrario and the Biſhop of Aquileia. The Senate perceiuing that both in apparence and deed the warre was prepared againſt them, prouided an Armie of twentie Gallies, the which was committed to Victor Piſani, with all authoritie at Sea, and gaue him Panthaleon Barba and Lodouico Loretano for Prouidatori. Foureteene of theſe Gallies being armed at Venice and the reſt in Candie, departed from Venice the foure and twentith of Aprill. But Victor was commanded not to atempt any hoſtile act againſt the Genoueſes, vntill ſuch time as warre ſhould be denounced. It is ſaid that Nicoleto a Citizen of Chioggia, one of the Secretaries of the Senate, was ſent to Genoa for this purpoſe.

The Genoueſes allie themſelues againſt the Venetians with the King of Hungarie, the Biſhop of Aquileia, and the Carrariars.

Victor Piſani Generall of the Venetians.

Warre denounced to the Genoueſes.

The nauall Armie leauing the Gulphe, and hauing coaſted Sicilie ſailed directly towards Genoa, in which voiage it tooke in few daies diuers of the enemies ſhipps; and hauing ſoone after ſcoured the lower Sea, Lodouico Fieſca of Genoa to reuenge this ſhame went to Sea with ten armed Gallies with an intent to fight with the Venetian. Victor was at the ſame time at Ancia, a Sea-towne of Italy, who hauing notice of the enemies comming did ſodainely embattaile his Armie, commanding his Souldiours to bee in readineſſe, and at the firſt ſound of the Trompet to arme themſelues, at the ſecond all Souldiours and Marriners to keepe their ranckes, and at the third furiouſly to ſet forewardes towards the enemie. The Genoueſes were alreadie in ſight, when the Venetian becauſe hee would fight on the maine aduanced towards them. They had ſcarce begunne the fight, when as on a ſodaine a terrible tempeſt aroſe with great ſhowers of raine, which did in a moment ſo trouble them, as nine Gallies of either Armie (the reſidue being conſtrained to retire) did fight, not with arrows ſhot, for they did not ſhoot any in this ſodaine ſtirre, but with the ſword and puſh of pike; The battaile (notwithſtanding the foule weather wherein the Seas and Heauen ſeemed to fight together) laſted two long houres: At the laſt the Genoueſes giuing backe (foure of their Gallies eſcaping forth of the throng) the reſidue were taken with Lodouico their Generall, one of which daſhing vpon the neighbour ſhoares fell into the enemies power. Eighteene Gentlemen of Genoa were taken, and more than eight hundred Souldiours and Sailers, with ſix-hundred ſlaine.

Battaile at Sea with the Genoueſes.

The Genoueſes put to flight.

The victorie was likewiſe verie bloudie to the Venetians, hauing loſt diuers of the troupes which fought, and more were hurt: of the priſoners, Zacharia Giſio, Fieſca and the other Gentlemen, with the moytie of the priſoners were ſent to Venice, and the reſidue Victor carried with him to Candie. But beeing come vnto Morea neere to Modon, hee met with the ſix Gallies which (as wee ſaid) were ſent to Candie to be armed, and ioyning them with his owne, he ſailed to the Iſland: From whence departing ſoone after to intrap ten Genoa Gallies which had remained all the precedent winter at Conſtantinople, and being come as farre as Nigrepont, hee had notice that the enemies Gallies were paſſed alreadie, and almoſt at Genoa, whereupon he returned, and did for a while make after them, who by their diligent ſpeed were gotten into a place of ſafetie.

Carrario beginneth warre againſt the Venetians.

Whileſt theſe things were done at Sea, Prince Carrario as well in his owne name as in that of King Lewis had begunne the warre with the Venetians, ſaying that he did nothing contrarie to his oath nor to the Law of Nations in taking armes againſt the Venetians, becauſe he was whether he would or no to obey King Lewis, vnder whoſe protection he was: The Biſhop of Aquilea did likewiſe denounce war againſt them. Thus at one time did diuers ariſe thinking to ouerthrow the power and State of the Venetians, who had no ſuccour nor allies, but Bernabo Viſconte and Petrino King of Cyprus, to beare off ſo manie ſtormes and aſſaults of the enemies, and yet the King of Cyprus aide did neuer ſtand them in any ſteed, but that of Bernabo did auaile them which did ſpoile and ſcowre the Sea of Genoa. The Venetians neuertheleſſe ſo long as the warre continued did alone defend themſelues with their owne forces, without the helpe of any other, the which was ſcarce credible at the beginning.

The Biſhop of Aquilea denounceth ware in like maunter.

Gerard Caminenſis taketh the enimies partie.

Now at one time the Paduans on the one ſide, and the Forlani on the other entring the Treuiſan filled all the Countrie with feare and ſpoile. Gerardo Caminenſis who was thought to be a friend to the Venetians, by reaſon that he had married the daughter of Pantaleon Barba, at the firſt beginning of the warre, left them and went to the enemies, hauing firſt taken the Motte from his brother Richardo. This was done on the Venetians territories, whileſt the Lords of Carretta aſſiſted by the forces of Bernabo and the Venetians tooke certaine townes from the Genoueſes.

Famagoſta taken by the Genoueſes.

The enemies in the meane time were not idle, for they ſurpriſed Famagoſta, the goodlieſt Citie of the Kingdome of Cyprus. Hiſtorians ſay that the occaſion of the taking thereof was, that young Petrino ſonne to King Petro, being ſlaine a litle before by the conſpiracie of his owne ſubiects, hauing inuited to the feaſts and ſolemnities of his coronation all ſtrangers with thoſe of the Iſland, the Venetians and the Genoueſes trafficking in the Iſland which were verie many, came thither likewiſe. It hapned that theſe two Nations in the middeſt of the banquet, did by their ancient hatred and iealouzie fall to words, which diuers thinke that the Genoueſes did firſt miniſter, who did diſdaine that the King ſhould more eſteeme the Venetians than them. They drew their weapons in the middeſt of the Royall Palace: and the Cipriots fauouring the Venetians, certaine Genoueſes were ſlaine and diuers hurt, and the reſidue were driuen ſhamefully from the banquet. The Genoueſes being moued with this iniurie did forthwith depart forth of the Iſland with all their wealth. Then returning within a while with a nauall Armie they did on a ſodaine aſſaile the Citie of Famagoſta, and tooke it. The Authors whom we haue read, doe not plainely tell whether they took it by force or treacherie. They ſlew diuers in deteſtation of the death of the late King, and among others, the Kings brother, & ſpoiled all their goods. The King and his mother for feare of the Genoueſes eſcaped in this tumult forth of the Citie. In this manner did the richeſt marchant-Citie of the Kingdome of Cyprus fall into the Genoueſes hands.

The cauſe of the taking of Famagoſta.

The Genoueſes reuenge.

The young kings mother was ſuſpected to haue deliuered the Citie vnto them to reuenge her husbands death: and that which maketh me to beleeue it, is the death of thoſe who ſlue him, and the ſpoyling of their goods, as alſo, becauſe the Genoueſes attempted nothing againſt her nor her ſonne. Now whileſt the Genoueſes held Famagoſta, Viſconte had in the meane time betrothed his daughter to the yong king, and being deſirous to ſend her to Cyprus, he dealt with the Venetians to arme ſixe gallies, with which his daughter might paſſe ſafely into the Iſland, and that he on the other ſide would leuie eight thouſand horſe, and a great number of footmen

Viſconte of Milan giueth his daughter to the King of Cyprus.

at

at his owne coſt, to ouerrunne and ſpoile whatſoeuer belonged to the Genoueſes. The Ladie being brought to Venice, was lodged in the Pallace of the Cornari. Then departing from Venice with ſixe Venetian gallies, and ſiue which the king of Cyprus had ſent, ſhe ſafely arriued in the Iſland.

Viſconte his daughter commeth to Venice.

The king lay at the ſame time at Ceraunia called at this day Cernia, where after he had with great magnificence receiued his wife, he dealt with the Venetians for a great weight of gold which he promiſed them, that they would with the ſiue gallies which he had in pay aſſaile the hauen of Famagoſta: the which being taken, they gaue an aſſault to the Citie on the ſame ſide, whileſt he with the greateſt forces he could leuie, ſhould ſcale the walles on the other ſide. The Captaines of the gallies were, Giouanni Miani, Franciſco Boccoli, Pietro Quirini, Franciſco Foſcolli, Giouanni Barba, Franciſco Mocenigo, who had each of them a-part armed one ſeuerall galley at their owne charge. Theſe being moued as well by the kings offer, as for their generall hatred which they did beare to the Genoueſes, with the ſiue gallies, which as we haue ſaid were ſent from the king to Venice, beginning to fight at the entrie of the haue, were at the firſt repulſed by the Genoueſes, wherupon they retired to Sea, til their ſouldiers & marriners were refreſhed. The Genoueſes had placed three ſhips of burthen at the mouth of the hauen to hinder the enemies approach: The Venetian returning againe with his mercenaries to aſſaile the Genoueſes, came not as at the former time to aſſaile the hauens mouth but the ſides, and emptied ſo much earth and grauell as he made at laſt a paſſage for his gallies to enter, which comming into the hauen, the ſhips of burthen were forthwith taken by the Venetians with thoſe which defended them. Diuers gallies with other veſſels which lay there at an Anker were likewiſe taken. The Hauen being thus ſeiſed on, the Venetians gaue a ſodaine aſſault to the Citie, & hauing ſet vp ſkaling ladders in ſundrie places, diuers hoping to enter, did in the midſt of the enemies cries, & arrowes, mount to the top of the wall. The Genoueſes whoſe numbers were great in the Citie, making a furious ſally on the aſſailants, did firſt with great ſlaughter beate them from the wall, and then from the Hauen. Diuers doe thinke that the ſame Citie had beene taken that day, if the Cypriots had aſſailed it as couragiouſly on the other ſide as did the Venetians. The Venetians Hiſtories affirme this for true.

An agreement betwixt the Venetians and the king of Cyprus.

The venetians take the hauen of Famagoſta.

The venetians repulſed from the Citie and hauen of Famagoſta.

Some of the authors ſay, that it was not Pietro, but Bugon of Luſignam, which was father to Petrino, and that he was not ſlaine by his owne ſubiects, but that it was one called Pietro, brother to the young king: Beſides that the Genoueſes were not iniuried by the Venetians, but that by the kings commaundement, ſome of them were throwne forth of the chamber windowes, where the feaſt was kept, and other ſome ſlaine in the Citie, and ouer the whole Iſland, ſo that none were left aliue to carrie the newes to Genoa: That the Genoueſes comming into the Iſland with a great nauall Armie conducted by Pietro Fregoſa did take the Citie of Nicoſia by aſſault with the King and Queene, and after they had put all the Iſland almoſt to fire and ſword, brought away the King and Queene to Genoa, who being afterward ſet at libertie, did in vaine with the Venetian forces come and beſiege the Citie of Famagoſta, which he had voluntarily giuen to the Genoueſes, with the reſidue of the Iſland. But howſoeuer it happened, the matter falling out vnfortunately (as hath been ſaid) the Venetian gallies departing thence, ſailed into Syria, who beſides the other harmes which they did to the Genoueſes, they tooke from them a Barze named Spinereggio laden with moſt rich merchandize: and returning on a ſodaine towards the Adriaticke Gulph, did ioyne themſelues neere to Zara with the nauall Armie, which was conducted by Piſani.

Diuers opinions concerning the taking of Famagoſta.

Whileſt theſe things were done in Cyprus and Syria, Victor Piſani, with eighteene gallies tooke the Citie of Catharra by force which belonged to Lewis, king of Hungarie. At their arriuall they ſummoned the inhabitants, who made a verie proude anſwere, adding diuers reprochfull ſpeeches which did greatly offend the Venetians. Piſani in regard thereof being enflamed with choller, landing his troupes did come come and assailed the Citie. The souldiers and marriners did at the first with such violence winne the defences, and afterwards the walles, as in a moment they made themselues masters of the Citie : which being taken and spoiled, those which were in the fort, being daunted with the sodaine losse of their fellowes, did forthwith yeeld. The bootie did inrich the souldiers and marriners. The Generall did speedily aduertize the Senate of the victorie by a galley which he sent away of purpose.

The venetians take the citie of Catharra.

The fort of Catharra yeelded.

Pisani his Armie being increased which was alreadie of twentie fiue gallies, vpon report that the Genoueses gallies were comming into Dalmatia, and that they were alreadie departed from Genoa for that purpose, and had commission after they should haue shut in the hauen of Zara, to moleſt the Venetians, not onely at Sea, but along the neighbour shoares, resolued to meete the enemie at his comming farre from the Citie. The Venetian at last ouertooke the Genoueses neere to Tarentum: for hauing passed beyond Naples, he vnderstood that the enemies Armie a little before had sailed towards Calabria: whereupon hauing coasted all the shores, he did not misse of the enemies Armie at the place aboue said: and for to enforce him to fight, he encamped at the mouth of the Gulph neere to the mount Lacinia, which is iust opposite to that of Salentina. These two mountaines looking one vpon an other make this Gulph to be of a verie dangerous approach. In that is situated the Citie of Tarentum. I said the Venetian did rather encampe neere to Lacinia, than elsewhere, because that the Genoueses lying in the hauen of Tarentum, and the Venetian being verie desirous, not onely to draw him to the fight, but to constarine him thereunto, had rather encampe there, to take away the meanes from them who lay a good way in the Gulph of flying backward.

The situation of Tarentum.

At the last the enemie being come forth of Tarentum, so soone as he perceiued the Venetians to come towards them, did speedily put to sea-ward, and turned forth of the way. The Venetian neerely followed him, hoping speedily to ouertake him when as he saw himselfe to be deceiued with a new tricke of warre. The enemie made shew as though he would fight, and as if he were out of al hope to escape. And turning on a sodaine towards the Venetian, he feined to make all things readie in his gallies for a battaile : which Pisani perceiuing, made a stand and commaunded his souldiers and marriners to arme themselues. The Genoueſe so soone as he saw the Venetians in a readinesse, the souldiers loden with Armour, and the gallies all pestered with warlike engines, he gaue a signe to his people to set saile. Ye should haue seene then these two fleets sailing very differently the one from the other. For the Genoueses who had their marriners readie, and vnloden, seemed to flie vpon the Sea with wings, and the Venetians not able to stirre, by reason of their weight and pestering. By meanes whereof he escaped at his pleasure, and tooke the direct way into Dalmatia. Pisani hauing no place of retreate neere, turned on the left hand towards Apulia.

The Genoueſes flie from the venetians.

A stratagem of the Genoueses to auoid the fight.

At the same time, fiue gallies being armed by the Senates commaund, after the taking of Catharra departing from the Citie with the same which brought the newes of the victorie, to goe vnto the Armie, met with three Genoueses gallies neere to Berisone. These three had scoured for a time vp & downe to the Venetians losse, and had taken as occasion serued, diuers ships laden with marchandize. The Venetian so soone as he had perceiued them a farre off, sailed directly towards them to take reuenge. But the Genoueses without any stay betooke themselues to flight, and the one ceased not to pursue, and the other to flie, vntill they were in view of Zara, for then the Venetian gallies giuing ouer their pursuite retired to Brandissa, where so soone as they vnderstood that the Genoueses fleet was arriued in Dalmatia, they stayed in that hauen, fearing if they should passe on their iourney, to bee surprized by the enemie. The hauen of Brandissa is by nature great: the mouth thereof containeth diuers and sundrie hauens which are not subiect to Sea tempests. There are within it diuers pleasant places of retreat where ships lie out of danger.

The flight of three Genoueses gallies.

Description of the hauen of Brandissa.

The

The ſtructure thereof is like to the hornes of an Hart, whereof the Citie in times paſt tooke the name, becauſe the hauen with the reſidue of the Citie is made in the forme of an harts head which in the Meſſapian tongue is called Brandiſſa.

The Venetian, hauing then receiued of the Gouernour and the inhabitants of the Citie, the towers which lie at the mouth of the hauen, did man them with good garriſons, then they ſent by land to Piſani, who was ſaid to be in Apulia with a great Armie, to certifie him that they ſtaied in the Hauen of Brandiſſa, fearing to meete with the enemie who was not far from thence. Victor vnderſtanding the danger of his Countrimen came with ſpeed to Brandiſſa. And there adding the ſix Gallies to his owne fleet he made vp the number of one and thirtie, wherewith he ſpeedily ſailed into Dalmatia to ſurprize the Genoueſes going to Zara, who hauing notice thereof did ſodainely retire to Trahu.

The number of the Venetian Armie.

But whileſt theſe things were done at Sea, the Venetians on the firme land tooke the Citie of Saligetta from Gerardo Caminenſis & ſoone after Ceſalta which was burned, and the other wholy ruinated. The enemies in the meane time were not idle: for Prince Carrario hauing aſſembled, as well of his owne, as of the Hungarians, the Biſhop of Aquileia, and of other Princes of the league to the number of ſixteene thouſand men, came and furiouſly beſieged the Citie of Meſtra: and to take from the inhabitants all hope of ſuccour and victuals, he placed a ſtrong Garriſon on the riuer which leadeth from Mergera to Meſtra: within a while after the enemie ſeized on Morezane, which is neare to Meſtra, without the loſſe of one man: diuers men of note were taken there who were ſent to guarde that place. The Citie was afterward more ſharpely aſſailed. The Venetian ſent three hundred braue Souldiers to releeue Meſtra vnder the commaund of Nicolao Galianico the Luquois, and Hircio Piſani, who paſſed through the enemies watch, each of them carrying a bundle of arrowes on his horſes crouper. Afterward they made diuers skirmiſhes all along the dike. At the laſt the enemie deſplayed all his forces, and battered the Citie more furiouſly than before.

The Cities of Ceſalta and Saligetta taken.

Meſtre beſieged by the Carrarias.

Meſtra relieued by the Venetias.

Franciſco Delfino commaunded within it, who by his valour and good counſell did not onely defend the walls, but did likewiſe conſtraine the enemie, after he had loſt his peeces of batterie, and a great number of his Souldiers, to retire into his Campe, and within a while after to raiſe the ſiege and depart. Diuers of the enemies being infected with the aire of the mariſhes, fell into a deadly ſickneſſe: whereof being returned home to their owne houſes they ſoone died. Theſe are the exploits which were done that ſommer.

The ſiege of Meſtra raiſed.

Six gallies returning from forrage brought newes to Victor Piſani who was encamped before Zara, that the Genoueſes Armie rode at an Anchor in the hauen of Trahu. Victor departing thence to goe and fight with them, and paſſing by chance not farre from Sicco a Sea towne, he thought it fit before hee went farther to take it by aſſault. Yet neuertheleſſe hee would firſt of all ſummon the inhabitants to knowe whether they had rather to endure an aſſault than voluntarily to ſubmit themſelues to the Venetians. Three Gallies were ſent before to this purpoſe, who hauing taken aſſurance of the citizens, did enter the ſame, where they acquainted the Magiſtrates with what they had in charge, who anſwered very arrogantly that the Venetian ſhould neuer expect to haue the Sicceans to yeelde voluntarily, but if he ment to become maſter of the Citie, it behoued him to vſe other weapons than words. Piſani being ſtung with this braue anſwere of the inhabitants, truſting to the great number of his Gallies (which were ſeuen and thirtie) made haſt to aſſaile the Citie. Whereupon entring the hauen on a ſodaine, he commaunded his Souldiers to land, and to march furiouſly to the aſſault. The Souldiers went to it ſo couragiouſly, as hauing ſet vp ladders in ſundrie places of the wals, & vndermined them, the Citie was taken in a moment with great ſlaughter of the inhabitants: the greateſt number of whom were retired with their wiues and children to the Palace, where for a while was a bloudy fight. But that place being likewiſe forced, great great crueltie was vſed on all ſexes and age whatſoeuer: diuers were ſlaine, and ſome were throwne headlong downe from the top of the Palace. There was a Caſtle in one of the corners of the Citie which was ſtrong by nature and art, into the which diuers had retired themſelues, who preſuming on their great numbers, did dare to make a ſallie on the enemies, and to fight in the middeſt of the Citie. The fight laſted for a time doubtfull, and more bloud was ſhed there than in any other place. But the Dalmatians being at laſt ouercome, were conſtrained to retire againe into the Caſtle, which Piſani would not of purpoſe beſiege, fearing if hee ſhould ſtay long in that place, the enemie would be gone into the hauen of Zara.

A braue anſwer of thoſe of Sicco.

Sicco taken by the Venetians.

The Citie then being ſpoiled and burnt, and diuers priſoners carried thence, a great bootie was brought to the Gallies. He ſent away a Gallie to Venice to aduertiſe the Senate of the taking of Sicco and of their want of victualls: Then imbarking his troupes he ſailed towards Trahu. The hauen of Trahu hath two entries, one towards the Eaſt and the other on the Weſt ſide. The Genoueſes had ſo artificially ſtopped both of them, as the Venetian returning from the aſſault, was conſtrained to lie at Anchor on the Weſt ſide. One part of the Genoueſes Armie was at the ſame time gone into Apulia for victuals; from whence returning, they entred the Hauen on the other ſide not being perceiued, which Piſani hauing notice of, did diuide his Armie into two parts, to ſhut in the Genoueſes on euery ſide: Then to moleſt them in ſundrie places, he landed certaine troupes of Souldiers. It is thought that the footmen made certaine light skirmiſhes, which are not worthie of memory.

The Venetian Armie neere to the hauen of Trahu.

At the laſt, Victor being impatient of ſo long ſtay came and aſſailed the Citie, but all his attempts were in vaine. For hee was ſo farre from entring, as on the contrary he was beaten backe by the Genoueſes (whoſe number in the Citie was very great) and conſtrained to retire with great loſſe to his Gallies. Luca Valeroſa a Venetian Gentleman died in this aſſault. Victor being fruſtrate of his expectation, and victualls beginning to faile, not hoping to recouer any force from Venice, the dearth of all things being very great there, he raiſed his ſiege and came and encamped before Zara, where he did more feare than hurt the inhabitants. He ſent beſides tenne Gallies to the Albanois to know their minds, who being daunted with the miſhap of the Catharrians and with that of the Sicceans, did voluntarily yeeld. Franciſco Contareni was ſent thither to commaund the Citie.

The Venetians aſſaile Trahu in vaine.

The Venetian before Zara.

The Albanois reduced vnder the Venetians obedience.

The Senate being aduertized that the Armie was diſlodged from before Trahu, did forthwith arme fiue Gallies, and laded them with victualls, which were ſent to Piſani who lay before Zara, who was commanded to returne inſtantly before Trahu: and not to ſtir from thence till either by force or famine he had taken the Genoueſes Gallies which lay there. But the Genoueſes after the firſt ſiege, had with greater labor and trauaile than before, fortified the hauen: by meanes whereof this laſt attempt was as vaine as the former wherof we now ſpake. The Armie for certaine daies lay at ankor before the hauen. But Piſani being enforced by hunger and cold (for it was winter alreadie) departed from thence, hauing effected nothing, & came into Hiſtria. From thence he wrote to the Senate to know their pleaſures whether he ſhould with the whole Armie returne to winter at Venice, or elſe tarrie abroad. They decreed that the enemie being ſo neare, it was needfull that hee ſhould tarrie abroade all winter: the which of a certaine did greatly hurt the common wealth. For the Souldiers and Marriners being vndone by hunger and cold, were ſcattered here and there without any leaue ſearching for victualls, and left their Enſignes badly attended. Diuers likewiſe died with hunger, and others with cold. And becauſe victualls were ſcarce in the Citie, they concluded to ſend diuers ſhips that winter into Apulia to fetch corne, and that Piſani ſhould conuay them for feare of being ſurprized by the enemies. The dearth did in ſome ſort ceaſe in the Citie by meanes hereof. The Armie returned into Hiſtria to their wonted place. But the extremity of the cold daily increaſing, and many dying euery hower, the number of thoſe which remained was ſo ſmall, at it was not ſufficient to arme twelue Gallies: ſo as

The Venetian Armie returneth before Trahu.

The Souldiers moleſted with hunger and cold.

Piſani

Piſani ſent diuers of them emptie to Venice, to the end they might be furniſhed anew againſt the ſpring time, if the Senate ſo pleaſed.

Eleuen Gallies newly armed at Venice were ſent to Piſani, with diuers other veſſells, laden with victualls, and among the reſt, a great ſhip of burthen, full of armour, and other equipage for ſhips: the which Piſani commanded to bee forthwith carried into Candie, to furniſh thoſe Gallies which the Senate had appointed to be made readie in the Iſland. The Armie departing from Pola where it had wintered, and being come into the maine, a terrible tempeſt aroſe on the ſodaine, which ſcattered them here and there. This ſhip of burthen which was full of Armour, was by the force of the winde carried ſafely into the Hauen of Ancona, where it met with a Venetian Barze loden with Syrian merchandize: Being ioyned together they expected a fit time to depart thence, but on a ſodaine they eſpied twelue Genoueſan Gallies on the maine.

The Senate ſends new ſupplies to Piſani.

The Venetian Armie ſeparated by tempeſt.

The Venetians ſuſpecting the truth, and that they were Genoueſes, would forth with haue vnloden their ſhips, and determined to carrie their beſt and richeſt wares into ſome place of ſafetie, but the Townes men would not ſuffer them ſo to do, ſaying that their Hauen was a ſafe retreate for all men, and that they needed not there to feare the Genoueſes, nor any whatſoeuer, proteſting that they ſhould doe no worſe than themſelues. The Venetians on this aſſurance did not vnlode. The Genoueſes in the meane time entred the Hauen, and kept themſelues quiet for a while, but after they had beene at meate, they armed themſelues, and with great noiſe, ſeized on the Towers, and Walls of the Hauen, and from thence they ran to ſpoile the ſhips. The Venetians which were on the Citie walls, would haue ſhot at the Genoueſes, but the Inhabitants would not ſuffer them, ſaying, that they would not incenſe the Genoueſes againſt them by any new injurie. They then perceiuing themſelues to be betraied did not ſtirre. The Venetians ſhips being drawne forth of the Hauen, the one of them being vnloden of the Armour that was in it, was burnt in the view of the Citie, and the other which was laden with merchandize, the enemies carried away. This injurie did greatly moue the Venetians, but being intangled in ſo many Warres, they thought it fit to deferre the reuenge till ſome other time, and therefore they did as then attempt nothing againſt the Authors of that deede.

The Venetians being deceiued by the Anconitans, were taken and ſpoiled by the Genoueſes.

Piſani in the meane time was come into Apulia, and the Venetian Gallies tooke in their lading of corne, at Barletta and Siponto. Thoſe who loded at Barletta, quarrelling with the Inhabitants about a ſmall matter, were in great danger of their liues, but the tumult was appeaſed by the arriuall of thoſe who commaunded the Gallies. The Venetian in the end hauing loden, departed from Apulia, and met at Sea with fifteene Gallies of Genoa. So ſoone as Piſani deſcried them, he bethought himſelfe after what manner he might aſſaile them, whether it were beſt to doe it on the ſodaine, or after the accuſtomed manner: He knew well enough that the Genoueſes whom he could not prouoke to fight at Tarentum, & were not ſince that time become ſtronger in Gallies, or in ought elſe, would neuer abide a battaile: yet neuertheleſſe he commanded his warlike engines to bee ſet in order in his Gallies, and being come within bow-ſhot one of an other, each of them began to prouoke his aduerſarie by ſhooting of arrowes. The Generall of the Genoueſes Armie died at this encounter. The Venetian Hiſtorians, nor thoſe Authors whom we haue followed doe not name him; Victor Piſani was hurt likewiſe with the ſhot of an arrow.

A quarrell againſt the Venetians at Barletta ſoone appeaſed.

A battaile at Sea betwixt the Venetians and Genoueſes.

The enemie perceiuing that to diſſemble in this fight would no whit at all auaile him, truſting to the lightneſſe of his veſſells, he got forth of the throng, and ſailing directly towards Dalmatia, the Venetian forthwith loſt ſight of him, whereupon he entred at his pleaſure into the Hauen of Zara. Piſani arriuing in Hiſtria, and bringing his fleet into the Hauen of Pola, he ſent the ſhips which were laden with corne to Venice.

The Genoueſes flie from the fight.

Whileſt theſe things were done abroade, the Senate ſent fiue Gallies well armed from from Venice, to ſcoure the lower Seas. It was reported that there was no armed Gallies at Genoa. It was the ſpring-time when they ſailed into the maine Sea, where they remained all that Sommer, Harueſt, and a part of the Winter, in which time they did greatly moleſt the enemie.

The Venetian Armie ſtaieth at Pola.

Piſani after he had ſent (as hath beene ſaid) the ſhips loden with corne to Venice, he remained at Pola with one and twentie Gallies, fiue of which for that they were ſlower than the reſt, hee cauſed to bee drawne a ſhoare to bee trimmed and made cleane, that they might thereby become more light and apt to fight. But in the meane time fourteene Genoa Gallies were on a ſodaine deſcried within a mile of the Hauen: Thoſe which were within them, did brandiſh their naked ſwords, and challenged the Venetians to the fight: Ten other Gallies of ſupplies were come vnto them from Zara, of which the Venetians had no notice, the enemie had placed them in ambuſcado behinde a little hill neare to the Hauen, and commanded them that after the battaile ſhould be begunne, and when they ſhould perceiue their fellowes by little and little to retire, and the Venetians to follow them, then on a ſodaine with great noiſe and cries to come forth vpon the enemie. Piſani not dreaming on this Ambuſh (becauſe hee plainely ſaw all the Gallies which the enemies were wont to haue) hauing commanded ſpeedily to prepare thoſe fiue which were on the ſtrond, ſailed directly with the reſidue of his Armie towards the enemie.

The Genoueſes challenge the Venetians.

The battaile at Sea.

They ranne at one an other with great furie, and fought for a time without any ods, but the Genoueſes Admirall Galley ſtriking on that of Piſani, (and Luciano Dovia the Generall of their Armie being dead, whom Donato Zeno ſlew) ſhee was loſt: whereupon the Genoueſes in the heate of the fight began a little to giue backe, not ſo much for feare, as of ſet purpoſe, and being come to the place of the Ambuſcado, the enemies ruſhing forth with great clamours did much amaze the Venetians. Piſani perceiuing his fiue Gallies, which at the beginning of the battaile were on ſhore and being now armed did iſſue forth of the Hauen towards the fight, did courageouſly receiue the enemies running fiercely vpon them: (But thoſe Gallies who were appointed for reſcues, perceiuing the number of the enemies Gallies, and their fellowes to be incloſed on all ſides, refuſing to come to the fight, did forthwith flie towards Venice:) And then did the Venetians fortune beginne openly to decline. Piſani being to his great griefe drawne by force forth of the throng, did with all ſpeede direct his courſe towards Venice, leauing a glorious victorie to the enemie: fifteene Venetian Gallies with all their furniture were taken: very few eſcaped to the Land. Two thouſand men were taken in this defeate, among whom were diuers Gentlemen, the reſidue were ſlaine or hurt. This loſſe happened on the ſixth of March, on which day the Venetians in a manner loſt all their Sea-forces.

The death of the Genoueſes Generall.

Thoſe of the ambuſcado come forth vpon the Venetians.

The flight and defeate of the venetians.

Piſani, with the Captaines of the fiue Gallies are impriſoned at venice.

The newes of ſo vnfortunate a battaile brought extreme ſorrow to the whole Citie. Piſani, with the other Captaines of the fiue Gallies, which had refuſed to come to the fight, being condemned by the Senates decree in a very great fine, were committed to priſon, they for their refuſing, being the cauſe of the loſſe of the battaile, and Piſani becauſe he fought, before he had ſent forth to make diſcouerie. The people tooke Piſani his condemnation very impatiently, but much more his ſhamefull impriſonment. The report was, that the enuie of ſome of the Senators, rather than his offence, was the cauſe of his impriſonment.

The people are diſpleaſed with Piſani his impriſonment.

The Genoueſes being puft vp with pride for this one victorie: and hoping to execute greater exploits, being come to Zara, did commit their captiues to cloſe priſon, ſome of the meaner ſort excepted. Then cauſing their Gallies which were much broken at this battaile to be repaired, they filled the Venetian Gallies with Dalmatian Marriners, ſo as in a ſhort ſpace they armed eight and fortie Gallies with all things neceſſarie. But before this loſſe at Pola, ſixe Gallies were ſet forth from Venice vnder the command of Carolo Zeno, to moleſt the Genoueſes on the coaſt of the lower Sea. Theſe fiue hauing ouer-taken thoſe ſixe farre from Venice, did diuers great exploits as well in the higher as lower Sea, all the reſidue of that yeare vntill till the middeſt of Winter, at which time, after the loſſe of Chioggia, they were by the Senates decree called home.

The number of the Genoueſes Armie.

The Genoueſes in the meane time hauing a great number of Gallies, tooke ſixteene forth of the Hauen of Zara, and came at the ſame time, and ſeized on Humaga, Grada, and Caorli: Then giuing chaſe to a ſhip laden with Marchandize, they came euen almoſt to Venice, and were in the view of the Citie, when Thomaſo Mocenigo, who was Owner of the ſhippe, not beeing able to approach the Hauen by a mile for want of winde and water, did on a ſodaine with thoſe who were in his companie leape into a Galliot or ſmall Gallie, (for the enemie was verie neere) and ſo eſcaped into a place of ſafetie. Whereupon three Genoa Gallies did enuiron and ſpoile the ſhip in the view of the Citizens who ſtood gazing on the ſhoare, & when they had ſo done, they burnt it. This was the greateſt diſgrace that the Venetians ſuſtained during this war, to behold one of their ſhips which was returned from Syria richly loden, to be pillaged and burnt by the Genoueſes, they not daring to ſtirre, or make any reſiſtance.

Humaga, Grada, Caorli taken by the Genoueſes.

The Genoueſes ſpoile and burne a ſhip in the view of Venice.

The enemie departing thence, went and tooke Peleſtrina by aſſault, the which hauing found for the moſt part to be abandoned by reaſon of the wars, they forthwith ſpoiled and burnt it: Then they ſailed towards Chioggia, where they landed, and without any difficultie ſeized on that part of the Citie which looketh towards the Eaſt, called by the inhabitants Little Chioggia, the which likewiſe being deſolate they forthwith burned. The Garriſon which lay in the Citie being much offended thereat, made a ſodaine ſallie vpon the enemie. The Genoueſes attended them beyond the bridge, where they fought couragiouſly on both ſides, but the enemies number ſtill increaſing, the Venetian beeing ouer-come, was conſtrained to retire with great loſſe into the Citie, and the Genoueſes to their ſhips, who after that directed their courſe towards Ancona, where they ſtaied to refreſh their Souldiours and Mariners, and from thence, hauing with great mirth dragged the Venetians militarie enſignes gotten at Pola through the Sea, they returned triumphing to Zara. It is thought that the Genoueſes might eaſily haue taken Chioggia at the ſame time when they burnt part of it, if they had knowen the ſituation of the Citie.

Peleſtrina taken by the Genoueſes.

The Genoueſes before Chioggia.

The Genoueſes error.

The Venetians being in a ſhort ſpace afflicted with ſo manie miſchiefes, conſidering that the meanes of the Common-wealth were not ſufficient to leuie an Armie ſtrong enough to oppoſe againſt the Genoueſes, and that the cauſe therof was partly by reaſon of the late loſſe of their Armie, and partly likewiſe becauſe diuers armed Gallies were from home, they reſolued for that time to defend their Citie: Therefore they appointed fifteene Gallies for the guard of the Hauen vnder the conduct of Thadeo Iuſtiniano. But they could hardly manne ſix of the number, by reaſon that they wanted rowers, euerie man refuſing to ſerue, in hatred to the Senate, who had impriſoned Victor Piſani, who was beloued of all men.

The Venetians reſolution.

How the Mariners loued Piſani.

They did afterwards fortifie the Hauen in this manner. They did firſt of all build two Caſtles of wood, of a verie hard, and ſtrong ſubſtance, at each end one. Theſe two Caſtles were filled with great quantities of arrowes and darts, and beneath were placed warlike engins to keepe the enemie far off. Then they croſſed ouer an yron chaine three double, ſupported by verie ſtrong Sandoni (for ſo they call certaine ill trimmed veſſels) euerie of them being faſtned to two Ankors, to the end they might not be ſhaken by the waues of the Sea: And they did couer the entrie thereof with yron bodkins, and made ſtrong defences on each ſide. Three great ſhips ſtrongly faſtened together were ſet againſt thoſe chaines, who, being furniſhed aboue with hurdles, did repreſent an inexpugnable Fort. They made a trench at Saint Nicholas on the ſhoare, from the waters which are within the Citie, and there they builded a Fort to hinder the enemies approach, if he ſhould come from Malomoc: then they builded a Fort neere to Malamoc with a ſtrong Garriſon, and two couered ſhips to keep the enemie from comming into the Lakes, whereby they might greatly indanger the Citie. Caballa of Verona was made Generall of all theſe Garriſons. The Ports being thus incloſed and fortified, Thadeo Iuſtiniano Generall of the nauall Armie, did keepe ſometimes within the Forts, and ſometimes abroad. Diuers other veſſells well victualed for a good while, were readie, and expected when they ſhould bee commanded to ſaile againſt the enemie, if neede ſhould be.

The Hauen of Venice fortified.

Caballa of Verona Generall of the venetians footmen.

The Genoueſes likewiſe were not idle in ſo faire an aduantage: but departing from Zara the ſixt day of Auguſt vnder the conduct of Pietro Doria with eight and fortie Gallies, and diuers other ſmall veſſells, they ſailed beyond the Citie of Venice, and came furiouſly into the Hauen of Chioggia, which being taken the Armie approached the Citie. Prince Carrario, who was before aduertized (as being allied to this war) of the Genoueſes arriuall, had leuied forces and ſhippes, and hauing notice of what they had done at Chioggia, he came in ſmal veſſels called Ganzarioles through the channell of the Riuer Brent, euen to the Venetians Fort, neere to Montauban. But perceiuing that the place could not be taken without great ſlaughter, and meaning to make no long ſtay there, he tooke in hand a memorable worke, and worthy a great Prince. For hauing aſſembled a great number of husband-men, from day-breake till noone, he cauſed a trench to be made of fiue hundred paces long, euen to the channell called Naſariola, ſo deepe, as the veſſels with the troupes might eaſily paſſe through it, by meanes whereof he forthwith conſtrained the Fort of Naſariolas to yeeld.

A memorable enterprize of Carrario.

The Fort of Naſariola taken.

Giouanni Chyurani being ſent the ſame day with manie veſſells to hinder the Paduans deſigne, ioyning fight with the enemie, did greatly forteſlow Carrario his attempt till night, and then either by feare, or negligence rather, forſaking the buſineſſe, he went to Chioggia. The enemie in the meane time came at his pleaſure and ioined al his troupes to the Genoueſes Armie, with his munition and victualls, hauing left a Garriſon at a Fort built of purpoſe at the mouth of the Riuer, to the end that the paſſage thereof might be aſſured to his people comming from the firme Land. The Senate commanded Chyurani who was at Chioggia, to come home, who becauſe he had not perfourmed his dutie in the Seruice of the Common-wealth, was condemned in a great fine, and to perpetuall priſon.

Carrario ioineth himſelf with the Genoueſes.

Chyurani for not doing his dutie, is condemned to perpetuall impriſonment.

The end of the fifth Booke of the ſecond Decad.

THE SIXTH BOOKE OF THE SECOND DECAD Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the ſixth Booke of the ſecond Decad.

THe Genoueſes take Chioggia : The Citie is greatly affrighted at the report of this loſſe. PISANI is ſet at libertie by the Senates Decree. The Generall of the Armies place is diuided betwixt THADEO IVSTINIANO and VICTOR PISANI. The Citie fortified neere to the Hauen, and in diuers other places. King LEWIS ſendeth CHARLES to beſiege Treuiſo. The treatie of peace begun by the Hungarian, is broken off by reaſon of his vniuſt demands. The Genoueſes beſiege Malamoc : They fight vpon occaſions on either ſide, as well on the ſhoare as in the middeſt of the marſhes. The Senate reſolue to leuie a great Armie. Diuers particular perſons doe diuerſly aide the Commonwealth. The Genoueſes raiſing their Campe from before Malamoc, doe retire to Chioggia. CAROLO ZENO his exploits againſt the enemie, as well in the higher as lower Sea. The Venetians beſiege Chioggia on euerie ſide. How valiantly they fought at Brondoli neere to the Hauen with the enemie. THADEO IVSTINIANO looſeth part of the Armie at Siponto. The Genoueſes being vanquiſhed and almoſt daunted in a ſet battaile neere to Chioggia, yeeld themſelues. The Prince hauing giuen the Souldiours the ſpoile, doth recouer the Citie with all the priſoners.

CHioggia is ſeated in the middeſt of the mariſhes, enuironed almoſt round about with channels, and hath within it like to Venice, brookes that are nauigable, which ebbe and flow with the Sea-waues, and without the Towne diuers ſtreames which run through their fieldes and ſalt-pits whereon the inhabitants do go in little boates, as in a beaten way: By meanes whereof during the ſiege, there were ſtill men, ſo long as the enemie poſſeſſed the Hauen, who came thoſe waies by night, bringing letters from the Senate to Chioggia, and from thence to Venice. But theſe ſtreames can beare no great veſſells. There is a waie which leadeth from the Hauen to the Citie, by which the enemies might haue paſſed, which was before then incloſed by the Venetians. They had builded a Fort on the hither ſide of the Hauen with a good garriſon, as at Malamoc, and had beſides placed a ſhip in the middeſt of the mariſhes, right ouer againſt this Fort, well furniſhed with men and munition: Theſe lets kept back the enemie, who ſo ſoone as they had forced the Hauen, which is a mile diſtant from Chioggia, did not forthwith aſſaile the Citie, who being encamped neere to the Hauen, great forces in few daies came to them. For beſides the Paduans, and the mercenarie Souldiours which Carrario brought, the troupes likewiſe of the Biſhop of Aquileia, with thoſe of the other confederates came thither to them. Theſe perceiuing their bad ſucceſſe in that place, reſolued to aſſaile at one time the Fort and the ſhip: Hauing then put 12. Ganziarolles forth of the Hauen, after they had a while rowed vp and down heere and there, they came to the ſhoare of the little Chioggia, where great numbers of men drew them by maine ſtrength ouer little hillocks which hang downwards on the ſhoare, into the inner channells. They placed moreouer warlike engins on the ſhoare, to batter the Fort at one time, before, behind, and on euerie ſide. Diuers Genoa veſſells likewiſe being come ſomewhat neere, did greatly moleſt the Venetian with the ſhot of their arrowes, ſo that they which were within, being in this manner tormented by their ſhot, and diſtruſting their owne ſmall number, hauing ſet fier on the Fort and the ſhip, becauſe the enemie ſhould haue no vſe of them, retired into the Citie. The Paduans with thoſe which were on the oppoſite ſhoares, ſo ſoone as they perceiued the Venetians to leaue the place, cried out that the Venetians were vanquiſhed and vndone, that their pride was daunted, and that they together with their name would be buried in the waues. Bnt they not being any iot amazed, placed three ſhipps of burthen well armed and furniſhed neere to Saint Dominicks Church, to hinder the enemies approch. And on the other ſide thoſe which guarded the Citie ſallying forth on a ſodain on that ſide of the bridge, which leadeth from the citie to the little Chioggia, fell with great furie vpon the enemie. The fight was for a while equall, but the number of the enemies ſtil encreaſing (for they were reported to be foure and twentie thouſand) the Venetians did ſpeedily retire into the Citie, hauing loſt the other part of the bridge.

The deſcription of the Citie of Chioggia.

Supplies come to the Genoueſes.

The Venetians enforced to retire into Chioggia.

There were three thouſand fiue hundred Souldiors in the Citie beſides the inhabitants, who were commanded by Balba Gallucio the Bolognois, Nicholao Gallicano, Hircio Piſani, and Nicholao Darſeria, all of the valianteſt and famouſeſt Captaines of thoſe times: Pietro Hemo was Gouernour, and Nicholao Contareni with Giouanni Mocenigo were Prouidatori. The Citie was afterward twiſe aſſaulted. At the firſt time albeit the aſſault was verie cruell, hauing continued from day-breake till night, with great ſlaughter; yet the Citie had no great harme: But at the ſecond, the Genoueſes being mingled among the Souldiours entred into the middeſt of the Citie. It is ſaid that to their force they added cunning: for the enemie hauing brought neere to the bridge a ſmall ſhip-full of vine-twigs and other drie matter, that being ſet on fier, the ſmoake did firſt choake thoſe which fought aboue, and the flame and heat afterwards did enforce the Venetian to leaue the place. The enemie would not looſe ſuch an occaſion, but hauing once ſeized on that place, they did preſſe the Venetian ſo neerely, as giuing backe by little and little, they entred pell mell with them committing great ſlaughter in the Citie.

The enemies cunning.

The inhabitants and the reſt did then begin to flie on euerie ſide: Pietro Hemo being forſaken by his people, did with fiftie Souldiours for a time brauely ſuſtaine the enemies aſſault on the bridge neere to the Palace. But at the laſt all things falling out deſperate by reaſon of the great multitude of the enemies, he with his Souldiours did ſhut themſelues vp in the Palace, which ſoone after beeing yeelded fell into the enemies hands. The Armie afterwards entring, the Citie was vterly ſpoiled. The Genoueſes enſignes, with thoſe of King Lewis, and of Prince Carrario, were ſet vp in the higheſt place of the Citie, and thoſe of the Venetians were throwne downe and trodden vnder foot. All the noble women whoſe honours the victorious enemie would haue to be preſerued, were with their children retired into the Churches, and three daies after being called from thence were ſent home to their houſes in all ſafetie. Diuers eſcaped, others were taken priſoners: thoſe which fell into the Genoueſes hands, were impriſoned in Chioggia, but

The Genoueſes take and ſpoile Chioggia.

thoſe

thoſe which fell to the Paduans, and the Forlani, were carried elſewhere.

Chioggia hath on the ſouth ſide, a ſmall Iſland of the bredth of fiue hundred paces ſtretching as farre as Brondoli. This ſpace of ground is almoſt wholly tilled with great labour by the inhabitants. Therein there is a goodly vineyard to be ſeen, and verie large gardens. The inhabitants make great profit thereof, notwithſtanding that they giue themſelues to ſalt making, and to fiſhing. They make great ditches about their inheritances, their grounds being alwaies wet and moiſt. There are likewiſe diuers houſes in it here and there, ſome of them builded with mooriſh matter, and the reſt with morter and bricke. The Genoueſes drew a great many priſoners forth of theſe places, which being on all ſides enuironed with water could not for want of ſhippes eſcape. Diuers were found dead on the ſhore who had careleſly entred into the water.

Six thouſand men were ſlaine at the taking of the Tower, the moſt of whome were either Towneſ-men or Venetians. In this ſort we finde that Chioggia was taken by the Genoueſes. Nicolao Gallicano and Balba Gallucio being with money redeemed from the Genoueſes by Franciſco Carrario, were beheaded. But they which receiued the price of humane bloud falling into the hands of the enemies before the end of the warre, did dye more miſerably in priſon, than thoſe whom they had ſold.

The number of the dead on the Venetians ſide.
Carrario his crueltie.
A diuine puniſhement.

The guard of Chioggia was giuen to the Genoueſes. Prince Carrario with part of his troupes went home to their owne houſes. The like did the forces of the Biſhop of Aquileia who were commanded by Giacomo Porliano. Pietro Hemi paid three thouſand crownes for his ranſome, and loſt the worth of as much in mooueables when the towne was taken. The Genoueſes after the taking of Chioggia, came with Ganziarolles and other leſſer veſſels, and a fewe Gallies to ſeize on the Caſtle of Loretta, and the tower of Bebia. Thoſe which were in the new tower hauing notice of the taking of thoſe two neighbour Fortes, not tarrying till the enemie arriued burned their Fort, and retired with great feare to Cape-darger a Towne belonging to the Venetians: but it continued not long in their obedience. For Carrario approaching with his forces the inhabitants forthwith yeelded, which they of Montauban vnderſtanding, did quickly burne their munitions and fled to the tower of Salina. This Fort alone remained impregnable all the time of the warre.

The Genoueſes take Loretta & the tower of Bebia.
Cap darger taken by Carrario.

The Venetians being thus ſhutte in by Sea and Land, beganne on a ſodaine to want victuailes and other neceſſaries: For Chioggia beeing taken, with all the Townes and Fortes which they poſſeſſed on the Riuers and Lakes, they had no hope to get victuailes from any place but from the Treuiſan, from whence they furniſhed the Citie with a litle corne and fleſh by the Riuer Sylla.

The newes of the loſſe of Chioggia being brought at mid-night, the enemie entring into it at Sun-ſet, did in ſuch ſort trouble the Senate, that ſo ſoon as it was day the whole Citie was in alarme: At which noiſe all men ranne with their armes to the Palace, where ſuch great numbers of people arriued as all the great market-place before the Palace, and before Saint Markes Church, was filled with them. Then by the Senates commandment they gaue notice to the people of the loſſe of Chioggia with as many as were in it. It is reported that at theſe words there were ſuch cries and lamentations made among the people, as greater could not be if the Citie had beene taken: yee ſhould then haue ſeene honorable women to walke vp and downe the Citie hanging down their heads full of ſorrow, and then on a ſodaine lifting vp their eyes and hands to heauen, knocking their breaſts with their handes: The men on the other ſide bewailed their common fortune, ſaying that the State of their Common-wealth was ouerthrowne. Euerie man lamented his owne particular loſſe: but much more their libertie which they held ſo deare.

Great ſorrow ouer all the Citie for the loſſe of Chioggia.

They certainely beleeued that the victorious Genoueſes would ere long bee at their gates, and after the ouerthrow of their State would wholy aboliſh their memorie. Euerie one thinking all to be loſt, thought on nothing but their owne particular. Some ſent away their gold, pretious ſtones, iewells, money, apparell, and other rich mooueables, to them which kept their farmes in the countrie, others hid them in Churches, and old monuments. In a word the whole Citie was filled with feare and weeping: diuers did beleeue that if the enemies Armie had in this amazement come into the Citie (which Carrario after the taking of Chioggia did oftentimes counſaile the Genoueſes to doe) it would haue beene taken that verie day, or at the leaſt-wiſe brought into great extreamitie. But God hath not giuen all to one man: Many men haue knowne how to vanquiſh, but few that could make vſe of their victorie. The Garriſon which lay at Malamoc being called home, came ſpeedily to Venice, hauing razed their Fort and brought away the ſhippes.

The common complaint of the people.

Beſides, al men complained, that there was no man who by ſpeedy counſaile and exhortation could raiſe the courage of the Citizens daunted with ſorrow, and who for his good ſeruice had ſuch credit among the people, as all men would gladly entertaine him, and be deſirous to haue him for their Captaine in ſuch a danger: all men ſaying that their State was loſt, and their liues in great hazard, vnleſſe ſome one would ſhew himſelfe to relieue their afflicted countrie: That there was none but Piſani in the whole Citie, who being beloued of all men could by his valour preſerue the Common-wealth in ſo dangerous a ſeaſon: but that he was in priſon and kept in darkeneſſe, yet if he were ſet at libertie, his onely preſence would encourage the daunted Citizens, and that therefore they ſhould doe well to goe altogether to the Palace, and intreat the Senators preſently to enlarge him, and to beſtowe him on his countrie.

Piſani is ſet at libertie by the Senates decree.

Theſe ſpeeches were publickely pronounced, and ſome times in the Senates hearing. This being reported at the Palace, the Senators did ſodainely aſſemble to determine thereon. They decreed that Piſani and all they who were impriſoned for the ſame fact, ſhould be ſet at libertie: which being diuulged in the Citie, a great multitude of people ranne on a ſodaine to the Palace. But he like a diſcreet and modeſt perſon would needs lie the night following in priſon, and in the meane time ſent for a Prieſt to heare his confeſſion. Then ſo ſoone as it was day, hee went vp to the Palace and heard Maſſe at Saint Nicholas Altar, where he receiued the Sacrament giuing all men thereby to vnderſtand, that he did forget the wrong which he had receiued as well by the Common-wealth, as by particular perſons. This being done he was brought into the preſence of the Prince and Senate whom he ſaluted, not with a furious and angrie looke, but with a gentle aſpect, and kneeling at Prince Contareni his feet, the Prince ſpake thus vnto him.

Piſani his great modeſtie.

The Princes ſpeech to Piſani in open Senate.

Victor, we haue for a time obſerued the rigour of the Law: it now behoued vs to
" vſe mercie and fauour: by our commandement thou wert impriſoned for the loſſe
" which the Common-wealth receiued at Pola vnder thy conduct: we haue at this " time thought good to ſet the at libertie: Let me intreat thee not to diſpute which of " the two hath bin moſt iuſtly done, but rather forgetting what is paſt, to looke vpon
" the Common-wealth, and endeuour to reſtore and maintaine it: In a word deale in
" ſuch ſort, as thy fellow-citizens who loue and honour thee for thy notable vertues,
" may be bound vnto thee as well for the good of the Common-wealth, as for their " owne particular profit.

Piſani his anſwere to the Prince.

" To this ſpeech Piſani anſwered. Moſt excellent Prince there hath nothing befallen me either from your ſelfe, or from thoſe who with you doe gouerne the State " of the Common-wealth, which I take not in good part, as becommeth a good Citizen. I know that all things are well and wiſely done which are concluded for the " ſeruice of the Common-wealth, whereunto I aſſure my ſelfe that all your Councels " and decrees doe tende. Concerning the iniurie I haue receiued of ſome particular
" perſons, I am ſo farre off from taking any reuenge, as I proteſt and ſweare by that
" moſt holy Sacrament which I hope I haue this day receiued to my ſoules health,
" and by that holy diuine ſeruice which I was preſent at, neuer hereafter to remember it. And I intreat thoſe who haue in any ſort enuied my fortune and proſperitie, to beleeue, that I beare them no leſſe good will than to my deareſt friends, and that they ſhall neuer by me, nor for me receiue any diſpleaſure whatſoeuer, but I will on the contrarie ſtriue to performe all offices of loue and kindneſſe to wards them. As for your charitable affection, & inuiting me to the ſeruice of the Commonwealth, I doe moſt willingly vndertake the defence thereof, and I would to God I were a man able in theſe dangerous times, to relieue it in any ſort either with counſell or induſtrie, but howſoeuer, my loue ſhall neuer be wanting. This being ſaid, he was embraced by the Prince, and by all the Senators, whoſe eyes were full of teares, and then he went home to his owne houſe.

to

It is reported that as he walked in the ſtreets among great numbers of people who came to congratulate him, the whole Citie in a manner following him, they clapped their hands in ſigne of ioy, and there were ſome, who at randon ſaid that he ought to be Prince, and not a priuate Citizen; but he mildly reprehended them, telling them plainly that thoſe praiſes ought to be giuen to Saint Marke the Cities Patron, and to the Prince, and not to an humble Citizen. And becauſe the Senate had giuen him charge of thoſe troupes which were neere to the hauen, that he might together with Caballa the Veronois aduiſe what ſhould be moſt expedient for the Commonwealth, the common people thought that he had beene reſtored to his office of Generall of the nauall Armie. Then did all the religious Orders, all the Colledges, the companies and fraternities of the Citie come to offer themſelues both in publike and particular to furniſh an Armie freely at their owne coſts: ſome likewiſe made offer at their owne charges to arme all the gallies. But he after hee had courteouſly entertained them, ſent them backe to the Prince and Senate, telling them that it was they who had the managing of all matters, and that they would liſten to their offers, which concerned the good and profit of the Commonwealth. In the meane ſpace he ſpent the time in viſiting the works and fortifications made at Saint Nicolas Church againſt the enemies incurſions, the which as vnprofitable, he cauſed to be beaten downe, and made others of better forme. But when the people knew that he was not reſtored to his former office: yee ſhould haue ſeene in an inſtant how they ſtood affected to him, and taxed the wilfulneſſe of the Senators, who in ſo great a danger would ſtill reſpect their priuate hatreds. What ſaid they, ſhall not ſo notable a man, moſt skilfull in marine matters and famous for the reputation of his high attempts, be reſtored to the office of high Admirall? This is not done for the good of the Commonwealth, but onely to ſatisfie the enuie of a few particular perſons. Theſe or ſuch like detractions of the common ſort being reported at the Pallace, the Senate did againe aſſemble, where they propounded the ſmall danger which at any other time the peoples murmuring againſt the Senate could import; but that it was moſt neceſſarie at that preſent to bee at vnitie one with another, in regard the ſafetie of the Commonwealth was then in hazard. VVhereupon by a generall conſent, Victor was admitted to his former office: It was preſently blowne abroad the Citie, how that by a new decree of the Senate, Piſani was declared Generall of the nauall Armie, and that he was with his forces to lie betwixt the Citie and the Paduan confines: Great numbers of people did forthwith runne vnto him, and in three daies ſixe gallies were armed, and many more might haue beene made readie if need had beene, euerie man ſtriuing who ſhould firſt enroll his name for that ſeruice.

The ioy of the people when they beheld Piſani at libertie.

The peoples talke in fauour of Piſani.

Piſani is reſtored to his former office.

Many Ganzarioles and other ſmall veſſels were added to theſe gallies. All which being readie to depart: Piſani came with the nauall Armie to the Hauen, where he conferred with the Generall of the land troupes, to change the Fort which had been builded at the firſt into a bricke wall, & to build at both ends two ſmall towers with good garriſons. The Senate allowed this opinion of his, and euerie one falling forthwith to worke, in foure daies the two towers were builded; Piſani, Thadeo, Iuſtiniano, Caballa, and diuers other noble men, hauing laid the firſt foundations. Then they began the wall in the ſame place where the trench was, the which being drawne

In what manner Piſani fortified the Citie.

The diligence which was vſed in the fortifications.

drawne from one tower to another, was ended in fifteene daies: great numbers of townſmen, ſouldiers, and marriners laying their hand to it. The ruines of this building are at this day to be ſeene on the left ſide of the Hauen. There was afterward a great yron chaine drawne neere to the lewrie to hinder the enemies incurſions, and foure great couered ſhips were there placed to ſerue for a defence. Then without they made a trench from the new wall vnto Saint Martins Church, where diuers light boates were placed, who all night long went the round, leaſt the enemie entering ſecretly, ſhould burne the buildings next to the Citie. They did beſides in the night time place diuers corpes-de-guard, for feare leaſt the Citie ſhould receiue ſome harme by a ſurprize.

The venetians daily incurſions.

VVhileſt theſe things were done in the Citie, diuers perſons in light boats made incurſions beyond Montauban and thoſe places from which men go from the firme land to Chioggia, where they aſſailed diuers boates which went vp and downe, which being eaſily taken, with the profit that aroſe by them, did encourage diuers others to doe the like. There paſſed no day but ſome veſſell or other was taken, ſo as in a while after none durſt goe from Padua to Chioggia. The Genoueſes ſoone perceiued that if the paſſages were ſhut from them, victuails would faile. VVherfore to ſtay theſe incurſions, or rather hoping to execute ſome great exploit, they came with their gallies and diuers other armed veſſels, furiouſly to poſſeſſe the Hauen of Malamoc, and to encampe there; and hauing builded a Fort in the ſame place where that of the Venetians had ſtood, they landed part of their troupes on the oppoſite ſhoare to take Poueggia by force.

The Venetians being aduertized of the enemies approach did ſhut vp the channels which came from Chioggia to Venice with two ſhips which were ſunke one neere to the other, a little beyond the Church of the holy Ghoſt, and on the ſide of them another greater than they lying at Anker, with ſtore of archers in it. The enemies gallies being come thither: Thadeo Iuſtiniano who lay at the foreſaid Church did with fiue gallies euerie day giue them alarme, where they fought more with arrowes and dartes, than with hardie ſtroakes. The Venetians light boates comming on the one ſide with their warlike engines and arrowes did infinitely torment the Genoueſes gallies, and diuers daily died on both ſides. They fought likewiſe ſometimes on the ſhoare as occaſion ſerued. In all which encounters the Venetians had ſtill the better. For Caballa the Veronois was moſt skilfull in the art militarie, and had good troupes of horſe, which the enemies at Poueggia, and Malamoc had not.

Diuers and ſundrie encounters where the venetians had ſtill the better.

Charles ſonne to Lewis king of Hungarie commeth before Treuiſo.

During theſe combates and encounters at the Sea, Charles ſonne to Lewis, (as ſome ſay) or according to others, ſonne to that Charles who defeated Manfred king of Apulia, came with ten thouſand Almaines before Treuiſo. Before his arriuall Nicolao Moroſino, Giouanni, and Zacharia Contareni were ſent thither to conſult with the Hungarian concerning the Commonwealth. For it was reported that hee had expreſſe commiſſion from his father, to giue audience to the Venetians Ambaſſadors, and to thoſe of the league; and if he and his aſſociates likewiſe thought it fit, to make a peace with the Venetians. At his arriuall the Paduan Prince came to the campe, ſo did the Ambaſſadors of the Genoueſes, and the Biſhop of Aquileia, as well to congratulate his welcome, as to determine with him either for peace or warre, of that which concerned the king and the confederates. The Venetians the next day came to the campe which lay neere to the Church of the fortie Saints. And though they were expreſſly commanded by all meanes to accept of peace, though it were on vniuſt conditions, yet neuertheleſſe the demaundes were ſuch and ſo hard on all ſides, as if the Venetians wealth had beene foure times greater than it was, it would not haue beene ſufficient to ſatisfie the inſatiable couetouſneſſe of the enemie.

The venetian Ambaſſadors come to the campe to treate of peace.

The enemies vniuſt demaunds.

This treatie of peace laſted certain daies, but the enemies ſhameleſſe demands cauſed the Venetians by no means to condiſcend to ſuch vnhoneſt conditions, chuſing rather rather to endure all extremitie than by ſuch baſeneſſe to diſhonour the Venetian name: Prince Carrario in the middeſt of this parlie returned to Padua, hauing left Arcuan Buccecarino to command the troupes which hee had brought to Charles. After his departure the matter was a while debated on. But the enemies meaning to take all from the Venetians, and to leaue nothing to the vanquiſhed but their liues, the which they would haue them to enioy of their ſpeciall fauour, the deſpite of that diſgrace being conuerted into choler, the Senate commaunded their Ambaſſadours to giue ouer the buſineſſe, and without any concluſion at all to returne to Venice. They being gone, Charles, after hee had laine in Campe two moneths before Treuiſo, perceiuing that it was to no purpoſe, diſlodged and returned into Hungarie.

The treatie of peace broken.

Charles returneth to Hungarie.

Whileſt theſe things were done on the Treuiſan, the Venetians armed fiftie ſmall boates, and came about ſixe or ſeuen of the clocke in the euening, to ſurprize the enemies Fort. There was in the dike which Carrario had haſtily made neare to Montauban, one Gallie commanded by Bartilmeo Vſiere of Sauona, with two other ſmall boates, which ſerued for conuoy to thoſe which went vp and downe. The Venetians hauing ſodainely aſſailed it, tooke it in a moment, the enemie making greater ſhewes than deedes. The Venetian Archers wanne it, who paſſing ouer the otherſide of the dike, did ſhoote directly into it being very neare to the ſhoare: but being taken and ſpoiled, becauſe by reaſon of the ebbe they could not bring it away they burnt it.

This victorie did greatly reioyce the Citie, and ſo much the more, becauſe this fortunate ſucceſſe did put courage into the Citizens, who were daunted with ſo manie loſſes, and cauſed them to hope for better fortune. For after theſe exploits, diuers ſpeeches full of diſcontent were euery where heard, How that the Citie was become careleſſe and fearefull, that it durſt not fight with the enemie in a ſet battaile, that the Venetians did greatly degenerate from the valour of their anceſtours, who had ſo often ouercome the Genoueſes, hauing more Gallies than they: That a while before, the Genoueſes had no place of retreat in all the Sea, to retire themſelues in ſafetie for feare of the Venetians, but that now the ſame Venetian vigour was dead: that they did no more remember their Countrie, their libertie, nor yet their owne priuate meanes, ſaying that it was a folly, or rather a miſerable thing to ſtay, (hauing conſumed all their wealth) till they were baſely enforced to yeeld, rather by famine then by Armes: That the Senate ſhould doe well to leuie the greateſt forces they could: That the Citizens were reſolued, either to vanquiſh the enemie, or elſe to die for the preſeruation of their libertie. Theſe ſpeeches being reported to the Senate, made them thinke on higher enterprizes: Whereupon they concluded to Arme fortie Gallies of which Prince Contareni ſhould bee Generall: And Captaines for thoſe Gallies were ſpeedily appointed. This decree being publiſhed, did greatly reioyce the people; and it was executed with ſuch affection of the inhabitants, as according to ſome Authours, foure and thirtie Gallies were made readie in two dayes, the friends kinsfolks and allies of the Captaines of the Gallies hauing imploied themſelues in that buſines to hire Rowers, the reſidue of the Gallies for want of men could not be made readie. For beſides the loſſe which they receiued a few moneths before at Pola, eighteene Gallies were abroade vnder the command of Carolo Zeno, which they daily expected. Prince Contareni in the meane time, ſo ſoone as the Rowers were gone into the Gallies; for to practiſe them in rowing (for they were almoſt all artificers) hee did daily make them to row from the Iewrie to Saint Nicholas Church. Hee did it of purpoſe as well to accuſtome thoſe new and vnskilfull people to the oare, as alſo to delaie the battaile if it were poſſible till the arriuall of Zeno: Becauſe it was againſt reaſon to oppoſe to the victorious Armie of the enemies, one leſſer in number, and weaker in forces than they.

Secret ſpeeches of the people.

The Citizens reſolution.

But becauſe the ſcarcitie of all things did in ſuch ſort oppreſſe them, as it was impoſſible poſſible to drawe the matter out at length for feare leaſt that delaie might caſt them headlong into ſome greater danger, they reſolued to fight notwithſtanding that Zeno was not returned. And becauſe in ſo great a dearth they might bee able to feed ſuch an Armie, before they did ſet forward againſt the enemie, it was publiſhed by a decree of the Senate, That whoſoeuer among the people would relieue the nauall Armie or the troupes, with monie, victualls or Souldiers: ſo ſoone as the enemies ſhould be defeated, thirtie of thoſe who ſhould bee thought to haue beſt deſerued, ſhould be receiued into the number of the Senatours, which honour they and their poſteritie ſhould for euer enioy: And beſides, that the Senate would yearely diſtribute fiue thouſand crownes among thoſe who could not attaine to that dignitie. Diuers on the hope of ſuch a recompence did ſhew themſelues, diuers likewiſe being moued with loue to their Countrie, ſome offered one thing and ſome another.

A new decree of the Senate in fauor of thoſe who ſhould relieue the Citie.

More than threeſcore families did relieue the Common-wealth at this need, ſo as by how much any man was eſteemed rich, by ſo much more did he ſtriue to deſerue well of the Common-wealth: by meanes whereof great reliefe was gathered, whereupon diuers were made Senatours. But in reading all that aboue mentioned in ſome Authors who haue beene carefull to collect this hiſtorie, one thing hath greatly moued me, which though it be of no great importance, doth neuertheleſſe ſhew a great affection and loue towards a mans Countrie.

It is reported that one whoſe name was Matheo Faſceolo a Citizen of Chioggia (this man after the taking of the Citie retired to Venice with his children) came to the Senate, and told them how that at the taking of his Countrie he had loſt all his wealth, which amounted to manie thouſands of Crownes: and that if they were againe in his poſſeſſion hee would franckly employ them for the good and profit of the Common-wealth: But that he had nothing left but his life, and two children, the which he freely offered to the Senate and his Countrie: And if they would employ them either by Sea or Land, they were readie for the ſeruice of the Common-wealth to expoſe that onely iewell which fortune had left them of all the reſt.

A liberall offer made to the Senate by a Citizen of Chioggia.

The Genoueſes hauing notice of the great preparations of the new Armie, fearing leaſt the Venetians, being driuen forward by the flowing of the Sea, ſhould about midnight ſurpriſe the entrie of the Hauen which they held, and being once entred, that thoſe of the Citie comming to aſſaile them in ſmall boates before and on the ſides would enuiron them, and by that meanes enforce them to fight in round and ſo cut them in peeces, they raiſed their ſiege and returned to Chioggia, thinking that the Venetians being ſhut from victualls by Land and Sea, would yeeld. But before their departure, they razed the Fort and ruined Malamoc and Poueggia downe to the ground.

The Genoueſes feare.

The Genoueſes do wholy ruinate Malamoc and Poueggia.

Soone after, foure and twentie Genoueſes Gallies went into Friul to get victualls, meaning to exchange ſalt (whereof they had great ſtore) for wheate and other kind of graine. In the meane time three of thoſe Gallies which were left for the guard of the Hauen (the Genoueſes hauing diſarmed the reſt becauſe the Citie ſhould not be without Garriſon did daily make incurſions as farre as the tower Salina (which was the only fort that the Venetians held of all the reſidue in the lakes) and gaue diuers alarums to them within it. Victor Piſani departing from the Citie with three hundred ſmall boates and fifty Ganziaroles, came and ambuſht himſelfe among the reedes neare to the tower thinking to ſurprize them, but being deſcried a farre off by meanes of his flags which were not taken downe, the Genoueſes on a ſodaine returned amaine towards Chioggia. The Venetian not being able to ouertake the enemie in his flight, came with ſpeed by the lakes which did beare ſmaller boates, firſt to Chioggia, where at his arriuall he tooke the Fort of the Saltpits, which are neare to the Citie, and hauing aſſailed the Citie at the ſame inſtant, he did greatly terrifie the enemie: The furie of the fight was towardes the gate,

gate Mariana, and the fight was alreadie begunne in the channels when on a ſodaine theſe three Gallies arriued. The Venetians being aſſailed by the enemie, before, behinde, and on the ſides, were enforced ſpeedily to retire to their enſeignes. Prince Contareni his ſonne in Lawe died in this encounter a braue young man and of the familie of the Gradonici, and diuers others likewiſe with, eight veſſels taken by the enemies: And by this meanes the matter falling out vnluckily the Armie returned to Venice. The Genoueſes Gallies in the meane time who were returned from forrage, vnderſtanding what had beene attempted in their abſence, did reſolue to fortifie Chioggia, and to beat downe all the buildings neere to the ſalt pits, and thoſe likewiſe which were vpon the Walls: to rampier the market place in the middeſt of the Citie, and all the houſes neere round abouts, and to that purpoſe to ſtop vp all the ſtreets which lead to the water with a bricke Wall, and to make a Fort in manner of a Wall with rampiers and Towers of wood, with bridges within it of double ranckes, for the eaſe of the combatants. And becauſe they had intelligence by their ſpies, that Carolo Zeno who was abroad with the Armie, was not yet returned, and that there was no likely-hood that the Venetians would attempt any thing before his comming, fearing by that meanes nothing leſſe than their arriuall, they wrought but laſily in thoſe fortifications.

An enterpriſe attempted with bad ſucceſſe.

The Genoueſes fortifie Chioggia.

Carolo Zeno (as hath beene ſaid) departing from Venice with fiue Gallies at ſuch time as Piſani was defeated at Pola, met neere to Sicilie with Sicilians ſhips, diuers of which being loden with corne and other victuailes were going to Genoa, hee made himſelfe maiſter thereof, and taking as much victuailes as hee thought ſufficient for his owne fleet, he threw the reſt into the Sea, then he did let goe the Marriners who were Sicilians without any harme at all; and gaue them ſomewhat to beare their charges: forbidding them hereafter to goe no more to Genoa. Beſides he tooke diuers Genoueſes ſhips, as well on the coaſt of Trinacria as, on the Tuſcan, and after he had ſpoiled them he ſuncke them in the Sea,

What Carolo Zeno did after his departure from Venice.

In this happie iourney of his, foure Gallies departing from Candie came and ioyned with him: Theſe likewiſe before they came to him, had taken three Genoueſes Barzes, one betweene Candie and Morea, the other at Sapientia, by the aide of the Modonois, and the third on the Sicilian Sea: The which being brought to Naples, the merchandize which was within them was ſold for fiue and fortie thouſand crownes. Then Carolo hauing of fiue Gallies made a fleet of nine (for he was ſtill Generall of them all) ſailed ſpeedily towards the Riuer of Genoa to ſpoile there, where after he had made furious incurſions, torne vp Trees and plants by the roots, he made all things deſolate from Porto-venere euen to Genoa. He would not tarrie to beſiege any place for feare of ſix of the enemies Gallies, who ſtill followed him.

Zeno makes ſpoile all along the River of Genoa.

This ſpoile being made, returning to the maine Sea, he ſeized on a Sicilian ſhippe laden with corne, and other veſſells going to Genoa, he brought away the ſhippe, and ſuncke the reſt. Theſe exploits did Zeno on the lower Sea. But neere to Trinacria Micheleto Iuſtiniano who with foure Gallies had laine in the ſtreight, beſides other ſhippes taken from the enemies on the Propontide Sea and the Boſphorus, he tooke a Neapolitan Barze loden with Genoueſes merchandize which was ſold for eighteene thouſand ducats.

The ſix Gallies likewiſe which departed from Venice at the ſame time in a manner, or a litle before Zeno, were not idle. For ſoone after their departure they ſurprized two ſhippes of Amona, vnto whom vpon their word, they reſtored what they had taken from them, and within a while after departing forth of the Gulphe they met with a Turkiſh Gallie which they ſuncke, and ſlew all that were in it. Then they came and made certaine light aſſaults on the Iſle of Chios where they burnt the Wind-mills and the Rampiers. From Chios they went to Tenedos, and from thence hauing croſt the ſtreight, they ſailed toward the Ponticke Sea, where hauing ſurprized a ſhippe of Sicilie, and finding the merchandize to belong to the Genoueſes, it was ſent as good priſe into Candie.

After

Afterwards, he drew neere to Conſtantinople. Caloianes had at the ſame time recouered his Empire, and driuen his ſonne Andronicus into Pera. But he was not yet maſter of the Caſtle, which did greatly vexe him. Therefore he neuer ceaſed to importune the Venetians, vntill he had drawne them as well by entreaties as promiſes to aſſaile three hundred Genoueſes which kept it. It is reported, that melting into teares, he beſought the Venetians not to forſake him in ſo euident a danger, proteſting that if by their meanes he were reſtored to his Empire, that the Venetians, and not hee (as in time before) ſhould beare the name of Emperour of Conſtantinople. The Caſtle being taken by the Venetians valor, Caloianes recouered all the places of the Empire (Tenedos excepted.)

Caloianes earneſt intreatie to the Venetians for ſuccour.

The Venetians take the Caſtle.

But whileſt the Venetians were neere to Conſtantinople, they ſurpriſed two Genoueſes ſhips laden with Syrian merchandize, within the which were eight and twentie Genoueſes; and diuers other ſmall veſſells, which for the trafficke did ordinarily frequent the ſtreight, and the Ponticke Sea. Pera likewiſe in hatred to Andronicus was ſtreightly beſieged, and during the ſiege, the foure Venetian Gallies in fauour of Caloianes did neuer ſtirre thence.

The Venetians beſiege Pera in hatred of Andronicus.

About the ſame time Zeno came to Tenedos, where in few dayes nineteene Venetian Gallies arriued, truſting to whom he tooke a Barze of Naples wherein were diuers Genoueſes. Whithin a while after he departed from Tenedos with fifteene Gallies, hauing left two for the guard of the Iſland, and ſent the reſidew to the ſiege of Pera, vnder the command of Bertucio Piſani, brother to Victor. As he paſſed along he would needs haue ſeized on Andria a Citie belonging to the Barbarians, where being ſtricken with an arrow he fell downe dead. Carolo came from Tenedos to Rhodes, and going from thence he tooke two Genoueſes ſhips. Then he arriued in Cyprus, where neere the Iſland he tooke a Barze of the enemies laden with corne, after that, an other which was verie rich. From Cyprus he ſailed into Syria, where refreſhing himſelfe in the Hauen of Beritha, a Candiot-Gallie arriued ſent by the Prince and Senate, bringing newes of the loſſe of Chioggia, and of the Cities ſiege, who commanded him to returne ſpeedily into Italie, to raiſe the enemies Campe: whereupon hee ſodainely left Syria and ſailed to Rhodes to take in victuailes. Nicholao Zeno, Micheletto Iuſtiniano. Giouanni Barba were ſent before with three Gallies to make expedition for whatſoeuer ſhould bee neceſſarie for their iournie. They found in the Hauen of Rhodes a Genoa Barze called Pichinione, the goodlieſt that in thoſe daies ſailed on the Seas. The Genoueſes miſtruſting that which followed, that the reſidue of the Armie would quickely come thither, (the Venetians in the meane time not daring to aſſaile it for the bigneſſe of the veſſell) went forth of the Hauen, and tooke the direct courſe towards Ionia, hauing but a ſcant winde. But it was not verie long ere Carolo arriued. There was by chance at the ſame time in the Hauen, a ſtrange Barze, with an other of Spaine ſtrongly armed, but ſomewhat leſſer: Zeno with theſe and the reſidue of the Armie, came and ouertooke the enemie who for want of winde (as hath beene ſaid) was not verie farre from the Hauen. The Genoueſes ſuſtained the aſſault a day and a night, and would not yeld, vntill they perceiued their ſailes to be burnt. A hundred and threeſcore Marchants were taken in it, and almoſt as many Marriners. The Florentine Marchants were let goe ſo ſoone as they came to Rhodes, and to each of them were giuen an hundred crownes to beare his charge home.

In what place Zeno receiued newes of the loſſe of Chioggia and the Cities ſiege.

A great Barze of Genoa taken.

It is reported that the Genoueſes neuer had a greater or richer ſhip. They found by the marchants bookes of accounts, that the goods within it were worth fiue hundred thouſand crownes. They ſould thereof to the value of foure-ſcore thouſand to ſuch as bid moſt: the reſidue not being ſet to ſale.

A Genoueſes ſhip eſteemed to bee worth fiue hundred thouſand crownes.

Carolo, after he had cauſed the great ſhip to be vnladen, and the goods to put in ſmaller veſſels, ſuncke it in the maine ſea, and then paſſed into Candie. In that place (as ſome Authors ſay) hee receiued the firſt newes of the Cities ſiege by Marco Moroſino, who was ſent thither with a Gallie of purpoſe by the Prince and Senate.

But

But during theſe exploits at Sea, the Citie being tormented daily more and more with the ſcarcitie of all neceſſaries, Prince Contareni departed by night from Venice in the middeſt of Winter, with foure and twentie Gallies, and diuers other Veſſells which carried Victualls: the Horſe-men, and Archers, came by day-breake, and ſeized on the Hauen of Chioggia: And then on a ſodaine hee ſanke two Barzes at the mouth of the Hauen, which he had dragged thither for that purpoſe, thereby wholly to take from the enemies all meanes of making any incurſions, hauing at his arriuall left forces at the place, where he meant to ſinke them, to ſee that thoſe who had the charge thereof ſhould ſpeedily execute it. Then the Mercenarie Souldiers being landed, and tickled with a deſire to fight, marched toward the Citie: Thoſe within the Towne being in great numbers made a ſallie forth vpon him (for there were at the ſame time ten thouſand fighting men in Chioggia) where the battaile was bloudie and fierce on both ſides: But the enemies multitude ſtill increaſing, the Venetian was beaten backe, and with great loſſe driuen to his Gallies. Diuers were ſlaine fighting, but more flying: For whileſt the troupes arriued on the ſhore ſide, ſtriuing to enter into the Gallies, diuers in that amazement were ſlaine, and many taken: who being brought to the Citie and diſarmed, were all murthered. Vncio Piſani who had an honourable place in the Venetian Armie, died in this aſſault. The enemie by this victorie being become more inſolent, did forthwith arme diuers ſmall veſſells, and came againſt the Venetian Barzes, the which being not defended, the Gallies not being able to come neare them by reaſon of the ſtrength of the floud, were preſently taken and burnt: wherewith the Venetian was better contented than if the enemie had kept them and placed Garriſons in them; For if they had ſo done, they would haue wholly hindered the Venetian from ſhutting vp the hauen.

The Prince with his Armie in the Hauen of Chioggia.

The Genoueſes beate backe the Venetians to their Gallies.

The Venetian Barzes taken & burnt by the enemies.

The Venetian did not greatly eſteeme theſe two loſſes, hauing his nauall Armie ſtill whole and ſound, for of all his Rowers, Pilots, and Marriners, not one came on ſhore to fight. He ſpeedily ſent two Gallies to the Citie to bring away two other Barzes. But whileſt all theſe preparations were making readie: Frederico Cornari went with foure Gallies by the Princes commandement to Brondolli, to ſhut vp at one time all iſſues from the enemie. Being come thither he ſodainly ſanke two ſhips neare to one another, not farre from Brondolli; the one towards Saint Blaſe his Church, in the way from Chioggia to Ladice, and the other in the very Hauen.

Cornari ſeizeth on Brondolli.

But whileſt Cornari was occupied in this buſineſſe, Prince Contareni, becauſe hee would looſe no time, cauſed the bottomes of thoſe two Barzes, which the enemies had burned to be drawne forth of the water, and filling them with flint ſtones, hee put them in the ſelfe ſame place from whence they had beene drawne: Then the next day hee did without any impeachment ſinke in the ſame place the two other Barzes which came from Venice, being filled with earth and flint-ſtone. And becauſe the entrance and comming forth of the Hauen, ſhould bee ſtill free to the Venetians, they fortified that part thereof which looketh towards the Citie; the which the enemies ſometimes attempted to hinder: But being repulſed by the arrowes which were ſhot forth of the ſhips in the Hauen and then by thoſe which lay at ankor without, they were conſtrained to retire to the Citie with great loſſe.

The enemie fearing that if the Hauen ſhould be ſhut vp, he might be brought to the laſt point of all miſeries, which is famine, cauſed fourteene Gallies to bee prepared to carrie part of the troupes from thence by Sea to Brondolli, intending to returne at the ſpring, to free his Countrimen from the ſiege, after hee ſhould haue reenforced his Armie at Genoa. The Venetian Gallies which Cornari had brought thither (as hath beene ſaid) did come before them to S. Blaſe his Church. The Channell was ſo ſtreight as two Gallies could hardly goe in Front; the which did greatly profit the Venetians, becauſe they could not bee enuironed by a greater number, (but the ſhips which were ſunke auailed them ſpecially) whereupon ſo ſoone as Cornari perceiued that the enemie ſought to draw them vp from thence, and to make themſelues a paſſage, he aduertized his fellowes thereof, who lay three miles from thence, by a ſmoake. Contareni perceiuing this ſignall, inſtantly commanded Thadeo Iuſtiniano to goe with foure Gallies to relieue Cornari. At his arriuall the enemies left off a little. Victor Piſani being ſent after Thadeo with ſixe Gallies, cauſed two other ſhips to be ſunke, almoſt in the ſame place, and ſhut vp the paſſage with a chaine made of Maſts and Saile-yards, builded in the forme of a Rampier.

The Genoueſes determination fearing to be ſhut vp.

The Paſſage of Brondolli ſhut vp to the Genoueſes.

Victor was made Generall of the Gallies which were ſent to Brondolli: whereat Thadeo being offended (for there was alreadie ſome ſuſpition of jealouſie betwixt them two) forthwith departed thence in his Galley, becauſe he would not be enforced to obay him, and came to the Prince. The reſidue which were thirteene remained in the Garriſon, where the Venetians had much to doe, the enemies hourely ſeeking all meanes to open the paſſage. The Genoueſes Gallies being brought back to Chioggia, hauing attempted the paſſage in vaine, the enemie ſeized on the Monaſterie of Nunnes neare to Brondolli, and fortified it: and hauing cauſed his Gallies to glide along as farre as little Chioggia, he attempted likewiſe to poſſeſſe the other ſide of the Hauen of Brondolli. Victor which perceiued it (for the enemies Gallies were remoued from the other ſide) he commanded Giouanni Barbadico to paſſe ſpeedily vpon the enemie with light Veſſells (whereof great numbers were from the beginning ſent vnto him) whileſt himſelfe with his Gallies drew as neare as he could to the ſame ſide which the Genoueſes intended to take. For it is moſt certaine that the enemie poſſeſſing both the ſides of the Hauen, the Venetian Gallies would haue beene ſhut in. The Hauen is foure hundred foote broade. There is ſmall ſtore of Water in the middeſt thereof, but it is nauigable on both ſides neare to the ſhore. Now the Genoueſes poſſeſſed alreadie (as hath beene ſaid) one of the ſides, and had fortified it. If he had ſhut in the going forth on the left ſide, as he had determined, the Venetian Gallies had beene vndone. They reſted not in any ſort in ſo great a danger: they fought fiercely in the middeſt of the Hauen, whereby the Venetians endured much, in regard of the great numbers of arrowes which the enemies ſhot on them from the oppoſite ſhore. But the greatneſſe of the danger made the Venetians reſolued, or rather obſtinate in their determination, ſo that at laſt they brake the enemies deſeignes; and being become Maſters of the place, they builded a Fort there with all expedition: which that they might finiſh with more ſafetie, they called great numbers of Souldiers and Artificers from the Armie.

Ielouzie betwixt Piſani and Thadeo Iuſtiniano.

A ſharp fight in the Hauen of Brondolli.

Georgio Caballa, Sonne to Giacomo, was ſent with a good troupe to guard that place; and by this meanes the Genoueſes and the Venetians poſſeſsed one Hauen at one time. Whereupon there were daily skirmiſhes, the engines of warre throwing from one ſide to an other. The nauall Armie was likewiſe much moleſted day and night, by the warlike engines which the enemie had in the Nunnes Monaſterie. During theſe exploits, neare to Chioggia, the Stellani, in fauour of Bernabo Viſconte, ouer-ranne the whole Countrie of Genoa, thereby to diuert them from the Warre of Chioggia. For beſides other exploits of warre, foure thouſand horſe came at times vnder the conduct of Aſturo their Generall vnto S. Francis Church, neare to Genoa, filling the whole Countrie with feare and terrour. But the Genoueſes making a ſallie forth vpon them the latter time, wholly brake them, and tooke them all priſoners; their Captaine excepted, who eſcaped by meanes of a Peaſant.

The Venetians and the Genoueſes lodge at one time in one Hauen.

The Stellani Warre on the Genoueſes.

The Genoueſes defeate the Stellani.

The forces likewiſe of the Emperour Caloianes did ſomewhat aide the Venetians, who did greatly moleſt thoſe of Pera by ordinarie incurſions, and ſometimes by furious aſſaults: But ſo ſoone as his Sonne Andronicus had placed Miſians and Turkes that were come to his aide, in a place neare to the Citie, for feare of danger he gaue ouer the Venetian partie.

This was done farre from the Citie. But on the Venetian Territorie, The Genoueſes who were deſirous to put forth ſome Gallies to ſuccour their troupes, did with great difficultie draw eighteene Gallies ouer the bridge of Port Mariana, into the ſtreame which ſeparateth little Chioggia from the great, and from thence conducted them with great danger to Brondolli, where being ſufficiently furniſhed with with men and Armes, they remained before the Fort, expecting a fit time to ſallie forth. The Venetians on the other ſide not to ſuffer the enemie to eſcape without puniſhment, kept good guard neare to the Hauen, to beate him in if hee ſhould attempt to make any euaſion. But whileſt the enemie watcht his time, and the Venetian continued to attend on him, the Venetian Gallies were greatly moleſted by the enemies Archers, in ſuch ſort as the Marriners like deſperate perſons cried out, that they were of neceſſitie to diſlodge, vnleſſe they would haue them which were in the Gallies, to die before Chioggia. Thoſe likewiſe which were in guard on the ſhore, fearing that Carrario would ſend his troupes to aſſaile them on their backs, intreated that they might raze the Fort and depart thence. Piſani exhorted and intreated them all to haue patience for a while, and that it could not be long ere Carolo Zeno would arriue; and that then being ſtrengthened with Men and Gallies, they would eaſily daunt the enemies boldneſſe.

The Venetian attempts to hinder the Genoueſes eſcape.

Piſani exhorteth his murmuring ſouldiers.

The like deſpaire was in the Princes Armie. For cold and hunger, and the danger of arrowes which were continually ſhot into the gallies had ſo daunted them, as the ſouldiers with thoſe which were in the Hauen, thought more on flight, than on reſiſtance. The Princes preſence onely, and intreatie did ſtay them, who laid before them the great diſgrace, and euident danger which their countrey was like to incurre if they departed thence without effecting ſome worthie enterprize: That without doubt the Genoueſes would purſue the Venetians at the heeles, if they diſlodged from before Chioggia, and comming more furiouſly than before to aſſaile their Citie alreadie in a manner loſt by famine, they would in ſhort ſpace take it.

The great reſpect which the ſouldiers did beare to the Princes preſence.

But neither entreaties, nor exhortations could perſwade the ſouldiers, who were wholly daunted, to continue the ſiege, ſo as at laſt they reſolued within two daies to raiſe their campe from both places: But Zeno on a ſodaine, as if he had beene ſent from Heauen, about noone entred the Hauen of Chioggia with foureteene gallies well armed.

The Senate on the firſt of Ianuarie, ſo ſoone as they deſcried him on the maine ſailing directly towards the Citie, about three of the clock after noone, ſent to commaund him to go and meete with the Prince, who lay before Chioggia. His comming was no leſſe acceptable than needfull. The ioy and welcomes were great in both Armies, but much more when they vnderſtood by his ſpeech that he had ſunke threeſcore of the enemies veſſels of all ſorts, and that he had taken in the great Barze called Pichinione, and in the reſt more than three hundred Genoa marchants, not accounting the rowers and marriners, and gotten a bootie more in value than three hundred thouſand crownes. But becauſe their buſineſſe at that time required no long delay, Zeno was forthwith commaunded to goe to Brondolli with twelue gallies to meete Piſani.

His arriuall brought great contentment to the Venetians, who wept for ioy. The Garriſon which was on the ſhoare perceiuing the arriuall of their gallies, tooke courage alſo. At the ſame time three gallies of Candie, and one of Arba came to the Prince: Whereupon the Venetians ſeeing their Armie to conſiſt of two and fiftie gallies, did no more feare the enemies attempts. Carolo reſolued to lie at Anker without the Hauen, and not to enter before night: But a ſodaine tempeſt ariſing before ſun-ſet, he returned with fiue gallies to the Prince, hauing winde and tide with him. Thadeo Iuſtiniano who had remained ſtill with the ſeuen, hauing been grieuouſly toſſed, loſt two gallies, one neere to the Fort which was broken on the Sea-banks, & the other neere to the mouth of Po. Carolo being ſent back again with nine gallies to Piſani, entred the Hauen as he was commanded & ioyned with him. Two gallies were placed as ſentinels neere to the place, where the enemies would haue eſcaped.

Two and fiftie gallies in the venetians Army by Sea.

Carolo Zeno arriueth in the hauen of Chioggia.

The Genoueſes faining to eſcape by night, came and aſſailed one of thoſe two gallies, and by the helpe of the Garriſon of Brondolli drew it on ſhore. Thoſe within it feeling themſelues to be drawne forwards by cables and yron chaines, did preſently leape into the Sea, hoping to ſaue themſelues by ſwimming, but being kept downe by the waues, they were all drowned, and those who strooue against the waues were slaine by the enemie. Giouanni Miani Captaine of the galley was taken with a rich booty. For this galley Carolo had brought home from his voayge.

The enemie being proud of this exploit, would needs attempt to get forth: For he certainly knew that so great a multitude of people shut vp in a place, would soone be famished if speedie meanes were not found to separate them. Whereupon the Garrison which was at Lupa neere to the hauen, which the Venetian determined to assaile; and the other which ment to escape at Brondolli, came at one time to encounter the Venetian. They fought fiercely in both places, and the Genoueses were repulsed with great losse; but much more at Lupa than at Brondolli. The Venetian after all these attempts, to take all hope of escape from the Genoueses, caused two great ships of burthen to be brought from Venice, and sanke them with an yron chaine in that place, (though verie streight) which remained open to the Genoueses. Then they placed fiue gallies for the guard of the passage commaunded by Francisco Bocolli, in which place before there were but two. Carolo Zeno was commaunded to keepe neere to the Fort with seuen gallies; and fiue others were placed in the way to Bebia: Victor with the residue of the Armie encamped neere to Saint Blase his Church.

A new fight with the enemie.

The venetians attempt to hinder the enemies escape.

In these places they remained all day: in the night they came neere to Brondolli, and set boats in sentinell, to the end they might be soone aduertized if the enemie remoued. Such was the state of the Venetians affaires at Brondolli, when in the meane time three Venetian gallies, sent with forces from the right hand, assailed Loretta, which in few daies was recouered and manned with a strong Garrison: in like manner the new Tower which had beene burnt at the Genoueses first arriuall, was repaired and manned with souldiers for the guard thereof.

Loretta recouered.

About the same time that Loretto was recouered, the Tower of the Monasterie of the Nunnes which the enemies possessed neere to to the Hauen, being shaken with a sodaine stroke of a Peece of batterie, was for the most part ouerthrowne, where Pietro Doria Generall of the Genoueses Armie was crushed in peeces. Some say that he was slaine as he was putting his vessels in order of battaile, and that (he being dead) the Fort was abandoned, and the vessels left to the mercie of the fire. And that thereupon the victorious Venetian pursued the enemie in his flight as farre as Chioggia, and that there they fought againe before little Chioggia: whereupon the Genoueses being againe vanquished with great slaughter, and hauing lost the one halfe of the bridge, they retired confusedly into the Citie: that the same day likewise more than sixe hundred Genoueses were taken, and almost as many slaine, of whom besides Doria of whom we now spake, Thomaso Goti a man of great repute, was buried in the ruines of the bridge. But Chinatio setteth downe the matter otherwise, whom herein we rather follow as we haue done in other matters. He saith that all that which we haue spoken of, did not happen in one day, but at sundrie times: that both the enemies fleets did neuer lie so neere one to the other, nor did neuer so much hurt one another with arrow-shot. It is reported that no day passed wherein aboue fiue hundred great stones were not flung forth of brazen engines from one campe to the other, with great slaughter and hurt.

The death of the Genoueses Generall.

In the meane time they were not lesse infested neere to the Citie. For they skirmished daily neere to little Chioggia, as occasion serued. The Genoueses being shut vp in this manner, men began to come to Venice by the riuer of Po, from La Marca, Romagnia, and Ferrara. By meanes whereof the dearth of victuals soone ceased. The price whereof had beene so high, as the Citie was almost brought to the last extremitie. For corne was solde at the same time, at a fourefold rate, and so likewise all other necessaries.

Great scarcitie of victuals in Venice.

The Paduans by stealth in small couered boates carried victuals to the besieged. The Senate to reenforce the troupes which were before Chioggia, leuied fiue thousand foot: The Genoueses for their last attempt, would trie if by any cunning they could could put their Armie forth which lay at Brondolli, ſeeing by force they could not doe it. VVherefore hauing drawne a great and broad trench from the Fort, euen to the ſhoare, they were in great hope to be able in the darkneſſe of the night vnknowne to the Venetians to put forth to Sea, whereupon twentie gallies made account to get forth in that place, whom they thought to be ſufficient to moleſt the Venetians coaſt, and chiefely the Citie of Venice, ſo as they being at Sea, the Venetian ſhould be enforced whether he would or no to raiſe his campe. But the Venetian hauing diſcouered the enemies deſigne, all the ſouldiers thereabouts were ſent for to the Princes campe, where they reſolued to aſſault Brondolli at one time by Sea and land.

The Genoueses designe to get forth.

All the forces in a manner being reduced into one bodie for this purpoſe, there aroſe a quarrell betwixt the Italians and the mercenarie ſtrangers which were in the campe: who falling to blowes, diuers in a moment were ſlaine, and it would greatly haue endangered the Armie, had not the Princes comming ſodainly appeaſed the matter. This tumult, with the feare likewiſe, leaſt the enemie ſhould draw his trench euen to Brondolli, cauſed the Venetians to make haſt, and not to tarrie for Iohn d'Agons a wiſe and valorous Frenchman, whom in his abſence they had named for their Generall by land. Carolo Zeno being ſent with the reſidue of the forces which remained round about Brondolli, was commanded to bring thoſe troups which had ſtill laine encamped vnder the publike enſignes before the Citie neere to the ſhoare, to aſſaile the Fort of the Genoueſes, who was thought to be a Captaine better experienced on the land than ſea.

Tumult in the venetian Army.

Iohn of Agons a French man.

Piſani was alreadie commaunded carefully to attend the ſignall: and that ſo ſoon as he ſhould be aduertized that his fellows fought at Brondolli, he ſhould likewiſe come on the other ſide, and that hauing brought his gallies as neere as poſſibly he could, he ſhould land his troupes, and aſſaile the enemie on that ſide next to the Port. All things were readie for the aſſault of Brondolli, when as the exploit falling out fortunately at little Chioggia made them to alter their determination. For the Venetian fearing that the enemie would come on their backs, would firſt before they went to Brondolli aſſaile the Fort which the Genoueſes held in that place: The troupes marching on to this end, were hardly come to the Tower, when as on an inſtant the Genoueſes as though they had beene called by a certain ſignal, cauſed all thoſe which were at Brondolli to come to Chioggia, ſauing a few who were leſt for the guard of the place, who were commaunded to march in battell, and to aſſaile the Venetians on their backes, whileſt they ſhould be buſied in the fight, and that they on the other ſide would ſally forth of the Citie, and giue a furious onſet on the enemie: herein being guided after the common ſaying, That it is better to fight with the enemie in a ſet battell, than by a long ſiege to bee brought to all extremitie.

It is ſaid that fifteene hundred came forth of Brondolli, and about eight thouſand from the Citie. The Garriſon of Brondolli came with great noiſe, as iſſuing from an ambuſh, and fell vpon the Venetians. Zeno brauely receiued them, and the fight was verie cruell. At the firſt they ſhot ſuch great ſtore of arrowes from both ſides, that the aire was darkned as with a great cloud. The noiſe which was heard from the ſhoare, and from the ruines of little Chioggia, together with the claſhing of Armour filled euerie place with terror: in which fight the number of the dead was great, but that of the wounded much greater.

The Genoueſes come and aſſaile the venetians in ſet battaile.

In the meane time that great ſquadron of eight thouſand men came forth of the Citie, and came forward in a cloſe battallion like a torrent vpon the Venetian, who was buſied in fight with the firſt commers. Zeno likewiſe turning towards them, did valiantly ſuſtaine their firſt attempts, and was alreadie enforced to fight on both ſides, when deſiring to be ridde of the one, that he might intend the other, he came with greater furie againſt thoſe of Brondolli, towards whom giuing backe by little and little, and almoſt halfe vanquiſhed, the cauallerie ſpeedily marched, who finding ding them to be ſpent and tired in the fight with the footmen, did eaſily breake and put them to flight with great ſlaughter. Diuers caſting themſelues into the water neere to S. Katherines Church were drowned, as well becauſe they could not ſwim, as by the weight of their Armour.

The Garriſon of Brondolli broken and defeated in the fight.

The victorious Venetian being freed on that ſide turned all his forces againſt the ſquadron of the Citie, which being amazed at the miſhap of their fellowes, had alreadie begun by little and little to giue backe. Againſt theſe being of themſelues diſordered, the Venetian furiouſly marched. The enemies being then affrighted, looſing their iudgement with their rankes, perceiuing fortune to be contrarie, beganne openly to flie: euerie man ſhifting for himſelfe, endeuoured to get ouer the bridge fearing if he ſhould be ſhut forth to be murthered by the enemie: thoſe that were laſt were worſt dealt with. Diuers were ſlaine in the flight, but manie more neare to the bridge: which not being able to beare ſo manie armed men together, and ſodainely breaking in the middeſt, drew diuers with it into the ruines. Thoſe which fell with the bridge and their Armor into the water, did all periſh, ſome on their owne Iauelings, and others by ſtones which fell vpon them, but the number of ſuch was greateſt who by the weight of their Armour ſincking into the bottome of the water, were neuer after ſeene. More than a thouſand who were ſhut forth of the bridge, were cut in peeces, and diuers likewiſe caſting their weapons from them were taken priſoners. Thoſe who were on the farther ſide of the bridge being purſued with arrow-ſhot were enforced to yeeld. The Venetians committed the keeping of the fort that the enemies Souldiers had builded in that place, to Giacomo Rouccio a valiant Captaine. The Tower which before the battaile was begunne to be aſſailed, did likewiſe preſently yeeld.

The great loſſe which the Genoueſes ſuſtained that day.

Foure hundred Genoueſes were taken at the ſame time, among whom were diuers gentlemen: with a thouſand enſignes of the Paduans and Genoueſes.

The night after the battaile, the Genoueſes that were at Brondolli hauing ſet fier on their Gallies retired in great amazement to Chioggia. So ſoon as Victor had notice of the enemies flight, he preſently drew neere with his Gallies, where he ſaued two Gallies of Genoa from the fier, ten of them being burnt, and the reſidue drawne to Chioggia a while before. Diuers Paduans and Genoueſes fearing that if the Venetian ſhould ſhut vp al the paſſages, they might not then depart when they would, did the ſame night retire with great ſilence to Padua. The next day Victor entred into Brondolli, where hee had intelligence by certaine ſpies, that tenne Genoa Gallies ſtrongly Armed, lay not far from thence for the guard of the Mills, whither he preſently ſent certaine ſmall boates, to diſcouer whether it were ſo or no. But the Genoueſes deſcrying them, and beeing terrified with the newes of the loſſe of their Armie, left their Gallies, and leaping into the water eſcaped by ſwimming to the next ſhoare, by meanes whereof theſe Gallies without any reſiſtance at all were poſſeſſed by the Venetians, which to the great ioy of the people, were brought to Venice. Some Authors ſay, that they were but fiue, and that foureſcore of the enemies were taken in them.

Piſani entreth into Brondolli.

Ten Genoa Gallies taken.

Carolo Zeno, hauing by the Princes commandement drawne his troupes from the leſſer Chioggia, came and encamped before the Hauen of the Citie, by the way which leadeth to Brondolli, neere to Saint Francis Church, where he cauſed his Souldiors to make a great Trench. The Genoueſes then perceiuing that they were more ſtreightly ſhut in, did put all the women and children, with other vnprofitable eaters forth of the Citie. Prince Contareni ſent that wretched companie to Venice. Beſides, the Venetian incloſed all the paſſages from the firme Land to Chioggia, with ſtronge rampiers. Piſani likewiſe by building a Tower and a rampier at Brondolli, did within a month make the Hauen ſo ſtrong, as leauing a few troupes for the guard thereof, he brought thence his Armie out of all feare and danger. The ſiege ſtill continued till Chioggia was recouered.

The Genoueſes put all vnprofitable eaters forth of Chioggia all paſſages leading to Chioggia are ſhut vp. Piſani fortifieth Brondolli.

In the meane time, vpon report that a new Armie was prouiding at Genoa, and that that of a certaine Prince Carrario made great preparations of Armor and ſhipping, and perceiuing beſides, that they ſhould not ſpedily recouer Chioggia, the Senate to preuent the like ſcarcitie of victuailes, as that wherewith the Citie was a while before afflicted, decreed that certaine ſhips of burthen ſhould be ſent into Apulia to fetch corne, and that Thadeo Iuſtiniano with twelue Gallies ſhould be their conuoy. He ſailing towards Hiſtria did without any great difficultie recouer Grada, where ſurpriſing diuers Foriani, he ſent them all bound to Venice. Hee departed thence with a faire wind, and came to Manfredonia, where he had intelligence that the Genoueſes Armie was not farre off, being commanded by Maruffo Doria; hee preſently ſent backe thoſe ſhippes which he had laden with corne: Soone after, the enemie approaching, he cauſed the other ſhippes to bee ſuncke in the Hauen to the end the Genoueſes ſhould make no vſe of them, and himſelfe with ſix Gallies (for the reſt were gone a forraging) returned towards Venice. But a terrible tempeſt ariſing, cauſed him to returne to Manfredonia, where (becauſe the enemie was at hand) he cauſed all his Gallies to be diſarmed, and their tackling and furniture to be caried into the Towne, which done, he ſuncke them in the Hauen. Then barricadoing his troups on both ſides the entrie of the hauen, to the end they might fight in couert, he reſolued to hinder the enemies entrance. Some ſay that Guido Foranenſis the Cities Gouernour, counſelled Thadeo to leaue the Hauen and to retire with his troupes into the Citie, but that he would by no meanes doe ſo.

Iuſtiniano it ſent to Apulia for forrage.

The Genoueſes aſſaile Iuſtiniano at Manfredonia.

At the enemies firſt arriuall, there was a cruell fight for two houres ſpace: then both ſides made a pauſe whilſt they refreſhed themſelues, & ſoone after they returned to the combate with greater furie. The Hauen had been brauely defended, if the Venetian had not beene enforced to fight neere together, and in a round figure, by reaſon that ſome of the enemies were landed, they neuertheleſſe for a while brauely ſuſtained all their aſſaults: But being beaten thence by the enemies great multitudes, they fled. The Citie beeing not farre off was the cauſe that the ſlaughter was no where elſe but in that place where they skirmiſhed. Thadeo with a hundred of his Souldiors were taken by the enemie.

Iuſtiniano taken by the Genoueſes

The Genoueſes hauing broken as much of the ſunke Gallies as appeared aboue water, ſailed to Ficulan, where ſix other Venetian Gallies were reported to be, fiue of which by the enemies raſh entrance eſcaped and came to Venice, and the other being not ſo ſwift as the reſt, was taken. The ſlaues of thoſe Gallies which were loſt at Manfredonia, came to Chioggia by Land. Where, at the verie ſame time as all this happened farre from Venice, the Venetians fought with good ſucceſſe on the Lakes, with foureſcore of the enemies veſſells, eight of which were taken, and the reſidue beeing put to flight retired with great feare to Chioggia. But the aſſault which was within a while after giuen to the Genoueſes Fort at the Mills was not ſo fortunate. For the Venetian was not only ſhamefully beaten thence, but the ſonne of Lodouico Loretano a valorous yong man, with diuers other Venetians of note were there ſlaine. The Venetians comming againe the morrow after to enuiron the Fort, the Paduan Armie (which Chioggia being beſieged had remained there, intending to paſſe ouer into the firme Land, ſo ſoone as the Venetian Gallies ſhould not be able to ſtirre for want of water) was onward on their iournie in the Lakes, ſo as whilſt the Venetians were buſied in the fight, newes was brought them that the Paduans were eſcaped towards the firme Land. Whereupon they gaue ouer their enterprize, and croſſing the Lakes they made haſt to ouertake the enemie, whom on a ſodaine neere to the ſhoare they defeated and put to flight.

A great fight on the lakes.

The Venetians repulſed from the Fort of the Mills.

The Paduans defeated and put to flight.

The enemies eſcaping into the neighbour Mariſhes, all their veſſells to the number of foureſcore were taken, & with them threeſcore priſoners, among whom were diuers Genoueſes, They were not idle in Zenos Campe, for they ſtill fought as occaſion was offered. The enemies beginning to want victualls, the Soldiours firſt, & then the Genoueſes, craued that they might depart from Chioggia with their goods; the which was flatly denied to either of them.

Demands of the beſieged.

Not

The Venetians propoſitions to the beſieged.

Not long after, the Venetians hauing intelligence that the Genoueſes Armie was arriued in Dalmatia, and of the preparations which Carrario made on the frontiers to relieue his aſſociates, and to raiſe the ſiege; ſent word to the beſieged, that whoſoeuer would haue their liues ſaued ſhould forthwith leaue Chioggia (for the Hiſtorians mention no ſet time) and come and yeeld their bodies at the Priſon gates in Venice, otherwiſe they ſhould not expect any mercie.

The reſolution of the beſieged.

It is reported that the enemie did ſo contemne this propoſition, as not one among all their great number would embrace it. They had beene aduertized of the comming of their Armie, and therefore hoping that the ſiege would ſoone bee raiſed, they reſolued ſtill to hold out, and to endure any extremitie rather than to yeeld. The Senate did ſet forth fiftie light veſſells to reſiſt the Paduans attempts, for they were to fight on the lakes. They did afterwardes cauſe fiue and twentie Gallies to come to the Citie, which ſhould be oppoſed againſt the enemie, if he had made any approch.

The Genoueſes Armie calleth the Venetians to the fight.

On the fourth of Iune about three of the clocke after dinner the Genoueſes Armie preſented it ſelfe before the Hauen of Chioggia, being three and twentie Gallies in number. They came within a mile of the Citie, and with great cries called the enemies to fight. But the Venetians not ſtirring at all, made themſelues readie to receiue the enemies aſſaults: And in another place great number of light boates kept watch on the lakes to diſcouer the Paduans proceedings. The Genoueſes perceiuing that they could not draw the Venetians to fight, retired to the Foſſoni, from whence they daily came to challenge the Venetians with reprochfull ſpeeches. Yet neuertheleſſe Prince Contareni and the other Captaines continued ſtill firme in their reſolution, by no meanes to fight. And yet they ſent forth certaine ſmall boates which by their ſwiftneſſe did greatly moleſt the enemies Gallies.

The Genoueſes dare not attend the Venetians.

Piſani at the laſt contemning the enemies ſmall number, did by the Princes permiſſion ſallie forth of the Hauen with fiue and twentie Gallies, and being come ſomwhat forward at ſea, he did on a ſodaine turne the prowes of his Gallies vpon the enemie at Foſſoni. The Genoueſes durſt not attend them, but hauing retired the Armie, they did on a ſodaine flie towards Ancona; but the Venetian without the Princes commaundement would not purſue them verie farre, fearing to leaue the ſiege,

The beſieged at the ſame time would needs attempt one meanes more to eſcape, hauing for the purpoſe made a hundred ſmall boates of the wood of houſes, each of which had tenne oares. They had determined (for their fleet within few daies after was returned to their olde place of abode) that ſo ſoone as their Gallies ſhould approach the Hauen, and with their great vſuall noiſe make all men attentiue to behold them (for they had receiued new ſupplies from Genoa and Dalmatia) three of their Gallies ſhould come as neare as they could to the ſhoare right ouer againſt the leſſer Chioggia. And in the meane time thoſe within the Towne ſhould come forth by the inner channells which lead to the port Mariana and the leſſer Chioggia, and being come to the Sea, ſhould goe aboord the Gallies: Granello of Pera was the Conductor of this enterprize. Hee when all things were readie, gaue a ſignall to his people to come forth. Thoſe of Zeno's Campe hauing diſcouered the matter, did ſpeedily aduertize the Prince that the enemie was readie to depart. Diuers light boates were forthwith ſent to hinder their comming forth, who hauing croſſed the water, and being come to the place where the enemie was alreadie come forth, did on a ſodaine ſo affright them, as in a moment they were defeated. Fiftie of their boates were taken, diuers of them were ſlaine, and foureſcore priſoners taken with Granello their leader, and the reſidue by flight eſcaped into the Citie

The Venetians ſodaine arriuall hinders the enemies eſcape.

Blondus ſaith that the Genoueſes made an attempt to cut a ſunder the chaine which croſt the ſunke Argoſeis at the entrance of the Hauen, at which time Maruffo the Generall of their Armie came at the floud, and gaue in vpon the Venetian tian Gallies and that the skirmiſh being begunne, hee buſied the Venetian in fight, whileſt his people tooke away that hinderance: but that both their attempts proued vaine. For thoſe who would haue come forth, and thoſe likewiſe who came and aſſailed them at their backes, were in ſuch ſort beaten by the Engines of warre and by arrow-ſhot, as they were baſely enforced to flie.

The enemies are euery where ill intreated.

The Genoueſes being daunted with the loſſe of their people returned to their vſuall aboade. Thoſe in the Citie perceiuing that neither their owne attempts nor thoſe of their fellowes did any whit auaile them, did ſet all the priſoners at libertie, and bringing them to the Citie gates, ſent them to the Campe. It is thought that they did it for feare, leaſt if they ſhould haue died in priſon, they themſelues in like manner falling afterwardes into the enemies power might receiue the ſelfe ſame puniſhment.

The Genoueſes pollicie to get forth of the Citie in deſpite of the Venetians.

Then they tried another means to get forth. They ſent meſſengers to the Captains in Zeno's Campe, who promiſed them all the gold, ſiluer, and Armour of the Genoueſes with the Citie to boote, on condition that the Venetians would permit them to depart thence home to their houſes without any harme at all. To this forme of yeelding they did all hearken; But Zeno oppoſing it, did aduertize the Prince thereof by an expreſſe meſſenger. Pietro Hemo his Counceller was forthwith ſent thither, for beſides diuers things which would haue beene taken from them by this kind of yeelding, the Venetians ſhould haue receiued a great diſgrace, if the Genoueſes their ancient and Capitall enemies being with great danger and trauaile brought to all extremitie ſhould haue eſcaped from them without puniſhment. By Hemo his aduice then it was concluded, that the ſpoile of the Citie ſhould bee giuen to the Souldiers, and that as manie as tooke the enemies paie ſhould become their priſoners; and the Genoueſes, Paduans, Forlani, Dalmatians, and Greekes, being more apt to tug an oare than to beare Armes, ſhould with the Citie fall to the Venetians ſhare. The Captaines being by theſe Articles put in minde of their dutie, did promiſe and ſweare to Zeno, that they would neuer againe accept of the Genoueſes offers, nor in any ſort harken to their meſſengers, entreaties, or promiſes whatſoeuer. The matter being thus appeaſed, Roberto de la Marca, who held a very honourable place in the Armie, continuing ſtill wilfull in his opinion that the Genoueſes offers ſhould bee accepted, did labour all hee might to haue it done, til being brought into Zeno's preſence, hee was by a generall conſent committed to priſon, and two dayes after being conuicted of treacherie was hanged at Venice: and thus by the death of one only man the whole tumult was appeaſed.

An in what conditions the Genoueſes deſignes were broken.

Roberto de la Marca is hanged at Venice.

The Genoueſes firſt deſigne prouing vaine, they endeuoured ſtill to raiſe ſome ſedition in the Campe, as they had done at the beginning, by making greater offers to the Souldiers. But the Captaines ſent their meſſengers to Zeno, aſſuring them that the Genoueſes liues and deaths were in his and the Venetians hands, and that they were to entreate and beg their liues of them, and to vſe no more meanes to the Souldiers, for both they and their Captaines, were at the commaund of Carolo, into whoſe preſence they being come, they could by no meanes change his determinat on.

A diſcreet anſwere of the mercenarie Captaines to the enemies.

Hauing then loſt all hope, falling to teares and entreaties, they ſent the chiefe of all their troupes to the Prince, who weeping and falling at his feete, entreated him for the loue of Almightie God, and in pittie of their calamities, to take commiſeration of their preſent miſerie; confeſſing that they had till then like enemies executed diuers enterpriſes againſt the Venetians, as well by Sea sa Land, but that it was only for dominion, and not for greedineſſe of mens liues: which might bee eaſily teſtified, in regard that during the warres all priſoners on both ſides, had beene oftentimes redeemed or exchanged, and ſometimes likewiſe by conuention ſet at libertie: Namely that lately at the taking of Chioggia, not any one was iniuried by them, that were found without Armes, except ſome few, who by the raſhneſſe and follie of ſome particular perſons, and not by the generall conſent of all all men, had beene slaine. And that besides, they had neuer refused to giue anie man his life that had requested it. That victualls beginning to growe scarce, they dismissed their prisoners, fearing least they should be famished in Prison. They did not denie but that they had tried all meanes before they wou'd yeelde; which neuertheless they had not done so much for any hatred they did beare to them, as because they would not bee counted Bisonians and cowards among their Countriemen. And that now being vanquished rather by famine than by Armes they did not request to carrie away with them their owne gold, siluer, or moueables, but onely their liues: the which if it should bee denied to men vnarmed, and who did humbly craue it, would for euer bee accounted a deed both cruell and inhumane: Yet whatsoeuer should befall the Genoueses in this warre, they had next vnto God placed their hope in the meeknesse and mercy of the Venetians. They besought them then to bethinke what regard they meant to haue, to their prayers and teares, and lastly to their greiuous calamitie. For they could not beleiue, nor neuer would, though they should endure the vttermost extremitie, that they who had so many times felt the thwarts of aduerse fortune would forget the alteration of wordly affaires.

The Genoueſes on their knees at the Princes feet begge life.

The replie made vnto them.

To this there was no gentle replie made, but only that they might bee sure to bee soone imprisoned, and that then the Senate would at leisure determine of their life or death: That in the meane time, it was both iust and reasonable that those should remaine in darke captiuitie, who to obey their owne vnbridled passions, had lost their libertie. They were then commanded to depart, and to take heed least that by their owne fault they lost not the offer made vnto them, and that they should speedily dispatch what they had to doe. Being returned to the Citie they brought newes of nothing but sad calamitie, how the losse of their goods, imprisonment, and their liues were in danger, But being grieuously afflicted by famine (for there were some among them who of a long time had seene no bread) they resolued to yeeld howsoeuer rather than to die with hunger. Therefore setting vp an Ensigne on the highest Tower of the Citie, the Genoueses fleete came forthwith from their vsuall place of aboade into the Cities view, but the besieged did soone take it downe: whereat those of the Gallies being moued, sought by all meanes to encourage them: but they within the Citie returning them no signall for an answere, they were certainely perswaded, that both they and themselues were wholly vndone: whereupon, being sad and disconsolate they retired to the Fossoni.

Famine enforceth them to yeeld.

The Captaines in the meane time sent into the Citie to separate the mercenarie Souldiers from the Genoueses, and to put the richest bootie into a certaine place. Foure thousand prisoners fell to the Venetians, three thousand of whom were Genoueses, two hundred Paduans, a few Forlani, and the residue Dalmatians and Illirians with some Greekes, who were all brought prisoners to Venice. The Souldiers being disarmed, were let goe. The whole spoile being laid on a heape in Saint Maries Church was for the space of two daies sold to such as bid most: the monie was distributed among the Souldiers, and the Citie was by the Captaines yeelded to the Venetians. In this manner did the Venetians recouer Chioggia, ten months after it had beene taken by the Genoueses. Prince Contareni, Victor Pisani, Carolo Zeno, and the chiefe of the Armie entred it on the foure and twentieth of Iune: and hauing in all places erected the Venetian Ensignes, they brought home to the Common-wealth ninteene Genoa Gallies well armed, with diuers ships, and a meruailous great quantitie of salt.

The Venetians recouer Chioggia

The end of the sixth Booke of the second Decad.

THE SEVENTH BOOKE OF THE SECOND DECAD OF THE HISTORIE Of Venice.

The Contents of the ſeuenth Booke of the ſecond Decad.

THe Venetians recouer Bebia with all the other Forts on the Lakes ſoone after the reduction of Chioggia. The Thryeſtines reuolting take parte with the Genoueſes Cap-Hiſtra is taken by the enemies. The Genoueſes paſſing with their fleete before the Hauen of the Citie come into Hiſtria. The Venetians mightie Armie recouereth Cap-Hiſtria. The Genoueſes take Arba. VICTOR PISANI dieth at Manfredonia. CAROLO ZENO is made Generall of the nauall Armie. Treuiſo is a long time beſieged by the Carrarians. The Venetians attempt in vaine to relieue Treuiſo with men and victuals. The Venetians giue the Citie of Treuiſo to LEOPOLD Duke of Auſtria. CAROLO ZENO refuſeth to fight with the enemie on the Frontiers of the lower Sea. The great danger that the Genoueſes priſoners were in, vpon the newes that the Venetian priſoners were all ſlaine at Genoa. What great harme three Genoueſes Gallies did to the Venetians. LEOPOLD commeth into Italie with tenne thouſand horſe. Peace with the Genoueſes and their aſſociates by meanes of the Duke of Sauoy. The Venetian Dames relieue the Genoueſes priſoners with clothing and money for their iourney. Diuers who aboue the reſt had ſuccoured the Common-wealth during the warre, are made Senators.

CHioggia being recouered in this manner, the Venetians becauſe they would not ſtoppe the fortunate courſe of their victories, did forthwith ſend to beſiege the Fort of Bebia, thereby to make free paſſage for their Merchants who traffique into Lombardie. The Genoueſes in the meane time, diſlodging from all places neare to Venice, did neare to Corbolles ſet vpon diuers ſhips loden with corne, who tarried in that place till ſuch time as the Genoueſes Fleet were remoued (that they might with more ſafetie goe to Venice) the which at the firſt they tooke, and furniſhing their Gallies with corne for their owne prouiſion, they threw the reſidue into the Sea, and then ſailed into Hiſtria.

The Venetians beſiege Bebia.

The Genoueſes take certaine venetian ſhips laden with corne.

The Citie of Thryeſte at their arriuall (being before ſolicited by the Forlani) did reuolt from the Venetians. The Genoueſes placed a choice troupe of Archers for the guard thereof. The Thryeſtines hauing taken armes, did firſt of all ſeize on the Thryeſte reuolteth & yeeldeth to the Genoueſes

the Palace, then on the perſon of Lonato Troni Gouernour of the Citie, and impriſoned all the other Venetians, whom they firſt deſpoiled of their wealth. After that, they aſſailed both the Forts, (for there were few people in them) which within two daies yeelded, and were preſently razed downe to the foundations.

The Caſtles of Thryeſte are razed by the Inhabitants.

Prince Contareni hauing prouided for the affaires of Chioggia, left Carolo Zeno for the guard thereof, and making Piſani Admirall of the Sea, he returned to Venice where he was generally welcommed with ſignes of great ioy. The newes of the Thryeſtines rebellion being brought at the ſame time to Venice, did in ſome ſort interrupt their mirth. For at the Princes arriuall the Citie was troubled thereat: But on the very day of his entrie, other newes no leſſe diſtaſtfull arriued, how that Cap-Hiſtria was taken. It was reported of a certaine that the enemies Armie was ſo mightily encreaſed, as beſides the Gallies (which were fortie in number) they had diuers other ſmall boats of two ranks of Oares: and that the enemies after they had taken the Towne, had wholly ſpoiled it, certaine houſes of baniſhed men excepted, by whoſe means and trecherie they had ſurpriſed it, but that the Caſtle did ſtill hold out for the Venetians, into the which Criſpolino Azo of Treuiſo perceiuing the Citie to be loſt, had with certaine troupes entred.

Cap Hiſtria taken by the Genoueſes.

The loſſe of theſe two neighbour Cities, brought great diſcontentment to the whole Citie: And then the great Armie which the enemie was reported to haue, did much trouble the Senate. For it was very likely, that vnleſſe their Armie were as ſtrong as that of the enemies, the Genoueſes would in ſhort time become Maſters not only of Hiſtria, but of all the Venetian coaſt. Reſoluing then forthwith to leuie a mightie Armie, they tooke order that no day ſhould paſſe, but ſome Gallies ſhould be Manned and Armed.

The Senate much troubled with the loſſe of theſe two Cities.

But during theſe preparations at Venice, the Genoueſes hauing reſtored Cap-Hiſtria vnto the Patriarch of Aquileia, departed thence with their Gallies, and ſpeedily encamped before Brondolli, where ſo ſoone as they had viewed the fortification of Chioggia, and perceiued how all paſſages were ſhut vp from them, they ſailed towards the Citie. The Fleet remained in order of battaile for a time before the Hauen, but not with great aſſurance. For diuers light boats going ſpeedily forth of the Hauen, did greatly moleſt them by arrow-ſhot, and ſtones throwen forth of engines. But no ſigne of a battaile appearing, the Genoueſes returned towards Hiſtria, when hauing attempted to cauſe the Piarnes to reuolt, they did furiouſly aſſaile the Citie, becauſe the inhabitants and the Souldiers would not conſent thereunto: But being brauely defended, the enemie was with great diſgrace beaten thence.

Cap-Hiſtria is giuen to the Patriarch of Aquileia.

The Genoueſes fleet before the Hauen of the Citie.

The enemies Armie before Piarna.

The Genoueſes did likewiſe at the ſame time aſſaile Parenza, but their attempts as well there as at Piarna were to no purpoſe. The enemie departed thence, and came to the Frontiers of the Carnori where they trimmed their Gallies in the Hauen of Marran.

The Venetians did at the ſame time recouer the Fort of Bebia. It is certaine that the ſiege laſted for a while: for threeſcore Genoueſes were within it, who at the firſt did valiantly defend the place, but when they perceiued the Venetians who were entred into their defences, to beate downe the Fort, thirtie of the beſieged by ſwimming ouer the Riuer eſcaped, and fled to Padua: Thoſe which continued within, hauing valiantly defended it were either all ſlaine or taken: Thoſe likewiſe who kept the Tower would neuer yeeld till they perceiued it to be ſet on fire.

Bebia recouered.

Bebia being recouered, all the other Forts and Townes which are in the Lakes or at the mouthes of Riuers, were recouered by the Venetians, Cap-darger excepted which was held by Carrario. On theſe termes ſtood the Venetians affaires, when on a ſodaine newes was brought that the Genoueſes had taken Pola, and burnt it for the moſt part. This cauſed the Venetians, ſooner than they had determined to paſſe ouer with a mightie Armie into Hiſtria: At their arriuall the enemie being Pola is taken by the Genoueſes.

The Venetian Armie in Hiſtria

danted,

danted, (for the report was that they had ſeauen and fortie Gallies, and manie boats of two rinckes of oares) hauing ſpoiled the Citie, did retire to Zara. The Venetians Armie being come into the Prouince, was forthwith encreaſed by many Gallies from the Piarnes, Parenzanes, and other inhabitants of Hiſtria, who had continued loyall to the Venetians, ſo as it amounted to an hundred warlike veſſels. The Venetians neuer had a better furniſhed nauall Armie, For euerie Gallie had fifteene men at Armes, beſides the rowers, Archers, and other mariners.

The Venetians haue a nauall Armie of one hundred veſſels.

Piſani commanded this mightie Armie. Caballa of Verona was there likewiſe, who had beene (as hath beene ſaid) at the beginning Generall of the Armie by Land. The Venetians being come into Hiſtria, ſent forth two Gallies in the euening towards Cap-Hiſtria, to diſcouer the ſtate of the Citie. Michaeli Delfino and Petrucio Maripetro commaunded thoſe two Gallies. Theſe being aſſiſted by the night, did breake the bridge which the Patriarch of Aquileia had made from the Citie to the firme Land. For being thus broken there was ſome likelihood that the Venetians being encamped before it, thoſe within could not hope for reliefe from any place. Diuers of the Bandetti who had bene the cauſe of the taking of the Citie, ſo ſoone as the bridge was broken did the ſame night eſcape to the firme Land, by the foordes neere to the Citie. By day-breake the reſidue of the Armie approched: the light veſſells went before being followed by the reſidue with great cries. Thoſe who kept the Caſtle would not looſe ſo faire an occaſion, but preſently making a ſallie vpon thoſe of the Citie, did ſo affright them as they preſently yeelded. Foure hundred Forlani were taken there, among whom were Nicolao Spilingbergo Gouernour of the Citie, and Simon Pampergino. The Citie in deteſtation of the Bandetti was wholy ſpoiled, and then left to the guard of the inhabitants who were not then (in regard of the miſerie of the time) verie many: they placed a good Garriſon in it to defend it with them, fearing leaſt the enemie ſhould againe ſeize on it, by reaſon of the ſmall number of the inhabitants.

The Venetians recouer Cap. Hiſtria.

Cap-Hiſtra being recouered, Piſani would haue directly gone to Pola, but that he tarried for an expreſſe commandement from the Prince and Senate, to knowe their pleaſures, whether they thought it fit that he ſhould paſſe with his Armie ouer the Fanaticke Gulphe: which being granted him, the Armie ſoone after drew neere to Pola. The Genoueſes in the meane time were not idle: For whileſt the Venetian Gallies remained at Cap-Hiſtria, they brought theirs to the Iſle of Scardona, neare to Liburnia, where they enforced Arba the chiefe Citie of the Iſland to yeeld, hauing for a time ſuſtained a ſiege. They yeelded on theſe conditions, That if the Inhabitants would deliuer to them all the Venetians which were in the Citie with Lodouico Contareni their Gouernour, the reſidue of the Inhabitants ſhould haue no harme. The Arbians did euer till then affect the Venetians, and had often beene beſieged during that warre, chooſing rather to endure all extremitie than to quit their obedience.

The Venetian Armie before Pola.

On what conditions Arba was deliuered to the Genoueſes.

Chinatius who more than any other Author hath curiouſly written the laſt Genoueſes warre, ſaith, that the Arbians did not for many daies eat any bread, liuing onely on fleſh and white meates: but that at laſt being daunted by the cruell aſſaults of the enemies, they yeelded on compoſition, not ſuch as they were reſolued to haue done, but on ſuch as they could obtaine of the enemie. The Genoueſes entring into it, left three Gallies for the defence thereof, and afterward departed thence.

This was done at Sea, at ſuch time as the Paduan came and beſieged Treuiſo, hauing builded two bridges on the Riuer, one at Caſal, and the other neerer the Citie, where Carrario in haſt had builded a Tower. He did reſolue at firſt, to tame the Venetian Souldiours & the Treuiſans by famine, by ſhutting vp all the paſſages of the Riuer, by which victuailes were brought from Venice thither. The Paduans Camp laie neare to the Tower from whence they made daily incurſions euen to the gates. The Townſ-men were beſides greatly tormented by the enemies peeces of battery.

The Paduans beſiege Treuiſo.

At this ſtay ſtood the Venetians affaires at Treuiſo, when Piſani being come neere to Zara, and hauing begun to batter the Hauen, vnderſtood by ſpies, that twelue Genoueſes gallies were a while before gone from thence into Apulia to fetch corne. Hauing intelligence hereof (notwithſtanding that he was ſicke of a Feuer which had held him from the fifth of Auguſt) becauſe he would not looſe ſo faire an occaſion, he departed from Zara and went after the enemies whome he ouertooke on the coaſt of Belligion, but the darkeneſſe of the night at their verie firſt encounter made him to looſe ſight of them. Catharino Corberio Captaine of one of the Gallies was ſlaine at their firſt meeting.

Piſani purſueth twelue Genoueſes Gallies into Apulia.

The Venetian hauing loſt the ſight of the enemie, retired to Manfredonia, where Victor ſonoe after dyed to the great griefe of the whole Armie. It is reported that neuer any man was better beloued of his Countrie-men, whereupon whileſt he liued they called him their Protector, & being dead they all bewailed him as their father. Lodouico Loretano commanded the Armie in his ſted till ſuch time as the Senate had prouided another. Piſani his bodie being brought to Venice, was with a great pompe brought by the Senate with a great concourſe of people to Saint Anthonies Churche. His Tombe is at this day to be ſeene neere to the high Altar, bewtified with Marble and guilding.

Piſani dyeth and is bewailed of all men.

There was neuer any funerall more followed with teares and ſighs than this, ſo greatly was he beloued of all men. The Senate gaue his place to Carolo Zeno, who was commanded to depart ſpeedily to the Armie, two Gallies being made ready for his conduct.

Piſani is honorablie buried at Venice.

Carolo Zeni is Generall of the Armie in his ſted.

But whileſt the Citie thought on this buſineſſe, the Venetians had not forgotten Treuiſo, where the paſſages being ſhut vp they were brought to all extremitie for want of victuailes, whereat the Senate being highly diſpleaſed, did attempt to open them and to ſend prouiſion to the beſieged. Therefore they made an engine of ſhippes which ſhould plucke vp all the Piles which had beene driuen into the Riuer, which was accompanied with foure and twentie Ganzarioles, and with diuers other veſſels well armed, with part of the troupes which were at Chioggia, and of thoſe which lay about the Hauen of the Citie: the managing hereof was committed to Marino Carrauall a diligent and valiant perſon, who had charge of the opening of the Riuer. The Paduans had planted athwart the Riuer of Silla from one ſide to the other, on that ſide neere to Crete, three ranckes of Piles ſo neere one to another, as it ſeemed to be a chaine. Sarrazino Dandulo commanded thoſe troups which were to bee conducted to Muſeſtra, by the ſhoare oppoſite to the enemie. Muſeſtra is within a mile of Caſal, where the enemie had a Fort. Being come to this place; this engin of ſhips well armed with all neceſſaries did ſodainely mooue towards the enemie, hauing for conuoy on the ſhoare a good troupe of Souldiours, and being come to the incloſure, they were buſied two full dayes, in plucking vp two ranckes of Piles, in which meane time they fought brauely with the enemie. There was nothing to be ſeene on both ſides but Arrowes and Dartes flying in the Aire. But the enemies brazen Peeces of batterie, did greatly endamage the Fleete, and chiefly the engine which pluckt vp the Piles, which being battered with many blowes was made vnprofitable, being in all parts full of leakes. Thoſe likewiſe who were on the ſhoare did continually ſhoot.

After what manner the Paduan had encloſed the paſſages towards Treuiſo.

The Paduan troups which beſieged the citie ran to Caſal at the Venetians firſt arriuall, vnder the conduct of Girardo Caminenſis, ſo likwiſe did all the Souldiors nere to Padua, who were called thither in haſt: by meanes whereof they often fought at Muſeſtra: but in euerie encounter, the enemie had ſtill the better. Diuers Venetians were ſlaine, but more taken, among whome was Iohn ſurnamed le Grand, a French man of a verie noble houſe: whereupon the fleete gaue ouer the enterprize, and retired to Muſeſtra. But the enemie, albeit he ſaw the Venetian gone, would not ſtand ſtill, but hauing ſtaked diuers trunkes of trees, and great peeces of timber, and other things which they abundantly found there in the mouth of the riuer, they ſhut vp the paſſage more ſtrongly than before.

The Venetians enforced to giue ouer the enterpriſe retire to Muſeſtra.

The

The Venetians perceiuing their encamping in that place to bee to no purpoſe departed thence ſome two houres before day, and came to Meſtra, to make triall whether they could relieue the Treuiſans by land, ſeeing by water they could not. Dandulo in the meane time fell ſicke, and was conſtrained to goe home to his houſe, in whoſe ſteed Pietro Hemo was ſent by the Senate. The fleete likewiſe ſo ſoone as the footmen were departed from Muleſtra, was brought backe to Venice. Now when the Venetian fleet was diſlodged, the enemie brought backe his troupes to the campe: Then, fortifying the Tower with men and victuals (for he had no other ſafe place of retreate) fearing ſome encombrance from the Venetians, who were encamped at Meſtra, he diſlodged, and in all haſt beſieged Noualla which he beganne forthwith to batter with his engines.

Noualla beſieged by the enemie.

Meane while the Treuiſans being at times relieued with victuals by thoſe of Meſtra, the dearth was in ſome ſort diminiſhed. For the ſcarcitie was ſo great in the Citie, as the ordinarie meaſure of corne was worth foure crownes, and in regard thereof, diuers of the common people did voluntarily abandon the Citie, the moſt part of whom retired to Venice. The enemie hauing no good ſucceſſe at Noualla, being wearied with ſo long a ſiege, and being out of hope to take the Citie, raiſed his campe, and returned to the Paduan territorie. Where becauſe winter drew neere, he diſpoſed his armie into diuers garriſons, and ſent them away to winter. This is all that was done on the firme land that Summer, and a part of Harueſt. At Sea Lauretano approached with the nauall Armie neere to Ancona, and afterwards ſailed into Hiſtria. But ſoone after, departing thence he tooke Breſſia and Senia on the frontires of Liburnia by aſſault which hee ſpoyled: howbeit through an vnfortunate fire at that time hapning in Senia, the whole bootie was almoſt conſumed.

Great dearth in Treuiſo.

Breſſia and Senia taken by Loretano.

At the report of the comming of this great Armie, the Goritani being affrighted forſooke the Citie, and retired with their wiues and children to the higheſt hilles in the Iſland. The Biſhop of the place came to the Venetians, and offered them the Citie, and humbly entreated Loretano, not to ſuffer his ſouldiers to commit any hoſtile actes in a Citie that yeelded. Whereupon there was no outrage done, not ſo much for preſent curteſie, as in regard of the faithfull friendſhip which the ancient Lords of that Iſland had borne to the Venetians, wherein they had by mutual offices ſtil continued, till ſuch time as king Lewis tooke all Dalmatia from them. From thence he came to Bocharis: which being taken by force, hee wholly burnt and ſpoyled it. Then he departed towards Pola, where by the Senates letters he was aduertized that Carolo Zeno was appointed Generall of the nauall Armie, whereat all men highly reioyced: For, beſides his valour, he was next to Piſani the moſt popular man. From Pola he came to Parenza, where in few daies after Zeno arriued.

What Loretano did after Piſani his death.

Zeno arriueth in the Armie.

Hauing muſtered the Galley-ſlaues, he found that many were wanting. Whereupon fearing that for want of rowers, he might incurre ſome danger, if he ſhould happen to meete the enemie, he diſarmed ſeuen of the formoſt gallies, and with their ſpoiles manned ſuch as had need, and being thus diſarmed (becauſe without rowers, they could not ſerue in the warres) he ſent them backe to Venice, into which Caballa of Verona entered with the troupes of the land-Armie, being called home by the Senate by reaſon of the warre of Treuiſo. Three of theſe gallies being come to Venice were preſently armed and giuen to Marco Phalerio for the defence of Romagnia, and La Marca. For the Genoa gallies making daily incurſions neere to Ancona, had in ſuch ſort turned the marchants from commerce with Venice, as the dearth began alreadie in the Citie. But Phalerio his arriuall reſtrained the enemies boldneſſe, whereupon the dearth ceaſed.

The paſſage at ſea being aſſured to the marchants, Phalerio by the Senates decree went with his gallies to Zeno in Dalmatia. The Armie after diuers paſſages to and fro through Hiſtria and the frontires of Dalmatia, not finding the enemie any where, was brought backe to Venice, about the first of Nouember, hauing done no memorable matter, leauing onely foure gallies to guard the Prouince.

Zeno besiegeth Marran a town of the Forlani.

VVithin a while after Carolo departed from Venice with three hundred small vessels well armed, and came and besieged Marrana a sea-towne of the Forlani. By the way hee met with threescore well armed vessels of the same sort, belonging to those of Grada and Piran, who came to him at the hauen of Lignana, wherewith hauing ioyned his owne, hee gaue a furious assault to the Citie: But, it being circled on euerie side with the Sea, and well fortified, their attemptes proued booteless: The Venetian hauing viewed the place, perceiued that he should but loose his labour. But because he would not seeme to depart thence for feare hauing brought his forces to the walles, for a while they fought fiercely: but at last diuers being hurt, Zeno retired without any further losse.

The Venetians treasure wholly exhausted.

The great expences of the warre had exhausted the publike treasure, when as the Senate being enforced by the dearth commaunded sixe Gallies, and sixteene boates with two rankes of Oares to be prepared to goe into Candie, to fetch thence the richest wares of certaine particular persons, to the end that they being sold by their consent, the money might be imployed for entertainment of the Armie, being lent for a time to the Commonwealth. At the beginning of the spring (for sooner they could not by reason of the tempestuous VVinter) the fleete went to sea vnder the conduct of Simonetto Michaeli. But I finde in the meane space that these preparations were made in Venice, That diuers light skirmishes were made on either side, as well on the Treuisan, as in Histria, and that they fought with different successe as aduantage was offered.

An vnworthie Act of a garrison for want of pay.

The Garrison which the Venetians held in Castell-Franco, hauing receiued no pay for certaine moneths, first chaced away Andrea Paradiso the Cities Gouernour, and afterwards assisted by the inhabitants receiued Carrario into their wals. This reuolt caused diuers others on the Treuisan shortly after to doe the like. The newes of this losse being brought to the Citie, another soone followed. For the Hungarians that were encamped on the mountaines, and who from thence did ouerrunne the Countie of Ceneda, had imprisoned Gulielmo Caminensis an associate of the Venetians, accusing them to haue, contrarie to the agreement, relieued during the warres, the townes of Sacilla, Cogniliana, and diuers others subiect to the Venetians, with victuals, and they demanded to haue the Hauen of Busatere deliuered to their hands, and that Caminensis with all his family should retire to Conigliana.

The Venetians are enforced to offer Treuiso to the Duke of Austria.

The Venetians affaires being in this sort brought to all extremitie on the firme land, and not knowing from whence to be supplied, either for victuals or money, to sustaine the charge of the warre, the Senate resolued to send to Leopold Duke of Austria, and in the Commonwealthes name to offer him the Citie of Treuiso, with her confines, which if the Paduans should not hereafter desist to molest, it was certaine that the Almaine would on a sodaine come into Italie with the greatest forces he could leauie, and that thereby the Commonwealth, being elswhere sufficiently busied with Sea-matters, should by forraine forces be eased of the warre on the firme land. Pantaleon Barba was by the Senates decree sent to the Duke.

In the meane time, aboue a thousand horse of those at Mestra for want of their pay went from the Venetians to the enemies side. Those who remained after the others departing, did in the night bring some victuals to Treuiso, and in their returne thence were surprized by the enemies ambush, whereupon, some of the horse being taken, and the residue put to flight, went first to Treuiso, and afterwards to the campe, so as all the troupes which were at Mestra, were in a short space brought to nothing. The Venetians being daunted with so many losses, sought meanes of agreement with Carrario, referring themselues to the arbitrement of Alberto d' Este. And to this purpose they sent vnto him Frederico Cornari, and Perrino Rotta, the one being his Procurator, and the other his Gosship, and ancient friend. But they could procure him by no meanes to deale in the businesse, so mischieuously nouſly at the ſame time were their neighbours bent againſt them.

And becauſe the report then was, that they were alreadie mounted on the carriages, the Venetians on a ſodaine made great Cauſies and Rampiers on the banks of Muſſiona, as men goe by water to Meſtra, thinking that all the enemies practiſes were wholly bent to ſurprize and inuade Meſtra. But his deſignes were elſewhere. For Carrario being come to Noualla, began furiouſly to batter it, and hauing broken downe the cawſies round about Moggiana, on which men went to Treuiſo, and placed a ſtrong Garriſon at the breach, hee tooke from the Treuiſans all hope of reliefe. The Garriſon in Treuiſo being aduertized of the Ambaſſade ſent to Leopold (for all men certainly beleeued that Pantaleon Barba was ſent to offer Treuiſo with her confines to the Almaine:) fearing in this alteration to be defrauded of their due, and hauing receiued no pay of a long time, they choſe Horatio Maleſpina a diſcreete perſon, to vndertake and debate the ſouldiers cauſe. They did all ſweare and promiſe to accept of agreement, truce, warre, peace, or whatſoeuer he ſhould conclude, ſaying, that at his command they would take and lay by Armes, ſo that he would onely take their cauſe in hand, and take ſuch order for them, as they might not beſtow ſo great labour and trauaile as they had endured for nothing. This Horatio being a wiſe and diſcreet Gentleman, came with all the Captaines to the Venetian Magiſtrate. Leonardo Dandulo was Gouernour of the Citie, Marco Zeni chiefe Iuſtice, and Andrea Venieri Prouidator, vnto whom it is ſaid, he ſpake in this manner.

The venetians hated of all their neighbours.

The garriſon of Treuiſo mutineth for want of pay.

Maleſpina his ſpeech to the Magiſtrates of Treuiſo.

IT is reported for certaine, my Lordes of Venice, that the Prince and Senate haue ſent to Leopold Duke of Auſtria, to offer him in the name of the Commonwealth the Citie of Treuiſo with her confines, the which which we may ſuppoſe, (if he be not ſenſeleſſe) that hee will willingly embrace. Who doubteth but that when he hath accepted thereof, he will ſoone come hither with forces, and commit the guard of the Citie to his owne ſouldiers? or (that which I can hardly beeleeue) if delaying to come, he ſhould afterward arriue in Italie too late, Carrario is heere, vnto whom whether we will or no, we muſt of force yeeld, he hauing ſhut vp all the paſſages, and taken all hope from vs as well of victuals as of ſouldiers: Now becauſe we are iealous of them both, & vnwilling to looſe ſo many monethes pay wich is due vnto vs, we haue determined, reſpecting the Venetian dignitie, & the faith of ſouldiers, to looke to our affaires in time, and gently to demaund our pay. And becauſe we will doe nothing raſhly, we are reſolued to containe our ſelues a while longer in our dutie, till ſuch time as one of you ſhall goe to Venice, to take order that our due be ſent vs. In the meane ſpace you may ſafely relie vpon vs. But heerein wee will endure no delay, nor haue the Senate advertized heereof by letters or meſſengers: one of your ſelues muſt needs goe thither, to the end all may fall out proſperouſly. Wee will expect the returne of him, whom ye ſhall ſend, ſo long time as we ſhall thinke to be ſufficient to prouide money: For there needeth no long determining in matters that are iuſt. The fault ſhall bee in you, if we be not ſuch hereafter as wee haue hitherto beene, or if yee enforce vs by injuries to commit ought againſt your profit and reputation. For we will keepe our faith and promiſe with you, euen ſo long as yee ſhall pleaſe.

This vnciuill demaund of the Souldiours greatly amazed the Venetians: for there was no man but eaſily knewe whereto their deſeignes tended. Albeit they made a gentle replie, yet euerie one fearing as much his owne particular danger as that of the Publicke, they concluded betwixt themſelues that Dandulo ſhould forthwith be ſent to Venice, to aduertiſe the Prince and the Senate on what tearmes the affaires of Treuiſo ſtood. Departing therefore by night ſomewhat farre off from the enemies Campe, he came with two truſtie friends by woody and by-waies to Muſeſtra and from thence to Venice. The Senate being aduertiſed in what danger Treuiſo was, reſolued by a common conſent to prouide money; but they were at a ſtand by what meanes ſafely to conuey it thither: For they could not do it without great danger, the enemie poſſeſſing all the paſſages; beſides, they had no forces readie to conuey it thither. Therefore they concluded to write to Zeno that he ſhould deale with the chiefe of the Citie, that ſome of them would in the Common-wealths name paie the Souldiours their due; ſaying that they were readie to make ouer the ſame ſumme into what Banco they pleaſed: But in regard of the length of the warre thoſe who were thought to be beſt monied, ſaid that they were ſo farre from hauing any ſummes of money lying by them, as on the contrarie they had not one pennie; that their continuall loſſes one vpon another, had in ſuch ſort ſtript them of all meanes, as they were in a manner readie to begge. Whereupon leauing the Townef men they delt with two ſtrangers who did put forth money to intereſt: who on the aſſurance of the Common-wealths word did preſently tell downe the money, and by this meanes the Souldiours were paied.

Dandulo goeth to venice about the ſouldiers demaunds.

The Garriſon of Treuiſo are paid their due.

But whileſt theſe things were done at Treuiſo, the enemie hauing aſſembled all his forces from diuers places, came and beſieged Aſil, where there was no great Venetian Garriſon. Franciſco Delfino Gouernour of the place, and thoſe that were with him, diſtruſting their ſmall number retired into the Caſtle. The enemie comming to beſiege them, hauing battered it with engins of warre, and vndermined it in ſundrie places, did in fiftie daies take it by force. Some ſay that eight and fortie of thoſe that were within it were ſlaine by the enemies arrowes and engins. But the Caſtle Walls and the tops of houſes being much ſhaken by the engins of warre: and beſides vtterly deſpairing of ſuccour, the Inhabitants who with the Gouernor were retired thither, vrged him to parley. Delfino being thereunto enforced, capitulated in this manner, That it ſhould be lawfull for himſelfe and as many as ſhould follow him, ſafely to depart thence with fiue and twentie waggons which the enemie ſhould furniſh them for the carriage of their ſtuffe and furniture. The Caſtle being in this ſort yeelded, Delfino going towards Venice, neere to Creſpiniano met with Leopolds troupes, who came to free them from the ſiege. Some Authors affirme, that at the ſame time Loſinaſtro Calderio Generall of thoſe troupes, was corrupted by Carrario: and thereupon he ſlackt his iourney, till ſuch time as hee imagined the Caſtle was yeelded. The Garriſon of Noualla likewiſe hauing expelled their Gouernour for want of pay, did yeeld vp the place to Carrario.

Aſil yeelded to Carrario by compoſition.

The Garriſon of Noualla for want of paiment yeeld it to Carrario.

The Tower of Corania being aſſailed at the ſame time by the enemie in the marſhes, was not onely brauely defended, but diuers Ganzarioles were taken from them and brought to Venice. Arcuano Buccecharino came at laſt from Prince Carrario with great forces and beſieged Treuiſo, lying incamped neere to the Church of the fortie Saints: Diuers and ſundrie exploits were made on both ſides, and at times more than fortie Horſe were taken from the enemie; which was the beſt atchieuement that was there performed.

The Citie of Serrauall followeth the example of Treuiſo.

The Citie of Serrauall following the example of the Garriſon of Treuiſo incurred the like danger. The Soldiers began to mutinie for certain moneths pay which was behind, and and on a ſodaine fell vpon Nicholao Vellereſſo the Gouernour, and ſeized on the Caſtle. Afterwards they diſpatched meſſengers to the Senate at Venice, to excuſe themſelues for what was done, laying all the fault on their want of victuailes and paiment, both of them hauing beene badly ſupplied to them, whereupon they had beene enforced whether they would or no, to enterpriſe nouelties; and withall demaunded their pay: which if within eight daies they might receiue, the Garriſon and the Caſtle ſhould continue obedient to the Venetians: or elſe, otherwiſe prouiding for themſelues they would let all men know, that there is nothing more dangerous for ſuch as make warre, than to detaine the Souldiours pay.

The Senates anſwere to the Garriſon of Serrauall.

The Senate was not greatly moued at theſe newes, being certaine that Pantaleon had alreadie made the offer: Yet neuertheleſſe fearing leaſt the inhabitants who had euer loued the Venetians, might thereby fall into ſome miſchiefe, they ſent them word, to vſe meanes in ſome ſort to content the Souldiours, to free themthemſelues from the danger which threatned them. Heereupon thoſe of Serrauall (for they were reſolued to endure all extremitie rather than to beare Carrario's tirannous yoake whom they extreamly hated) ſent Franciſco Lardonio to the Gouernour of Belluna, to requeſt him, That ſeeing by the Venetians offer made to Leopold, they were his vaſſalls, that he would defend them from the danger wherein they were: telling him that the Souldiours poſſeſſed the Caſtle, who demaunded their paie, which vnleſſe they might ſpeedily receiue, it was certaine that they would ſoone deliuer it to Carrario; whereuntoas the Tyrant had a long time aſpired, ſo hee would now doe any thing to obtaine his deſire: And that therefore it behooued him to make haſt, leaſt (as it often happeneth) ſome ſmall delaie might bring ſome great daunger to the wretched inhabitants.

The Gouernour who would not ſeeme to abandon their new ſubiects, forthwith cauſed money to be deliuered to the meſſenger, which was paid by Giacomo Spiritello of Belluna a man of exceeding great wealth, who did it for the Gouernors ſake. Chinatius ſaith, That three thouſand fiue hundred Crownes were ſent to Serrauall, which beeing giuen to the Souldiours, they did forthwith quit the Caſtle. This is that which was done on the Treuiſan: whileſt the Venetians (vpon report that the Genoueſes had newly taken Armes, and were alreadie departed from Genoa) fearing leaſt the Gallies which Simonetto had at the ſpring time carried into Candie ſhould be met with by the enemie, cauſed eight Gallies to be made readie, and to be giuen to Zeno, who was made Admirall for a yeare, who with them put out to Sea.

He firſt directed his courſe, as he was commanded, towards Candie to the ſuccour of his Countrimen. But going along the Coaſt of Dalmatia, he met with twelue Genoa ſhips, which he tooke and ſpoiled, and then burnt them. Soone after, neere to Morea, he eſpied a great ſhip of Genoa, loden with rich marchandize, which he tooke and ſent into Candie. From thence he ſailed towards the Promontorie of Mailles, where he reſolued to tarrie for the Gallies which returned from Candie: Within few daies after Simonetto came thither with tenne Callies: which were forthwith followed by the reſidue of his fleete, ſo as in few daies, he had thirtie Gallies. And becauſe the enemies Fleete which was not farre off, was reported to be but one and twentie Gallies: Zeno reſolued to leaue fiue Gallies at Modon with the marchandize, and with the reſidue to make towards the enemie.

Zeno taketh twelue ſhips of Genoa.

The Venetian fleet of thirtie Gallies.

Two daies after he deſcried the Genoueſes Fleete nere to Ionia, the which (auoiding the fight) he purſued in vaine all that day till night, when by reaſon of the darkneſſe he loſt ſight of it. The Venetian being come to Ancona, ſent ten Gallies for the guard of the Citie, and with the reſidue he determined to rauage the Riuer of Genoa, where hauing with good ſucceſſe croſſed the Adriatick, Ionian, and Tuſcan Seas, being entred on the enemies confines he deſcried ſix Genoa Gallies, to whom he gaue chace for a time. But hauing giuen ouer his purſute, he was likelie ſoone after to haue beene intrapped before Porto-uenieri by foure and twenty Genoa Gallies, who hauing intelligence of the Venetians comming into the lower Sea, were ſpeedily come from Dalmatia to reſiſt their attempts. Two Venetian Gallies which Zeno ſent forth to diſcouer, hardly eſcaped from the mouth of the Hauen: but making way by the ſtrength of their oares they ſoone came to their Fleete, which from thence went to Liuorna; then on a ſodaine they returned to Morea, where receiuing a new ſupplie of fiue Gallies from Lodouico Loretano, they ſailed againe towards the lower Sea, intending (as I thinke) to fight with the enemie if he could meete with him; if not, to ſpoile all the Coaſt-Townes on the Riuer of Genoa.

The Genoueſes fleet flieth.

The Genoueſes fleet of foure and twentie Gallies.

Whilſt the Venetian ranne thus vp and downe, the enemie was not idle. For, ſo ſoone as Carolo departing from Ancona, ſailed towards the Riuer of Genoa: hauing made readie ſeuen and twentie Gallies, he came and beſieged Cap-Hiſtria, which in a moment he tooke, ſpoiling and burning it for the moſt part. The Caſtle was defended tended by meanes of the Garriſon within it. But hauing intelligence that Zeno was gone to rauage the Riuer of Genoa, fearing that the Frontiers being without Garriſon, the Venetian might wholly ſpoile them, hauing left ſix Gallies in Dalmatia to moleſt the Venetians, he came ſpeedily with one and twentie to the reliefe of his Countrie. They were thoſe with whom the Venetians met (as hath beene ſaid) at Porto-uenieri, and which had like to haue ſurprized two of his Gallies.

Cap-Hiſtria taken by the Genoueſes.

Treacherie of 2. Captaines of the Garriſon of Conigliana.

Whileſt theſe things were done at Sea, on the Treuiſan Conigliana had like to haue beene taken by treacherie. Two Captaines of the Garriſon had intelligence with the enemie who had the guard of the Hill, aduertizing him to come in the night with ladders, which they ſhould without any reſiſtance reare againſt the wals, and ſo enter into the Towne. The enemies vnwilling to looſe ſo faire an occaſion, did not faile to come at the time appointed; and diuers of them were already come ouer the wall vnder the Tower, when thoſe aboue hauing deſcried the enemie, began on a ſodain to giue the alarme. At this noiſe all the Townesmen ran ſpeedily to the Caſtle, by whoſe aſſiſtance thoſe aboue who defended the place did beate the enemies from the walls with great ſlaughter. Twentie men at Armes were taken, and eight and twentie of the Traitours were apprehended: who beeing conuicted of the fact were hanged, to ſerue for an example to others.

The traitors puniſhed.

The Duke of Sauoy a mediator for peace.

About the ſame time the Biſhop of Verſeil, ſent by Amadeo Duke of Sauoy, arriued at Venice, and in his Maſters name requeſted the Senate to ſend Ambaſſadours to his Highneſſe, who greatly deſired to heare the deputies, as well of the Venetians, as the enemies, and maturely to vnderſtand the cauſe of their ſtrife, and that he would doe his beſt to attone them, and to procure a peace; ſaying that hee had already for that purpoſe ſent to Genoa, and would likewiſe ſend to King Lewis and their aſſociates, whom he did not doubt but that they would accept of peace.

Vpon this offer, Michaeli Moroſino, Giouanni Gradonico, and Zacharia Contareni were ſent Ambaſſadours to the Sauoyan, who accompanied the Biſhop: The Ambaſſadours beeing gone, the Senate were aduertized by letters from Pantaleon that Leopold had accepted the offer of the Citie of Treuiſo, whereupon the Duke ſent two Almain Gentlemen to receiue it of the Venetian officers: Theſe according to their Commiſſion did muſter the Souldiours of the Garriſon, and gaue them pay onely for one moneth, till Leopold with his forces were arriued.

Leopold accepteth the Venetians offer.

Newes was brought at the ſame time that the Venetian priſoners at Genoa were ſo hardly delt with by the enemie, as more than three hundred and fiftie of them were in few daies dead with hunger, whoſe bodies they had inhumanly flung into the Sea: Some thought that they had beene poiſoned in regard ſo many of them died at one time. Vpon this report all men were ſo enflamed with choller, as they preſently ranne to Terra-noua to the publike priſon, where breaking open the priſon dores they had like to haue ſlaine all the Genoueſes. But thinking it to be a diueliſh deede, they would be reuenged in an other kinde, by depriuing them of all their commodities, as of kniues, beds, couerlets, and their kitchin: forbidding women who for charitie did miniſter vnto them, not to come any more there. Their ordinarie pittance was but bread and water and that verie ſparingly: But the Citie did ſoone after remember their accuſtomed clemencie, and all that had beene taken from thoſe poore creatures, was by a publike decree reſtored vnto them.

The Genoa priſoners in great danger at Venice.

Whilſt theſe things were done at Venice, and on the confines of the firme Land, three Genoa Gallies did in the Hauen of Piſauro take foureteene Venetian veſſells loden with wine, which they burnt, and taking away the Marchants whom they found in the houſes neere to the Hauen, they ſpeedily departed thence, and rauaging from Piſauro euen to Chioggia, they did infinite harmes to the Venetians, in the Hauens, and at the mouthes of Riuers.

The Genoueſes tooke 14. Venetian veſſells loden with wine.

What harme three Genoa Gallies did to the Venetians.

Hauing

Hauing afterwards taken fiftie veſſells loden with Marchandize, they ſailed towards Ancona, and from thence, fearing leaſt the Venetians would come to their reſcue, they ſent them ſpeedily to Zara.

Vpon report that the Genoueſes Armie was greatly encreaſed, Zeno in the meane time beeing with the Gallies farre from home, the Senate fearing leaſt the enemie would on a ſodaine come and aſſaile the Citie, did ſpeedily fortifie the Hauen, and the forces being called from Meſtra, which ſince the yeelding vp of Treuiſo were there to no purpoſe, they appointed a Campe at S. Nicholas on the ſhoare. They had beſides eight Gallies in a readineſſe to ſaile whither neede ſhould be vnder the conduct of Nicholao Michaeli.

In the meane time, the ſiege of Treuiſo was not diſcontinued but daily augmented by new ſupplies which the enemie ſent thither. Arcuano Buccecarino the Princes brother in Law commanded there: whereof Leopold being aduertized, came within few daies after his people had taken the poſſeſſion thereof with tenne thouſand horſe, and encamped on a ſodaine before Conigliana. He was reported to haue in his Armie beſides that great number, more than foure Hundred Knights and great Lords. Arcuano hauing intelligence of the Almans comming, ſent ſpeedily to his Campe to treate with him about ſome matters. But he was ſo far off from hearing the meſſenger, as he would not vouchſafe to ſee him, but commanded him ſpeedily to returne and tell the Paduan, That he attended him: and that the next day they might conferre together about their affaires. Arcuano did ſoone perceiue whereunto thoſe words tended: whereupon fearing to be ouerthrowne by his ſodaine arriuall, the morrow after by breake of day he raiſed his Campe, & fled thence. Which Leopold hauing notice of, was highly diſpleaſed that he had loſt ſo faire an occaſion of a battaile, who ſoone after departing thence, cauſed his troupes to paſſe ouer the Riuer of Piaua, and came and encamped neere Treuiſo, in the ſame place where the enemies had beene. And he with the chiefe of his Armie entring into the Citie, brought thither ſuch abundance of corne and wine and all other neceſſaries, as the Citie was in an inſtant deliuered from the ſiege and famine.

Leopold with ten thouſand horſe before Conigliana.

Leopold his proud anſwere to the Paduan.

Leopold entreth Treuiſo.

In this manner did the Venetians looſe Treuiſo, fortie yeares after they had taken it from the familie of Eſcalla: But the Senates conſtancie in diſſembling ſuch a loſſe, was ſo great, as they ſent Ambaſſadours to Leopold, to congratulate his welcome and entrie into Treuiſo. Giacomo Delfino, Pietro Hemo, Bernardo Bragadino, Marini Memo, and Alberto Contarcni were ſent thither.

Ambaſſadours ſent from Venice to Treuiſo to Leopold.

Prince Carrario albeit that at Leopold's comming, hee had raiſed his Campe from before Treuiſo, did not ceaſe for all that to moleſt and make incurſions on the Treuiſan, where he tooke certaine Townes ſince the Almains arriuall, ſaying openly that he did it by the King of Hungaries commandement, albeit Leopold was newly allied with the ſame King, and at his entrance into the Citie, had cauſed his roiall Armes to be ſet aboue his owne. It was thought that King Lewis had ſpeciall regard to Leopold's profit, but becauſe he would not ſeeme to abandon his aſſociates, he entreated them to take Carrario his wilfulneſſe in good part: whereupon he did often intreate them by Ambaſſadours (the which hee might haue done by force) and chiefly the Paduan, to deſiſt from his enterprize. But neither entreaties nor threates could make him to abſtaine.

Zeno who (as hath beene ſaid) was of late come from Morea to the lower Sea, arriuing at the mouth of the Riuer Arno, was aduertized by the Senates Letters that peace was concluded with the Genoueſes: wherupon being ſad and diſpleaſed to ſee himſelfe ſnatched forth of the enemies throat, he went back again towards Morea, & from thence by the Senates commandement, he returned with his Armie to Venice. And by this meanes this ſommer which was the laſt of the fourth Liguſticke warre was ſpent without any memorable action.

Peace betwixt the Venetians and the Genoueſes.

By the mediation then of the Duke of Sauoy, peace was concluded with the Genoueſes, King Lewis, and their allies: ſix yeares and foure moneths after that this laſt war

The conditions of peace.

warre beganne. The conditions of the peace were: That the priſonners of warre on both ſides ſhould be ſet at libertie: That the Paduan Prince ſhould deliuer Cap-darger and Morenſana to the Venetians: That he ſhould raze all the Fortes which he poſſeſſed in the Lakes, and neere to the Riuers: that the Venetians ſhould giue him the Tower of Corania: that Alberto D'Æſte ſhould be iudge of the controuerſie betwixt the Venetians and Paduans concerning their limits: that the Venetian ſhould withdraw the Garriſon that he kept in Tenedos, and that the Duke of Sauoy ſhould haue the keeping of the Iſland for two yeares, and that it ſhould be kept at the Venetians and the Genoueſes charges: that at the two yeares end the Fort ſhould be razed, if the Genoueſes thought it fit to be done, and that the Venetians ſhould then giue ouer the entire poſſeſſion of the Iſland: that the Florentines ſhould be caution in the ſumme of two hundred thouſand crownes, that neither the Venetians nor the Genoueſes ſhould euer after poſſeſſe the Iſland: that both the Genoueſes and Venetians ſhould not trafficke neere to the Riuer Tanais, for feare leaſt by ancient ielouzie, (as it had oft hapned) they ſhould beginne the warre a newe: That euerie ten yeare the Venetians ſhould paie ſeuen thouſand Dukats to King Lewis, who in regard of the ſaid ſumme ſhould be bound to free the Sea-coſt of Dalmatia of all Pirats; and that no Sclauonian nor Dalmatian ſhould make any ſalt. But Chinatius of Treuiſo who hath more truely than any other written of this warre maketh no mention of any tribute giuen to the King.

A monſter borne at Venice.

Charitie of the venetian Dames towards the Genoa priſoners.

Some ſay that on the ſame day that the peace was publiſhed, a childe was borne in Venice which had foure Armes and foure Leggs, and did liue till it was baptized. The Venetian Dames made a collection of money to relieue the Genoueſes that came forth of priſon halfe naked, with cloakes, ſhirtes, hoſe and ſhoes, and other cloathing according to euerie mans need, and did beſides furniſh them with money to beare their charges home, to the end they ſhould not be enforced to begge by the way. Thoſe that went thence were aboue fifteene hundred perſons, the reſidue dyed with the ſtentch of the priſon, and others with too much filling their bellies. Beſides it was found that aboue eight thouſand naturall Genoueſes, did dye in this warre, and of the Venetians halfe as many. The Senate being freed from this warre, becauſe they would performe the promiſe made by the Common-wealth, called thirthie of thoſe into the number of the Senate, who in the heate of the warre had at their owne coſts relieued the Common-wealth: and for others, the ſumme of fiue thouſand crownes euerie yeare was appointed to bee diſtributed among them. Thoſe who were made Senators before they came into the Senate went all together to heare diuine ſeruice, then being brought before the Prince and Senators, they tooke their oathes, to continue loyall and not to reueale the ſecrets of the Common-wealth. Chinatius ſaith that Caballa of Verona for his great and notable ſeruice done to the Venetians in this warre, was honored with the ſame dignitie.

The end of the ſeuenth Booke of the ſecond Decad.

THE EIGHTH BOOKE
OF THE SECOND DECAD
OF THE HISTORIE
Of Venice.

The Contents of the eighth Booke of the ſecond Decad.

HOw greatly the difficultie in deliuering vp the Iſland of Tenedos did trouble the Venetians. The Thryeſtines in fauour to LEOPOLD doe reuolt. The Carrarians by LEOPOLDS permiſsion, become maſters of Treuiſo. A law againſt murtherers. Prince ANTONIO VENIERI ſuffereth his Son to die in Priſon for wronging a Senatour. The Venetians aide GALEAS VISCONTE againſt thoſe of Eſcalla and the Carrarians: whereby they recouered Treuiſo and raiſed the ſiege before Mantua. The Paduans forſaking GALEAS returne to the Carrarians ſubiection. The Duke of Auſtria and the French Kings Nephew come at ſundrie times to Venice. The Citie newly beautified. The Genoueſes nauall Armie comming forth of the Higher into the Lower Sea, doth for a time keepe the Venetians in ſuſpence. The Genoueſes being ouercome in battaile before Modon, doe wholly looſe the poſſeſsion of the Sea. The Carrarians poſſeſſe Verona by deceit. VINCENZA, BELLVNA, and FELTRA are reduced vnder the Venetians obedience. The cauſe that moued the Venetians to warre on the Carrarians; who purſued them by Sea and Land: Warre for a time againſt thoſe of Æſte, becauſe of the Carrarians. The Venetians take Verona from the Carrarians. A briefe deſcription of the Citie of Verona. The Carrarians (Padua being taken) become ſubiect to the Venetians, and afterwards by the Senates commaundement are ſtrangled in Priſon. The Ambaſſadours of Padua and Verona arriue almoſt at one time at Venice, which did greatly reioyce the people.

PEace being thus eſtabliſhed by Land and Sea, the yeelding vp of the Iſle of Tenedos did for a while trouble the Venetians: Mutatio was at the ſame time Gouernour there, who being too indiſcreetly tranſported with the loue to his Countrie, had almoſt hazarded the publicke credit of the Common-wealth. The Senate had giuen commiſſion to Pantaleon Barba who was ſent thither for that purpoſe, to deliuer the Fort of the Iſland according to the agreement into the hands of Boniſacio, Deputie to Amadeo Duke of Sauoy. The Genoueſes Agent was come thither to ſee it done, and to pay the Souldiers that were there.

The Venetians are troubled about the yelding vp of the Iſle of Tenedos.

Mutatio

Mutatio his anſwere to the Venetians and Genoueſes.

Mutatio hauing receiued the money which the Venetians and Genoueſes had brought, declared to Boniface and the Commiſſioners his owne determination with that of the Iſlanders, ſaying; That they had heard how in the Articles of peace it » was expreſly mentioned that the Fort of the Iſland, their only refuge, ſhould be ra» zed, wherein both the Genoueſes who had requeſted it, and the Venetians who » conſented thereunto, had carried themſelues baſely: But he told them that the I» ſlanders would looke to their owne affaires, and that therein they ſhould doe wiſe-
» ly: That they had neuer yeelded to the Venetians on that condition, that their Fort » being razed, their Iſland in time ſhould become deſolate. And therefore calling » now to minde that which concerned them, they were reſolued to hazard all, ra» ther than to ſee their Iſland in ſuch ſort to be wholly ruined: And to that end, they » had inſtantly entreated him to take their Citie, Caſtle, and meanes, into his prote» ction. The which he finding to bee great both in ſhew and effect, he was determi» ned to keepe and defend the Iſland as his owne, ſeeing it belonged neither to the » Venetian, nor to any elſe: He willed them then to depart, and not any longer to ex» pect the deliuerie thereof vnto them, ſaying, That they were well dealt with in be» ing ſuffered to goe freely thence: Then was there a great noiſe made by the Soul-diers, and the Inhabitants of the Iſland, calling Mutatio their Lord and Captaine: who commanded the Venetians and Genoueſes ſpeedily to depart thence.

Some ſay that Mutatio made a ſhew that this came wholly from himſelfe, to the end that the Greeks ſhould not afterward reedifie the Fort which the Venetians ſhould demoliſh. But on what pretence ſoeuer he did it, the Commiſſioners being enforced to depart thence, came to Venice. The Senate tooke this refuſall in bad part, knowing that vnleſſe Tenedos were deliuered, the Common-wealths credit through one mans follie, would be crackt among the Italians and forraine Princes, and that all men would impute the blame to the Senate and not to one man alone. And that beſides their breach of faith, it was to be feared, that ſo ſoone as the Genoueſes, King Lewis, and the other aſſociates ſhould heare that the Iſland was not deliuered to the Sauoyan, they holding the couenants of peace to be broken, would forthwith take Armes: They therefore decreed to ſend to Mutatio and the Iſlanders.

Zeno is ſent to Tenedos, who likewiſe effected nothing.

Carolo Zeno was ſent thither, who neither by entreaties nor threats could alter his determination. At Zeno his entrance, becauſe by one mans raſhneſſe the Common-wealths promiſe ſhould not be infringed, they decreed to proceed by Armes; whereupon a ſpeedie leuie of Souldiers was made, vnto ſuch a number as was thought ſufficient to ſubdue the Iſland. Fantino Georgio was made Generall of theſe forces. He departing from Venice with ſixe Gallies well Armed, and arriuing at Tenedos, landed his men, and in an inſtant gaue a furious aſſault to the Towne and Caſtle.

A venetian Armie to ſubdue the Iſle of Tenedos.

There were great numbers of Archers in the Camp, ſo was there in the Caſtle, by meanes whereof at euery aſſault and ſallie, diuers died on either part: Some ſay, that they fought more eagerly than againſt ordinarie enemies; For if any one were taken he was forthwith hanged, or elſe being put into one of the engines of Warre, was inſted of a ſtone throwne into the Camp, and ſo from the Camp into the Citie: whereby it plainly appeared that it was neither the Prince nor Senates fault, that the Iſland was not deliuered according to the treatie of peace; but only through the wilfulneſſe of Mutatio.

Cruell Warre at Tenedos.

The ſiege laſted aboue ſeuen Moneths: but victualls failing, they yeelded on theſe conditions; That neither Mutatio, nor thoſe who were with him ſhould bee called in queſtion for detaining Tenedos, to the hindrance of the Common-wealth: That the Inhabitants ſhould depart forth of the Iſland, with their gold, ſiluer, and other moueables: That as many of them as would go dwell in Candie, ſhould haue as much Land there as they had in Tenedos, and as many as would goe to Conſtantinople or elſe where, ſhould receiue money for the iuſt value of their Lands: And in this ſort, thoſe within gaue place to the Garriſon.

On what conditions Tenedos was yeelded.

The

The Caſtle being recouered, Fantino entred it with two hundred Archers, diſmiſſing the reſidue of the Armie. Giouanni Memo by the Senates decree did afterwards ſucceede h m. The reſidue of the Articles being performed, and the Inhabitants being gone, the Fort was at the laſt razed.

The Fort of Tenedos razed.

The Thryeſtines who in the hotteſt of the warre were reuolted from the Venetians, fearing that ſo ſoone as they ſhould be at quiet both by Sea and Land, they would on a ſodaine come and inuade them, did yeeld to Leopold. Soone after King Lewis died. At the firſt it was thought that his death would in ſome ſort abate the pride of Prince Carrario, who till then had neuer ceaſed to moleſt the Treuiſans: but on the contrarie in ſted of deſiſting, he aſſailed them more furiouſly than before, and gaue them ſo many aſſaults and ouerthrowes, as Leopold deſpairing of being able to defend the Citie, did on certaine conditions giue it ouer with her confines to the Paduan, who in a manner was Conquerour.

The Thryeſtines yeeld to Leopold.

Leopold rendreth Treuiſo to Carrario on conditions

All this hapned almoſt three yeares after that peace had beene eſtabliſhed by Sea and Land. But in the meane time Prince Contareni died, after he had gouerned fourteene yeares, and was honourably buried in S^t. Stephens Church.

¶ Michaeli Morosino, the 61. Duke of Venice.

Michaeli Moroſino ſucceeded him. At his entrie into the Gouernement, a Law was made againſt Murtherers, that whoſoeuer ſhould kill a man, ſhould looſe his head, whereas in time before they who were conuicted of ſuch crimes, were hanged according to the cuſtome of the Countrie. It was thought of a certaine that if his Principalitie had laſted any long time, he would haue beautified the Common-wealth with ſundrie holy Lawes and Statutes: But by how much the hope thereof was greater, by ſo much was his Regiment ſhorter. For about foure Moneths after his Creation hee deceaſed, and was buried in the Church of the Twinnes.

A law againſt murtherers.

¶ Antonio Venieri, the 62. Duke of Venice.

Antonio Venieri being abſent was ſubrogated in his ſted, a man who beſides his ancient Nobilitie, was of a meeke and gentle diſpoſition, and beloued of all men. Being called home from Candie where he remained, he arriued the thirteenth of Ianuarie at Venice, on S. Nicholas ſhore, where the whole Senate, and a great part of the people receiued him; and from thence after diuers reciprocall embracements, going into the Bucentauro he was with great ioy brought to the Ducall Palace: His preſence was the more welcome to all men becauſe by reaſon of his long abſence it had been ſo much deſired: He had beene ſeuen yeares abſent with his familie, and had well gouerned the Common-wealth in diuers places, and chiefly at Tenedos. His gouernment was very meeke and gentle, without any tumult or ſtrife in the Citie, with plentie of all things which was greatly deſired of all men: But his owne domeſticke loſſe did in ſome ſort trouble the fortunate ſucceſſe of his affaires. Albeit I doe not well know whether his ſeuere iuſtice did purchace the old man more honour and reputation, than his ſonnes death did afflict him with griefe and ſorrow.

The peoples great ioy at the Dukes arriuall.

Seuere iuſtice of a Father on his owne Sonne.

He had a Sonne named Lodouico, who was enamoured on a Senators wife. But as it often happeneth, ſome jealouzie aroſe betwixt the two louers, whereupon this yong Lord by chance, in diſgrace of his Miſtris, whom he then hated, cauſed hornes to be hung vp at her huſbands gate. Inquirie thereof being made, the Prince being moued at the iniurie done to a Senator, commanded his Sonne forthwith to be impriſoned, where he remained till he died, to the great griefe of all the people.

The ſame yeare at ſundrie times the Marqueſes of Æſt, and Mantua, came to Venice, with diuers other Princes, and Princes Ambaſſadours to treate with the Senate concerning great affaires of State, albeit ſome of them came but to ſee the Citie. A while after, peace ſtill continuing abroade and at home, great warre and contention arriſing betweene Antonio Eſcalla of Verona, and Franciſco Carrario the elder, Giouanni Galeas Viſconte (whoſe power was at the ſame time very great) at Carrario his entreatie did make warre vpon Eſcalla, and hauing vanquiſhed him, he tooke from him Verona and Vincenza. Then, (as the deſire of getting doth encreaſe when proſperitie doth follow vs) he did as furiouſly aſſaile Padua, as he had not long before done thoſe of Eſcalla. Some ſay that Carrario attempted to ſet Bernabo his Allie at libertie, whom Galeas, his Sonne in Law and Nephew, Sonne to his Brother, kept priſoner in the Caſtle of Trecy, becauſe he had beene aduertized by Katherine his wife, wife, that Bernabo had laid waite to kill him, whereat Visconte, being moued, made warre vpon him.

Antonio of Eſcalla is defeated by Giouanni Galeas Viſconte.

Galeas Viſconte taketh Padua.

The Venetians in this warre ioyned their forces with Galeas who assailed the Paduan, and hauing armed foure hundred boates vnder the conduct of Giacomo Delfino, did in a manner seize vpon all the Cities, Forts and townes which Carrario possessed on the lakes, and at the mouthes of riuers. Galeas likewise on the firme land, did not alone take all the Cities of the Paduan territorie, but likewise in few moneths that the siege lasted, the verie Citie of Padua. Where after he had taken the elder Carrario, he imprisoned him in the Medozian prison. His sonne surnamed Nouello, escaped into Germanie: Galeas would not stand still in so faire a way, but pursuing the course of his victorie, came and tooke Treuiso by force. This warre was verie painfull and bloudie.

Carrario imprisoned in the Medozian tower.

At the last, Carrarios forces being broken, and wholly ouerthrowne, Galeas by agreement had Padua, Feltre, and Belluna; the Venetians Treuiso; and the Marques of Æst, who was one of the associates against Carrario, recouered all the townes which did belong to his ancestors. Then not long after, Galeas hauing proclaimed warre on the Bolognese and Florentines, and his forces being already suspected of all the people and potentates of Italie: The Venetians, Florentines, Bolognese, Francisco Gonzaga, the Marquesse of Æste, and Carolo Malateste, entered into league against him. Robert Duke of Bauaria was entreated to bee of the number, (with whom Nouello remained) and to march with his forces into Italie, against the troups of Visconte.

Carrario his lands diuided.

League against Galeas Viscont.

Galeas leauing the Bolognese, came and furiously besieged the Citie of Mantua, and presuming on the great number of his souldiers (for his Armie was reported to be fortie thousand) he enuironed the Citie by land and water. The Venetians armed a great number of boates against him, to deliuer a friend and confederate Citie from the siege: and because Gonzaga was more molested by water than by land, the Venetians hauing added certaine gallies to their fleete, this audacious enemie was repulsed with great losse from the Citie by the Venetians aide, on the same side of the Citie, by which the enemie had thought to haue taken it. And soone after being incountred by Malatesta Generall of the land Armie neere to the village of Gouernolla, and being broken and defeated by him in a set battaile, he was with great disgrace chased farre from thence.

Galeas besiegeth Mantua with fortie thousand men.

Galeas is repulsed by water and land.

Nouello remained not idle in so faire an occasion. For Robert vsing delaies, he returned into Italie in disguised habite vnknowne to the Venetians and their associates. And by that meanes he entred Padua and enioyed it. The Almaine, following him afterwards with a great Armie, came and besieged the Castle of Padua, which held out for Galeas. Those of Verona being amazed by their neighbours example, tooke Armes, and hauing expelled Galeas his Garrison, they sent for Antonio of Escalla from Tuscan, but they vnderstood that he was dead a while before: whereupon, repenting of what they had done, they sent to Vgoletto Blanchardo, who commaunded Visconts his Armie in the countrey of Cremona, and hauing obtained pardon of him for their reuolt, and for the obtaining of it paid a great summe of money vnder the name of lendings for the souldiers, they receiued him into their Citie: into the which entering tumultuously, the souldiers desirous of bootie could not be kept from spoyling. The wife of Galeas being sorie for the mishap of so excellent a Citie, commaunded three daies after they began to pillage, to spoyle no more. Robert in the meane time being discontented for that he was deceiued by his associates of his promised reward, raised his campe from before the Castle of Padua, and went backe with his forces into Germanie. The Florentines did at the same time send Iohn Hancute, one of the famouse Captaines of his time, with forces to aid Nouello, by whose valour the Castle was in few daies recouered: diuers and sundrie attempts were made on either side, but because they do no whit concerne the Venetians (for they were done on the firme land, & farre from the Sea) we do of purpose omit them.

Nouello some to Carrario recouereth Padua.

Verona pillaged.

The Castle of Padua recouered for Nouello.

Peace for ten yeares.

At the last, peace being concluded for ten yeares was as acceptable to afflicted Lombardie, as pleasing to all men else. At the same time the Duke of Austria arriued at Venice, where being bountifully entertained, he remained till such time as two gallies were made readie to carrie him to the Sepulcher of our Lord. The same yeare the French kings Nephew arriued there, who had the like entertainment as had the Almaine: he made readie a Galley there at his owne charges to transport him into Syria for the same purpose, as the Austrian was gone thither.

The D. of Austria and the French kings Nephew come to venice to bee transported to the holy Sepulchre.

In processe of time, all things being quiet by sea and land, newes was brought that an Argozie of Genoa of meruailous bignesse was gone forth to robbe at Sea. The Venetians vpon this report rigged forth three great ships of warre, which were manned with fiue hundred armed men, which went to Sea. But that great Genouesses Argosey being cast away by a great tempest, the Venetians returned safe and sound home to their houses.

The market place of Saint Marke paued with bricke.

The Cittie during this long peace, was beautified with diuers publike works. The market-place of Rialto, with that great and spacious place before Saint Markes Church, were paued with bricke, and with square stone. At the same time Prince Venieri died, the eighteenth yeare of his principalitie. His funerall was accompanied by great multitudes of people to the Church of the Twinnes.

¶ MICHAELI STENO, the 63. Duke of Venice.

Michaeli Steno Procurator of Saint Marke succeeded him, who being chosen in the beginning of December, came not (by reason of a disease whereof he lay sicke) to the Pallace till the tenth of Ianuarie.

Diuers publike shewes made in the Citie for loue to the Duke.

The people did neuer doe the like honour to any of his predecessors as to him. All the Trades of the Citie euerie one a-part, did prepare costly shewes for his sake, each of them inuenting new, so as no holy day passed in the whole yeare, but some shew or other was presented: And that whole yeare would haue beene spent in mirth and pastime, if the vnexpected losse of certaine Citizens had not marred the sport. Sixe gallies laden with forraine marchandize vnder the conduct of Leonardo Trenisano returned to Venice about the end of Autumne, but it fell out, that neere to the Islands of the Egean sea, at Irene (called by corruption of language Turin) foure of them (which had seldome happened) being beaten with a tempest suffered ship wracke. Yet neuertheless few of the men perished: the marchandize chandize being ſcattered heere & there was with great labour recouered. The Viari, Delfino, Sourance, and Sagreda, were loſt. Cornari and Gradonico reſiſting the ſeas furie came ſafe to Venice.

Foure Venetian Gallies loſt by tempeſt.

The yeare following three Gallies departed from Venice: the Duke of Auſtria had prepared two of them, and Prince Carrario the third, to fetch and conuoie from Apulia the ſiſter of King Ladiſlaus, who being newly reſtored to his kingdome, was Crowned King by Bartholmeo Iuliari, Cardinall of the Sea Apoſtolike, ſent from Pope Boniface. This ſiſter was promiſed to one of the Dukes of Auſtria. But theſe Gallies came back to Venice, by reaſon that Ladiſlaus refuſed to ſend his ſiſter.

Ladiſlaus crowned king of Hungarie.

Some Annales make mention how that the Emperour Robert with his wife came the ſame yeare to Venice, where he was magnificently entertained, and honoured with diuers rich preſents. But thoſe Authors whom we follow conceale the cauſe of his comming. I finde in ſome, that Robert being vanquiſhed by Galeas in the Territorie of Cremona, hauing in a manner loſt all his Armie, retired to Trente, where hauing leuied new forces, he came to Padua, and from the firme Land to Venice, where being curteouſly entertained, after he had familiarly diſcourſed with the Prince and Senate of the wrong which Galeas had done him, he returned into Germanie: But becauſe mention is made of his wiues being there with him: we muſt think that he left her at Venice, becauſe himſelfe went on pilgrimage to Rome. For it was the yeare of our Saluation one thouſand foure hundred, at ſuch time as Pope Boniface the ninth celebrated the great yeare of Iubilie.

Ladiſlaus defeated by Galeas Viſcont.

The ſame yeare the bridge of Rialto was reedified. In this manner did the Common-wealth peaceably flouriſh, and the greateſt care of the inhabitants was ſet on trade of Marchandize. But this quiet was interrupted by the Genoueſes new ſtirs. They had about the ſame time armed one and twentie Gallies, and ſixteene great Argoſies: Some Authours make no mention of Argoſies. The report was, That this preparation was made againſt the King of Cyprus. Boucicault a Frenchman, was Generall of the Armie. The Genoueſes had beene for a time, as they were then, vnder the French Kings protection, and the moſt part of their Gallies were manned with French-men. The Fleet departing from Genoa, arriued after a tedious courſe, at Scandelora a Sea-Towne of Cilicia. (thoſe who are moſt expert in Nauigation, affirme this place from the firme Land to be oppoſite to Cyprus) The Genoueſes receiued there ſo great a loſſe, as of all the Gallie-ſlaues in one and twentie Gallies, there were not ſo manie left as would furniſh eleuen. Departing thence, they ſailed into Syria, where ſurprizing Barut, they ranſackt & ſpoiled as enemies all the Venetian ſhips, and others, who by chance were then in the Hauen. From Syria they ſailed into Morea.

Boucicault a French-man Generall of the Genoa Armie.

The Genoueſes great loſſe.

Carolo Zeni whome the Senate, at the firſt report of the Genoueſes preparations, had ſent with eleuen Gallies into the Adriatick Gulph, hauing at Sea narrowly purſued the Genoueſes Fleete, had ſpeciall care that they ſhould not attempt on any place belonging to the Venetians: (for their Armie ſpoiled all places where they came) and yet he would not fight with them becauſe they were not proclaimed enemies. In this ſort both of them diſſembling, the Venetians kept the Genoueſes in aw, and the Genoueſes the Venetians. But both of them ſtaying neere to Modon, they made ſhew of other matters than they had done at the beginning. Zeni fearing leaſt by his patience the Venetians affaires might incurre ſome great danger, did on a ſodaine ſet forward towards the Genoueſes Fleete, who vnder colour of taking in freſh water, lay betwixt Modon and Ijonches. At Carolo his vnlookt for arriuall, there was a ſharp-fight, and the Venetians fortune was ſo much the worſe, becauſe the Genoa Gallies were better manned than theirs.

A new Genoa Fleete.

Both the Fleetes diſſemble.

The two Armies fight.

It is reported that euerie Gallie had beſides the ordinarie banke of Rowers, fortie men at Armes, and all French-men, who fought furiouſly with the Lance & ſword, after the manner of their Countrie. And the Venetians did but in a manner beare off the blowes, at ſuch time as Hermolao the Lombard returning from a long voiage,

The Venetians in danger, before the comming of Hermolao.

came thither opportunely with two Gallies. He perceiuing the danger wherein the Venetians were, did with great furie turne the prowes of his Gallies vpon the enemie who was buſied in fight, and ſtrooke one of their Gallies with ſuch force, as he ouerturned it into the Sea with the Souldiers and Marriners. At Hermolao his arriuall fortune ſodainly changed.

For the enemie who had alreadie in a manner wonne the victorie, for the loſſe of one Gallie began to faint: The Venetian on the contrarie being ſtrengthened by theſe two Gallies, did valiantly renew the fight. Their fortune hung for foure houres ſpace in equall ballance: at the laſt three of the enemies Gallies being ſunke, and as manie taken, the reſidue which were fiue, betooke themſelues to flight. More than fiue hundred of the enemies were ſlain and drowned, and more than eight hundred were taken priſoners. The Venetians for their part, obtained not this victorie without bloud ſhed, who found an hundred and three and fortie of their men to be wanting.

The Genoueſes Fleete defeated.

It is ſaid, that, after the victorie, certaine Captaines of the Gallies were diſgraced and noted of cowardize for comming too ſlowly on the enemie at the beginning of the fight, & becauſe by their baſeneſſe they had endaungered the ſtate of the Common-wealth. Others, among whom was Gyles the Black, were honored with great rewards, becauſe they had brauely borne themſelues in that conflict. The fiue Genoueſes Gallies which fled from the fight, encountring with a Venetian Gallie loden with victualls they eaſilie tooke it: after that, they tooke an Argoſie, wherein were diuers Venetian Gentlemen. Much more harme beſides they did to the Venetians; but becauſe after this defeate, they knew no ſafe place of retreate: they returned verie diſconſolate to Genoa.

Gyles the Black greatly honoured

Within few daies after, a French-man, of the number of thoſe who were taken priſoners in the fight, being wearied with impriſonment, ſaid in choller, That he hoped one daie to waſh his hands in the bloud of the Venetians. This cruell preſage being reported to the Senate, did ſo highly offend euerie mans eares, as they all with one voice commanded that hee ſhould bee hanged betwixt the two Columnes.

A French man puniſhed for indiſcreete ſpeaking.

In this mean ſpace Nouello Carrario commanded in Padua, where he was ſome few yeares before replanted by the Venetians. This vnthankfull man did hate the Venetians more than euer his Father had done. He practized day & night againſt them & their ſtate; he dreamed on nothing elſe, & all his attempts tended to that purpoſe. The Venetians, hauing knowledge of a long time how he ſtood affected to them, had I know not by what meanes, diſcouered all his practiſes, & vnderſtood by the French priſoners, that he had beene the cauſe of the ſetting forth of the laſt Genoa Fleete that was defeated. They knew likewiſe by letters found in the coffers of Galeas Viſconte lately deceaſed, the traps which thoſe Tyrants had laied for them. And beſides all this, after Galeas his deceaſe, hee had earneſtly ſolicited William of Eſcalla, who had beene created a Gentleman of Venice, and dwelt at the ſame time there, to recouer the Principallitie of Verona: whom after the recouerie thereof, he perfidiouſly poiſoned: notwithſtanding that before he had ſworne and proteſted all loue and friendſhip to him, and releeued him with Armes and Councell. After which hauing ſurpriſed Antonio, and Brunora of Eſcalla his children, he cauſed them to be murthered. The race of Eſcalla being thus extinct: Franciſco cauſed his ſon Giacomo, or according to ſome, his brother, to enter Verona, the Enſignes of the Empire and his owne being diſplaied before him, and created him Prince of the Citie: Yet not being ſatisfied with ſo great a Principalitie, he beſieged Vincenza, hauing firſt ſpoiled the Vincenzans Territorie.

The hatred which Nouello did beare to the Venetians.

Perfidious trecherie.

Verona poſſeſſed by the Carrarians.

The Vincenzans deteſting the name of Carrario, reſolued to endure all extremitie, rather than to ſubmit themſelues to their Tyrannie. They ſpeedily ſent to Katherina, widdow to deceaſed Galeas (for Carrario already made hauock of their countrie, to get that by force which he could not obtain by right) and intreated her to aſſiſt ſiſt them againſt the violence of the Carrarians, giuing her to vnderſtand their great danger, vnleſſe they were ſpeedily relieued: alleaging for inſtance, That on the one ſide they had Padua for neighbour, where the Tyrants made their retreate; and Verona on the other which they had lately ſeized on, hauing vilely murthered their hoſts; and that being enuironed and ſhut in on euerie ſide, they were openly purſued as enemies, becauſe they would not open their gates to the Tyrants: and that the Vincenzans knew not of whom or from whence to expect reliefe, but from thence where the power of Galeas had beene in force and Authoritie. Earneſtly therefore they entreated her preſently to ſend them aide, or if ſhe had not the meanes ſo to do, yet to ſend them word in what manner ſhee would will or commaund the Vincenzans to prouide for their ſafetie. This did the Commiſſioners deliuer vnto her. But ſhe being a woman, and troubled with the death of her huſband, and buſied elſewhere in greater affaires: (For Carolo ſonne to Bernabo after Galeas death began to ſtir, and diuers pettie Princes of Italie had ſeized on the Cities which belonged to her huſbands Dukedome, ſo as ſhe had buſines enough to keepe Milan) for reſolution in theſe difficulties aſſembled her Councell: by whom it was concluded, That, in regard they being ſo ſtreightly preſſed, could not continue in her obedience, it was much better for Verona, Vincenza, Feltre, Belluna, Collogna, and Baſſan with their dependances to be giuen to the Venetians, than to leaue them for a prey to thoſe wicked Tyrants.

The Carrarians make incurſions on the Vincenzans.

The Vincenzans aduertiſement to Galeas his widdow.

The reſolution of the Councellors of the widdow of Galeas.

The Venetians, albeit they had already refuſed the offer which the Vincenzans had made to them of their Citie, not that they did it to gratifie Carrario, or were vnwilling to helpe their poore afflicted friendes, but only for that they were aſhamed to poſſeſſe the goods of an other man without iuſt cauſe: ſo ſoon as they perceiued the offer to be made, contrarie to their expectation, by the true Lord (albeit they knew that great warre would follow with Nouello) they would not looſe ſo faire an occaſion. Therefore they courteouſly entertained the Vincenzans Commiſſioners (the chief of whom was Giacomo Thyeni, ſent with the Cities keies) & willed them (after they had receiued their oathes of fidelitie) to be of good cheere, & not to doubt but that they would deale in ſuch ſort, as if this Paduan, who filled all places with tumult and menaces did not deſiſt from moleſting them, they would ſhortly ſet him ſuch taske-worke, as he ſhould no more trouble his neighbours, nor any elſe. Beſides, ſeeing that the Vincenzans had eſteemed from the beginning nothing to be more profitable for their Citie, than to be vnder the protection of the Venetians, they would take order that ſo loiall a Citie ſhould neuer repent her loue and affection towards them. Heereupon they willed them then to depart, and to carrie home with them the enſignes of Saint Marke, (whom they beſought to be fauourable to them both) and to erect them in the publicke places of their Citie, aſſuring them that the Prince and Senate would take order for the reſt.

The venetians entertaine the vincenzans commiſſioners.

In this manner were the Commiſſioners ſent home. Giacomo Suriano followed them ſoone after with a good troupe of Archers for the Cities guard. They ſent likewiſe to Carrario to ſignifie vnto him in the name of the Common-wealth that he ſhould abſtaine from further moleſting the Vincenzans, becauſe they were become ſubiect to the Venetians. But al this aduertiſement notwithſtanding ſo farre off was he from giuing ouer his enterpriſe, as on the contrarie, in contempt of them, and againſt the law of Nations, he cauſed the Ambaſſadours Noſe and Eares to be cut off, and willed him beſides, to tell the Venetians, that it was too faucily done of them to preſcribe lawes vnto thoſe, who were commanders in poſſeſſion: That they ſhould doe well to containe themſelues within their ſmall incloſure of the Sea, and leaue Cities to thoſe who from their Anceſtours had receiued the power to gouern.

A venetian garriſon ſent to vincenza.

Carrario wrongeth the venetian Ambaſſador.

The Senate being mooued by the Tyrants arrogant anſwere, would (before they proclaimed open warre) contract alliance with Franciſco Gonzaga. In the mean time, the Feltrians, the Bellunois, and Baſſans, following the Vincenzans example, voluntarily ſubmitted themſelues to the Venetians. Colognia gaue occaſion of a great great battaile. The Paduan euerie where oppoſing himſelfe againſt the Venetians attempts, did greatly moleſt them. The Senate on a ſodaine cauſed great forces to be leuied, and gaue the charge of them to Carolo Malateſte of Arimini, who was ſent from Flaminio for that purpoſe. The Armie was reported to be of thirtie thouſand as well horſe as foot.

The venetians allie themſelues with Gonzaga.

Carolo Malateſte of Arimini Generall of the venetians land Army.

Howbeit Carolo ſtaied longer than was expected, yet being come to Venice he was entertained with great ioye, and receiued the publicke Enſignes in St. Markes Church. Then marching towards the enemie he came to Meſtra, which was the Rendeſ-uous of all the Venetian troupes, and diuers great perſonages were in that Armie who receiued good pay of the Venetians. The Generall at his arriuall made certaine attempts vpon the enemie, but of no great moment, and therefore not worthie of memorie. But in the hotteſt of the warre he gaue ouer his place. Thoſe Authors whome we haue read giue no reaſon why he did ſo.

Malateſte giues ouer the Generals place.

Whileſt theſe things were done on the firme Land, the nauall armie had no better ſucceſſe on the Lakes. Marco Grimani Generall of the Fleet which the Senate had ſent forth againſt the Tyrant, hauing remained for a time on the Lakes neere to the enemies, and cauſed a great number of light boates to come thither, did violently force certaine of the Garriſons: but being aſſailed on a ſodaine by the Paduan, neere to the Church of Saint Hilarie, he was defeated, hauing loſt the greateſt part of his veſſels, which the enemies drew on ſhoare with hookes of Iron; and himſelfe being taken priſoner was committed to the keeping of the Sacceans.

The Venetians nauall Armie defeated.

Malateſte his diſmiſſion being knowne at Venice, they beganne carefully to conſider, whom they ſhould appoint for their Generall. At the laſt among ſo many noble perſons as were then in great number in the Armie, Paulo Sabello a Roman Gentleman for his valour and great experience was alone thought worthie of that place. By his conduct diuers places were in ſhort ſpace taken from the enemie, and the Venetians beganne to haue better ſucceſſe vnder this new General. But the Tyrants arrogancie did no whit diminiſh: whereby they knew of a certaine that he was to be dealt with in more places than one. And therfore they leuied new forces, and a new Campe as great as the former, which ſhould ſpoile and ouer-runne the territorie of Verona. They made Franciſco Gonzaga, their aſſociate in this warre, Generall of that new Armie. He comming ſodainely on the Veronois, did ſpoile all places, and brought away with him a great bootie, as well of priſoners, as of Cattle; he burnt the Farmes and Countrie houſes; he tooke certaine ſtrong places, and among the reſt Hoſtilio; and in a word, he left the enemie in a manner nothing. Carrario being then aſſailed in two ſeuerall places, that great vſuall heat of his beganne by litle and litle to coole. For he could not intend both places together, nor were his forces ſufficient being diuided into two, to reſiſt the enemies attempts. His affaires therefore were of neceſſitie to goe backeward in both places, or at the leaſt in one of them.

Paulo Sabello a Roman, Generall of the venetians Armie.

Franciſco Gonzaga Generall of another Armie of the venetians.

Albert of Æſte maketh warre on the venetians in the behalfe of Carrario.

In the meane time Prince Albert of Æſte being mooued with compaſſion of his friend and allie, proclaimed warre on the Venetians, who were readie enough to accept it. He firſt ſent aid to the confederates, and after draue the Venetians foorth of the Polleſin. Some Authors ſay that it was Nicholao ſonne to Albert, which made warr on the Venetians, to whom Carrario had giuen his daughter Liliola to wife. But whether it were he, or the other (according to the Venetian Annals) who at the ſame time relieued the Carrarians; the Venetians being diſpleaſed thereat did repeale Accio D'Æſte from Candie, whither they had in time before confined him in fauour of Albert, and hauing giuen him forces, they cauſed him to warre on the territorie of Ferrara.

Accio of Æſte is repealed from Candie to make warre on Albert.

This Accio was before that time a deadly enemie to Albert, and had without doubt driuen him from his eſtate, if the Venetians, the Florentines, and thoſe of Bologna, had not ouerthrown him in the height of his good fortune, and confined him farre from Italie. There was then ſome likelihood that ſo ſoone as this man

ſhould

ſhould aſſaile the Ferrarois in his Countrie, that he would either greatly moleſt him, or enforce him to laie aſide his Armes againſt the Venetians: Therefore they armed certaine Gallies, and gaue them to Gionanni Barba, who at the mouth of Po ſailed vp the Riuer, where he did greatly affright thoſe of Ferrara. In the meane time diuers and ſundrie skirmiſhes were made on the Riuer and elſe-where. And the Citie of Ferrara being thus hardly preſſed by water and land, Albert, to quench this great domiſticke flame, inclined to peace, the which he obtained of the Venetians on theſe conditions: That no more ſalt ſhould be made at Comaccia: and that hee ſhould ſweare beſides to continue euer a friend to the Venetians.

The conditions of peace made with Albert of Æſte.

10 Theſe things were done neere to Ferrara, but on the Paduan territorie they fought fiercely. The Venetian had fortified his Campe at Nogara: Then the Generall being gone from thence with part of his troupes, came and encamped at Baſſanelto. Thoſe Authors whom we follow expreſſe not on what occaſion he did ſo. The ſonne of Franciſco Carrario, ſurnamed Tertius, a valorous young man, being ſent by his father with a choiſe troupe of horſe, came and aſſailed the Campe. The Venetians at the firſt were ſo affrighted, as the enemie came euen to the Generalls Tent, and trode the Venetian Enſignes which where there erected vnder his feet, before any man made reſiſtance. Sabello in this amazement with much adoe recalled his Souldiours: and by earneſt intreating now one and then another he reſtrained their 20 ſhamefull flight, ſharpely reprehending their feare. Then he commanded them to turne their faces towards the enemie; and as he exhorted them hee marched foremoſt. But ſo ſoone as the enemie perceiued the Venetians in armes, and furiouſly bent to begin the fight, & fearing if he ſhould ioyne with them he ſhould be enforced to bring all his forces to the battaile, turning his backe, he retired on a gallop towards his Enſignes, who alreadie by their Captaines command had begunne the retreat. The Venetians not being able to cauſe the enemie to ſtay ſuffered him to depart with certaine of their Enſignes which at his arriuall hee had taken from them.

The venetians are afrighted at the arriuall of young Carrario.

Sabello endeuoureth to ſtay his amazed Souldiours.

The enemies retreate.

Some ſay that they fought at Manſana, and that the Venetians loſt ſix hun- 30 dred horſe; but they altogether conceale the loſſe of their Enſignes. This victorious young man returning to the Citie as it were triumphing, preſented the people with a ioyfull ſhewe. It is reported that afterwards diuers and ſundrie exploits were executed, and that diuers Townes were taken from the enemies, as well of the Paduan as the Verona territorie. Whileſt theſe things were attempted, Paulo Sabello dyed. His bodie being brought to Venice, was in great ſolemnitie accompanied by the whole Clergie, the Prince, and Senate, to the Church of the Friers Minors. His Image is to be ſeene on horſe-backe before the high Altar. Galeas Grumello of Mantua was by the Senates decree ſubrogated in his place. Others ſay that Gonzaga brother to Prince Franciſco, ſucceeded him; and not Grumello.

The death of Paulo Sabello.

Galeas Grumello of Mantua ſubrogated in the place of Sabello.

40 This man beganne his charge with as great care and diligence as could be deſired in a great Captaine. In the meane time Giacomo Suriano, who lay in Vincenza, becauſe there was no doubt to be made of the Vincenzans loialtie & affection towards the Venetians, reſolued by the permiſſion of the Prince and Senate, to goe with a companie of men at armes to the Venetians Campe on the territorie of Verona. The enemie lying in ambuſh came forth and aſſailed this troupe of men at armes at Soaua, and eaſily defeated them, and being thus broken, they tooke Suriano with diuers others, priſoners. The Veronois being wearied with ſo long and tedious a ſiege, were alreadie determined to yeeld. For they likewiſe did deteſt the Carrarians. Giacomo Carrario commanded in the Citie, who (as we ſaid in the beginning) was 50 giuen to the Veronois for their Lord and Prince. Hee of himſelfe perceiuing all things to be doubtfull, and imagining that he ſhould bee ſafer abroad than in the Citie being out of hope to keepe it, attempted ſecretly to flie thence. He came firſt to Hoſtilio; and from thence croſſing the Po, he was taken on the Riuers bancks and brought to Venice. But I know not what ſhould moue him to goe to Hoſtilio, Certaine venetian troupes defeated.

Giacomo Carrario departing from verona is taken in flight.

lio, seeing it was at the same time vnder the power of Francisco Gonzaga, vnlesse it were so that he came thither in disguise, thinking to deceiue the enemie in that habite, till such time as he had crossed the riuer. Some say that he was surprized at Asellario a village of the Veronois. But be it that he were taken there or elsewhere, it is certaine that he did not depart from the Citie before such time as he knew that the inhabitants intended to yeeld.

Verona in the Venetians power.

Those of Verona being reduced to the Venetians obedience, all the Castles neere to the Citie did the like. The yeelding of so mightie a Citie gaue the Venetians great hope of executing higher enterprizes. And this victorie was as much and more pleasing to the Senate, than any other which they had obtained for a long time before, and not without cause. For Verona (to speake somewhat thereof) is among all other Cities of Lombardie, the most famous, as well for the reputation, as the situation thereof. It is thought that the Gaules were the first founders of it, because the notablest Cities of Lombardie were built by them. And likewise because Trogus Pompeius referreth her original and foundation to those Gaules which came with Brennus into Italie. But whosoeuer the first founders were, I doe thinke them to haue beene famous men, because they vndertooke so great & admirable a peece of worke, and likewise that they were wise and discreet persons, and not blind like those founders of Calcidonia, whom in times past Apollo's Oracle thoght to be so.

In what esteeme the Citie of Verona is.

The good'y situation of Verona.

For besides that the territorie neere to the Citie is most fruitfull in corne, oyle, wine, and cattaile, and that it hath goodly stone-quarries, riuers, lakes, and pondes, among which is that of Benac, the pleasantest of those of all Italie, streames of water both holesome and profitable; the which I dare affirme to haue in times past serued for bathes, by reason that they are hot, and because at this day the ruines of the walles are to be seene, which doe verifie the opinion which the common people hold thereof. VVhat shall we speake of her situation and structure? There is nothing to be seene more faire and pleasant. Neuer could any Painter how excellent soeuer he were, represent a place of more delectable recreation. For the whole Citie almost being seated in a plaine countrey, looking towards the South, East, & VVest, it hath a little hill on the North side, the top whereof by a short and pleasant circuit doth in a manner represent the forme of a Theater: The bottome betwixt them both is filled with vine-yards and goodly gardens, so delightfull to those who behold them a farre off, as their spirits (as it hath hapned to some) surprized with a sodaine and vnlooked-for ioy, are instantly (as it were) depriued of all sense. On the top of the hill two goodly Fortes are to be seene, the one of which doth in a manner hang ouer the riuer Ladisla, which with her pleasant streames watereth a great goodly bottome, the other seated in a higher place, and almost ouer the valley, looketh on the Citie walles which are below, and extendeth her view on euerie side ouer all the plaines watered with the Po, and in a manner ouer all Lombardie. There are to be seene besides, diuers goodly bridges richly builded ouer the riuer; an Amphitheater in the midst of the City, with diuers old triumphant Arches, with a thousand other antiquities, which declare how notable the greatnesse of this Citie hath beene in former times. That which we haue hitherto said is verie great, but that which followeth is much more admirable.

Bathes in time past at Verona.

Two forts at Verona.

An Amphitheater in Verona.

This Citie hath had from the beginning a certaine Seminarie of excellent men, and as famous in all sciences, as any other Citie whatsoeuer. All these things being knowne, to the Venetians, did make their victorie more notable.

They forthwith manned it with a strong Garrison, and sent Pietro Arimondo thither for Gouernour, and Rubro Marino for chiefe Iustice. VVhilest these things were done at Verona, Gonzaga hauing spoiled all the Paduan territorie, and taken diuers townes, came and besieged Padua. There is a place without Holy Crosse gate, called Terra Negra, or the blacke land, in which place the Venetian was incamped, and held the Citie straightly besieged, keeping the Paduans in continuall alarme. The Carrarians in the meane time (perceiuing their affaires to bee in great danger) did brauely brauely defend the Citie walles, oppoſing themſelues euerie where againſt the Venetians attempts; they ceaſed neither day nor night from labour; they fortified their Citie, placed the guardes, and encouraged the townſmen, and did at times ſallie forth vpon the enemie as occaſion ſerued: Both ſides had labour and care ſufficient.

Gonzaga besiegeth Padua.

But whileſt Padua was thus beſieged and defended. Maſſolerio the Venetian was ſuſpected ſecretly to haue ſhot arrowes into the Citie with letters tied to their heads, wherupon being impriſoned he was ſent to Venice, where being conuicted of the crime he was hanged from the higheſt place of the Palace with a long rope. The ſame day his brother and two young Prieſts, were put aliue into the ground betwixt the two Columnes their heads downewards: The which puniſhment being not as yet vſuall, did greatly terrifie all men. The common report was, That they had determined in the night to ſet the Citie on fire in diuers places, and that they had diuers complices, ſome of whom were found within a while after dead in ſacks on the ſhore, not being knowne who they were, Giouanni of Padua likewiſe who had great pay in the Venetian Armie, being accuſed to haue had ſecret conference with the enemie, was ſent to Venice, and there hanged betwixt the two Columnes.

Maſſolerio the Venetian being accuſed and conuicted of treaſon is puniſhed.

A cruell and vnuſuall puniſhment.

Giouanni of Padua is puniſhed for hauing ſecret conference with the enemie.

Theſe executions did greatly trouble the tyrant, for beſides that he perceiued all meanes to be cut off from him of diſcouering any thing in the Armie, he was certaine that the ſhamefull death of a noble perſon did ſerue for an example to others how to caſt themſelues headlong into apparent dangers. Now therefore to diſcouer his enemies deſignes, he tried another way. For pretending as if he ment to harken vnto peace, he craued a ſafe conduct ſaying that he would confer with Gonzaga, and treat with him of peace before all men. A paſport being ſent him, he came to the Campe, where theſe conditions (as it is reported) were propounded to him. That he ſhould leaue Padua to the Venetians, and that he with his children ſhould goe and dwell an hundred miles from thence: That the Venetians would deliuer vnto him Giacomo his ſonne, and would permit him to carrie away all his treaſure, apparell, and other rich moueables that he had, and that they would ouer and aboue giue him for a preſent the ſumme of threeſcore thouſand crownes. The enemie contemning theſe conditions, returned to the Citie without effecting any thing, reſoluing rather to hazard all than to accept of ſo baſe a peace.

Conditions of peace propounded to the Paduan

The Venetians then perceiuing that the tyrant had loſt that haughtie and proud ſpirit which he was wont to haue, did preſſe the Citie more furiouſly than before. And at the laſt, hauing about midnight reared ladders to the wall, diuers went vp vpon them: where thoſe of the guard being heauie with ſleepe all were murdred without noiſe at the gate of holy Croſſe, whither all the troupes ſpeedily ranne, & forthwith entred the Citie. Padua is cireled with a triple wal, the vttermoſt wherof being loſt by the enemie, he kept himſelf within the other two. But his forces being alreadie broken, and being hopeleſſe of better fortune, hee ſent to entreate Gonzaga to take him into his protection; that he would caſt himſelfe betwixt his armes, with his children and all his meanes; requeſting that hee might come ſafely to him to parley and compound with him about his yeelding. But Gonzaga by the counſell of his friends ſent him word that he ſhould doe better to haue recourſe to the Prince and Senate, and that with teares caſting himſelfe at their feete, he ſhould perhaps obtaine of them more than he hoped for. He then craued aſſurance that hee might ſafely goe to Venice, but he was anſwered that the Senate would ſend Commiſſioners to Meſtra, who ſhould heare him. Both ſides being come neere to Meſtra, the matter was a long time debated without any concluſion at all, whereupon they departed thence without doing any thing, and the tyrant returned being conducted by Gonzaga into the Citie: where being arriued without tidings of peace, he was ſo badly welcomed by the inhabitants, as diuers were ſo bold to tell him; That the Paduans were no more reſolued to liue as they had done. They willed him then

The venetians enter Padua in the night by Scalado.

Padua cireled with a triple wall.

The Paduan ſeeth to Gonzaga.

Gonzaga his anſwere to the Paduan.

The poore entertainment which the Paduas gaue to Carrario returning without peace.

to

to depart thence,& (if he did mean to looke well to himſelfe) to embrace ſuch peace as the victorious Venetian would offer; and not ſuch as he deſired. That the wretched inhabitants had rill then endured too much by their Princes arrogancie; that the enemie was alreadie within their walls: and therefore nothing elſe to be expected, but that the Souldiers hauing forced the inner Rampire, would come & ſpoile the Citie; which God rather than any mans valour had til then ſafely preſerued: And that it was madneſſe, rather than wilfullneſſe, not to yeeld, when men could not helpe it.

The Tyrant being daunted with theſe ignominious ſpeeches, ſent again to Gonzaga, and with teares entreated him to take pittie on the affliction of his familie, and to procure ſo far as he might with honor, that his own and his childreus liues might be ſaued: Then at the Citizens requeſt, they without any further fight entred the Citie on the 22. of Nouember. Padua being recouered, Nouello with Franciſco ſurnamed Tertius and William, his children (for Hubertino, and Marſilio, before the Citie was yeelded, were fled into Tuſcan) were brought to Venice. The Senate cauſed them to be carried into the Iſland oppoſite to the Hall where they vſed to meet, and placed diuers ſmal boats for the guard thereof for feare leaſt they ſhould eſcape. Zacharia Treuiſano was the fieſt gouernour that was ſent to Padua after it was taken, & Marini Caraualla was Iudge: who did forthwith fortifie the Citie with a ſtrong rampire, and a good Garriſon: Then they did put diuers forth of the towne whom they knew to affect the Carrarians, banniſhing them into ſundrie places, and by that meanes did carefully prouide for what ſoeuer they knew neceſſarie to keep ſo excellent a Citie vnder their obedience.

Padua being taken, the tyrant with three of his children are brought to Venice.

Officers ſent by the Senate to Padua.

The Tyrant and his children being by night tranſported into ſeuerall priſons (to the end that the people ſhould not ſee them, who for the great hatred which they had a long time borne them would haue torne them in pieces) were by the Senates commandement ſtrangled. The Father was buried in S. Stephens Church, and the children in S. Georges monaſterie. Such an end had the Carrarians, who not long before did fill all places with feare and menaces: and who not being ſatisfied with commanding ſo excellent a Citie, did raſhly prouoke thoſe by whoſe meanes their predeceſſours had acquired the name of Princes. But diuers did iudge that the cruel tyrannie of Franciſco deſerued ſuch an end.

The Priſoners by the Senates commandment are ſtrangled.

Franciſco Carrario his great cruelltie.

The report was that he kept dogs of a meruailous bigneſſe, vnto whom he gaue the wretched inhabitants to be deuored. There is to be ſeene at this day in the great Hall where the councell of the Tenne do aſſemble, two Scorpions, with verie ſharp ſtings, who did ſting ſuch ſtrangers, as he called thither to talke with him. I conceale his impudent and vnnaturall conditions, wherewith he was infected, as vnworthie to be mentioned.

By this ſo triumphant a victorie the Venetians purchaſed Vincenza, Verona, Colognia, Feltra, Belluna, and the laſt of all, Padua with her confines. The expence of this warre which laſted two yeares, was ſo great, as two millions of gold of the publike Treaſure were ſpent in it: And yet neuertheleſſe this exceſſiue coſt was verie pleaſing in regard of the proffit and renowned victorie which enſued it.

How much mony was ſpent in the warre with the Carrarians.

At the ſame time as the warre was ended, whilſt the whole Citie was buſied euery night in making of bonfiers, and other ſignes of ioy for the good newes which daily arriued from al parts, the top of the Tower, which is neere to S. Markes church was burned; but it was forthwith reedified, and guilded with fine gold. That ſide likewiſe of the Palace which looketh towards the South, and had been a long time before begunne, was then ended. All things being quiet, fortie Gentlemen of Verona, clothed in white, came well accompanied to Venice. And their comming being expected, becauſe the people ſhould receiue the greater content thereby, the Senate commanded a Theater to be ſet vp richly furniſhed neere to Saint Markes Church: whereupon the Priuce with his familie clothed in white, did ſtand, all his Enſignes being for that day white. He was attended on by all the Magiſtrates of the Citie

Fortie Gentlemen of Verona come to Venite in Ambaſſade.

The entertainement giuen to the Gentlemen of Verona.

Citie, and honoured likewiſe with the companie of the greateſt part of the Senate.

The Veronois being come to the Theater, went vp in order, where after they had ſaluted the Prince and Senate, they laied downe their publicke Enſignes, and the keies of their Citie-gates at their feete, entreating them to accept thereof, and beſeeching God, that the offer might be both to the Venetians and themſelues as fortunate and profitable, as that was an aſſured and perpetuall pledge of their fidelitie, as well publicke as particular, towards the Venetians; requeſting them of their accuſtomed goodneſſe to continue in the defence, preſeruation, and maintenance of them, their Citizens, their meanes, fortunes, with all other Diuine and humane matters: And as for their vnfeigned loue towards them, they durſt freely ſay and affirme, that they would be extreamely ſorry, if among ſo manie people as did obey them, any ſhould goe before them in loue, dutie, and affection. The Ambaſſadors ſpeech.

The Ambaſſadours being curteouſly entertained, receiued great thankes: And they were aſſured, that ſo long as they did continue ſuch as they had promiſed, the Senate would ere long let them know, that the greateſt happineſſe which can befall thoſe which haue not meanes to maintaine and defend themſelues, is to be ſhrowded vnder a lawfull gouernment; and that they would finde it to be as pleaſing in that they had recourſe to the only Fort of libertie, hauing caſt off a Tyrants yoake, as doth that man which hath eſcaped out of a terrible tempeſt, when he entreth into a ſafe Harbor: They might then depart when they pleaſed, and take with them the Venetians Enſignes, (and in ſo ſaying, the Prince gaue them to the chiefe Ambaſſador) and erect them in the middeſt of their Citie, which he wiſhed might proue to the Venetians and them, alwaies profitable and honourable: and being ſo erected, to hold them in reuerence: Then he willed them to execute juſtice and equitie, in regard they had in times paſt obaied the vniuſt commandes of Tyrants. In this ſort the Ambaſſadours of Verona were diſmiſſed. The anſwere which was made them.

Thoſe of Padua following their example, came ſoone after to Venice. They were entertained as the former, and the only difference was, that in ſted of white, the Paduans were clothed in purple. The Paduans come in the ſame manner to Venice.

* * *

The end of the eighth Booke of the ſecond Decad.

THE NINTH BOOKE OF THE SECOND DECAD

Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the ninth Booke of the ſecond Decad.

LADISLAVS King of Hungarie reſtoreth the Citie of Zara to the Venetians. Warre for a while in Dalmatia, by meanes of the Sibenſans. What great hurt a ſodaine ſtorme hapning on the thirteenth of Auguſt did to the Citie, and places neere about. The Scythians make incurſions on the Faires of Tane. PIPVS entreth violently into Italie with great troupes of Hungarians. FREDERICK ſoone followeth him thither. Diuers encounters with the enemies on the Treuiſan and Forlane. Certaine new Magiſtrates are created in the Citie. How the Venetians by the contention of thoſe of Vdina entred in Armes into the Countrie of Friul; which is reduced vnder the Venetians obedience. Strangers come twice into Italie, vnder the conduct of LEWIS Biſhop of Aquileia. CARMAGNOLLA forſaking PHILIP VISCONTE comes and ſerues the Venetians. Sundry opinions of the Senate touching the warre in behalfe of the Florentines, againſt PHILIP. And laſt of all, war is proclaimed againſt PHILIP: the Venetians being allied with the Florentines.

PEace continued three whole yeares, as well within the Citie as abroad; All which time, according to thoſe whom we follow, we finde no memorable accident to haue hapned. In the end whereof, being the yeare of our Saluation one thouſand foure hundred and nine, Ladiſlaus leauing Italie, departed towards Hungarie, to poſſeſſe his Fathers Kingdome. Hee made a ſtay in Dalmatia before Zara. This Prince was ſonne to the ſame Charles, who in the time of the Genoueſes warre, did for a while beſiege Treuiſo; from whence being afterward called, hee went into Apulia, to reuenge the death of King Andrew on Queene Ioane his wife, where he conquered the kingdom of Naples; but returning afterwards from Italie into Hungarie, he was murthered by his owne ſubiects. He left behinde him his ſonne Ladiſlaus, who in proceſſe of time, being likewiſe called to recouer his Fathers Kingdome, came, into Dalmatia, and recouered Zara, after hee had for a while beſieged it. In the meane time being aduertized by letters, that the Neapolitanes with diuers great Lords of the Kingdome were readie to rebell, fully reſoluing to returne into Italie, he ſold that Citie with her Territorie, Hauen, and other appurtenances to the Venetians for the ſumme of one hundred thouſand crownes crownes. Whereupon Franciſco Cornari, Leonardo Mocenigo, Antonio Contareni, and Fantino Michaeli, were ſent thither with a ſtrong Garriſon to take poſſeſſion thereof.

Ladiſlaus king of Hungarie, ſelleth Zara to the Venetians.

We finde in ſome others, that the Venetians receiued Zara before the Paduan warre was ended. This negotiation was very pleaſing to the whole Citie, as well in regard of the hauen, which is one of the moſt commodious in all Dalmatia, as alſo, becauſe it being reduced vnder their obedience did ſeeme to promiſe them the entire Dominion of Dalmatia, as it fell out ſoone afterward. Some ſay that the Venetians did together with Zara, buy of Ladiſlaus all his Title to Dalmatia. Whereupon they made generall Proceſſions in the Citie; and a decree was made, That the ſame day ſhould be kept holy.

Great contention among the Sibenſans.

Within few Moneths after, there aroſe great diſſenſion betwixt the Sibenſans; the Nobilitie holding for the Venetians, and the reſt of the people for the King of Hungarie. This ſeditious multitude did put on Armes, and hauing thruſt all the Gentlemen forth of the Citie, they tooke the publike gouernment into their owne hands. Thoſe who were expelled went to the Venetians, and hauing promiſed to yeeld themſelues vnto them, entreated them ſpeedily to paſſe ouer into Dalmatia, to recouer Sabenica. The Venetians did forthwith arme foure Gallies, with about fiftie other ſmaller veſſells. The Citie being beſieged, was not only well defended, but the Venetian was expulſed thence with great loſſe, whereby they knew that it behoued them to haue a greater Armie: whereupon, the Senate ſent thither Lodouico Buccecharino with great ſupplies to beſiege it by Land.

At his arriuall they built a Fort neare to the Citie, and all the paſſages were ſhut vp, that no victualls, armour, nor reliefe might come vnto it. And beſides, Ambaſſadours were ſent into Hungarie (Giouanni Barba, and Tomaſo Mocenigo, both of them being Prouidatori of S. Marke, went thither.) The affaires of the Sibenſans being for a while debated, was by the conſent of the Hungarian and the Venetians, referred to Pope Iohn to be decided.

But in this meane time Marſilio Carrario, and Brunora of Eſcalla, being then fugitiues in Germanie, did each of them by Letters and truſtie Meſſengers ſolicite their friends to ſtirre vp rebellion: whereof the Venetians being aduertized, it did greatly trouble them. At the laſt it was knowne by letters intercepted by chance, that Marſilio would be ſhortly at Padua, where certaine of the Inhabitants, who were louers of noueltie, had put him in hope to be kindly welcommed. One of thoſe who were faultie, being taken, and conuicted of the fact, was cut in foure quarters: And an other of them being brought backe from Ferrara to execution, loſt his head betwixt the two Columnes. Diuers were reported to haue a hand in the conſpiracie, but the Senate were of opinion that it was better to defer the puniſhment till ſome other time, thinking in the meane time that they had ſufficiently prouided for the Common-wealth, if by containing the Paduans in their dutie, they ſhould for feare of danger keepe the Tyrants farre from Italie. They appointed fiue thouſand crownes for reward to any that ſhould bring either of their heads to Venice.

Secret practizes of Marſilio Carrario, and Brunora of Eſcalla. The conſpiracie diſcouered.

About the ſame time, on the thirteenth of Auguſt, there hapned in the Citie ſo great a Tempeſt of Winde, Haile, and Raine, as diuers ſhips were caſt away, ſome being ſwallowed by the waues, and others daſht to peeces againſt the Sea-banks. Diuers buildings as well publike as priuate were ouerthrowne, and among others S. Sauiours ſteeple: Trees were pluckt vp by the rootes, and carried farre off by the violence of the winde. This was reputed for a wonderfull prodigie. And that which ſome affirmed, to haue ſeene diuers monſtruous and terrible repreſentations in the aire, did encreaſe mens feare and amazement. Two Moneths after, newes was brought to Venice, that the Scythians had robbed and ſpoiled the Faires of Tane, with great murther of Chriſtians, and that among others, diuers Venetians who were come thither with very rich merchandize, were ſlaine by the Barbarians. They had aſſured teſtimonie that this loſſe happened at Tane, on the ſelfe ſame day, as that horrible Tempeſt did afflict Venice. The ſteeple of S. Iohns Church at Rialto was the ſame yeare finiſhed. The order of the Celeſtines which was founded in the Church of S. George of Alega, was at the ſame time, by the purſute of Lorenzo Iuſtiniano, and other Honourable and deuout Perſons, made very famous and much frequented. This Order had at the beginning beſides theſe men, ſundrie other more rich Benefactors, among whome was Gabrieli Candelmaro, who being afterwards Pope, and called by the name of Eugenius, did much beautifie that place with buildings and reuennues.

A meruailous Storme.

The Faires of Tane robbed & ſpoiled by the Scythians.

At the ſame time one of thoſe foure Gallies which returned home loden with rich merchandize from France, was caſt away at the entrance of the Sicilian Sea, not by the violence of the winds or waues, but by the only ignorance of the Marriners. Thoſe who were within it were almoſt all ſaued, and the moſt part of the goods were recouered.

Pipus the Florentine makes incurſions on the Venetians Territorie.

Such was the ſtate then of the Common-wealth abroade and at home. But this quiet was diſturbed by the inuaſions of the Hungarians. For Pipus the Florentine ouer-running Italie at the ſame time with ten thouſand Horſe, made incurſions on the Venetian confines. The Venetian Annales make no mention, for what cauſe the Emperour Sigiſmond (in whoſe name the Tuſcan made theſe ſtirres in Italie) did beginne this Warre: But it was to bee preſumed that it was by reaſon of the ciuill Warre of the Forlani, the Lords and People of that Prouince contending about the publike Gouernement. Some of them would haue the Venetians, others the Hungarian, or the Biſhop of Aquileia: whereupon it came to paſſe that at Pipus his arriuall, Frederico Sauergnane with all his faction, being retired to Venice, thoſe of Vdina yeelded to him. Pipus hauing receiued Vdina, did forthwith come vpon the Treuiſan, and tooke from the Venetians, Serauall, Belluna, Feitre, and La Motte. It is certaine that the ſale of Zara made by Ladiſlaus, and the ſiege of Sibenſa were cauſe of all thoſe troubles. Some Authors neuertheleſſe doe affirme, that the King came into Italie at the purſute and entreatie of Brunora of Eſcalla, who did ſtill aſpire to his Fathers Principalitie. But whatſoeuer the occaſion of this Warre was, it is certaine that Pipus after diuers warlike exploits, being corrupted with money (as they ſay) did leaue the Prouince, and returned into Hungarie, where the Hungarian cauſed him to die, by pouring molten gold downe his throat: And that ſoone after he came downe into Italie with fortie thouſand men; others make the number leſſe. This latter attempt of Warre, albeit it carried a greater ſhew, yet was it not ſo fortunate as that of Pipus, for he did hardly paſſe the confines of the Forlani. Some Hiſtorians ſay that Sigiſmond did make Warre on the Venetians with Pipus. But whether it were ſo, or (as others affirme) a-part, it is certaine that the Venetians at the firſt report of this Warre, made great preparations of Souldiers and munition, and choſe Carolo Malateſte for Generall of their Armie, who was a man of great reputation, whom for that purpoſe they had called from his houſe. It is reported that they fought at times on the Treuiſan and Feltrian confines, as occaſion was preſented, & that the Hungarian did ſtill vſe ſuch crueltie, as all thoſe who fell into his hands, came from him lame of ſome of their members. For he did cauſe the priſoners hands to be cut off, and their eies to be put out. After hee had in this manner proſecuted the Warre for a time, they ſent Ambaſſadours to him. Franciſco Foſcari, Tomaſo Mocenigo, (who were afterwards Princes) and Antonio Cornari, came to his Camp and concluded a truce with him for fiue yeares.

The death of Pipus.

Great crueltie of the King of Hungarie.

Armes being laid a-ſide againſt Sigiſmond, Prince Steno ſoone after deceaſed in the thirteenth yeare of his Gouernment. His body was laid in S. Marinies Church.

¶ THOMASO MOCENIGO, the 64. Duke of Venice.

THomaſo Mocenigo who was abſent, was ſubrogated in his place. Hee was at the ſame time Ambaſſadour at Cremona to Gabrino Fondulo, from whence being called, hee came to the Citie, and was receiued of all men with great ioy.

At the beginning of his Gouernment certaine Magiſtrates were by the Senates decree tranſlated to Rialto: And to the three Tables which were there from the beginning, the fourth Proſenitica was added, called vulgarly the Meſſetaria. For that purpoſe a Palace was builded on La Riua de Ferro, where theſe foure Magiſtrates doe at this day execute Iuſtice. The great Douana was there at the beginning. Since then, it being diuided into two, that concerning the affaires of the firme Land hath ſtill remained there, and the other for marine matters, was tranſferred neare to the Church of the Trinitie.

The Citie was not long at reſt, a new warre being raiſed on the confines of the Forlani, concerning the contentions of Vdina. Lodouico Techia was at the ſame time Biſhop of Aquileia, who at his owne pleaſure gouerned the whole Prouince, which lieth betwixt the Riuers of Liuenza, and Timaua, the Adriatick Sea and the Alpes. Some Authors ſay that this Prouince belongeth to the Forlani. But the vulgar doe at this day call it Friul, and the Inhabitants the Countrie of Friul. There aroſe great ſtrife betwixt this Biſhop, and thoſe of Vdina, by reaſon that the Vdinois would haue thoſe of Sauergnane his faction, who in the laſt war tooke part with the Venetians, and in regard thereof being in a ſedition driuen thence, and were retired to the Venetians, to be called home into the Citie. Techia on the contrarie did impugne it, ſaying that he would neuer permit it. Whileſt the Citie of Vdina was in this contention, and by conſequent the whole Prouince almoſt, the Venetians ſeized on Sacila. The Biſhop perceiuing that the matter was to bee determined by armes, had recourſe to the King of Hungarie. For hee felt himſelfe too weake to deale with the Venetians.

Strife betwixt the Biſhop of Aquileia and the Vdinois.

In the meane time the Ciuidalians did yeeld to the Venetians, who kindly receiued them, not as vaſſalls, but as aſſociates. The Biſhop ſoone after returning from Hungarie with foure thouſand Hungarians, came (with the aide of the Patrians who had ſtill continued faithfull to him) and beſieged the Ciuidalians. But being ſtrengthened with a good Garriſon, which the Venetians had left there, they did without feare receiue the enemie, The Hungarians were before the Citie for the ſpace of fifteene daies, who hauing ſpoiled all places round about, being enforced by the great froſt and ſnow (for it was winter,) they raiſed their Campe.

The Ciuidalians yeeld to the Venetians.

The Venetians recouer Feltre, Belluna and other places.

The Biſhop being out of hope to effect any thing, did follow them into Hungarie: The Venetians recouered Feltre, Belluna, and other places which had beene loſt in that warre: they entred the Patrians confines, where they wholy ruined the Citie of Prata. Philippo Arcia was Generall of the Armie, one of the beſt experienced Captaines of his time. He (Prata being ruined) marched towards Vdina, where the gate on the ſide of Ciuitade, being opened to him by Fredericke and others of his partie, the Citie was then like to haue beene taken by that treacherie: But a great noiſe raiſed on a ſodaine, and the alarme giuen on euerie ſide all men ranne to armes. The Bandetti being amazed at this ſodaine and vnlookt for feare, hauing loſt diuers of their Souldiours who were at hand with the armed Squadrons of the Citie, retired without doing any thing. Afterward the Venetian Enſignes, ranne here and there vpon the Patrians territorie: and the Vdinois for certaine yeares were in danger. Diuers Cities and Lords of the Forlani did acknowledge the Venetians.

The Vdinois doe voluntarily yeeld to the Venetians

But the Vdinois perceiuing, that it was in vaine to expect reliefe from any place, and that the Biſhop his arriuall was vncertaine, they reſolued likewiſe to yeeld. Therefore they ſent their Agents to Venice, to offer vnto the Venetians their Lands and meanes as well publicke as particular, and in Generall all matters both diuine and humane. The Agents being friendly entertained, the Senate decreed that Fredericke and his aſſociates ſhould be reſtored to their Citie and their goods. By which decree not onely the Sauergnans but their adherents and all thoſe who had beene baniſhed, returned into the Citie and their inheritances. The whole Countrie of the Patrians in Friul, followed the example of the Vdinois. The Biſhop being aduertized of the Vdinois yeelding, thinking it no time to delay, came through Germanie with great troupes of Hungarians, and fell furiouſly on the Forlani: and at his arriuall in the ſtreights of the Alpes he tooke the Caſtle of Claſino, a moſt ſtrong and well defended place, and neere thereunto that of Mutiano, a place then, as now well fortified. And the Patrians were like to haue receiued a great loſſe, if the Venetian forces ſent thither for that purpoſe, had not opportunely by their arriuall, broken the enemies deſignes, who were ſtill in the ſtreights of the Alpes.

7 The Barrunis fly ſo ſoone as the venetians arriued.

The enemies did not onely refuſe to fight, but they durſt not attend the Venetians who came towards them; for they came into Italie with an intent rather to robbe and ſpoile, than make warre. And by this meanes within few daies after this great ſtirre, all the Countrie of the Patrians was at quiet, all thoſe places which the enemie had ſeized being eaſily recouered. Within a while after, the Biſhop returned into Italie with a greater Armie, and entring the Patrians confines, he aſſailed Manſane, and ſoone after Roſacia. But this iourney prooued as vnfortunate as the former whereof we now ſpake. The Venetians at the firſt newes of the enemies comming were in the field, whereat the Biſhop being greatly aſtoniſhed, departed forthwith out of Italie: And within a while after practizing noueltie he deceaſed. By his death the Vdinois and Patrians were afterward at quiet vnder the gouernement of the Venetians. Theſe things hapned abroad. But the Citie ſuſtained great loſſe by fire as it had oftentimes done before. The fire breaking forth on a ſodaine from the Dukes Palace, did in an inſtant take hold on Saint Markes Church which is verie neere to the ſame, where the flame did ſo terribly encreaſe as the lead beeing melted, (wherewith it was then couered as it is at this day) there was nothing left but the open vaults. They tooke great paines neere to the Church to keepe the fire from the neighbour-houſes. The fire being quenched, the Senate decreed, that no man vnder paine of forfeiting a thouſand Ducats, ſhould dare to propound to the Senate to pluck downe the old Palace and to reedifie it more ſumptuouſly. It is reported, that then the Prince, preferring the honour of the Common-wealth before his owne priuate profit, brought the ſame ſumme to the Senate, and requeſted

The Ducall Palace for the moſt part burnt.

ſted the Senators that they would permit & command, that the fore-part of the Ducal Palace, which was much defaced, might be reedified in more ſumptuous manner as was befitting for the maieſtie of the Common-wealth. The publicke Aduocates and Procurators, did forthwith craue that the Prince might pay the forfeiture for that he had enfringed the Senates decree. The Prince hauing liberally paid the ſumme, did ſo conſtantly purſue his propoſition, as the Senate reuoked their former decree, and ordained that the Palace ſhould be new built, whereupon the ancient ſtructure was pluckt down, and another more ſumptuous was begunne. But the Prince dyed before it was finiſhed after he had gouerned ten yeares and almoſt three months. His bodie was buried in the Church of the Twinnes. Franciſco Foſcari ſucceeded him.

The Prince is conſtrained to paie the forfeiture for infringing the Senats decree.

The occaſion of the warr againſt Philip Duke of Milan.

¶ FRANCISCO FOSCARI, the 65. Duke of Venice.

HIs promotion was ſo pleaſing to all the people, and to the whole Venetian State, as in ſigne of gladneſſe there was no holy day for one whole yeare, wherein fight at Barriers, running at Ring, or other ſundrie ſhewes were not preſented. The yeare following the Porch of Rialto was builded at the charges of Scipioni Boa, and afterward built new againe by him, becauſe the former building was thought to be of no long continuance. The ſame yeare likewiſe, warre was begunne againſt Philip Duke of Milan. The cauſe of which painefull and tedious warre we muſt fetch from farre, to the end that all men may know that it was not vndertaken raſhly or without cauſe againſt ſo mightie a Prince, and a great friend as then to the Venetians, but that they were conſtrained ſo to doe.

This Philip was ſonne to Galeas Viſconte, who being left verie young with Iohn Maria his eldeſt brother, did looſe a great part of his Principalitie. For Galeas being dead, diuers Tyrants and pettie Kings, beginning to ſtirre here and there, each of them ſeized on one or many Townes of his Dukedome: and like a bodie, being left in the middeſt of them, they tare it in peeces. But in ſucceſſion of time, as well by his owne valour as that of Franciſco ſurnamed Carmagnolla, one of the greateſt Captaines of thoſe daies, hee did not onely recouer the greateſt part of that which did belong to his deceaſed father, but by a wonderfull courſe of victorie became maſter of diuers Townes which were neuer poſſeſſed by his Anceſtors. At the laſt comming to beſiege Genoa, and the Genoueſes being brought to all extremitie, it is certaine that they were relieued by the Florentines with a great ſumme of money, on condition that they ſhould giue them for aſſurance of the lent ſumme, the Citie of Liuorne a verie ſtrong place on the mouth of Arno. Philip perceiuing that the ſame warre would beget matter of new diſſenſion, did neuertheleſſe diſſemble, deferring the reuenge till ſome other time.

ſumme

He had determined (as he ſaid afterward) to ſuccour Pope Martin, whom he vnderſtood to be baſely dealt with by his neighbours: Whereupon he gaue out that he tooke armes for that purpoſe, and marching forward, he did fight with and deſeate the Florentines neere to Zagonare, becauſe (as he ſaid) they would haue ſtopt his paſſage. But it was ſufficiently knowne to all men that Angelo Pergoleſi, who at the ſame time did ſo fortunately winne the battaile againſt the Tuſcans, was ſent by Philip to raiſe the Florentines campe before Forli, the inhabitants hauing entreated him ſo to do. But vpon what occaſion ſoeuer it was that the Armie came thither, it is certaine that the warres being begun in thoſe quarters, it came to paſſe afterwards that the Florentines by the careleſneſſe of their Captaines (or rather by their owne malice as ſome haue thought) being vanquiſhed at diuers times, after ſundrie loſſes, thought vpon nothing more than how to preſerue their libertie. And becauſe there was ſome likelihood, that they could not long without ſome forraine aide reſiſt the force of Philip, they reſolued to haue recourſe to the Venetians, whome they had attempted at the beginning by diuers Ambaſſadors to draw into that warre.

The Duke of Milan his victorie ouer the Florentines.

At the laſt they ſent Lorenzo Ridolpho their Ambaſſador to Venice, to entreat and exhort them to contract alliance with them againſt Philip, with this charge; That if their entreaties would not moue the Senate, that he ſhould aduertize the Senators of the danger that was like to enſue; that hauing ouerthrowne the Florentines, he would ſtriue to doe as much to the Venetians. For as touching the euent of the preſent warre, he ſhould giue them to vnderſtand, that they would defend their libertie againſt that cruel enemy, ſo long as their forces and meanes would giue them leaue: but if he ſhould perceiue the Venetians to incline and giue eare to the proſperous ſucceſſe of Philip, to aſſure them that it would be too late to talke of peace at ſuch time as Florence being beſieged, all things ſhould fall out contrarie to them. But becauſe it was for one man to commit the error, they would endeuour to free themſelues of this warre, in becomming tributarie to him, and then it would come to paſſe that the Venetians would perceiue how that it had beene more expedient for them to haue made warre in the Florentines companie, vpon him who would one day become their enemie, than afterward to vndergoe the whole burthen alone. And being thus inſtructed to moue the Venetians on all ſides, he departed from Florence.

The Florentines' ambaſſage to the Venetians.

But the Senators hauing beene alreadie ſundrie times importuned by the Florentines (for they had ſtill for two yeares ſpace continued their ſolicitings for that purpoſe) had to that end ſent diuers times to Philip: Firſt Andrea Contarent, and Lorenzo Bragadino were ſent vnto him. Then Nicolao Maripetro, who was afterward followed by Andrea Mocenigo, and the laſt of all was Franciſco Serra one of the Secretaries; all of them being commaunded to entreat, & exhort him to giue ouer the warre againſt the Florentines, and hauing laid by Armes, to referre himſelfe to the Venetians for all wrongs which he could pretend to haue receiued of them, albeit they knew well enough that if the Florentines had offended him, they had alreadie receiued ſufficient puniſhment. Beſides, that the Venetians did highly account of his alliance, the which they were reſolued to entertaine ſo long as they ſhould perceiue it not to be preiudiciall to their libertie: Neither had they forgotten humanitie, which did conſtraine them to haue pitie and compaſſion of a free people. They did then entreat him if he deſired to continue their allie, and to haue them for his friends, to make peace with the Florentines, the which ought to be as pleaſing to him, as to any of thoſe whom it neereſt concerned. Philip heard them verie courteouſly, & gaue them to vnderſtand both by geſture and word, that he would in fauor of the Venetians grant their demaunds: yet neuertheleſſe, he did not ceaſe vnder

Venetian Ambaſſadors ſent to Duke Philip.

Philip his diſſimulation.

hand

vnderſtand ſtreightly to preſſe the Tuſcans, alledging now one reaſon, and then another, and by diſſembling drew the matter forth at length. The Venetians albeit they knew whereunto Philips deſignes tended, neuertheleſſe becauſe they would not ſeeme to doe any thing raſhly, they did laſt of all ſend Paulo Cornari to him, to giue him to vnderſtand what the Senate had determined to doe, if he did not preſently ceaſe from moleſting the Florentines: Franciſco Carmagnolla his comming to them (who had forſaken Philip) had in ſome ſort heartned them to warre, if ſo be that he did not lay aſide his armes, ſeeing they were before then doubtfull openly to denounce warre againſt him. This man hauing vnderſtood by vicious young men (for ſo he termed them) that Philip did no more beare him the ſame affection that he was wont, with cholericke ſpeeches and threats he forſooke him, and came by by-waies to Trerte, and from thence to Treuiſo.

Carmagnolla leaueth Philip, and commeth to the Venetian.

Now this which followeth is in effect that which Cornari ſpake to Philip. That among all the Princes of the earth he did not know any man who was more bound to giue thanks to Almighty God than Philip: Becauſe he had not only recouered his loſt principalitie for the moſt part, but likewiſe by an admirable ſucceſſe had wonderfully encreaſed it: That he did peaceably enioy that part of Italie, the which in fertilitie of ſoyle, in goodly and rich Cities, and in number of skilfull and ingenious men, either in time of peace to till the earth, or in time of war to beare Armes, was not only to be compared, but wholly to be preferred before any other Region whatſoeuer. But his eſtate being ſuch as it was, he did not referre the ſucceſſe therof to the diuine prouidence, by ſaying that his youth, induſtrie, ſtrength, and wiſdome were not worthie of ſuch a fortune, the which without all doubt were ſufficient to conquer a verie great Kingdom or Empire, & being conquered; brauely to defend it; but that his ſpeech rather tended to this, to put him in mind, that being placed in ſo high degree, he ought not to forget humane affaires, nor the vncertaintie of them, but to be contented with his owne eſtate. The which the Venetians did hope would fall out according to their deſire: in regard whereof they had freely made firme alliance with him for ten yeares, which was not a limited treatie, but a perpetuall league of friendſhip. Which being ſo, the Venetians did greatly meruaile that hauing recouered his fathers Dukedome with many other Cities, and among others Genoa, enemies in times paſt of their greatneſſe, at ſuch time as in the middeſt of ſo many felicities he ought to take his eaſe, he had ſeiſed on Forli in Flaminia, and had marched into Tuſcanie againſt the Florentines: That they were not ignorant of the pretence he alleadged, that the Florentines had contrarie to the agreement relieued the Genoueſes with money, that they had ſeized on Liuorne, at ſuch time as Genoa was alreadie in a manner taken. Nor were the Venetians likewiſe ignorant, what theſe pretences were, and whereunto they tended; that the common prouerbe was true: That man who is cunningly dealt with, doth ſometimes as plainly perceiue the deceit as he that vſeth it. And that it oftentimes commeth to paſſe that bad deſignes fall vpon the Authors heads. Beſides, that the Venetians held nothing in this world ſo deere as libertie, that vnto it alone they referred all iuſtice, clemencie, pietie, and all other duties as well publike as particular, thinking all things to be well done, which are done by the onely contemplation thereof. That there was no contract, agreement, nor any diuine or humane law, that was able to empeach the publike libertie: And to come to the matter in queſtion; That the Venetians were no leſſe moued with the Florentines danger, than if they perceiued the Armie of Philip to ouerrunne the lands of their obedience. For by being careſull of the libertie of other men, in regard they held the ſame forme of gouernment, as the Florentines did, it hapned to them as to diuers others, who were as ſorrowfull for the harme of their neighbours, as for their owne. And that they did not doubt but that he who as an enemie doth aſſaile the libertie in Tuſcanie, would likewiſe if he could do the like euerie where; and chiefly tyrants, who do euer feare & deteſt this name of libertie. That when the Venetians made a league with Philip, it was with

The effect of Cornari his Oration to Philip.

„ with this intent to continue frenids and allies with him ſo long, as he being ſatisfied
„ with his Fathers principallitie, ſhould abſtaine from moleſting his neighbours, and „ ſhould liue in peace and quiet: But that they could not allowe, nor would by no
„ meanes ſuffer him by a continuall warre ſtill to moleſt the Florentines, whoſe
„ only fault hath beene in that they did not valiantly defend themſelues: wherefore
„ if he did not ſpeedily diſlodge forth of Flaminia and Tuſcanie; if hee did not re-
„ maine within his owne confines limited by the agreement, and ſatisfying himſelfe
„ with ſo flouriſhing an eſtate did not hereafter liue at peace: the Venetians, as well
„ to defend themſelues as their friends the Florentines, would both together make „ warre vpon him, and leauie the greateſt forces againſt him they could, as againſt
„ a Tyrant and cruell enemie.

Philip his anſwere to Cornari

Cornari his ſpeech did greatly moue Philip; who diſſembling his anger for that preſent, anſwered him with a ſmiling countenance in few wordes, ſaying, That hee was well aſſured that the Venetians by their conſtant and faithfull promiſe would euer obſerue the agreement ſworne betwixt them, and that hee could not beleeue, though there were none at all, that they would preferre the Florentines friendſhip (whoſe treacheries, deceits, and thefts, the Venetians did greatly deteſt both in publique and particular) before his: That there was no occaſion (if the Venetians would call to memorie the ancient friendſhip of his Anceſtours, the affection of his Father Galeas, and the reſpect which hee had euer borne to them) whereby hee ought to expect any wrong or diſcontent from them. But as concerning warre, albeit hee knew for a certaine that the Florentines treacherie and raſhneſſe would be puniſhed, before that the Venetians or any other could come to their ſuccour; their affaires being in very great hazard: yet neuertheleſſe hee was content for the Venetians ſake, vnto whome hee would refuſe nothing, to referre the whole matter, (if the Florentines were ſo contented) to be decided by them, and Nicholao of Æſte.

Cornari being diſmiſſed with this anſwere, returned to Venice. Giouanni Aretin who had beene Secretarie to deceaſed Galeas, and Bertrand Lamponiano did ſoone after follow him. For, the report was that new Ambaſſadors were come to Venice from the Florentines: And therefore Philip fearing leaſt the Venetians who were already of themſelues ſufficiently enclined to leaue him, ſhould make a league with the Florentines; he would likewiſe haue his Amdaſſadours to bee there, to the end that if need were, they might plead his cauſe in the Senate.

The Ambaſſadours of Philip come to venice.

The Florentines Ambaſſadour at Venice.

So ſoone as they were arriued: the Ambaſſadours were ſeene to walke vp and downe the Citie in different manner. Lorenzo (as it became him) repreſenting with a ſorrowfull countenance the miſerie which afflicted his Countrie, went here and there penſiue and diſconſolate, entreated the Senators whome hee met with, and viſited others at home at their houſes, omitting nothing that hee knew might ſerue for his purpoſe. On the contrarie thoſe of Philip, beſides their brauerie and goodly ſhew, being full of hope and confidence, went vp and downe viewing the Citie, and the admirable ſituation thereof, wondring to ſee it all Sea, and yet all Land. They did curteouſly ſalute all men: being demaunded any queſtion, they gently anſwered, and generally in their geſture, ſpeech and gate, they repreſented the greatneſſe and proſperitie of their Prince.

Now the Senatours were of opinion firſt to giue audience to the Tuſcan, who being brought into the Senate ſpake in this manner.

The Oration of the Florentine Ambaſſador.

YEe may eaſily coniecture, moſt excellent Prince, and yee conſcript Fathers, albeit I were ſilent, what buſineſſe I haue to handle in your preſence, and whereunto this laſt Ambaſſade of the Florentines doth tend. Thoſe who haue ſeene my ſpeedie comming out of Tuſcanie vnto this Citie, haue vnderſtood, that an Anbaſſadour of a free Citie, is come to demaund aide of a free people for the conſeruation of their libertie. This is the ſumme of our demaunds, the wich I craue for our Countrie, which hath begotten and bred vs, and raiſed vs vp into ſome degree of honour aboue the vulgar, and if it bee poſsible, by our entreaties, to obtaine it. If I ſhall be ſo happie, moſt excellent Prince, and ye Senators, as to perſwade yee to accept of the Florentines alliance, and to ioyne your armes with ours againſt this cruell Tyrant who thirſteth after our libertie and yours, my Ambaſſadge ſhall bee moſt fortunate, and my Countrie being highly contented, ſhall welcome mee home with teares of ioy, will embrace me for ſuch good newes, and will account it ſelfe by your meanes to be freed from all danger. My deſire maketh me to hope well, and chiefly when I conſider, that I come vnto thoſe, who beſides their knowledge (which doth no leſſe concerne them than the Florentines) how to quench and roote out the Tyrants neighbour forces, as though it were a new fire, are eſteemed to be ſo zealous of libertie, whercin their Citie is borne and encreaſed, as they will likewiſe wholly maintaine, and free all ſuch places from wrong, where they perceiue any ſparke of libertie to ſhine, and will with a mutuall conſent hate all Tyrants, as enemies and diſturbers thereof. I could alleage diuers examples, how for loue to this libertie, the Athenians accounted Philip of Macedon for an enemie, the Romans Mithridates, Antiochus, and diuers others, who with an vnbrideled deſire of rule, or rather enuying the libertie of other men, did raſhly ſtirre vp againſt themſelues, the Armies of that inuincible nation. But wherefore doe we ſeeke ancient or forraine examples, when we haue in abundance ſo many new and domeſtick: There is none of vs (as I thinke) which hath not ſeene or heard of their Fathers and Mothers, how vehement an enemie to this Citie Prince Carrario ſhewed himſelfe, during the Warre with the Genoueſes, firſt at Chioggia, and then at Treuiſo. What did King Lewis? what did many others who haue not ceaſed to diſturbe the peace and quiet of your ſtate? And we likewiſe haue euer without intermiſſion had an hereditarie Warre with the Viſcontes, euer ſince the Principalitie of Luchin. And to ſpeake truly, it is commonly ſeene, that thoſe who haue vſurped other mens libertie, doe hate thoſe vnto whom they cannot doe as much. I eſteeme your Common-wealth moſt happie, and your ſelues O yee Venetian Fathers, in that yee haue extinguiſhed the Carrarians race your capitall enemies, before ſuch time as this rauening Lyon, with whom we haue to doe, was growne great: For if he had now found them liuing, he would not haue beene ſatisfied with aſſailing you only on the Lakes of Bebia, (as they did) but comming both by Land and Water, he would not only haue endangered your ſtate, but your libertie it ſelfe: whereupon I thinke that it fell out well for vs that day that you ſmothered that neighbour flame; vnleſſe the great aſſurance which you haue conceiued by that victorie, doth hinder you from thinking on the danger, which threatneth you from this cruell Tyrant. He is your enemie, beleeue me, he is your enemie, and lieth in wait on euery ſide, and therefore ſo much the more dangerous as he is yet leaſt knowne, and there is nothing ſo difficult, which he preſumeth not to atchieue by his good fortune, or dareth not to attempt. For, hauing with ſeuen thouſand men aſſailed our forces, who were then excellent in Armes, meanes, and good fortune, and ſometimes, twiſe or thriſe greater than his, hee hath neuertheleſſe broken and defeated them, ſooner than we thought that he had deſcried them. He hath no Gyants (according to the Poets fictions) or cruell Centaures in his Armie: They be men like ours, but much more hardie and valiant, vnto whom he hath giuen in marriage, the Daughters and Wiues of wretched Citizens, with their Houſes, Lands, and Poſſeſſions. Whereunto doe you now thinke that their haughtie courages will not aſpire? Is it likely that they thinke or deſire any other matter, than after that they ſhall haue ouerthrowne our forces, how they may one day aſſaile the Venetians more mightie than wee in reputation and power, ſo greatly greatly hath their good ſucceſſe encreaſed their boldneſſe. Let vs then finde meanes to ouerthrow their wicked Councells, and deteſtable vowes, to expell their Wiues and Children, with their Gouernours of Cities, Fields, and Townes, from the confines of Lombardie, and to enforce them to buſie themſelues about their owne domeſtick affaires, or elſe to take forraine pay. I am afraide, moſt excellent Prince, to ſpeake what I thinke; yet I will tell it, ſeeing that neceſsitie enforceth me thereunto: That vnleſſe yee ſpeedily ioyne your forces with ours, Florence being ſubdued, will bring Philip to that paſſe, that without the aide of any elſe he will come to diſturbe and beate downe the Venetians State. But (ſay yee) the Venetians are accuſtomed to maintaine their alliances as ſacred and inuiolate. I beſeech God, moſt excellent Prince, and yee conſcript Fathers, that thoſe vnto whom he hath giuen ſo good a minde to obſerue their promiſe, may likewiſe know the cunning and deceits of thoſe with whome they are to deale, and being knowne, to auoide them by ſpeedie wiſedome. I thinke yee remember, with what ſubtiltie and craft he deceiued you when as he expelled Pandolfo Malateſte from his State, and from that of his Mother, whome yee ſo much deſired to maintaine in the Principalitie of Breſcia. Yee haue heard how by deceit, and contrarie to the agreement, hee hath ſuppreſſed the Soueraigne Magiſtrate of Genoa, and brought that mightie Citie into bondage. Yee are not ignorant likewiſe, how contrarie to the aſſurance of peace, infringing all lawes and cuſtomes, he hath ouerthrowne vs by a ſodaine and vnlookt-for aſſault: who is it then which doth not plainly ſee how often he hath broken all Diuine and Humane lawes? It is not lawfull to keepe promiſe with a periured perſon. But your ſilence doth make me alreadie in a manner to beleeue, that yee doe ſufficiently know, that I doe not ſo much craue by this mine aduertizement the ſafetie of our Common-wealth, as your proſperitie, good fortune, and preſeruation, the which this perfidious, craftie, and well aduiſed, great Souldier, no leſſe audacious than readie, doth daily lay wait for; truſting to the fidelitie of his Souldiers, to the treaſure which he hath gathered together, and to the great yearely tribute which he receiueth, deferring to make Warre on you, till he hath wholly ruined vs. But doe not contemne our alliance, although we ſeeme to be reduced to all extremitie: For albeit we haue without meaſure ſpent great wealth, we haue yet greater, though not publike, yet particular, the which we are readie franckly to employ, for the preſeruation of our libertie. Ioyne then your armes, ioyne your forces with ours, and by wholeſome Counſell and Sacred alliance, conſerue both our Liberties, Common-wealths, and Countries. And as concerning the meanes how to accompliſh it, we preſcribe no conditions, but are readie to embrace ſuch as yee ſhall propound.

Lorenzo hauing ended his ſpeech, all the Senators were greatly moued; not one againſt an other; but in themſelues being of ſundrie opinions, each of them debating with himſelfe the power of Philip on the one ſide, with the Common-wealths danger, and on the other the Florentines example, with the great expence of the warre. Whereupon they concluded to heare the Ambaſſadours of Philip, before they would giue an anſwere. And to the end they might make an eaſie reply to that which Lorenzo had vttered, certaine Senators were commanded to relate to the Milanois, vnder colour of particular friendſhip, that which he had ſpoken. Whereupon, a day being appointed for their comming to the Senate, Giouanni Aretin famous for humane learning, and eloquent in the Countrie language, with the conſent of his fellow, ſpake in this manner.

The Oration of Giouanni Aretin.

I Vnderſtand, moſt Illuſtrious Prince, that the Florentines who are great enquirers after newes, are deſirous ouer the whole Citie to know wherefore, and vpon what occaſion, Philip Duke of Milan hath ſent vs hither to you, and to this moſt Sacred Senate: whome in ſome ſort to ſatisfie, I will in few words vtter the effect of our Ambaſſade; and I aſſure my ſelfe that when they ſhall vnderſtand it, it will not greatly content them. We are not then come hither, conſcript Fathers, to ſtirre vp any troubles, nor for to ouer-turne any Diuine or Humane Law. Philip leaueth leaueth thoſe cunnings to the Florentines, vnto whom by nature they belong: For he thinketh on nothing more, than carefully to obſerue the precepts and documents which he hath receiued from his Anceſtors, and how to reuerence by all good meanes and offices your friendſhip, confederacie, and good will. And ſeing that by the diuine bountie it is come to paſſe that it is not needfull in ſuch a bond of friendſhip, to renew any treatie of peace or alliance betwixt you and him, the Florentines muſt giue place, and with their good leaue (if they pleaſe) to permit Philip according to his owne manner, and that of his Anceſtors, to ſalute you, moſt excellent Prince, and all theſe well-beloued Senators, by his Ambaſſadours, together with the whole Citie: Let it be lawfull for vs to ſay, that Philip liueth not but for the good of the Common-wealth: that the Duke of Milan an inward friend to the Venetians, liues not but to preſerue their dignitie and greatneſſe: who for the great loue he beares them, and in regard of the ſound alliance and contract betwixt you two, and in reſpect of the correſpondence of all fortunate and happie euents, that he hath with you, giues yee to vnderſtand, that his enemies the Florentines, are ouerthrowne & vndone, who by euill counſell, would with a ſhameles boldneſſe haue ouer-whelmed him, if hee had not diligently preuented it, in a moſt dangerous warr. This is moſt wiſe Fathers, this is the chiefe end of our Ambaſſade. This is the cauſe why Philip hath commanded vs to come hither. Moreouer becauſe we haue vnderſtood, that theſe men goe about with an affected ſpeech, wherewith they naturally helpe themſelues, and with teares and ſighs, ſay, not onely in the Senate, but likewiſe in the ſtreets and publicke places of the Citie, that they are not the cauſe of the warre, for which they are at this day ſo badly delt with; that Philip did beginne it; he willingly referreth the whole matter to your iudgement, being reſolued to embrace ſuch conditions as ye ſhall propound: Let the Florentines if ye pleaſe, come into this place, and excuſe themſelues: but let them not inuent vnheard of falſities, whereby they endeuour to animate againſt all right and alliance, your Authoritie & conſtancie againſt Philip. Ye muſt (ſay they) beware of him, if his power doe encreaſe: For all Kings Princes, and Tyrants, doe enuie and are enemies to Common-wealths, and doe abhorre that name. They alleadge Philip of Macedon, Mithridates, and Antiochus; I would he had remembred Porſenna, who by a ſodaine warre did in a manner ſmother the Romans libertie at her firſt birth: But he did of purpoſe forget it (as I thinke) becauſe he would not haue it knowne that Tuſcanie hath in times paſt brought forth any, who hath attempted on other mens libertie. But if they take ſuch delight in Hiſtories, why doe they not rather alleadge Hieron, Maſſiniſſa, the Ptolomies and Attalus, who were truſtie friendt to the Romans. King Lewis was a capitall enemie to the Venetians, ſo were the Carrarians; but the Viſcontes, for a hundred yeares ſpace that they haue enioyed their excellent State, were neuer enemies, but alwaies friends and allies to the Venetians. The Tuſcan hath not knowne this; nay rather, knowing it, he hath like a ſubtill and cunning Orator of purpoſe concealed it. Let him produce but one onely example of this family which doth ſo much affect you, he cannot doe it, and therefore it is ſufficient to ouerthrow his vntruethes, fables and ſlanders. And not to ſpeake of his Anceſtors, ſo farre off were the Venetians from euer ſuſpecting the forces of Galeas father to this Philip (which vndoubtedly were verie great) as on the contrarie he did not let to ioyne his Armes with their forces, the better to helpe to increaſe theirs. As it fell out at ſuch time as being your allie, he tooke Verona, Vincenza, Padua, and laſt of all Treuiſo. Yee haue ſeene this my Lords (to the end that no man may reproue me of falſe-hood) or you may haue heard it of your fathers who were there preſent. But the Viſcontes haue euer beene enemies to the Florentines, and haue ſtill from father to ſonne euen till now, made warre vpon them. Doe you not thinke that they had iuſt cauſe ſo to doe? Were they not by wrongs prouoked to take Armes? For to ſpeake of the occaſion of this preſent warre, by which they ſay they are greatly moleſted. They complaine of the taking of Forli contrarie to the Contract as if wee had neuer heard of this fable till now: Philip hath giuen you all authoritie together with Prince D'Æſte, to enquire this matter. Why doe they not rather tell, vpon what cauſe againſt all right they did ſuccour the Genoueſes with a great ſumme of money, whileſt Philip beſieged them? why did they attempt to ſhut vp all paſſages to the Armie of Philip, which went to ſuccour Pope Martin? what mooued them them to paſſe their bounds on the confines of the Riuer Migra? why did they ſeize on Liuorne? and would not giue audience to the Commiſſioners of Philip, till they had head-long throwne him vnto the hazard of an open warre? Theſe are the cauſes which haue now mooued Philip to vndertake this warre: The ſame cauſe likewiſe had the Viſcontes in times paſt. They can impute it to nothing but to their owne manner of life, their pride, and couetouſneſſe. Let them ceaſe then before you to blame our Prince, a friend to peace and quietneſſe, and one that is ſtuffed with all bountie and liberalitie. But we are ſatiſfied (being prouoked thereunto) that we haue anſwered this little, for much more which might be ſaid, which is ſo true as they themſelues, albeit they are vaine lyers, dare not affirme the contrarie. As for the reſt, we haue alreadie ſaid and will againe ſay, that Philip is readie and reſolued to referre the whole matter to your iudgement, wiſedome and equitie. We are come hither to this purpoſe, and not (as the Tuſcan preſumeth) to renew the alliance, which hath not yet beene violated by you nor by vs euer ſhall.

So ſoone as Aretine had made an end of ſpeaking, the Ambaſſadours were put forth of the Senate: And then the Senators opinions were diuers: Some cried out that Philip was to be preuented, and warre to be denounced againſt him, who drawing forth the matter in length, durſt not aſſaile them till he had vanquiſhed the Florentines: Others ſaid it behooued them to beware leaſt they vndertooke ſuch a matter inconſideratly; and that it was verie eaſie for any man to beginne warre, but verie hard to end it. Vpon this diuerſitie of opinions, they decreed to call Carmagnolla into the Senate, and to heare him.

Different opinions of the Senators.

Carmagnolla is called into the Senate.

This man after his arriuall at Treuiſo, was euer highly extolled, both in publick & priuate by Prince Foſcari and all his adherents, publiſhing his great renowne and experience in martiall matters, with his long and faithfull ſeruice to Philip a moſt vnthankefull Prince. They affirmed that without all doubt vnder the conduct of ſuch a man, (who knew Philips forces, and was well acquainted with all his deſignes yea with his moſt inward ſecrets) they might eaſily breake and ouerthrowe all the attemps of the Milanois. That which the Prince and his fauorites ſaid of Carmagnolla was true; but many did ſuſpect his loyaltie, fearing that after he ſhould haue thrown the Venetians into the hazard of warre, being wonne by faire promiſes, hee might againe returne to Philip.

But to cleare this doubt, it happened at the ſame time as this matter was debated, or not long before, that he had like to haue beene poiſoned by Iohn Alitprand the Milanois. This man had in time before married the daughter of Bernabo Viſconte, but becauſe he had fauoured Hector de Monze whome Philip beſieged, fearing the vanquiſhers furie, had retired with his wife to Treuiſo. And in regard thereof Carmagnolla did often viſit him, as one whome he knew to bee greatly hated of Philip. He in meane time being reconciled to Viſconte did determine to poiſon his friend and gueſt, but being apprehended by the accuſation of his maide-ſeruant, and put to the torture, he confeſſed the matter, and had his head ſtricken off. The Senators then imagining that which fell out, that the ſame had more animated Carmagnolla againſt Philip (for he was at the ſame time come from the firme land to Venice) they called him into the Senate, where (being by nature chollericke) he beganne to inueigh againſt Philip, complaining with great vehemencie of his treacherie and ingratitude, ſaying That by his skill and diligence, hee had not onely recouered his fathers ſtate, but much more beſide: That by his conduct and dexteritie, he had reduced vnder his dominion, Alexandria, Nouarra, Monza, Lauda, Coma, Pauia, Placentia, Bergamo, Cremona, Breſsia, and laſt of all Genoa, enuious in times paſt of the Venetians greatneſſe: And that therby he had extolled the name of Philip, not onely beyond the confines of Italie, but of Europe, in regard of the taking of Genoa. And that he would not haue them to thinke that his labours had beene recompenced becauſe that he had beene greatly honoured by him and married a wife of that kindred, and taken vpon him the ſurname of that familie: for that was no remuneration for his paines, but a bond of his militia, ſo as by that meanes, this vnthankefull man had had tyed him to serue him till such time as he perceiued his affaires to be settled according to his wish, as the euent did afterwards manifest. For besides his suffering of certaine shamelesse and detestable persons, whome he abused, to slander him, and in that regard holding him in some suspect, had enforced him retire thence, he had moreouer being thus banished attempted to take away his life. But that it fell out well for him, for that escaping the present danger in recompence of his Countrie, wife and children, and all his meanes left to a Tyrant, he had met with another true nurserie of all integritie and iustice, where euerie man was rewarded according to his deserts, where vertue and valour were honored, and where bad men had none accesse nor retreat: which being so, he did not thinke on his lost wealth, but that he had purchased much greater: That he felt not himselfe to be danted by any aduerse fortune, but that he was well recompenced for all his losses, were it not that his wife and children did so abate his courage, as he had not the meanes to hurt that Tyrant. As for the warre which they propounded, he said that Philips power, nor his forces were not so great as men bosted: And that the Florentines were not vanquished by the valour and conduct of their enemies, but by the malice and rashnesse of their owne Captaines: Nor that the other victories obtained in former time, were gotten by Philips conduct, but by his alone. And besides, that he was but needie, in regard he had spent all his meanes on those Armies which he had sent forth by Sea and Land against the King of Arragon, so as that Armie which he now had in Tuscanie had not of a long time receiued any paye. That he durst affirme, that Philip whome they thought in shew to haue alreadie surmounted all men, was in effect neerer to be vanquished than to vanquish: That his treasure cleane was exhausted, his subiects consumed, & his reuenue in a manner wholy engaged, and that little which remained, was by his detestable and shamelesse loues, rob'd, spoiled, and consumed: That he knew of a certaine that his Armie had not beene paid for the space of a whole yeare: and that the report of some was not true, which said that his Souldiours followed him to the wars freely and without money. He willed them then to consider what might happen, if the Venetians should roundly assaile the people of Lumbardy who were drawn drie of their wealth by continuall subsidies: If the Lombard merchants were prohibited their traffick with them, which was onely left thē of all Italie: if their husbandmen and cattell should be enforced to retire into the circuit of their wals, their lands would become barren & vnfruitfull: if after the spoile of one years fruit famine and want of all necessaries should afflict them, they should then perceiue, that he who now was thought a Conquerour, and whose onely name was fearfull to all men, being by these meanes vanquished, would find enough to doe to defend himselfe and his subiects. And that they should not find him such an one in beating backe his enemies, as he had been before, in inuading & pursuing them. Moreouer that the Florentines forces were great at the first, but that those of the Venetians were much greater. That there was great difference in making warre in a forrain Countrie, & in a mans owne. That his reputation could much auaile them in that enterprize, as hee who had fortunatly ended all the warres which hee had begunne, and vanquished all those against whome hee had fought, and had learned by so many hazards, dangers, and labours, both to obay and commaund. But as concerning Philips good will towardes the Venetians (because by longe conuersing with him, hee knew all his secrets) hee assured them that he did deferre the warre, which he had long since resolued in his minde against the Venetians, till such time as hee should wholly ouerthrowe the Florentines. Hee wished them then whilest they had time to quench this flame which was so neare them: and if they thought him fit to manage the warre for the seruice of the Common-wealth, hee entreated them to vse the power which they had ouer him. Because hee was determined in regard of Philips ingratitude, to march against him with the same zeale, affection and heate of courage to his ouerthrow, as hee had done when hee was his friend to purchase him the soueraigne Principallitie. The Venetians should doe well then to embrace so faire an occasion, who in so doing should not alone defend their owne estate, but mightily enlarge it, and should aide the Florentines their fellow brethren in libertie, who were then greatly afflicted. And this ought chiefely to excite them so to doe, in that they had him for their Generall in this warre, whom if they thought fit to serue them they might dispose of at their pleasure. They might peraduenture emploie others more excellent in valour and reputation than himſelfe, but none who was more affectionate to the Venetian people, nor with more iuſt cauſe and vehemencie animated againſt their enemie.

Carmagnolla by his diſcourſe had ſo well mooued the Senatours, as all of them in a manner inclined to warre. Prince Foſcari thinking it vnfit to ſtand ſtill in ſo faire a way, did with great vehemencie purſue the ſame diſcourſe. For the Venetians good happe was, that the Common-wealth had then a Prince, who beſides his admirable wiſedome was borne for all haughtie enterprizes, and an immortall and daily enemie to Tyrants. Hee then ſpake in this maner.

Prince Foſcari his Oration.

THere are two things in the Common-wealth (moſt excellent Fathers) which though in effect and name they ſeeme to bee very ſweete, haue oftentimes neuertheleſſe brought many miſchiefes to very great and noble Cities; namely, peace, and ſparing of the publique treaſure. For being only conſidered a farre off there is no danger ſeene in them, and being viewed neare at hand there is yet none to be ſeene, or if there be, men will ſo flatter and fauour them, as they deſpiſe it, in ſuch ſort as wee ſooner fall into an euident danger, than haue any leiſure to redreſſe it by a ſharpe warre, or by ſome expence, which is odious to the Common-wealth. The which wee haue found to bee moſt true by diuers loſſes which our Anceſtours haue ſuſtained, and by ſome likewiſe happned in our time. The Florentines loſſe may ſerue for a ſufficient preſent example, who being able to haue ouerthrewne the power of Philip at ſuch time as it encreaſed, many goodly occaſions being preſented vnto them, they would not doe it for feare of expence. What is come thereof? They doe now vnprofitably ſpend the Golde and Siluer which in time of Peace they had ſo curiouſly gathered together. And that which is more to bee lamented, they cannot, (their libertie preſerued) obtaine peace, nor giue end to their expences. I ſay then that it behoueth vs to foreſee future dangers, and being foreſeene to preuent them by ceunſell and mature deliberation. It is in a manner one ſelfeſame gouernment (and no man doubts thereof) that of a Common-wealth and that of a ſhippe at Sea. I demaund of you, if any man in calme weather (as they call it) the windes gently blowing, holding the helme ſhall fall aſleepe and take his reſt, without conſidering from farre ſuch dangers as may happen: or whileſt other men make vſe of the ſailes, maſt, and ſaile-yardes, ſhould omit that which were needfull to remedie the ſuddaine fortunes of the Sea, nor exactly conſider the time when hee ſaileth, vnder what climate or planet, or in what Sea, what rocks and ſhelues hee ought to auoide: would yee not ſay that ſuch a man ſuffering ſhipwrack by a ſodaine tempeſt did iuſtly merit ſuch a loſſe? The verie ſelfeſame is now happened to the Florentines: And the like will ſtill happen to ſuch, which doe not foreſee from farre the imminent dangers which threaten Common-wealths: or hauing foreſeene them, doe not ſpeedily applie the remedie hauing the meanes to doe it. The Florentines might (not to ſtray from their example) eaſily haue ouerwhelmed, if they would neuer ſo little haue attempted it, the power of Philip, when it began to increaſe: but they would not intend it, either through negligence, or rather couetouſneſſe. What is come thereof? Being often vanquiſhed in battaile, and brought to the verie hazard of their libertie, hauing loſt their meanes they are deceiued, and in ſted of being accounted wiſe, well-aduiſed, and prouident people, they are eſteemed dull fooles and ſenſeleſſe creatures. Wee muſt beate backe (I ſay) we muſt beate backe miſchiefes, not only thoſe which hang ouer our heads, but thoſe likewiſe which doe nearely preſſe vs. Beſides, were I in the fartheſt partes of Libia (let other men be of what minde they pleaſe) or beyond the Riphean mountaines, and ſhould heare tell that the libertie of any Nation were troden vnder foote, although I could not ſuccour them, yet certainely I could not chooſe but be a partaker of their griefe. And ſhall we ſuffer a proud Tyrant, to teare in peices, oppreſſe

oppreſſe, and abolliſh the libertie of a Noble people our Neighbour, borne and bred vp in our common Mother, Italie? VVee doe not well conſider that which wee ſee before our eyes, nor that which all Italie ſaith, that The ſame day as Florence ſhall looſe her libertie, will be the firſt that Philip will aſſaile the Venetians. The which ſeeing all men doe thinke will come to paſſe, I greatly wonder at ſome men, who albeit they ſay they haue well conſidered the matter, are neuertheleſſe of opinion, rather to endure any thing, than to relieue the Florentines, and bad people, enuious of our nauigation. It is a madneſſe certainely, it is a madneſſe, beliene me, to be contented to ſuſtaine a great loſſe, ſo as the enemie may ſuffer a greater. And yet, thankes bee to God, their affaires neither abroad nor at home are to be compared to ours. If vntill now their forces haue beene ſo great, as wee had good cauſe to ſuſpect them, they are at this preſent ſo abated, as of a long time they will not be able to recouer their former ſtrength. Yet neuertheleſſe, I doe not ſay they are ſo meane, but that ſo ſoone as they ſhall vnderſtand that the Venetians will ioyne with them, they will then vpon hope of better fortune bring forth ſo much gold and ſiluer as ſhalbee ſufficient to entertaine the one halfe of the Armie. And beſides, Philips forces are not ſo great, as falſe report hath made vs to beliene. Carmagnolla hath ſufficiently acquainted vs with what he is able to doe. Moreouer, the hope which we may conceiue to recouer and ioyne to our ſtate, Breſcia, Cremona, Bergamo, and all the Territories of ancient Venice, is no ſmall ſpurre to animate vs to beginne the warre. This is it I know which yee haue along time thought on, and for which ye daily ſtudie, But he who durſt demaund of the Prince of Mantua (whome he knew to be our friend and allie) the Citie of Peſcara, do yee thinke that he will not attempt to haue by force, if yee will not giue it him with good will, Verona, Vincenza, and in a manner all that we poſſeſſe in the firme Land? Therefore if yee will credit me, there is none expence, the which, God be thanked we may eaſily beare, nor labour, ſeeing it is to purchaſe vs an aſſured peace, which may bee of force to hinder vs from ſpedie ioyning with the Florentines to make warre on the Tyrant; I ſay a warre no leſſe profitable than neceſſarie.

The Princes vehement ſpeech, with his authoritie, which herein exceeded the Ducall dignitie, did in ſuch ſort moue the Senatours, who alreadie of themſelues were inclined thereunto, as the alliance with the Florentines was by a generall conſent of them all concluded. VVhereupon their Ambaſſadour being called before the Senate, the agreement betwixt their two States which was to continue firme and inuiolable betweene them during the whole time of the warre following, was ſolemnely concluded and confirmed in ſuch manner as hereunder followeth.

Alliance concluded with the Florentines.

The Articles of agreement.

It was therefore concluded that the Venetians and Florentines ſhould Arme at their common charge, ſixteene thouſand horſe, and eight thouſand foote. They ſhould furniſh two Nauall Armies; with the one the Venetians ſhould ſaile vp the Riuer Po to reſiſt the forces of Philip; and the Florentines, along the Riuer of Genoa with the other: That no man ſhould ſpeake of peace neither before, nor otherwiſe, till the Venetian ſhould commaund it. That all the Cities, Fortes, and Townes, taken on the confines of Flaminia, ſhould belong to the Florentines; the others ſhould be ioyned to the Venetian ſtate, or giuen to whom the Venetians ſhould pleaſe.

So ſoone as Lorenzo in the Florentines name had allowed of theſe written conditions, he did caſt himſelfe at the Princes feete, and voluntarily with a loud voice began to proteſt, That the Florentine people ſhould bee for euer mindfull of ſuch a benefit, and beſought God that the Venetians affaires might daily proſper better and better: And that if euer it did happen, that the Venetian people ſhould haue neede, the Florentines would be euer readie according to their meanes, to aide the Venetian Common-wealth. This new alliance was ſtrengthned by Nicholao de Eſte, Franciſco Gonzaga, Amadeo Duke of Sauoy, King Alfonſo (reconciled not long before to the Florentines) and by thoſe of Sienna, in reſpect of their neighbour-hood.

The Venetians denounce warre againſt Philip.

The Venetians ſent Franciſco Serrano one of their Secretaries to Philip, to entreate him ſpeedily to deſiſt from making warre on the Florentines, who were newly allied to the Venetians, and vpon his refuſall, he ſhould in the Common-wealths name, according to the cuſtome of their Anceſtors, denounce warre againſt him. But he was ſo farre off from condeſcending to the tenour of this Ambaſſade, as on the contrarie, he did with great courage entertaine their defiance, imagining by how much the matter was more painefull and dangerous, ſo much greater did he hope the honour and glorie would bee, if hee ſhould chance to winne the Victorie.

The end of the ninth Booke of the ſecond Decad.

THE TENTH BOOKE.

OF THE SECOND DECAD

Of The Historie

Of Venice.

The Contents of the tenth Booke of the ſecond Decad.

ARMAGNOLLA Captaine Generall to the Florentines taketh Breſſia. The Armie of PHILIP returning from Tuſcanie beſiegeth Breſſia. The great Trench which the Venetians made about the Caſtle of Breſſia: The enemies being wearied with the long ſiege, yeeld vp the Caſtle of Breſſia. Peace being concluded with PHILIP, doth not laſt long through his owne fault. The Milanois Oration to PHILIP to ſtirre him vp to renew the warre. The Venetians hauing renewed their alliance with the Florentines, doe againe beginne the warre. The baniſhed Fregoſes being vanquiſhed in battaile by the Genoueſes, were driuen from the Genoa Coaſt. The Nauall Armie of PHILIP, broken by the Venetians, a little beneath Cremona: two infortunate incounters hapning ſoone after to the Venetians, not farre from Cremona. The enemies falling into an Ambuſcado neare to Breſſia, doe looſe many of their Horſe. The enemies ſodaine ſallie on the Venetians Campe neare to Otholenga, doth greatly trouble them. A battaile neare to the Riuer of Olia, where they fought on both ſides without any loſſe. Laſt of all, PHILIP is wholly put to rout at Maual, whereupon peace enſueth.

WArre being thus denounced, the Senate did forthwith make a ſpeedie leauie of Souldiors ouer all Italie. But in the meane ſpace, not to looſe any time, they gaue to Carmagnolla their Captaine Generall all thoſe troupes which they had then readie. Hee hauing receiued them, being full of courage, beganne to thinke in what manner hee might by ſome braue exploit begin the warre. For his hatred to Philip on the one ſide, and on the other the great opinion which the whole Senate and people of Venice had conceiued of him, did animate him to high and difficult enterpriſes. Hee attempted firſt of all to enter the Caſtle of Breſſia by intelligence, hauing to that end wonne diuers; who promiſed him in the night time to kill the Gouernour uernour of the place: But the buſineſſe falling out vnluckily, he practiſed by goodly promiſes the chiefe of that faction, whome hee certainely knew did not affect Philip, and eſpecially Pietro, and Achilles Auogadres, very couragious perſons, and great enemies to Philip. Hee drew both of them by promiſes and exhortations to this point, as they granted about midnight to breake downe the Citie wall, and to let in the Venetians. This being executed, diuers of the contrarie part, being awaked forth of their ſleepe by the noiſe in the night, did in great feare retire to the ſtrongeſt place of the Citie where the Garriſon (which Philip had a few dayes before ſent thither) did lodge: Oldrado Captaine of thoſe men at Armes kept them backe that night, as they would haue runne into the Citie which they poſſeſſed, thinking if he could but defend that part of the Citie, with the Caſtle ſeated aboue it, that the Venetian after a notable loſſe ſhould be at laſt enforced to quit the place which he had inconſiderately ſurpriſed.

Carmagnolla Captaine Generall to the Venetians.

The Venetians enter Breſſia by treacherie.

Deſcription of Breſſia.

Breſſia hath a Caſtle (as is alreadie ſaid) on the top of an hill, which doth commaund the Citie, from whence two walles doe ſundrie waies deſcend towards the bottome; that which looketh Eaſtward, enuironeth the Citie; and that which goeth athwart, cutting through certaine houſes and old buildings, ſeparateth the remnant of the hill, and is called the old Cittadell. But this old Cittadell was ſo named three yeares before this happened, when as by Philips commaundement they made a wall ioyning to it, which was called the new. None elſe in a manner dwelt in the old but thoſe of the Gibelline faction. Some ſay that Pietro Auogadres at the firſt report of the warre entred the Citie with a great troupe of Peſants of the mountaines, and that the Prince of Mantua followed him with two thouſand horſe, and that at laſt Carmagnolla came thither with his troupes. But in what manner ſoeuer the Citie was taken, it is certaine that ſo ſoone as the Venetian was maſter thereof, he did ſodainely fortifie that ſide, where the wall ſeparated him from the enemie, fearing leaſt they aboue ſhould make ſome ſodaine ſallie vpon them.

Pietro Auagadres chief of the enterprize.

The Florentines ouercome the Cremonois vnder the conduct of Nicholao D'Eſte.

They ſay moreouer, that at the ſame time as Breſſia was taken, Nicolao D'Eſte Captaine Generall to the Florentines in this Warre, entring the Territorie of Cremona, brought thence a very great bootie. Philip, although at the firſt he made no ſhew of any great feare for being engaged in ſo great a warre (for neither in Milan nor abroade he had not leuied any new forces) and had beſides ſuffered thoſe which he then kept in Flaminia for want of victualls and pay, as if they had beene diſbanded and caſt, to retire themſelues into the Townes of that Prouince which hee poſſeſſed, was neuertheleſſe by theſe two notable loſſes hapned in ſo ſhort ſpace, greatly troubled, and grew fearefull of his ſtate. But nothing moued him ſo much as the loſſe of Breſſia. Yet neuertheleſſe when hee knew that the Caſtle, and that part of the Citie next to it, did yet hold out for him, he had ſome hope to be able to recouer it, and determined to ſend aide thither, and to raiſe an Armie: but being doubtfull with what troups he might firſt of all oppoſe himſelfe againſt the enemies attempts, the newes which hee heard how that King Alfonſo had forſaken the Venetians and the other Confederates, did not only giue him hope to atchieue ſome great enterprize, but did wholly aſſure him thereof. His firſt reſolution then was to recouer Breſſia. And on a ſodain he commanded Franciſco Sforza, whom he then called from Flaminia to Milan with a few Horſe to conferre with him about the Tuſcan warre, ſpeedily to march to the ſuccour of his people who were beſieged within the enclo-ſure of Breſſia. Other Authors ſay that Sforzas Camp lay then in Lombardie, and not in Flaminia, where hauing notice of the loſſe of Breſſia, he came with ſpeede to meet Philip. But it is moſt certaine that all the Cauallerie which Philip had in Lombardie at that time, did not exceede two thouſand Horſe; with which and certaine other troupes leuied in haſt, he marched againſt the Venetians. Others ſay that he had but foure hundred Horſe.

Franciſco Sforza is commaunded to goe and releeue Breſſia.

The way was ſtill open to the beſieged, ſo as of themſelues, before they receiued any ſupplies, they came from aboue and gaue the Camp many hot alarmes. It was thought thought at the firſt, that the Venetians hauing receiued ſome loſſe were deſirous to leaue Breſſia, and that they remained there till Sforza came thither with his cauallerie, who was commaunded by Philip to moleſt by all meanes the rebellious Breſſians, and eſpecially to keepe the Caſtle, if hee could not driue the Venetians thence, till ſuch time as his forces were come from Tuſcanie into Lumbardy. But the Venetians Generall in the meane time, hauing made a ſtrong Rampier, enuironed with a great ditch, oppoſite to the enemies Fort, dealt in ſuch ſort, as albeit at Sforzas arriuall many ſallies were made, yet neuertheleſſe, they did not greatly terrifie them: and they fought likewiſe at times neere to the walles with different euents. But theſe skirmiſhes were light, and ſuch as were vſually made vpon the like occaſions.

Diuers skirmiſhes at Breſſia.

Carmagnolla conſidering the enemies attempts not to be ſo terrible as he had in the beginning imagined: and that albeit Sforzas preſence, and couragious vigor, did make the enemie more bold and audacious, his furious ſallies neuertheleſſe began daily more and more to coole: hauing left the guard of the Rampier & trenches to Franciſco Gonzaga, a braue and couragious perſon, he went and aſſailed the gates, called the Piles: Where he omitted nothing that was neceſſarie for ſuch an aſſault; and hauing approached with his engines of batterie, he would not ſuffer the enemie day nor night to be at reſt.

But his watches and continuall trauaile, did renew in him a weakneſſe and diſeaſe in the ſinewes, which had in former time ſeized on him at Treuiſo by the fall of an horſe, whereupon he was enforced to goe to the bathes at Padua.

Carmagnolla being ſicke goeth to the Bathes at Padua.

It is reported that in his abſence, all things were ſo carefully gouerned by Franciſco Gonzaga, as the Generals preſence was no whit lamented: For albeit in that meane time, the enemies made more ſallies on the Venetians, than they were wont: he was ſo farre from being diſcouraged thereby, as on the contrarie he did brauely reſiſt all their attempts, and did beſides place Corps-du-guard without the Citie to ſurprize thoſe who were accuſtomed till then to carrie victuals to the beſieged.

Franciſco Gonzaga a braue and couragious Captaine.

At this ſtay ſtood the affaires of Breſſia, whilſt Philip by diuers meſſengers one after another, did call home his troupes forth of Tuſcanie and Flaminia. The Senate by reaſon heereof were greatly troubled, how to hinder if it were poſſible their paſſage into Lombardie. For they feared if all Philips forces were aſſembed into one bodie, that in ſted of taking the Caſtle and Rampiers of Breſſia, the Venetians might be enforced to leaue the Citie, and fall into the hazard of receiuing ſome notable and vnlooked-for ouerthrow. In the meane time then that they were buſied ſpeedily to preuent ſo many of the enemies attempts, becauſe they were ſaid to be alreadie on their way, the Venetians hauing no towne on the Po, nor neere to the Alpes, where they might reſiſt them, they ſent to Nicolao d' Æſte who commaunded great numbers of the aſſociates troups of horſe, that breaking all the bridges and ferries on the Modenois (where are the Appenine hilles and the riuer of Po,) that he ſhould encampe neerer to the Mariſhes. They ſent likewiſe Victor Barbaro a Venetian Gentleman with ſixe thouſand choice ſouldiers as well horſe as foote, to hinder (if it might be) at Vignolles, which is the midde way betwixt the Alpes and the Po, the enemies paſſage. They did moreouer by letters entreat Carmagnolla, who continued ſtill at the Bathes of Abbana to returne ſpeedily to Breſſia, for feare leaſt in his abſence the Commonwealth might receiue ſome loſſe. The which he did: and being returned to the campe, he did in ſuch ſort ſtay the enemies boldneſſe, as they durſt not onely make any more ſallies, but they did ſuffer themſelues to be braued and prouoked euen in their owne Fort.

Carmagnolla returneth to the Armie.

In the meane time Philips forces came and encamped on the Bolognian territorie neere to Vignolles, there being a great deepe riuer betwixt them both. Theſe great mariſhes doe emptie themſelues neere to Creuacore, and doe make a riuer which runneth into the Po, which is in no ſort foordable. The enemies hauing tried all poſſible meanes to paſſe it, were enforced to their great griefe to remaine on on the bankes therof thirtie daies. At the laſt hauing made a bridge at Percicete they did on May day by day-breake paſſe the riuer neere to Scultenna. The bridge was made in this manner. The enemies tooke twentie great Tunnes of one length and bigneſſe, binding them together verie ſtreightly, and being made faſt to trees on both ſides the riuer, they laid vpon them great hurdles of Ozier twigs, which they couered with ſmall ſhrubs and grauell, by which meanes they did eaſily paſſe ouer their cauallerie.

Hauing croſſed the riuer, the enemies by their ſodaine cries did ſo greatly amaze the Venetians who were incamped in the neighbour Forreſt, as none durſt preſent themſelues on the riuers bankes. Mirandola and Concorda, two Cities neere thereunto, and trees which were heere and there cut downe, did afford a ſafe place of retreate to the Venetians. Guido Fabrianico being ſent with a ſquadron of horſe to reenforce the troupes of Barbaro, arriuing inconſiderately on the ſame ſide of the riuer which the enemie had paſſed, and thinking that the noiſe came from the Venetians campe, was cut in peeces with all his cauallerie. Some thought that Nicolao d'Æſte might eaſily haue ſtopt the enemies paſſage, but that he would not do it, for feare leaſt the whole burthen of the warre ſhould fall vpon his territories. And thus as if hee had not beene able to ſtop the enemie, he ſuffered him to paſſe on without any fight.

Certaine venetian troups are defeated by the Armie of Philip.

Philip fearing in the meane time leaſt the Florentines ſhould ſeize on thoſe places which he had taken in Flaminia, being diſfurniſhed of Garriſons, commaunded that they ſhould be deliuered as from him, into the hands of the Legate of Pope Martin, who was reſident at the ſame time in Bolognia. Two moneths were almoſt ſpent betwixt the reuolt of Breſſia, and the returne of the Armie from Tuſcanie. Whereupon it was plainely perceiued, that if it had come ſooner, or if that forthwith after it was come they had fortified the Caſtle and the other Rampiers, (as they might eaſily haue done) the Venetians would haue beene enforced to leaue the Citie.

Angelo Pergulan who brought backe the enemies troupes into Lombardie, being come within two mile neere to the Caſtle, did there encampe and fortifie the place, reſoluing on a battaile if the Venetians would hearken to it. Carmagnolla, (whoſe counſels and deſignes only tended to take the Caſtle) would not ſuffer them within the Citie to attempt any thing.

The Venetians ſend new ſupplies to Breſſia.

The Venetians in the meane time were not idle in ſo great danger, but forthwith made a new leuie of ſouldiers, and ſent them in haſt to Breſſia, to aſſure their forces. The Florentines likewiſe with the other aſſociates ſent ſupplies thither with diuers Captaines, among whom was Nicolao Tollentino, a man beſides his great exploits in warre, moſt expert in the beſieging of Cities. He hauing viewed the Venetians Fort with that of the enemies, told them that the Caſtle would not be taken, though they ſhould beſige it neuer ſo long, vnleſſe by a Rampier and trench made round about it they did cut off the victuals which was brought thither, ſaying, that for the effecting thereof, it behoued them to haue great numbers of pioners and labourers ſpeedily to end the worke. This being reſolued on, great numbers of workemen were called thither, and the Rampier was made within three thouſand paces of the Caſtle: whoſe forme was after this manner.

A Rampier builded againſt the Caſtle of Breſſia.

A double ditch was made euerie where of equall bigneſſe, with a riſing in the middeſt of thirtie foot high, and by how much the two Dikes aduanced forward, by ſo much more did the furtheſt points of the riſing ſhew higher by the clods and turfes which were heaped one vpon another in forme of a wall. The Rampier followed after, being ſtrengthned on all ſides with many woodden towers verie neere one to another, ſo as in leſſe than threeſcore paces foure towers were to be ſeene.

This Rampier had beſides, twelue gates well fortified with ſtrong towers, to iſſue forth vpon the enemie when need ſhould require. Some ſay that the newes of this Fort newly begun being brought to Philip, one of his courtiers ſaid preſently, that the the Duke ought to wiſh nothing ſo much, as that the Venetians would but continue ſuch a work, wherein they would not only conſume al their wealth, but as much as Xerxes was reported to haue had, before they ſhould end it.

Pergulan in the meane time was not idle. For to diuert the enemie from his purpoſe, he entred furiouſly on the Mantuan Territorie, putting all to fier and ſword; yet for all that he could not cauſe the Venetian to giue ouer his new worke. And not being able by any meanes to draw him thence, he brought his campe neere to the Fort, and fortified it on euerie ſide. But he could not be perſwaded by Nicholao Picinino a great warriour, nor by Sforza, and other great Captaines of Philips Armie, to giue in vpon the new imperfect fortifications, telling them often times that hee was ſatisfied by his incamping in that manner to pleaſe Philip, who had giuen him the honour of Generall; and to be aſſured of his intent.

The Fort in the meane time being defended, the Venetian Generall encamped betweene the enemies Fort, and the riſing of the new-built Rampier, hauing in his Armie, (with the troups of the aſſociates) foureteene thouſand horſe, & ten thouſand foot, & beſides Carmagnolla the Generall diures noble perſonages; namely, Giouanni Franciſco Gonzaga, Lodouico Sanſeuerino, Paulo vrſini, Lodouico Vermio, and Lorenzo Contemoli. And vnder Nicholao Tolentino diuers ancient Captaines and olde Souldiers, who had a long time followed the war. The moſt part of the foot-men were placed in Garriſon vpon the riſing, and they were expreſly commanded not to ſtirre from thence in any ſort, not though they ſhould perceiue the General with his troupes to be enuironed on all ſides by the enemie, and to craue their helpe, yea though they were ſure to free him by their aide, but to keepe good guard, and carefully to looke to the Fort, that the Common-wealth by their carefullneſſe might not receiue any loſſe.

The number of the Venetians Armie.

The enemies campe conſiſted of twelue thouſand horſe and eight thouſand foot, beſide thoſe foureteene hundred foote which Franciſco Sforza had left within the Caſtle and Citadell, when, as at the arriuall of Pergulan he came to his Campe. Foure great Captaines did command theſe foote-companies that were left in the Caſtle and the Citadell, being denominated after the names of their natiue Townes, the Breſſan, Plaiſantin, Bergameſe, and the moſt noted of them all Andrew of Treuiſo.

The number of Philips Armie.

Carmagnolla, in regard of the great number of men that he had, euermore found worke for thoſe foure Captaines. Some times he reared ladders againſt the Walls, and then on a ſodaine would make approaches with his engins of warre, being aſſured though it did no preſent good, yet at leaſtwiſe that ſhew of an aſſault would expoſe the enemies to the mercie of the Venetian Archers (of whom there were great numbers in the Campe) vntil that their number ſhould be ſo diminiſhed, as it would be afterwards an eaſie matter to ouercome them. This determined ouerthrow of the enemie did not deceiue him. For within a ſhort ſpace, more than a thouſand of the enemies were either ſlaine or hurt by the Venetian Archers. But notwithſtanding all that, the enemies ſeeing their Captaines to be aliue were no whit diſcouraged. The continuall batterie had beaten downe a great part of the Wall, ſo as the ditch was almoſt filled with the ruines, and eſpecially neere to the Gate called Garzette.

Now becauſe there was ſome likelihood, that the Souldiers by taking ſome little paines might with ladders eaſily enter on that ſide; the aſſault being reſolued on, the Magiſtrate of the Citie promiſed the Souldiers this reward, That he who firſt ſhould mount the Wall ſhould haue foure hundred Crownes; the ſecond three hundred; the third two hundred; and a hundred to each of thoſe ten who ſhould ſecond them; and tenne Crownes to each of twentie who ſhould follow next after them. Both ſides fought at this aſſault with ſuch vehemencie and courage, as thoſe who beheld them could hardly iudge, who defended beſt, either thoſe who mounted the Wall, freely expoſing themſelues to danger, or the ſaml number of the beſieged.

An aſſault giuen to the Caſtle of Breſſia.

ged. At laſt, the enemies after great loſſe remained maſters of their Walls, and were ready to endure as long a ſiege as the Venetian would, had not famine which ouercommeth all things, afflicted, and enforced them to craue truce for tenne daies; conditionally if within that time they were relieued by Philip with ſufficient aide, to defend the Fort, otherwiſe (that time being expired) to leaue that place to the Venetians, and depart thence with their Armes.

An agreement made with the Garriſon in the Caſtle.

This Treatie being thus concluded; the Souldiers in the Rampier were commanded to keepe good guard; and to watch more carefully than before, to the end that no ſupply of men and victualls might from any place come to the beſieged. In the meane time thoſe of Philips Campe did fret with choller, and ſtuck not aloud to taxe the cowardize of their Commanders; ſaying that by their malice or baſeneſſe, the Caſtle was as well betraied as Breſſia was ſold to the Venetians by her own Citizens: That there was no doubt, but if ſuch an Armie as theirs was had at times giuen in vpon the enemies Fort, they might eaſily haue beaten downe the Rampire and the Mount, and haue raiſed the ſiege.

Pergulan made anſwere, That it was no reaſon in that manner to expoſe the Souldiers to their deaths againſt an Armed enemie, who kept himſelfe locked vp in his Fort; that it was much better (for that preſent) that the Garriſon ſhould come forth of the Caſtle ſafe and ſound, and leaue the remnant to the enemie. That it might ſo fall out, that hauing receiued thoſe ſupplies which they expected, they might aſſaile them at their departure thence, and enforce them to fight, and requite them with ſome greater loſſe. Picinino thereupon being bold and ſodaine, ſaid, That it was ill aduiſed, to giue ouer a place of ſafety, and afterwards to fight for it in plaine field without any aduantage. But if there were any man which deſired the good & commoditie of Duke Philip, or would bee held worthie of ſuch an enterprize, hee ſhould follow him vpon the enemie; and hauing ſo ſpoken, he departed on a ſodain in a rage forth of the aſſembly, and as he went forth Franciſco Sforza promiſed to follow him. But whilſt he ordered his Souldiers to march againſt the Venetians, Sforza ſtaied behind to perſwade Pergulan and the reſt to take Armes.

Boldneſſe of Picinino one of Philips Captains

The Venetian Captaine, whoſe Souldiers were well inſtructed for ſuch an enterprize: ſo ſoone as he perceiued a bow-ſhot off the enemie comming towards him, opened the Gate; and commanded his Souldiers to ſet forward. Then Picinino perceiuing that no man followed, made a ſtand, blaming the want of courage of his fellowes; and without other fight returned to the Campe. Thoſe in the Caſtle perceiuing the retreate of their Countrie-men, did abandon the Gates of Pilles and Garzette, and retired into the Citadell, where they willfully held out for certaine daies after the time of truce was expired: but at the laſt being vanquiſhed by famine, they did not giue ouer, but left that place to the Venetians.

The Souldiers comming to aſſaile the Caſtle, the Plaizantine preſented himſelfe with fiftie braue Souldiers. The Venetians in few daies ſpace, did ſo batter the walls, as the vttermoſt in a manner fell into their Campe: whereof Philip hauing notice, he ſent word to the Plaizantine and the reſt, that (their liues being ſaued) they ſhould leaue the place to the enemie. In this ſort the Venetian entred the Caſtle ſeuen moneths after the taking of Breſſia.

The Caſtle of Breſſia yeelded to the Venetians

Carmagnolla being freed from the ſiege, and commanded to goe againſt the ſtrong Cities and Townes thereabout, he receiued on their faith and homage the Salodians, with all the inhabitants of the Lake of La Garda, which lieth towards the Breſſians Countrie, before euer he tooke Armes againſt them. Soone after at the arriuall of the Popes Nuncio, they began to talke of Peace; & Ambaſſadors from each ſide were ſent to this end to Ferrara, where the aſſemblie was held: which was cõcluded on theſe conditions; That Philip ſhould friendly quit to the Venetians, beſides the vale Commonica, Breſſia with her confines, together with that part of Cremona-Territorie which is contingent to the Riuer of Olio in the Breſſian, being 40000. paces in length: and That the Duke of Sauoie ſhould keepe all that he had taken.

Peace betweene Philip and the Venetians.

Theſe

The articles being thus agreed vpon on either ſide, and ſealed with the ſeale of Philip and the reſt, the Nuncio for the better aſſurance of them would needes carrie them to Milan, where finding Philip (who complained of the wrong that was done him, accuſing ſometime the pride of the Florentines, who had throwne him headlong into this Warre, and then the Venetians couetouſneſſe, who not being ſatisfied with taking Breſſia from him, did likewiſe ſeize on a part of the Cremonois,) he had much to doe by faire ſpeeches and exhortations, to cauſe him to condiſcend to that which had beene agreed vpon: Which the Nuncio hauing at laſt obtained, ſo ſoone as he perceiued the Venetian Commiſſioners, (who were come thither according to the Articles to receiue the Townes) to bee deſpightfully vſed in his preſence, he returned to Rome and left the buſineſſe vnaccompliſhed.

Philip his complaints to the Popes Nuncio.

The Venetian Commiſſioners ill dealt with at Milan.

Some thought then that this ſodaine change did proceede from the hope he had to make an attonement with the Duke of Sauoy; and others thinke that the entreaties and exhortations of thoſe of Milan were the cauſe thereof, who ſo ſoone as they had heard of the conditions of peace, came to him in the name of the commonwealth, and ſpake in this manner.

The Oration of the Milanois to Philip.

Our ſubiects of Milan (moſt excellent Prince) come to you to obay your commandements: and there is nothing how grieuous ſocuer to be borne (ſo as it be profitable for your greatneſſe) which doth not ſeeme light and ſweet to them. For we are all of this minde, that if euer heretofore we haue beene readie, to doe you all ſeruice which a good Prince can expect of a moſt obedient Citie, we are certainly much more readie now at this preſent: and we may freely ſpeake it with ſo much more affection, as we haue ſeene you in this wretched time moſt to diſtruſt our forces and meanes, or elſe to be ignorant of them, when for one iniurie receiued in haſt from the Venetians, you are ſo mightily diſcouraged, and tranſported beyond your ſelfe, as you haue ſhamefully giuen ouer to the couetous enemie, that which the hazard of warre had not yet taken from you. For what elſe meane you by giuing ouer to the Venetians all the ſtrong Townes of the Country of Breſſia, and a great part of the Cremona Territorie, with the ſhore of the Riuer Oglio, but only to preſent the Citie of Cremona to the Vſurper of Breſſia? Is it not a meanes more to animate this audacious enemie, who hath a long time aſpired to the entire Dominion of Lombardie? and to embolden him to enterprize greater matters? For if your affaires were ſo deſperate (which God forbid) that you were of neceſſitie to giue place to the enemie, and to grant him all, we would then conſent with you to attribute it to fortune and to time. But ſeeing you haue a mightie Armie, with which the enemie being often prouoked durſt neuer fight, what may we elſe thinke hath moued you to embrace ſo diſhoneſt a peace, but only your feare that you haue not ſufficient meanes to entertaine ſo great an Armie? But you haue wealth enough as well of the publike as of your particular Subiects of Milan, of whom when you pleaſe you may freely diſpoſe. You haue beſides a very great and rich reuennue, ſufficient to entertaine not only thoſe troupes which you haue at this preſent, but others greater than they, if neede require. Make vſe then of your ſubiects meanes which lie open to you, and doe not ſuffer the Venetian vnder colour of libertie, to come and ſubiugate the Milanois with the reſidue of Lombardie which doth obay you, but rather trie how we ſtand affected to your State, and to that great libertie which your Dominion promiſeth vs. For we are ready in reſpect of that not only to expoſe our goods, but our liues likewiſe where neede ſhall be.

Philip gaue them a very gentle anſwere in few wordes, laying the whole blame of the Warre on the Florentines, and the Venetians, who by their ouer-weening and treacherie had forcibly drawne him into this Warre. But becauſe hee was of neceſſitie either to obſerue the contract or to renew the Warre, as they counſailed him, he told them that he was deſirous to know in what ſort they could aſſiſt him:

Philips anſwer to thoſe of Milan.

willing them to depart, and to conferre with the people about it, to the end that hee might bee assured on what ground hee might againe vndertake so great a Warre.

The matter was debated in a generall assembly of the Citizens, who concluded to giue the Duke this answere, That if he would suffer the Milanois to gather the Cities reuennue, they would furnish him while the Warre continued in Lombardie, with ten thousand Horse, and as many Foot.

The Milanois offer to Philip.

It was thought that Philip would haue granted it, had it not beene for one of his Courtiers; who knowing this Prince to be naturally fearefull and suspitious, wished him to consider what he did: For, to permit Citizens to gather the reuennues of Cities, was nothing else but to reare them ladders whereon to mount to libertie: That without all doubt it was a most dangerous matter for him, making warre on two free Common-wealths, and both of them very mightie, to giue his subiects any hope of libertie, which of all men is chiefly to be desired.

Philip lent a willing eare to this aduertizement. And being resolued not to accept those conditions which should bee propounded to him, nor yet openly to refuse them, because he would not by a scornefull answere displease his Citizens, hee sent word to those who were appointed to come to him, to report to Giouanni Riccio whatsoeuer they had to say to himselfe. This did by little and little coole the former affection of the Milanois, and being thus cooled, the businesse remained vnperfect. But Philip hoping by art and subtiltie to draw from them that summe so liberally offered, if they would not giue it gratis, renued the Warre; first of all prohibiting to yeeld vp those strong Townes lately promised by the treatie, and soone after making a furious entrie on the Mantuan Territorie.

Philip changing his minde: The Milanois grow cold.

Philip renewеth the Warre with the Venetians.

The Venetians aduertized by letters from the Popes Nuncio, that Philip wholly tended to Warre, being thereby iustly incensed, they renewed the warre with greater furie than before. But because whilest the treatie of peace lasted, they had dismissed a great part of their troupes, they forthwith made new leuies from all places: And when they vnderstood that the enemie made incursions on the Mantuan; the Senate forthwith decreed to renew the warre with all speede. First, they renewed their alliance with the Florentines; who (albeit they were tired with warre, and desired nothing so much as peace) did neuertheless by a generall consent take armes. Amadeo Duke of Sauoy who in the precedent warre did in a manner no memorable matter, vnder promise of doing better hereafter entred into the league. The Marquis of Montferrat, and Orlando Paluicin, who then possessed diuers Townes in Lombardie, would needes be registred in that new alliance. The like did the Bandetti of Genoa, promising to molest the enemies on the Sea-coast, who being forsaken by King Alfonso were vnable of themselues to doe any thing at Sea.

A new league against Philip.

Philip, albeit he perceiued so many to take Armes against him at one time, was no whit discouraged; neither did he shew himselfe slow in assembling his forces, and prouiding all things necessarie for the war: And because he would make a shew of the greatnesse of his forces, he resolued to assaile the enemie in three seuerall places at once: For, hauing armed certaine vessells at Cremona, hee seized on Turricoles, a Castle on the Parmesan, seated at the mouth of the Tarro: which the Venetians had for a time possessed. Likewise presuming on the great numbers of his Infanterie, he made incursions on the mountaines of the Bressan Territorie, and at the same instant hee forraged the plaines with his Cauallerie, vnder the conduct of Pergulan. The third and most fortunate exploit was against the Bandetti of Genoa, vnder the command of Francisco Sforza. Thomaso Fregosa (who being followed with great troupes of banished Genoueses, and with the Florentine succours, had in times past so disturbed Genoa, as he durst at times assaile the Citie) being aduertized of Sforza's comming, had commanded his brother, a couragious yong man, to tarrie for the enemie with part of his troupes at the entrie of the Valley of the Swine.

The exploits of Philip.

The

The Florentine forces in the meane ſpace hauing receiued no pay from Florence of a long time, began by little to drop away, and hauing neither victualls nor commaund, they left their enſignes ſo bare and vnfurniſhed of men, as Fregoza could number but eight hundred in his Camp. The which being by ſpies reported in the Citie, preſuming on Sforza his comming, who was ſaid not to be farre off, the Citizens made a ſodaine ſallie vpon Fregoſa's troupes, which at the firſt they defeated. Thomaſo and Baptiſta his brother with certaine others eſcaped to Rechia; the reſidue were taken, and their Camp ſtuffed with great wealth was taken and ſpoiled. And thus by Sforza his arriuall, as if a more fortunate Starre had ſhined on the Genoueſes, their affaires till then wholly ruined by warre begunne againe to proſper. Pergulan, on the other ſide, placed Garriſons in the moſt commodious places of the Breſſan, whileſt Picinino with his troups drew neare the Riuer Po: who hauing cauſed the nauall Armie to come to Caſal-Major, a Citie of the Cremonois, he did beſiege it by Land and Water, and enforced it to yeeld. Then, croſſing the Riuer he ſeized on the Citie of Briſſeles on the Po, by treacherie: But the Caſtle could not be wonne.

The Fregoſians diſhearted from Genoa are deſeated

Caſal-maior taken by Picinino.

Briſſeles taken.

In this ſort the enemie beganne the Warre. But the Venetians ſlept not in the meane time: For they likewiſe ſent forth a mightie nauall Armie whereof Franciſco Bembo was Generall. Now vpon the report that it was gone vp the Riuer Po, as far as the Mantuan Territorie: Euſtace of Pauia, Captaine of the Enemies nauall Armie determined to leaue the Camp at Briſſeles, and to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the Venetians who were not farre off. Picinino was of a contrarie opinion, and would haue the ſiege to be continued. The Captaines being diuided by this diuerſitie of opinions, the ſiege of the Caſtle of Briſſeles went forward more ſlowly; by meanes whereof thoſe who were ſent from Breſſia to relieue it, did enter into it without any impeachment.

Thoſe of Briſſeles preſuming on this ſupply, and on the comming of the Venetians nauall Armie, did recouer the Towne, and expelled the enemie, who left many warlike engines and inſtruments of batterie behinde him. Certaine troupes were ſpeedily ſent from Briſſeles againſt Euſtace, who was incamped a little beneath Caſal; but in the meane time he was come within foure miles of Cremona. Bembo hauing there ouer-taken him, did on a ſodaine embattaile his Souldiers. The Galions on both ſides were neare to one an other: ſo doe they terme theſe Veſſells, being like to thoſe which the Greekes call Dromons. This kinde of Veſſell is long, the belly thereof being nothing like to a ſhips bottome, but in a manner all flat, couered ſometimes with two or three floores of plancks: at the toppe of the maſt there is a place made where ten or moe Souldiers, if neede be, may fight. When one of theſe lieth at an Ankor ready for fight, it reſembleth a well-rampierd Fort.

Philips forces driuen forth of Briſſeles.

Bembo placed eight of theſe veſſells faſt ioyned together in the foremoſt rancks, and commanded the reſidue of the Fleet cloſely to follow them. The enemie did not refuſe the fight, but embattailing his Armie, he placed foure Gallions in Front, who were forcibly carried by the tide and ſtrength of Oares vpon the enemie. But being come before one an other, the enemie paſſed on beyond the Venetians, and turned his prowes on the Venetians Poopes; thinking that being followed by his Veſſells, the Venetians finding themſelues to be aſſailed on their backs, thoſe which were in the foremoſt rancks would be eaſily defeated: But it fell out otherwiſe. For Bembo preſently accounted thoſe who had paſſed on beyond him for loſt, and brought his ſhips into a round compaſſe, ſo as in a manner hee filled the whole current of the ſtreame, to the end that with more courage and leſſe difficultie, he might aſſaile thoſe which had paſſed by. Picinino ſtood with his troupes on the Riuer bankes, who not being able to helpe his fellowes by armes, did by his tongue encourage them in the heate of the fight. The battaile was for a time doubtfull. At the laſt the victorious Venetian tooke foure Gallions from the enemie, beſides thoſe which we ſaid were ſhut in at the beginning.

The venetians nauall Armie obtaines the victorie.

Euſtace then thought too late perceiued himſelfe nothing equall neither in ſtrength nor dexteritie to the Venetians. whereupon perceiuing the enemie buſied in defeating thoſe whom he had enuironed, on a ſodaine he turned the Prowes of the reſidue of his fleet, and went a pace towards Cremona: where being arriued, and fearing that which came to paſſe, to wit, That the Venetians would ſoone followe, he diſfurniſhed all his ſhips. Thoſe who at the firſt were incloſed, perceiuing the flight of their fellowes, made towards the Land, and leaping on ſhoare, forſooke their veſſells. Bembo ſeizing on them, purſued the enemie, whome he could not ouertake. Being come neere to Cremona he was enforced to fight after a new manner.

Fortes builded by Philip in the middeſt of the Riuer.

Philip neere to that place had cauſed three Caſtles to bee made in the middeſt of the Riuer, which did in ſuch ſort ſhut vp the channell of the Po, as he verily imagined that no nauall Armie, how mightie ſoeuer, could come to beſiege the Citie, or paſſe on farther into Lumbardie. Two of them were oppoſite to the Citie and builded on Piles which appeared aboue the water and the banckes. The third was builded in the middeſt of the water of a more groſſe ſubſtance with ſo ſmall a ſpace on both ſides, as no ſhip could paſſe either on the right hand or left without being greatly moleſted with arrow-ſhot. Bembo reſolued to aſſaile that which was farthеſt from the Cittie, and with eaſe tooke it: Then comming to the other which was neerer to it, hee became likewiſe maſter thereof with like facilitie: but the aſſault of the laſt was more painefull, becauſe the Souldiours which were in it had more hope to bee relieued, by reaſon they were neere to the Citie: but the Venetian aſſailing it by night, and by that meanes with more labour, did take it by force.

The fortes taken by the venetians.

Bembo being victorious cauſed theſe Caſtles to be burned, and the Piles where on they were builded to be pluckt vp, fearing leaſt the enemies ſhould ſeize on them, and make the like vſe of them. But the Venetian abuſing his victorie landed part of his Souldiers and Marriners in that ſmall ſpace of ground which lieth betwixt Cremona and the Po, not hauing ſent before to diſcouer the place: whereupon Chriſtofero Lauellano Gouernour of the Citie, making a ſodaine ſallie vpon them, did put them in great feare. All his Sailers were in a manner Hiſtrians and Dalmatians, who being well whitled with Wine doe apprehend no danger whatſoeuer: Lauellanos troupes comming vpon theſe men, did in a moment kill three hundred of them.

A troupe of venetian Mariners defeated by Philips forces.

Bembo being angrie at the Pilots for landing them without his knowledge, took them in againe, & commanded the fleet to row vp againſt the ſtreame, & hauing taken the Fort, which was on the verie point of the Riuers Po and Adda, he went vp againſt the ſtreame of the Riuer Theſina, and came to an Ankor neere to Pauia. This Citie was in times paſt called Ticina in regard of the riuer Theſina which is neere to it. But finding that place to be deſert and abandoned, fearing ſome ambuſhe, he returned towards Cremona. The Generall being arriued there was deſirous to reuenge his late loſſe, and landed diuers of his ſoldiours, hoping if he were but to fight onely with Lauellanos Souldiours, he might be recompenced for the ſame: But about the ſame time Nicolao Guerrieri was come to the Citie with a troupe of horſe, which being mingled with Lauellanos troupes, would haue more rudely entertained the Venetian than before, had not Bembo who at the firſt perceiued diuers of his Souldiers to droppe downe, cauſed the retreat to be ſounded in time.

A skirmiſh neere to Cremona where the venetian had the worſt.

This happened on the water. But on the Land, Sommer drawing on, and the troupes which the Venetian had then leuied being readie on the Mantuan, Carmagnolla being departed from Padua, hauing from Lanziſa to Salles croſſed the Lake of Benac, was come within fiue miles of Breſſia, at ſuch time as Alberico Count of Cunies, and Petrino of Dortonne, ſurnamed the Turke, leauing Ottolenga (where they lay in Garriſon eight miles diſtant from Breſſia) came and made a ſodaine incurſion euen to the verie gates, and did greatly amaze the Breſſians, and carried away foure hundred victuailers priſoners who were taken in the Suburbs, when as Pietro Lauretano Gouernour of Breſſia hauing intelligence of the enemies being there, ſallied forth of the Citie on horſe-backe vnarmed at Saint Nazares gate, where finding many without order who would willingly haue gone forth, he did ſharpely rebuke them, & would not ſuffer it, vntil Paulo Vrſino who was within the Citie was armed, vnto whom hauing giuen three hundred horſe next at hand he willed him to lead them by a ſhorter way towards Ottolenga, and that in the mid-way he ſhould ambuſh himſelfe, and preſently the reſidue of the Cauallerie to the enemie, with expreſſe commaundement ſtill to amuſe them going foreward by light skirmiſhes vnto the verie place of the ambuſcado, where they were commanded on euerie ſide brauely to charge them, that none might eſcape. This proiect fell out luckily; For the enemie falling into the ambuſh was hardly delt with, and Petrino with a hundred and fiftie horſe were taken priſoners, the reſidue were put to route.

and

The verie ſame day, Carmagnolla entred Breſſia, who was much diſcontented that the firſt exploit was executed by any but himſelfe; And hauing aſſembled whatſoeuer was needfull for the warres, captaines and Souldiours being ſent for from all places, the Venetians Generall departed from Breſſia on the fifteenth day of March with foureteene thouſand horſe and ſix thouſand foot, and incamped firſt at Monteclaro where hee tarried till his other Troupes were arriued with his warlike engins & inſtruments of batterie. Certaine daies being ſpent rather in expecting his own forces than in beſieging the Town, which was ſtrong in ſituation and well fortified, Carmagnolla thinking it but loſt time to beſiege it, raiſed his Campe and marched directly towards Ottolenga.

The number of the Venetians Armie.

Carmagnolla before Monteclaro.

A thouſand horſe of Duke Philips were within it. The Venetian being in great hope to take both them and the Citie, came and encamped with great noiſe neere to the walles: But not long before Guido Taurello, Chriſtofero Lucchino, and Nicolao Guerrieri were come thither with their Cauallerie: Theſe men without any noiſe kept themſelues a while encloſed in the Citie, that they might more commodiouſly make a ſallie vpon the enemie. The Venetians being come before the Citie, moſt of them wearied with the extreame heate lay downe on the ground diſarmed, others fell a ſleepe, expecting nothing leſſe than the enemies ſallie. Some of Nani Stroſsi his troupes whome the Marquis of Ferrara according to the conuention had ſent to the Campe with foure hundred horſe, kept the guard: vpon theſe men, towards the euenning Philips horſe-troupes gaue a furious on-ſet: Stroſsi did brauely ſuſtaine their aſſaults: but being too obſtinate in defending that place, and being oppreſſed by the great number of the enemies and his owne Souldiours he fell downe dead. But the alarme being giuen ouer all the Campe; ſome beeing halfe a ſleepe, and others vncertaine vnder what Enſignes or Captaines to place themſelues, & diuers running inconſideratly vpon the enemie with their Armes were ignominiouſly defeated: and this amazement continued vntill Carmagnolla beeing followed by a braue troupe of Souldiours marched foreward with the Enſignes. For then, the Venetians numbers encreaſing at the ſound of the Trumpets and Drummes, the enemies in a manner triumphant and victorious retired into the Citie, with the loſſe of fifteene hundred horſe. The Venetian Generall would not ſtirre from thence till the troupes not long before leuied at Padua were come to the Campe. Blondus makes mention hereof, who (as it is reported) was the ſame time in Breſſia, and perhaps in the Campe.

A furious ſallie of the beſieged.

But wee reade in the commentaries of Mariot Montano who was preſent in all theſe exploits, that they fought the ſame day with equall fortune, and that the Venetians ſuſtained no greater loſſe in that fight, than of a few who by reaſon of the extreame heate were ſmothered in their Armour. Carmagnolla euer after encamped after another manner. For hauing two thouſand Pioners in his Campe to make plaine the wayes for the munition Waggons and engins, and to digge Trenches and Rampiers, he diuided them into bands, and to euerie band appointed a Captaine to command it, who ſhould make ſure the diſlodging of the Campe, and the carriage of the engins of war. And he commanded them beſides that ſo ſoone as the Camp ſhould be ſet, to place all their carriages in forme of a Creſcent or halfe Moon, which ſhould in manner of a Rampier encloſe the Camp, to the end it might ſerue in ſted of a ſtrong Fort, againſt the enemies ſallies and incurſions.

Carn. agnolla raiſeth his camp from before Ortolenga.

Determining ſtill to encampe in this manner, he departed thence, and albeit he left behinde him diuers Townes and Fortes of the Breſſian country which were poſſeſſed by Philips ſouldiers, he reſolued neuertheleſſe, becauſe he would not ſpend much time in ſurprizing them, roundly to beſiege Cremona, imagining that the taking of ſo famous a Citie, would excite the reſt without further fight to ſubmit to the Venetians.

The Riuer of Oglio which diuideth the Cremonois from the Breſſian and Mantuan, hath two bridges well fortified, the one more high and neere to the mountaines of the Bergamuſe, and the other at the bottome of the plaine called Bina. The Venetian with great furie aſſailed this, as being leſſer, and therefore more eaſie, to the end that from thence he might haue free paſſage from the Mantuan territorie to his campe if he ſhould chance to paſſe the riuer. The neighbourhood of the Po did likewiſe moue him thereunto: By which he might with leſſe labour and danger haue all things brought to him which was needfull for a ſiege. Hauing in foure daies taken it, hee marched with his forces into the enemies countrey, and came and incamped within ſeuen miles of Cremona along the riuer of Po.

The venetians Armie much encreaſed.

Philip hauing notice of the enemies great numbers, (for the Venetians Armie was of eighteene thouſand horſe, and eight thouſand footmen, ſixe thouſand of the aſſociates ſouldiers, not accounting the ſouldiers boyes, landreſſes, & other troups of followers of the eampe: beſides, the nauall Armie conducted by Bembo, was not farre from thence, amounting to more than two thouſand men) was aſtoniſhed at their great attempts, and began to feare & doubt his owne eſtate. Therefore leauing his former wilfulneſſe, he called for the Citizens of Milan (whereunto he could neuer before be induced) and told them that the time was now come for to know who were his truſtie friends, and who till then had diſſembled: That it was not needfull in ſo dangerous a time to vſe many words to acquaint them with his meaning: That all thoſe who did mean to preſerue their goods, ſhould goe along with him to helpe to quench that fire, and that he did not with them all in generall to go with him, but ſuch as were fit for the wars: He cauſed the ſame to be publiſhed by a trũpet through the whole Citie, and then departing from Milan, he marched towards the enemie.

Philips ſpeech to the Milanois.

Great numbers of the Milanois, and thoſe of Pauia followed him to the warres. He encamped betwixt Cremona and the enemies, within three miles of the Venetian: He had before then in his Armie twelue thouſand horſe, and halfe as many footmen, and he brought with him as well of his friends and aſſociates as of others, fifteene thouſand horſe and foote: ſo as both the Armies were reported to haue thirtie thouſand men apeece at one ſelfeſame time. The which was ſcarcely euer ſeene before; That ſince the declining of the Romane Empire, two Italians to haue had two ſuch mightie Armies readie to fight one with another. The preſence of Philip had greatly animated his ſouldiers to enterprize ſome great exploit, ſo that they craued nothing more than to fight, they wholly deſired it and with loud voice did cheerfully beg it. Then being embattelled they marched couragiouſly againſt the enemie. The Venetian was at the ſame time encamped at Suma, and his campe was not fortified with trenches nor Rampiers, but enuironed onely with wagons, and with a riuer which diuided the plaine: the enemie hauing no way to come at him but by a bridge diſtant three Stadij from his campe.

Philip commeth to the Armie.

The number of both Armies.

The enemie comming to that place made a ſtand, expecting that the Venetian in regard of his great numbers would fight beyond the bridge. But the Venetian attended him in order of battaile, on the plaine neere to his campe, determining

to

to ioyne if the enemie came foreward. Pergulan and Taurello counſeled him not to paſſe the bridge; but the bold counſell of Sforza and diuers others was followed, who were of opinion to march directly againſt the enemie. Theſe being commanded to march before, and the fight alreadie begunne, all the reſt followed in order to the battaile, a few excepted who ſtaied behind for the guard of the bridge, to the end that thereby the retreat to their Campe might be aſſured: They fought from noone till night, running with ſuch furie and vehemencie one vpon another, as on a ſodaine there aroſe a great duſt like to a blacke clowde which did in a manner blinde them, by meanes whereof they did inconſiderately throw themſelues into danger: Eyes were to ſmall purpoſe in that darkeneſſe, they onely knew one another by their voices: the fight was doubtfull, and the aduentures of the combatants vncertaine. Euerie one might iuſtly boaſte in fighting to haue come euen to the enemies Enſiges, or to haue performed that day ſome generous exploit. Some ſay that diuers of Philips Armie thinking in that confuſion to retire to their fellowes who kept the bridge, did neuer perceiue that they were in the enemies Campe, till they came to the waggons: at the laſt, the retreit being ſounded both ſides retired without any aduantage.

A battaile betwixt the venetians and Philip.

Great diſorder in the battaile by reaſon of the duſt which blinded the ſouldiers.

Carmagnolla was wont to ſay that he had taken that day more of his own ſouldiers than of his enemies, and that the enemie might ſundrie times haue taken him if he had beene knowne. The ſame likewiſe hapned to Sforza, Picinino and diuers other noble men. Philip being glad for that which had beene done in his preſence, and imagining that he had wonne the victorie, becauſe he had not loſt the battaile, being ſpeedily called home by ſundrie meſſengers, becauſe the cauallerie of the Dukes of Sauoy and Montferrat entering by Vercelles on the Milanois made incurſions euen to the gates of Milan: he forthwith departed, hauing diſmiſſed thoſe forces which he brought with him, whom he willed (if they ſo pleaſed) to goe home to their houſes.

The Dukes of Sauoy and Montferrat make incurſions on the Milanois.

The Venetian perceiuing Cremona to be ſtrongly manned (for excepting thoſe troups whom Philip had diſmiſſed, the reſidue of the Armie after the battaile was retired thither) imagining that a Citie ſo well fortified would not eaſily be forced, came and encamped at Caſall Major. (for ſo is it called) Bembo with the nauall Armie came thither likewiſe ſoon after. Franciſco Sforza with a braue troup of ſouldiers purſued Carmagnolla in his march, but perceiuing his Armie to be ſo well guarded and circkled in on all ſides, and being loth to attempt any thing raſhly for feare of ambuſhes, he went backe againe, and without any difficultie recouered Bries, where he threw thoſe whom he found in Garriſon there into the Riuer, becauſe the Venetians not long before had done as much to their ſouldiers.

Caſall for a time was in vaine beſieged by the Venetian by land and water, by reaſon of the ſtrong Garriſon that lay in it. Antonio Piſani a valiant Captaine was Gouernour there: who day and night keeping good guard on the Rampier with foure hundred braue ſouldiers, did by his prouidence fruſtrate all the enemies attempts. The Citie was enuironed with good Rampiers and banks which defended it from the engines of batterie. But it is reported that there was a tower neere to the gate of Po, the which being battered with greateſt violence did wholly in a manner fall downe into the vttermoſt ditches. The Venetians hauing by ſundrie aſſaultes attempted to enter in at that place, and the Garriſon of the Citie being repulſed withgreat ſlaughter, the inhabitants ſtubbornneſſe being daunted, they were receiued by them vnknowne to Piſani.

The venetians take Caſal blaior.

The Venetians Generall being proud of this victorie did determine to make a bridge ouer the Riuer of Adda, to the end to ſend his troupes to ſpoile and rauage the Milanois. But hee wanted victualls, and it behoued him to prouide for that. And therefore he encamped ſtill at Caſal, til all neceſſaries were brought him from the neighbour Townes.

Philip in the meane time perceiuing his Captaines to bee diuided among themſelues, euery one thinking himſelfe equall both in valour and reputation with the beſt, beſt, and by that meanes refuſing to giue place to one another either in counſell or authoritie, in regard whereof there was ſome likelihood that his affaires might receiue ſome notable loſſe if it were not ſpeedily remedied, hee made Carolo Malateſte Generall of his whole Armie. It is thought that in this choice of Generall he had not ſo much reſpect to the valour of the man, as to his wiſedome and Nobilitie in bloud. Some ſay that hee did it, becauſe that euer ſince Pandolfo his gouernment, hee had beene greatly beloued of the Breſſians: and that hee did hope by his meanes the Citie would reuolt from the Venetians. The Venetian in this meane time was gone from Caſal. And Carolo hauing accepted the charge was not idle, but leading his Armie through by-waies he did opportunely fruſtrate the enemies deſignes.

Carolo Malateſte Generall of Philips Armie.

The Venetians beſiege Macale.

At the laſt, the Venetian came and encamped before Maclodia, (called by the vulgar Macale) a Citie of the Cremonois. Philips Captaines and his whole Armie did hardly digeſt the enemies boldneſſe, and did greatly blame their owne patience and their Generalls, ſaying, that there were many Cities in the Cremonois and Bergameſe beſides left by the enemie which they might with more ſafetie beſiege, and yet neuertheleſſe hee had encamped before Macale, as if the taking of that Towne would much auaile him; but that he did it in his owne and their diſgrace: and therefore if he deſired to purchaſe the reputation of true Generall of an Armie he ſhould doe well to take from himſelfe and them who vnder him fought for Philip that ſhame and reproch. At the firſt this was ſpoken ſecretly among a few, afterwards publiquely ouer the whole Campe. Sforza and Picinino deſired a battaile: Pergulan and Taurello contradicted it, ſaying that they were to deale with an enemie, who might more eaſily bee vanquiſhed by temporizing than by fight: That a battaile was that which the Venetian Generall demaunded: That they were moſt aſſured that the ſame day as Philips forces (who were leſſe in number and good fortune to the Venetians) ſhould fight with them, Philips affaires would altogether receiue ſome notable loſſe. Carolo did heare them, but hee fixed his eies on Sforza and Picinino whome hee was wont publiquely to call his Hectors: Hee did beſides willingly giue care to the reſidue of the Armie, who craued that they might come to battaile.

Diuers opinions in Philips Army

It is reported that thoſe two who more couragiouſly than the reſt were of opinion to fight, being requeſted by Carolo to deliuer their opinions whether it were neceſſarie to aſſaile the enemie, made this anſwere. That hee among many other was giuen vnto them for their Commaunder, and that it was his Office and not theirs, to commaund what hee would haue to be done. And that if of himſelfe he knew not what was fitteſt, he ſhould doe well to follow the aduice of others: For as concerning themſelues they were both readie to march in what ranke he ſhould pleaſe either in the firſt or laſt, becauſe no man doth euer vndertake great and difficult matters, ſo much at the perill of another man as at his owne.

Carolo at laſt condiſcended to a battaile, and commanded Taurello and Pergulan with ſtrong ſupplies to remaine for the guard of the Camp, Lauellano and Sforza to fight in the firſt rankes, and Picinino to follow the Enſignes with the reſidue of the troupes. But Pergulan and Taurello, thinking they had great wrong to be placed out of the danger of the battaile, becauſe they had been of opinion not to fight with the enemie, did runne to the foremoſt rankes, and ſpake aloude, that they would with all their power repulſe that miſchiefe and loſſe which by their counſell they could not diuert. Carolo granted it, and by changing the rankes, commanded Picinino to ſtand readie with the ſuccours, and hee firſt marched againſt the enemie with the troupes of light Horſe, as hee had determined in the beginning. Hee commanded Taurello to follow him in the fore-ward, and Sforza and Pergulan to come after, and ſo the reſidue in order. The way was plaine, though ſomewhat crooked, from Pompiano, from whence the Philippians came, euen to the Venetians camp, without any hedge or ditch, becauſe in Winter all thoſe places are Wet and Moiſt, and in Philips Armie marcheth in battaile againſt the Venetians.

Sommer

Sommer full of Thornes and Shrubs; and neare therunto is a goodly fruitfull plaine on which to march, becauſe on the fore-part thereof the marſhes are neuer drie: the hearbs and graſſe in diuers places being drie in Sommer, it made a way both drie and beaten, but the paths were very crooked, and the Venetian had fortified ſome of them with deepe Trenches, and others with ſhallow Dikes. Taurello hauing viewed theſe places in part fortified, and partly abandoned, turning towards Sforza and the reſt, he cried out aloude, and ſaid, that God was Almightie, but that no man could diuert the ouerthrow which did that day threaten Philip and his Captaines.

So ſoone as the Venetian Generall perceiued the enemies to approch, hee commanded Tollentino to goe with two thouſand Horſe to the marſh which lieth neare to Terentiana, and to returne afterward to aſſaile the enemies on their backs, whileſt they ſhould bee buſied in the fight: Then hee placed great troupes of footmen on both ſides the waies in the marſhes, and himſelfe with the reſidue of the Armie marched furiouſly in front againſt the enemie. Carolo at the very firſt had beene enuironed and defeated, for that hee had inconſiderately ſent his light Horſe before, and a great part of his Footmen, had not Taurello, Sforza, and ſome others with the Enſignes, forthwith come to his aide, who after they had repulſed the enemies forces, made the fight in that place equall. Then there beganne on either ſide a cruell bickering: But the Footmen who were hidden by the way in the buſhes & ſhrubs, did in ſhort ſpace with their darts and arrowes make a great ſlaughter of Horſe. Taurello who at the firſt did follow Carolo to the fight, being aſſailed on euery ſide, made a retreate, and eſcaped on the other ſide of the marſhes: In the meane time in the rereward a great ſhout was made (for Tollentino was come thither.) Pergulan retired forth of the battaile, perceiuing that all was loſt: Sforza followed him with his troupes in a manner whole. But Picinino being enforced to fight in Front, in Flanque, and behinde, had much to doe to get forth of the middeſt of the preſſe; but at the laſt by the valour of his Souldiers he eſcaped to a place of ſafetie: Then they beganne openly to flie, and great ſlaughter was made euery where. Carolo was taken, and with him eight thouſand Horſe and Foote, as many of the one as of the other. Some ſay that ſixe thouſand Footmen were taken, and three thouſand Horſe. All the baggage of the Armie fell into the Victors hands, where they found great quantitie of gold and ſiluer, and much rich ſtuffe.

It is thought that Carmagnolla had at the ſame time meanes to haue driuen Philip from his ſtate, if hee had kept the priſoners, and had forthwith after the battaile marched againſt the enemie, but he knew not how to make vſe of this victorie, or rather would not doe it. Being returned to the Camp the night following hee ſet all the priſoners at libertie, not being intreated ſo to doe, which did purchaſe him the ill will of the Venetians: Some thought that it was the chiefe cauſe of his death. Three hundred more being brought vnto him the morrow after, whom hee had not ſeene the night before, he gaue them leaue to depart likewiſe, ſaying aloude that therein he followed the ancient cuſtome of the Warres.

The chiefe cauſe of Carmagnolla his death.

Vpon report of the loſſe of the battaile, all the Townes and Forts of the Breſſan did freely yeeld to the Venetians, excepting that of the new Orges, which being beſieged by the Venetian was in few daies taken by force: But whileſt this ſiege laſted, Philip made haſt to renew his Armie, and in ſhort time made great leuies of armour and horſe, in regard the Commanders, and the moſt part of the Armie were eſcaped. There were at the ſame time two Artificers in Milan who did vndertake in ſhort ſpace to arme as many thouſands of men, as were reported to haue beene taken in that battaile.

The Venetians take the new Orges.

Sforza and Picinino were not in the meane time idle; For ioyning with thoſe that eſcaped, they ſurprized the Venetians victualls, and did greatly trouble the forragers, and thoſe which went to the enemies Camp. Picinino did moreouer attempt by night to recouer Pontoglio, but it was in vaine. Captaine Breſſan a very famous Gentleman died at this enterprize, being ſurprized by the Townes-men.

Although

Philip hath recourſe to the Emperour Sigiſmond.

Although Philip perceiued his affaires to be reduced to great extremitie, yet neuertheleſſe he did not omit all poſſible meanes to ſtop the Venetians, purſuing the courſe of their victorie. He ſent to the Emperour Sigiſmond (vnto whom hee had in former times beene as great an enemie as to the Venetians) to entreat his aide, and that he would ſend Brunora of Eſcalla with an Armie into Italie againſt the Venetians. He did afterwards practize with Amadeo Duke of Sauoy, with whom (hauing quitted Verſeill vnto him) he did not only make a league, but entred into his affinitie, taking his Daughter to Wife, whom he neuer touched after the firſt night. He did moreouer entreat Pope Martin to vſe all meanes to diſvnite the Florentines from the Venetians. But the more he went about by theſe meanes to raiſe himſelfe, the more did contrarie fortune deject him, by the death of diuers of his beſt Captaines. Angelo Pergulano died within a while after, who was followed by Fabricio Campana, and diuers other notable perſons who died one after another. At the laſt Viſconte being afflicted with this latter loſſe, conſented to peace.

Philip marrieth the Duke of Sauois Daughter.

This buſineſſe was for a time debated at Ferrara in the preſence of the Popes Legat, where peace was granted on theſe conditions: That the Venetians ſhould haue Breſſia, with all the Breſſian and Bergameſe Territorie, and that part of the Bergameſe which ſtretcheth towards the Riuer Adice, together with all the Caſtles which they then held vpon the Cremoneſe. The Florentines had little or nothing giuen to them, but only this, that it might bee lawfull for them to fixe their owne Enſignes vpon their Gallies, in regard that before then, by an accord made with the Genoueſes, they were woont to vſe thoſe of the Piſans. Thoſe of Ferrara, Mantua, Paluicin, Montferrat, and thoſe of Sienna likewiſe, at the entreatie of the Florentines their aſſociates were freed together with thoſe Countries vpon the Riuer of Genoa, which lay towardes the Leuant. But the Malſpini, the Fregozas and the Fieſci, very Noble families of Genoa could not obtaine leaue of Philip to returne home to their houſes, notwithſtanding that the Florentines did earneſtly ſue in their behalf; yet neuertheleſſe he promiſed to reckon them in the number of his friends. Carmagnolla receiued his wife and children, and Palace, which he had moſt ſumptuouſly built at Milan before his baniſhment.

Peace betwixt the Venetians and Philip.

***

The end of the tenth Booke of the ſecond Decad.

THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE THIRD DECAD

Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the firſt Booke of the third Decad.

THe cauſe of the ſecond warre in Lombardie. The forces of Gvenesio of Luca are on a ſodaine defeated by Nicholao ſurnamed Stella. A treacherous attempt made on the perſon of Prince Foscari by Andrea Contareni. Francisco Sforza his iournie into Tuſcanie, where hee reſtoreth thoſe of Luca to their libertie.. Nicholao Picinino paſſeth into Tuſcanie againſt the Florentines Philip putteth Sforza in hope of a future alliance. The Turkes take Theſſalonica on the Sea Thermaic. A great froſt round about Venice, where Cartes went vpon the waters. The Florentines care and diligence to preſerue Piſa. Warre renewed againſt Philip. vpon the Cremoneſe. The Venetians nauall Armie is put to rout vpon the Po. The Venetians deſeate the Genoueſes vpon the Rapalitane Sea. Lavretan brings ſupplies to the Pope to Ciuita-vecchia. Philip giueth battaile to Carmagnolla neare to Somma, where the fight is equall. Cremona almoſt taken. Picinino waſteth all places vpon the Riuer of Genoa, and drieth the Prince of Monferrat an aſſociate of the Venetians from his whole State. The Venetians haue no good ſucceſſe at the ſiege of Chios. Carmagnolla being ſuſpected a Traitour to the Senate and convicted of the crime, hath his head ſtricken off. The Venetians are put to the worſt in the Camonian Valley. And laſtly peace is concluded with Philip.

PEace was not alone in Lombardie, but (which had not beene ſeene of a long time) ouer all Italie, at what time the rebellion of thoſe of Bolognia againſt Pope Martin did diſturbe this reſt: and within a while after warre was renewed betwixt the Venetians and Philip. And the better to vnderſtand the occaſion thereof, we muſt fetch the matter from farre.

The cauſe of the renewing of warre betwixt the Venetians and Philip.

Peace being concluded with Viſconte, the confines of that part of the Cremoneſe which had beene adiudged to the Venetians were cauſe of continuall controuerſie betwixt them, and of procuring that warre which enſued. For although the Marqueſſe of Æſte was at the beginning choſen Vmpier for both ſides, the ſame neuertheleſſe was ſome cauſe of renewing the warre. Beſides, the next Sommer after the peace, Philip made fierce warre vpon the Fieſci and Fregozas which were baniſhed from Genoa, whome during the treatie of peace hee would not comprehend in the Florentines Articles, but had promiſed to hold them in the number number of his friends. He tooke from them diuers Townes and Caſtles, firſt by meanes of the Genoueſes, and afterwards by Picinino, whome he ſent againſt them with a mightie Armie. But theſe matters, which were not ſmall, were neuertheleſſe too weake to renew this warre all at once.

Philip contrarie to his promiſe maketh warre vpon the Banditti of Genoa.

Paulo Gueneſio Tyrant of Luca.

Another farre greater ſubiect, which was neuer dreamt on, miniſtred a lawfull occaſion to take Armes. Paul of Luca of the Gueneſian Familie, had for the ſpace of thirtie yeares vſurped as a Tyrant the Signorie and Gouernment of Luca his natiue Countrie, and did in the meane time ſo Gouerne the Cities important affaires in his owne name, as in the middeſt of ſo manie ſtormes of warre which did at that time thunder vpon Italie, he could neuer be drawne to take Armes nor to encline to any ſide. This had greatly offended the Florentines, for that they could neuer in their aduerſitie draw any aide from him, as from their neighbour. VVherevpon all men both in generall and particular did hate the Gueneſian name and enuied his proſperitie. Therefore, peace being made with Philip, the chiefe of the Citie deuiſed by what meanes they might intangle him in ſome affaires of importance. They wanted not iuſt matter whereby to make warre vpon him. For Ladiſlaus his ſonne being in the Florentines pay, was gone from them without their leaue: knowing very well that they would not haue ſuffered him to haue ſerued againſt Pope Martin in the troubles of Bologna. But the people of Florence being tired with warre, would by no meanes heare any talke of Armes.

The chiefe of Florence are animated againſt the Gueneſians

The principall of the Citie who deteſted the Tyrants power, ſeeing they could not be ſuffered to raiſe open warre, would helpe themſelues by a ſecret meanes. To this end, they wonne priuately to their ſide Nicholao, ſurnamed Stella, Nephew to that great Captaine Bracchio, who being a young man was in the Florentines pay, that he giuing ouer his charge, ſhould openly ſay, that hee would (as his vncle had done) beare Armes for himſelfe; and that afterwards hee ſhould attempt vpon the Lucan Territories, telling him what claime he might pretend thereto: to wit That it was knowne ouer al Tuſcanie that Gueneſio was in times paſt tributarie to Bracchio, and that by right of ſucceſſion he might demaund that tribute of the Tyrant which he had paid vnto no man ſince his death.

This young man being ſodaine and reſolute, did not refuſe the buſineſſe. Whereupon hauing openly giuen ouer his charge he did in a ſhort ſpace aſſemble two thouſand men, and remained for a while vpon the Florentines Frontiers, as though he made preparations for a farre iournie. By reaſon of which aſſemblie the Sienois were in greater feare than thoſe of Luca. This expeditious Captaine diſcamping about twilight, the next morning by breake of day fell fiercely vpon the Lucan Territorie; where finding all things to be abandoned, hee carried away with him great numbers of priſoners, and much Cattell. Hee continued two dayes incamped vpon the plaine of Luca: in which time he waſted and burnt whatſoeuer hee met with. From thence going to beſiege the Townes, hee tooke from the Gueneſians within a few dayes eight Caſtles, of which hee razed thoſe that hee tooke by force, and preſerued the reſt which voluntarily yeelded.

The incurſions of Nicholao Stella vpon the Lucan Territorie.

Many vpon report of this newe warre ranne to his Armie on hope of bootie. The tyrant and thoſe of Luca being amazed at this ſodaine incurſion, and not knowing at firſt whence this tempeſt came, were fearefull of all things. But when they vnderſtood who was the Captaine, and how that it was a practiſe of the Florentines: hauing recommended the guard of the Citie to the young Gueneſians, they firſt ſent to Florence to complaine of that iniurie as proceeding from them. The Florentines being ignorant of the matter did confidently repell that ſlaunder. But thoſe of Luca ſent to Venice to complaine vnto them of their Confederates, and at the laſt to Philip and to the Sienois; earneſtly entreating them for reliefe in their affliction.

Thoſe of Luca craue aide of the Venetians, of Philip, and of the Sienois.

The Florentines in the meane time, perceiuing that the exploits of yong Bracchio did daily proſper: thinking that it might ſhortly come to paſſe, that by hauing a hand hand in that warre they might annexe the Citie of Luca to their State, which was oppreſſed with ſo many miſeries, did by a publick decree write to Nicholao his camp, (who already of himſelfe was no more able to beare the burthen of ſo great an Armie,) That he ſhould continue the purſuite of that warre in the Florentines name; that they were ready to furniſh him with men, victualls, ſupplies, and monie, and generally with all neceſſaries for the warre; that his only care ſhould be to goe forward as he had begun and to end that warre, whereby he ſhould purchaſe the peoples loue, and immortall praiſe; ſaying, That the Florentines would prouide for all the reſt. Thoſe of Sienna on the other ſide, fearing if their neighbours ſhould ſubiugate Luca, this ſtorme would afterwards fall vpon their libertie, ſent to entreate the Venetians to diuert the Florentines their common aſſociates from that war by ſome great menaces, if by other meanes they could not effect it. But it hapned by chance that at the ſame time as the Ambaſſadors of Sienna came to Venice for that purpoſe, the ſacred Soueraigne Magiſtrate of the Citie was by the follie of a Citizen highly outraged.

The Florentines do adiourn that which Bracchian had done, and doe entreate him to goe forward.

Andrea Contareni, iſſued from a verie noble and ancient familie, being by a diſeaſe become (in a manner) lunaticke, ſued for the office of Admirall of the Adriaticke Sea. It came to paſſe, that after it had beene denied him in the generall aſſembly, he was in the companie of certaine yong men; who ieſting with him, laid the cauſe of that denial on the Prince, telling him he ſhould neuer be preferred ſo long as Foſcari liued. This man being heereupon prouoked with rage and griefe, (two mightie ſpurs) became ſo vnmeaſurably and inordinately furious, as he went and aſſailed the Prince, as he was comming downe the ſtaires to Diuine Seruice in S. Marks Church. But the better to effect his purpoſe, hee made ſhew as if he would haue ſpoken with him in ſecret; whereupon ſuch as were neere him gaue place, that he might ſpeake to him with the more priuacie: Thus hauing gotten opportunitie, he drew forth a poniard that he had hidden vnder his gowne, and had (without all doubt) ſlain the old man, if one of the Ambaſſadours from Sienna, who was verie neere him, had not laid hold on his Arme, and turned aſide the blow, which ſtrook him on the face, neere to the noſe. The Senators and the Princes Officers did preſently encompaſſe the wounded Prince, and the Traitour; they defended the one, and haled the other to execution, who made meanes to eſcape. His right hand was cut off in the ſame place, which being tyed about his neck, he was hanged on the higheſt top of the Palace; or (according to ſome Authors) betwixt the two Columnes. The Republick being troubled with ſo ſtrange an accident, did in haſt anſwere the Ambaſſadours, That the Venetians did deſire to maintaine & defend the Sienois libertie; but that it belonged not to them to meddle with the controuerſie betwixt thoſe of Siena and the Florentines their aſſociates. And with this anſwere the Ambaſſadors were diſmiſſed. The Florentines in the mean time did hardly preſſe thoſe of Luca, which at the laſt cauſed Gueneſio, and the Sienois, to ſue vnto Philip and to the Genoueſes.

The Prince is outraged by a mad man.

The Venetians anſwere to the Ambaſſadours of Sienna.

Philip, vſing the ſame policie as did the Florentines, perſwaded Franciſco Sforza, that asking him leaue, he ſhould leuie the greateſt forces he could, and march into Tuſcan to the aide of thoſe of Luca. Whereupon Sforza being valiant and couetous of honor, did forthwith paſſe the Alpes, and ſpeedily brought a great Armie to Luca. Vpon his arriuall, Stella retired to the confines of Piſa, becauſe he would not be enforced to fight at one time neere to the Citie Wals with Sforza's forces, & with the Gueneſians, being induced thereunto by his vnckles example, whom he remembred to haue beene defeated in the ſame manner at the ſiege of Aquileia. He reſolued therefore to draw the warre out at length, vntill that Sforza's Armie ſhould be enforced through want of all things to abandon the Lucan Territorie. For, they being gone, hee determined to continue the ſiege ſo long, till he had conſtrained the Tyrant, or (in deſpight of him) the inhabitants to yeeld.

Sforza comming to the aide of thoſe of Luca cauſeth the enemie to raiſe his Campe.

Sforza hauing razed the Fortes which the enemies had builded neere to the Citie-gates, entered the Towne in a triumphant manner, where, (being receiued by Guenesio with a reciprocall congratulation), he made no long aboad, but went into the Territorie of Pistoia, where in a short space he tooke diuers places by force. Guenesio considering with himselfe what the euent of that warre would be, supposing that the aide he then made vse of, would not continue long with him, & though they should remaine with him for a long time, yet neuertheleſſe they did not seeme vnto him to be able wholly to free him from that warre, and that therefore it might happen that whether he would or no, he should one day be enforced to yeeld: And likewise because he knew, that with far greater aduantage he might treate of peace whilst his affaires were in perfection, than afterwards, he began secretly to deale with the Florentines. But hauing acquainted his familiar friends and seruants with the whole matter, Sforza was forthwith aduertized of his negotiation by those vnto whom hee had discouered himselfe. Whereupon Sforza by the commandement of Philip, vnto whom he had written concerning that businesse, did disdainely seize vpon the Tyrants person and children, and sent them to Milan; and all his rich moueables he gaue to his Souldiers. Now hauing by this meanes restored those of Luca to their libertie, he left a strong and mightie Garrison with them for their guard. The Townes-men at his departure, gaue him manie rich and costly presents. The Florentines likewise furnished him with victualls for his iourney, and presented him with thirtie thowsand crownes, for that he had procured their peace.

Guenesio going about to treate with the Florentines is discouered by Sforza.

The affaires of Tuscanie beeing thus pacified, and Sforza beeing growne great both in wealth & reputation (two sure ladders to ascend to greatnesse) he departed with his troupes forth of Tuscanie, and came into Lombardie. After his departure the Florentines came againe and besieged Luca. Philip to free them from that danger, making vse almost of the former manner, sent Nicholas Picinino in the name of the Genoueses, (into whose protection those of Luca were reported to haue cast themselues) to breake the Florentines designes. He came with great forces and rumor into Tuscanie.

Picinino commeth to the aide of the Luquois.

The Venetians hauing notice of Picinino's iournie against the Florentines, although at the first they could not be perswaded to take Armes for the war of Luca, yet neuertheleſſe being moued by the danger which threatned their associates, they sent to Philip, to let him know that they did greatly wonder, how that the Genoueses, who were vnder the power of an other man, were able to raise so great an Armie against the Florentines, for it was apparant to all men, that Picinino, and Lauellano, who went with him into Tuscanie, had of a long time beene pensioners to Philip, and not to the Genoueses; and therefore that he should doe wel, in all points to obserue the agreement, and not to wrong the associates of the one partie; or if he were determined to aide the Luquois by meanes of the Genoueses, he should not take it in euill part, if the Venetians likewise did afterwards aide the Florentines their associates with their forces. And for the rest it was at his owne choice whether hee would obserue the peace or no which he had sworne with the Venetians: As for themselues, they promised to obserue the accord so long as they should perceiue the affaires of their associates not to be disturbed by Philip or by any other: which they perceiuing otherwise to fal out, did wish him to desist from any more troubling their associates; otherwise he should be assured that if he did continue in molesting the Florentines, that the Venetians in their defence were already prepared for war.

The Venetians summons to Philip.

Although the Ambassadors brought back from him no certaine resolution vpon this summons, the Senate neuertheleſſe thought it not fit to take Armes vpon a sodaine. Picinino in the meane time defeated the Florentines neere to the riuer Arno. This being reported at Venice, they decreed no longer to delay, but to beginne the warre. Whereupon they sought to draw Francisco Sforza to their partie, who after ter his returne from Luca had ſtill made his aboad in Mirandola. The Florentines likewiſe made meanes to haue him, vnto whom he moſt inclined in regard of their friend-ſhip towards his Father. But ſo ſoone as Philip had an inckling thereof, the better to oblige that courageous young man to himſelfe by ſome ſtricter bond, he promiſed him his only daughter Bianca in marriage, putting him in hope, that if he had afterwards no male childe, to make him his ſucceſſour in all his Dominions.

The Florentines defeated by Picinino.

Philip promiſeth to giue his daughter in marriage to Sforza.

We haue read in the Commentaries of Montanus, That Philip for feare of loſing Sforza, becauſe he ſaw Picinino his corriuall to be preferred before him, and to haue the command of his Armie, did put him in hope of this affinitie and alliance by marriage. Pope Martins death did for a time delay this warre to the which both ſides were well addicted. Both the one and other thought it verie neceſſarie before they tooke Armes to ſee who ſhould be the next Pope. Gabrieli Candelmario a Venetian was choſen in the place of the deceaſed, and aſſumed to himſelfe the name of Eugenius. Although this man did at the beginning of his Papacie acquaint all Princes and Common-wealths by his Ambaſſadours, that he would doe nothing raſhly, ſaying, That he would be vmpier of their controuerſies, and in friendly manner eſtabliſh peace betwixt them, Philip neuertheleſſe ſuſpected him in regard of his Countrie. And therefore he did not ceaſe firſt ſecretly, and afterwards by open meanes, to practiſe whatſoeuer he could againſt him. And thus moleſting him in all matters, at the laſt he entangled him with a domeſtick warre in Rome by meanes of the Colonneſi.

Whereupon the Venetians perceiuing Philip, in ſted of acknowledging the Pope, openly to make warre vpon him, after that they had in the fourth moneth of Eugenius Papacie renued the league with the Florentines, they proclaimed warre againſt him. They did moreouer releiue the Marquis of Mont-ferrat with monie, and the Palauicins, whom they receiued into this new league. Beſides, they ſet forth a great nauall Armie, which went vp againſt the ſtreame of the Riuer Po to oppugne the enemie. Carmagnolla in the meane time lay with his forces at the new Orges, ready to march at the firſt rumour of this warre. Philip ſent Tolentino and Franciſco Sforza againſt him with gallant troupes. Hee likewiſe put into Cremona, vpon which all men thought that the whole burthen of the warre would fall, Lodouico Colonna with braue Souldiers; and oppoſed Lauelland, who was well accompanied, to the Prince of Mountferrat that had ſmall forces.

The Venetians proclaime warre againſt Philip.

Whileſt theſe things were done in Italie, certaine ſparkes of a verie dangerous warre (which the Venetians had within a while after by Sea and Land againſt Mahomet Ottaman the mightie Turkiſh Emperour) appeared at Theſſalonica a Citie of Macedonia. This Towne which in former times was verie famous, is ſeated on the Thermaic Sea, but in our time ſo deſert, as tenne thouſand Barbarians did eaſily force it. It did belong to the Venetians, and was gouerned by Giacomo Dandulo and Andrea Donato, who ſeeking to eſcape forth of the middeſt of the tumult, Dandulo was taken by the enemies. At the ſame time two ſorts of monies were coined in the Citie; that of moſt value was worth eight ſouls, and the leſſer, two. There was likewiſe a Bridge built of white ſtone neere to the Church of the Fryers Minors. It is moreouer recorded, That the waters round about the Citie were ſo frozen, as men went drie-foote from the Citie to Tourcelles, Malamoc, and (that which is more ſtrange) to Chioggia. It is reported that a bride was brought from Meſtre to Venice in a waggon, the which before that time was neuer ſeene; that waggons did paſſe vpon thoſe waters which are betwixt the Citie and the firme Land.

Theſſalonica Macedonia ken by the Turkes.

An extreame froſt.

The Florentines after the loſſe of the battaile in Tuſcanie neere to the riuer Arno, would againe haue attempted by reaſon of Picinino's abſence, to beſiege Luca (for after the battaile, he had retired himſelfe towards Pontremolle to force certaine places belonging to the Fiesci neere to the Alpes) had not Bartholomeo Fornari Captaine of fiue Genoa-gallies, and two ships of burthen, come and encamped before Liuorne. Whereupon fearing least by reason thereof the Pisans would reuolt, they were constrained to send part of their forces in Garrison into the Citie. VVithin a while after Picinino returned, who with a wonderfull speed had in a manner reduced al the towns belonging to the Pisans vnder his power. The Florentins after that they had lost all the rest, fearing least the victorious enemie would seize on Pisa, did make a verie cruell decree, That all the inhabitants from the age of fifteene yeres to three-score should depart forth of the Citie, before that a candle lighted vp for that purpose should be burnt out, and by that meanes did vnburthen the Citie which they suspected of a great number of inhabitants.

A cruell decree of the Florentines.

The enemie leauing the Pisan territorie marched to that of Volterra, which iourney was as prosperous to him as that of Pisa. For hauing taken all places of the countrey, Volterra likewise would haue beene mightily endangered, if Michaeli Attendulo sent by Pope Eugenius to aide the Florentines had not by his opportune comming freed it. These things were done in Tuscanie, whilest that Philip was greatly troubled, because that Carmagnolla lay at the new Orges with his troupes in a readinesse, hauing beene there a long time; and fearing least that he would beginne as in the precedent warres by some vnlooked-for repriſall, he began heedfully to looke to his affaires, that the enemie might not enterprize vpon him, by some secret practise: VVherefore after diligent search made, he discouered that they within the Castle of Lodes had promised to giue him entrance: VVhereupon hauing speedily smothered that treacherie, he was desirous to trie if he could take the enemie in his owne trappe. He did secretly counseli the Gouernour of the Castle of Socinna to promise the Venetian Generall, that for a certaine summe of money, he would deliuer vnto him the Castle, Munition and garrison. The Generall did not refuse this offer, for which he promised him a great summe of money, and had a day appointed him when he should bring his troupes thither. Philip being aduertized heereof, commanded Sforza and Tollentino to march thither verie secretly with part of their forces, to seize on all the waies, and to lay an Ambuscado for Carmagnolla to surprize him and his forces if it were possible.

Picinino scoureth the volterian territorie, as he had done that of the Pisans.

An enterprize vpon the Castle of Lodes discouered.

Carmagnolla failed not at the day appointed, and hauing sent before him certaine troupes to seize on the place, he made a stand neere to the towne with the residue of his forces. Those which were sent before, being receiued into a corner of the Castle were at the enemies mercie, when on a sodaine the Gouernour of the place cried out with a loud voice, calling diuers times to Carmagnolla, saying; That he was no traitor to Philip but a beguiler of his enemies. And thereupon Sforza and Tollentino arising forth of their ambush, and assailing the Venetians on euerie side, did greatly terrifie them. Carmagnolla then perceiued that he was taken in his owne subtilties, and presently turning his backe, fled in disorder as fast as he could. The report was, that hauing lost more than a thousand horse, he escaped by meanes of Tollentino.

Double trechery vpon the Castle of Soncina.

Carmagnolla escapeth by flight.

VVithin a while after, the Venetians being rather detained than encamped vpon the Cremonese, did fearelesse runne vp and downe: Lodouico Colonna (who as we haue said was sent to guard the Citie) went and assailed them being disorderly scattered vpon the riuers bankes, where he brake and defeated them with forces farre inferiour to theirs in number, and tooke three hundred horse from them. But I finde nothing recorded by Historians, concerning this second defeate. During these exploits in Lombardie, Tuscanie was much afflicted with warre, and especially the Florentines, who had Picinino still at their elbowes. For hauing a long time made incursions on the Volterran territorie, he marched towards that of Arezzo, where by intelligence he had like to haue taken the Citie. But being disappointed of his expectation, he began to batter Townes and Castles of which he tooke manie; some by force, and others by volunrarie yeelding. At this stay stood the state of the affaires of theſe two Prouinces, when Tollentino diſdaining that Duke Philip ſhould make more reckoning of Franciſco Sforza, and Picinino than of him, hauing to the one promiſed his alliance, and to the other committed the ſole commaund of his Armie, and thereby as it were held him in contempt, did leaue Philips partie, and retired with a gallant troup of his own followers into Flaminia. The Venetians and Florentines ſought to draw him to their parties, offering him the ſole commaund of the Armie if he would come into Lombardie. But matters being delaied, he went from Flaminia to the Popes ſeruice, againſt the Colonneſi neere to Rome. Philip was enforced by Tollentines departure, to call backe Picinino into Lombardie.

The venetians are put to rout vpon the Cremonese.

of

Tollentino leaueth Philips partie.

The Venetians in the meane time, although they well knew that they had renewed that warre with bad ſucceſſe, did neuertheleſſe leauie forces, and made great prouiſions of victuals and Armour, and beſides their land-forces, they made readie a mightie nauall Armie, to ſend it vp the riuer towards Cremona, wherein was ten thouſand fighting men beſides the Marriners and Pilots. Nicolao Treuiſano was made Generall, and in euerie veſſell a Venetian Gentleman commaunded. There was beſides great ſtore of warlik engines of all ſorts, as many almoſt as there were men. Carmagnolla likewiſe was encamped neere to the towne with twelue thouſand horſe, and as many foot. Philip had prepared a nauall Armie vpon the Theſin, which in number of veſſels, ſouldiers, and in all other prouiſions was inferiour to the Venetians, but for the valour of the Generall, and skill of the Pilots, if it did not ſurpaſſe it, it did at leaſtwiſe equall it. Gionanni Grimaldi the Genoueſe was Generall, a man among his countrymen the moſt famous and expert in marine matters of any of his time, of whoſe chooſing Philip manned the veſſels with Pilots, and the beſt Archers of Genoa. Picinino likewiſe being returned from Tuſcanie had greatly augmented the land-Armie. But by how much his preſence did further the affaires of Philip in Lombardie, by ſo much more did his abſence cauſe them to decline in Tuſcanie. For ſoone after his departure, Alberto Earle of Cunes, vnto whom he had committed the charge of thoſe troupes that he left in Tuſcanie, falling into an ambuſcado neere to the towne of Colle loſt aboue a thouſand horſe, whereupon he was ſuſpected to haue done it willingly, for that he had a meaning before to turne to the enemies partie.

The venetians nauall Armie vpon the Po.

But whileſt theſe things were done in Tuſcanie, all the burthen of the warre in Lombardie lay neere to Cremona, where the enemies were much weaker both by land and water than the Venetians. VVhereupon Picinino and Sforza perceiuing, that if to their weakneſſe they did not ioyne ſome pollicie, they ſhould not be able in both places to reſiſt the Venetian, they did by wit and diſcretion ſupplie the want of force. And therefore they made often incurſions into the enemies trenches, as though they had contemned them, and not remembred their nauall Armie, which by how much neerer it approached comming vp the ſtream, by ſo much more fiercely did they prouoke both the one and other campe. But in the night they did ſecretly conferre with Grimaldi, diſcourſing by what meanes they might giue battaile vpon the riuer Po: And reſoluing betwixt themſelues by what pollicie they might obtaine the victorie, the audacious Genoueſe hauing from farre deſcried the Venetian veſſels which kept the watch, did forthwith ſet forward againſt them, thereby to cauſe them to returne to tell Treuiſano of their approach, and by the way he came before the walles of Cremona, where full of hope and courage he tooke Picinino and all his men at Armes into his ſhips, which were equally diſtributed among the veſſels: Then he fel downe ſoftly with the ſtreame towards the enemie. So ſoone as they that were in the ſhips tops had deſcried him, the alarme was ſounded. The Venetian who craued nothing more, did ſpeedily commaund that by ſtrength of oares they ſhould draw neere to the enemies veſſels, to the end they might come to handie ſtrokes, the which Picinino was ſo farre off from refuſing, as on the contrarie, he did fiercely ſet forward before the reſt with a part of the veſſels. The Venetians wondering dering at first at the enemies boldneſſe, ſo ſoone as he perceiued their veſſells to gliſter with armour did ſuſpect the truth of the matter, how that he was to fight with the Land-Armie, and preſently ſent meſſage vpon meſſage to Carmagnolla to let him know that Picinino and Sforza were at ſtrokes with him together with their whole troupes, and therefore he entreated him, if he did wiſh the good of the Common-wealth, to come ſpeedily to his aide.

Stratageme of Philips Captains

It is reported vpon this arriuall of the meſſengers one after another Carmagnolla who was by nature cholerick grew extreame angrie, and with a loud voice did abhorre and condemne the Venetians fault, who reiecting his counſell would not diſtribute that great ſumme of monie to the land Armie, ſaying that he could not beliеue that which they reported to bee true, but that their Generall being affrighted at the ſhadow of an armed man did dreame that he had ſeen Gyants in the enemies ſhippes. The battaile in the meane time reſted doubtfull, and alreadie about ſunſet foure Gallies of the Venetians which the enemies drew to them by hookes did fight neare at hand, not as before with arrow-ſhot and warlike Engines, but hand to hand with ſharpe ſwords and axes made for that purpoſe. At the laſt theſe foure Gallies being loſt about the beginning of the night, the other Venetian ſhips which had fought with the enemie, retired to the hauen from whence they came. Picinino hauing carried away with him the veſſels that hee had taken, and cauſed Sforza to come into the ſhippes with a companie of men at Armes, commaunded Grimaldi againe to ſet forward againſt the enemie about the fourth watch of the night. The Generall of the Venetian Nauie had intelligence thereof; and becauſe he was out of hope of the aide of the land-Armie, by ſo much the more ſpeedily and carefully he had ordered his forces in battaile. So ſoone then as daie began to breake the two Nauall Armies deſcried one another, and the battaile was on both ſides demaunded with great clamours. The Venetian had, (like to a battaile on Land) cloſed his ſhips together, as if he had ment to haue giuen in vpon them, ſuppoſing, that by the continuall caſting of Engines, hee ſhould bee able to hinder the enemies approch who in numbers of men were ſtronger than he: which being perceiued by Philips Captaines, they preſently commanded their Marriners by force of oares to draw neare to them, that notwithſtanding all danger they might come to handie ſtrokes: This being ſpeedily executed, and with equall courage hauing from both ſides throwne iron hookes and cordes to grapple together, there was a fierce fight, whereof not any man that was there did remember to haue euer ſeene the like. Stones, Darts, Pots of artificiall fire lighted from both ſides on the Souldiers that were on heapes together; they thruſt burning torches in one anothers faces, they ſlew one another with ſwords, poniardes, axes; ſundrie kindes of death being preſented to their view. Then the ancient maner of Sea-fight betwixt the Venetians and Genoueſes, did equally torment both parties. They did from the ſhips tops throw downe vpon the enemies, earthen pots full of oile and glew, which breaking with the fall made the ſhips ſo ſlipperie as no man could ſtand vpom them; and therewithall baskets full of vnſlakte lime to dazell their ſight. The Venetians from the beginning had the worſt, as well by reaſon of the freſh ſupplies that the enemies had taken into their veſſells the ſame night, as for that they were better armed than the Venetians. The experience hereof together with the remembrance of the former dayes loſſe, had daunted the courage of Treuiſano and the reſt, who perceiuing fortune to fauour the enemies, and remembring that he had there with him a great ſumme of monie belonging to the Common-wealth, he went forth of his Admirall Gallie into a ſmall veſſell, and with the monie made haſt away. Hee being gone, the reſidue of the Armie, trembling with feare began to flie. The enemie ſtill keeping neare them, did breake and put them to rout. Fiue Gallies only, and no more, of ſo great a number eſcaped, who ſpeedily comming vpon the confines of the Palauicins, and being not wel entertained there went to the mouth of Po; all the reſt were taken by the enemie. It is reported that two thouſand men of both parties

Foure Venetian Gallies taken.

A bloudie fight.

The Venetians Nauall Armie defeated.

parties were ſlaine vpon the place; ſixe thouſand Venetians were taken; among whome were thirteene Senatours; and that of the whole bootie that was taken nothing was ſo welcome to Philip, as the veſſells: the biggeſt whereof hee cauſed to be drawne vp againſt the ſtreame into the Riuer Thelin, and the tackling of the others that were diſarmed to bee laid vp in the Caſtle of Cremona.

This loſſe, which vndoubtedly was very great, was followed by the reuolt of Palauicin, and Carmagnolla his diſmiſſion from his charge; who knowing that he had committed a fault would no more through his owne obſtinacie meddle therein; ſo as it was reported, that with deſpight and choller, he was brought to ſuch deſpaire, as the Senate by their Ambaſſadours had much to doe to comfort him. As for their partes, this loſſe was ſo farre off from diſcouraging them, as on the contrarie being readie to repell all aſſaults of fortune, they reſolued to aſſaile the Genoueſes in their owne Hauens, becauſe they had conducted Philips Nauall Armie which had vanquiſhed them vpon the Riuer. They Armed eighteene Gallies with Souldiours, Armes, victualls, Marriners, and made Pietro Lauretano their Generall, who was a man well experienced in marine matters. He being come with his Fleet ſooner than was expected, forth of the higher Sea into the lower, arriued at Liuorne: where being reenforced with fiue Florentine Gallies, hee did honourably receiue for aſſociates in that warre Giacomo Adorini, and Antonio Fieſca, who at that time were baniſhed from Genoa. The Familie of the Adorini is one of the nobleſt among the people, out of the which the Genoueſes did for a long time chooſe their Soueraigne Magiſtrate. And the Fieſci haue euer held a very honourable rancke among the Nobilitie. It was ſuppoſed at the beginning, that the preſence of thoſe great perſons accompanied with a mightie Nauall Armie of a free people would haue prouoked the Genoueſes to haue recouered their libertie, to haue expelled Philips Officers, and with great affection to haue imbraced their fellow-Citizens. But the Genoueſes vpon report of the Venetians comming had armed foure and twentie Gallies, among which was one ſhip of burthen. Franciſo Spinola was by Philips appointment made their Generall, a man beſides his ancient nobilitie verie famous for his valour.

Carmagnolla giues ouer his charge for ſorrow that hee had committed a fault.

A new Venetian Nauall Armie againſt the Genoueſes.

The Genoueſes Nauall Armie.

The Venetian Fleet in the meane time was come vpon the Rappallitan Sea ten miles from Genoa: It laie there at an anckor, when Spinola hauing intelligence thereof did in ſuch haſt depart from the Citie, as ſome veſſells that were of his number could not ouertake him all that day. The Genoueſe ſet forward full of courage and aſſurance, occaſioned by the remembrance of the late victorie obtained by his Countriemen vpon the Po. Being by day-breake come to the Promontorie of Rapalla (called at this day the Cape of the mount) perceiuing the enemie before him he commanded his Souldiers to make all things fit, and to prepare for the fight. Then without any delay, making vſe of a faire wind, hee hoiſed ſailes, and hauing giuen the Signall to his Souldiers hee went againſt the Venetians intending to ſinke the firſt Gallies he met with. Lauretano perceiued Spinolas deſigne, and as though he had not ment to fight, did ſpeedily put forth of the Gulph, whome the Genoueſes followed (as though he had fled) with great clamours. But the Venetian being come to a place where by turning his face vpon the enemie he might haue a fore-wind, he commaunded his Marriners ſodainely to turne the prowes vpon the enemie, who perceiuing him to returne to the fight, did brauely receiue him, and comming to handie ſtrokes there began a bloudie battaile betwixt them. Great numbers of arrowes flying from both ſides, in front and in flanke, did kill many of both fleets. And by this time three Venetian Gallies were neerely preſſed by the Genoueſes who had from the beginning of the fight encompaſſed them, which Spinola perceiuing, and ſuppoſing that with ſmall aide he might eaſily ſinke them, by ſtrength of oares and the force of the tide he made ſpeedily towards them: where his Gallie ſtriking a long Florentine ſhip vpon the broad ſide, had like to haue beene ſunke. But whileſt the Marriners were buſied in clearing of her, the enemie fell on a ſodaine

A Nauall battaile betwixt the Venetians and Genoueſes.

vpon

vpon her prow, ſo that in one Gallie the Genoueſes fought in the poope, and the enemie in the prow. Both of them fought with ſuch fierceneſſe, as the working of the ſea which was ſomewhat ſwelled, had-like to haue ſwallowed them both. The Venetians in the meane time had with yron hookes drawne eight Genoa-gallies vnto them, who brauely defending themſelues, ſo ſoone as they perceiued theyr Generall to be in danger, did yeelde to Lauretano. The others being well beaten, eſcaped by flight, whome the Venetians being wearied with fight did not purſue.

The venetians defeate the Genoueſe nauall army.

The victorious fleet came neere to the Towne of Reca which did voluntarily yeeld to Fieſca: From thence it returned to Liuorne, where they found that eight hundred men had beene ſlaine in the battaile, and about foure thouſand hurt. Lauretano, hauing firſt ſent Spinola Generall of the enemies fleet with eight Captaines of the Gallies, and three of his Councellors taken in that encounter, firſt to Florence, and then to Venice, he did put to Sea, and comming to Ciuitauecchia, did at the entreatie of Pope Eugenius tarrie there, vntill he had taken the Caſtle which commandeth the Hauen. That within a ſhort ſpace being recouered, he departed thence, and hauing coaſted round about Italie, he landed at Corfu.

Fieſca and Adorini are treacherouſly ſlaine.

Fieſca and Adorini, after Lauretanos departure, goeing from Piſa to Florence there to ſpend the time till Lauretanos returne, were treacherouſly aſſaulted by one Buffettio of Pauia, who valliantly defending themſelues becauſe they would not fall into their enemies hands, and being ſore wounded fell downe dead in the place. These things hapned along the coaſt of the lower Sea. But in Lumbardie, Philip, after the victorie vpon the Po, hoping for ſome greater fortune came to Cremona, to congratulate with his Souldiours for that victorie. The Venetian Armie was then at Summa, a place neere the Po, whither Philips Captaines, determining to fight if the enemies ſo pleaſed, did march in Battalion. The Venetians Generall did not refuſe the fight; whereupon, both ſides with great furie comming to ioyne, they fought with ſuch eagreneſſe, as there was no Souldiours either on foot or horſe (which doth not vſually happen) but did that day fight. In the end, fortune inclining no more to the one ſide than the other, the retreate was on both ſides ſounded. The other exploits of the remainder of the yeare were of no great moment, except that of the fifteenth of October; when as by the valor of Caualcabouis (who held a verie honorable rancke in the Venetian Campe) Cremona had like to haue beene taken.

A fierce fight by land.

An enterpriſe of the venetians vpon Cremona.

This man about mid-night had without any noiſe ſtollen with his troupes neere to the Citie, where hiding themſelues in the hedges and buſhes which ſhaddowed the Dike he lay a great while, vntill that the Sunne being riſen and the Sentinels retired, he perceiued the walles to be abandoned. For then his Souldiours hauing reared their Ladders did forthwith mount the walles, placing a ſtrong Garriſon to guard them. Carmagnolla with a braue troupe was come within three miles of the Towne, and had ſent certaine foot companies before, who being opportunely arriued, diuers of them aſcended the walles by the ſame Ladders that were alreadie reared, and they marching into the Citie, ſurpriſed the Corps-de.guard and ſeized on the next Gate; by which the others entring did eaſily ſuſtaine the attempts of the Inhabitants, who ranne to the alarme. If Carmagnolla had ſent his ſupplies, Cremona had beene taken; but failing therein, and pretending that the enemie had laid an ambuſh to entrappe him, thoſe which had entred the Towne, hauing loſt many of their fellowes, retired to their enſignes. Some ſaie that the Venetians held that place which they had taken two whole daies together: And others (whome I rather beleeue) eight houres onely. This opportunitie of taking the Citie being thus loſt, the Venetian Generall (for winter was alreadie come, and then the great raine that had fallen in Autumne, had made both the weather and the waies verie bad) did lead his Armie to their wintering Stations.

Vpon the coaſt of Genoa, after Lauretanos departure the affaires had no great good ſucceſſe. For after the defeate of the Genoueſes vpon the Rapallitan Sea, Bernabo rabo Adorni with thee hundred horſe, which the Marquis of Montferrat had giuen him, had cauſed all the coaſt of Genoa in a manner to reuolt, on the lands ſide. Picinino being ſent to pacifie theſe tumults hauing defeated Adorni and all his Cauallerie at Nouara, there was no kind of crueltie which he did not execute vpon the poore Inhabitants. For beſides great numbers that were ſlaine in two battailes, hee did by the Hang-man execute all thoſe whome the hazard of warre had pardoned. Afterwards being glutted with bloud, he ſet to ſale to them that offered moſt yong children, Matrons and reuerent Prieſts. Then he marched againſt the Prince of Montferrat, from whome in a ſhort ſpace he had taken thirtie Caſtles.

Picinino defeateth Bernabo Adorni.

The Generall Lauretano being come to Corfu, had acquainted the Senate with his need of ſupplies, together with the want his Gallies had of trimming, which were halfe broken in the laſt battaile. He could not ſpeedily obtaine his deſire in regard of another Nauie which the Senate had a while before ſent to take the Iſle of Chios belonging to the Genoueſes. This fleet conſiſted of ten ſhips of burthen and foureteene Gallies, with diuers other ſmall veſſells vnder the conduct of Andrea Mocenigo; who arriuing in the Iſland with the fleet, did by Sea and Land beſiege the principall Citie of that place, of the ſame name. And after that he had battered it on all ſides with engins and warlike inſtruments by the ſpace of two months, yet he could not take it, being manned with a verie ſtrong Gariſon. In the meane time there was a great rumour ſpred that great number of veſſels were arming at Genoa. Whereupon Mocenigo (hauing loſt many men in that ſiege) perceiuing that hee muſt needs raiſe his Campe: and being out of hope to take the Towne ere ſuccours arriued, did in a rage and deſpite ſpoile the reſidue of the Iſland by cutting downe the Vines and Fruit-trees. Hee departed thence before any ſupplies came from Genoa.

The Venetian fleet before Chios.

The enemie hauing intelligence that the Venetians had diſlodged; certaine Gallies and ſome fewe ſhips of burthen ſailed thither to continue there the remainder of the winter. The Summer following Pietro Spinola went thither with a greater fleet of foureteene ſhips of burthen, ſeauen Gallies, and eight thouſand fighting men.

Supplies come from Genoa to Chios.

The Venetians vpon the firſt newes of this fleet of the enemies, did likewiſe augment theirs which lay at Corfu to the number of thirtie three veſſells, to reſiſt the attempts of the Genoueſes. Lauretano departed thence, and with wonderfull ſpeed came whileſt the enemie coaſted Sicil, to Liuorne; from whence the Genoueſes not long before departed. Spinola being come ſooner to Corfu than he was lookt for did mightily affright thoſe of the Iſland who had not as yet finiſhed their fortifications. Therefore the Senate in all haſt did by letters aduertize Lauretano of the danger wherein Corfu was, if ſpeedie aide were not ſent thither. He hauing notice thereof, ſent ſixe of his beſt Gallies thither, to which the Senate hauing ioyned foure more, did make Silueſtro Moroſino their Generall who was commaunded to follow the Genoueſes whitherſoeuer they went, and to defend the Sea-coaſts together with the Gulph.

Siluester Morosino is sent to the aid of Corfu.

Whileſt theſe things were done at Sea, Picinino hauing waſted all the Marquiſat of Montferrat, returned to the Cremoneſe, where in ſhort ſpace he recouerd Torricelles & Bordelan, whereat all men did greatly wonder, in regard that Carmagnolla with his troupes was not farre from thence. The Senate being mightily incenſed thereat, did at laſt reuiue that which a long time before it had propounded Many had ſuſpected him from the beginning, who did openly crie out in the Senate, that the ſuſpition which they had conceiued of the man was ſo farre off from beeing ſmothered, as on the contrary it was much increaſed and daily augmented, acknowledging nothing in him, but the name of Generall, which was not an enemy to the Venetians. Others were of opinion not to haue him called in queſtion as culpable, vntill that the preſumptions of his trecherie were approued. The Aduocates and Procurators Fiſcall required to haue him committed to priſon, and if after hee had had beene tortured hee ſhould be found conuicted of treaſon, to haue him puniſhed with death. This determination which was of long continuance, did manifeſt the Venetians faithfull and ſecret conſtancie in the managing of their publique councells and affaires. For the Senate which is compoſed of ſundry orders of officers, being aſſembled for this purpoſe, the Senators came in the euening by torch light into the pallace, and departed thence the next morrow by day-breake, ſtil conſulting vpon that buſines. Carmagnola was at the ſame time in Venice, who comming in the morning to ſalute the Prince as hee came from the pallace, asked him with a ſmiling countenance, whether he ſhould bid him good night or good morrow, in regard he had not gone to bed that night. The Prince anſwered ſmiling, that the Senate being aſſembled about important matters, had in that nocturnall councell often mentioned him: Then on a ſodaine he changed his diſcourſe for feare leſt he ſhould ſuſpect any thing. Eight moneths were ſpent from the time of this conſultation till the day of his execution, during which time the matter was kept ſo ſecret, as Carmagnola neuer ſuſpected any thing, although diuers of the councell were his familiar friends, and ſome of them very poore, ſo as both the one and other might haue drawne from him what ſumme of money they had pleaſed, by diſcouering vnto him that which had beene concluded againſt him.

How ſecret thoſe things are kept which are determined in the Senate.

About the ſame time (for they had already begunne to treate of peace with Philip) being ſent for by the Senators letters, hee came to Venice, where comming forth of his Gondola, diuers gentlemen, according to the manner, went to receiue him, and after ſundry reciprocall embracements, they conducted him to the pallace, although they were not ignorant of that which was concluded againſt him. There being impriſoned, and put to the torture, hee was conuicted by his owne letters, which he could not deny, and by the teſtimony of his domeſticke ſeruants: wherupon, on the 19. day after his impriſonment, his head was ſtrucken off betwixt the two Columnes, and his goods were confiſcate to the publique treaſurie. The chiefe points of his accuſation were, his refuſall to relieue Treuiſano, and the loſſe of Cremona by his diſloyall delay. Before his execution, and at the ſame time that he was ſent for to Venice, the prince of Mantua was ſent to the army in Lombardy, and Georgio Cornari and Marco Dandulo were choſen Prouidatori.

Carmagnola being conuicted of treaſon is beheaded.

The prince of Mantua Generall of the Venetian armie.

Picinino in the meane time being puffed vp with the fortunate ſucceſſe of his exploits, did very earneſtly purſue his victories begunne in the time of Carmagnola. And if he had not bin grieuouſly wounded at the ſiege of Pontoglio, ſo that the phiſitions held him for a dead man, or elſe likely to languiſh for a long time, he would in a ſhort ſpace haue recouered whatſoeuer the Venetians did then poſſeſſe on the Cremoneſe. The newes of this hurt, was cauſe that the Marquis of Montferrat, being wholy driuen from his ſtate by Picinino, was in ſome ſort better entertained. The Marquis, ſo ſoone as he ſaw his forces to be broken, paſſed the Alpes, and went through the Treuiſan into Germany, and from thence returning to Treuiſo, he made meanes to the Venetians as to his friends and aſſociates, where hee was entertained by the Senatours with ſuch magnificent bountie, as during his abode there, he was neuer deſirous (as he afterward ſaid) to returne home into his country, nor yet to recouer his ſtate.

The Marqueſſe of Monferrat commeth for refuge to Venice

In the meane time Philips affaires declining in Lombardie had no better ſucceſſe in Tuſcanie. For Tollentino being diſmiſſed by the Pope, and ſoon after entertained by the Florentines, did make fierce incurſions vpon the territorie of the Sienois, and with great violence did waſte all the ſea coaſts. Afterwards ioyning with Attendulo whom he knew to be giuen him for companion, hauing taken certaine townes from the Sienois, he did in ſhort ſpace recouer all the townes which the enemie enioyed vpon the Piſan territorie. At the laſt, ioyning battell with Philips forces neare to mount Tepulo, he put them to rout, and tooke Bernardino Vbaldino priſoner, with three thouſand horſe. Others ſay that he tooke but a thouſand.

Attendulo recouereth ſundry places for the Florentines.

The ſame day of the fight neare to mount Tepulo, Sigiſmond, ſonne to Charles

King

King of Boheme and Hungarie, who at the earneſt entreatie of Philip was come into Italie with foure thouſand horſe, did enter Luca. He ſtaied for certaine daies at Milan, where being crowned (according to the manner) with the Crowne of Iron, and reſoluing to go to Rome, he did at Philips perſwaſion come to Luca, from thence to goe to Siena, for feare leaſt vnder colour of hoſpitalitie hee ſhould contract any league with the Florentines. Tollentino and Attendulo, by the Florentines command drew neere with their troupes to Luca, at which time it is reported that the Hungarians made a ſallie; and that their cauallerie did ſo boldly giue in vpon them, as ſome of them came to Attendulos Tent, vnto whome one amongſt them of a big ſtature (fighting with an iron mace) gaue him a great ſtroke vpon the head, but his caske being of excellent temper, he did not long delay to recompence him: For hee did preſently thruſt his ſword through his bodie: And that the Hungarians and Luquois being brauely repulſed, did ſpeedily retire into the Citie, hauing in that ſallie loſt many valiant men.

Sigiſmond in the behalfe of Philip commeth into Italie.

They ſay moreouer that Sigiſmond, after this loſſe, went at laſt to Siena where for a time the Pope and he were at great controuerſie; but by meanes of ſundrie ambaſſades ſent from either ſide, being made friends, he went to Rome where he was crowned Emperour.

Sigiſmond crowned Emperour at Rome.

There is nothing found worthie of memorie to haue beene done during that Sommer by Lauretano a-long the Coaſt of the lower Sea. The Sigeſtins only were for a time beſieged by Sea and Land; but the buſineſſe had no good ſucceſſe. For hauing loſt certaine Marriners of thoſe whome hee had ſent with Abrahamo Fregoſa to giue the aſſault on the Land-ſide, hee retired from thence without doing any thing. Afterwardes hee made incurſions vpon thoſe of Clauara, of whome hee got no great bootie. That being done, the Armie returned to Venice.

The Genoueſes that Sommer had no better fortune, but ſomewhat worſe. For ſayling along the Coaſt of Sicill, they loſt three Gallies by a tempeſt that aroſe, and hauing afterwards done nothing of note, about the end of Autumne they brought backe the Fleet to Genoa. In Lombardie Sanchio Venieri ſubrogated at Dandulo's requeſt in his ſted, and Cornari, the Prouidators of the Armie, did exploit brauely for the Common-wealth, hauing recouered from Philip, Bordellana, Ruminenga, Fontanelles, and Socinna.

The two Nauall Armies of the Venetians and Genoueſes returne home.

Such happie ſucceſſe had the Venetians affaires, when vpon the returne of the Prince of Mantua home to his owne houſe they beganne to talke of peace. The Senate at the Prince of Montferrats entreatie, ſent Fantino Michaeli to Ferrara, only to know what conditions of peace the enemie would propound. The Florentines likewiſe ſent Palla Stroſſi thither. Philip had alreadie ſent Franciſco Gallina thither for that purpoſe. But whileſt they treated of peace at Ferrara, the Prouidators hauing aſſailed the inhabitants of the mountaines, r educed vnder their obedience firſt the Camonic valley, and then that of Tellina. Daniel Vitturi, ſucceſſour to Venieri, ioyning with Cornari in the vale of Tellina, attempted to make a bridge ouer the Riuer Adda, to paſſe ouer into the enemies Countrie. But this deſigne came to nothing: the enemie valiantly oppoſing it. Cornari neuertheleſſe did ſtill with three thouſand men keepe the vale Tellina (vulgarly called Valtellina) whither Picinino, being ſent for by the chiefe of the Gibelline faction which fauoured Philip, ran with diſbanded troupes, but with ſome loſſe he was rudely repulſed. The ſubtile enemie knowing that the Venetiãs in regard of this fortunate ſucceſſe wold become more bold and couragious to attempt any thing, hauing firſt placed his Ambuſh, he returned the next day, and of ſet purpoſe began to skirmiſh, and drew the Prouidatour with all his troupes into the place of Ambuſcado, where with a ſodaine reuolt of all the inhabitauts neare at hand, hee brake and defeated him with all his troupes. Three hundred horſe making way through the middeſt of the enemies eſcaped into a verie thicke Forreſt that was at their backes. The Priſoners, beſides Cornari, were Thadeo De Æſte, Ceſar Martinenga, Italus of Friull, Baptiſta Capitio

The Venetians are defeated by Picinino.

Capitio, and Antonio Martinasco, who were all famous Captaines.

Neere to the Po likewise there were great combustions. For whilest these things were done in the mountaines, Philips Captaines recouered Casal-maior, and Brixelles. The losse of the vale of Tellina being reported to the Senate, they presently resolued to appoint a new Generall of their Armie. The Prince of Mantua, though some were against it, was by the Senate chosen to commaund the Armie. Hee hauing accepted the charge, went forthwith to the Campe, and on a sodaine recouered the Camonick valley which was reuolted; Then by the aduise of Contareni, Cornari his successour, he conducted all his troupes (for winter was alreadie come) to winter in the neighbour vallies.

The Articles of peace betwixt the Venetians and Philip.

Peace being debated on all that winter, was at last at the spring-time concluded on these conditions: to wit That Philip should restore all the Townes and strong places which he had taken vpon the Bressan and Bergamese Territories during the treatie of peace: That he should surrender to the Prince of Montferrat his whole estate which he had taken from him during the warre: (although some say that he had alreadie done it for Sigismonds sake:) That he should giue all assurance to Lodouico Vermio and others who had borne Armes for the Venetians: That all prisoners of marke on both sides should bee set at libertie. That hee should likewise restore to the Florentines, all those Townes taken from them in the Pisan and Volaterran Territories, and should doe his best to cause the Sienois likewise to surrender to the Florentines within a moneth, whatsoeuer they had taken from them; and if they refused so to doe hee should giue them no aide nor assistance; As concerning the Luquois, Thomaso Fregosa, and Lodouico Plombino, (for this man during the warre, had likewise borne Armes against the Florentines) it was decreed that they shold restore whatsoeuer they had taken from the Florentines, and that the Lord of Plombin should no more bee vnder Philips protection: But as for Fregosa, it should be lawfull for him to follow what partie he pleased.

There was a long disputation about Pontremola, yet neuertheless Philip did at last obtaine that Towne, on condition to restore to the inhabitants of the Florentines partie, whatsoeuer hee had taken from them. The Senate perceiuing that Cornari did not returne, was so troubled, as they would not establish the peace, vnlesse Philip (according to the contract) did send home their Senatour: but the Ambassadors sent to Philip for this purpose, affirming that he was dead a day before, they did in Philips name satisfie the Prince and Senate, Cornari dyeth in Prison.

()

The end of the first Booke of the third Decad.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE THIRD DECAD Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the ſecond Booke of the third Decad.

FRancisco Sforza ſeizeth on the Marca d'Ancona, and on a part of the Dutchie of Spoleta. Pope Evgenivs is driuen from Rome. The Armies of Sforza and Bracchian are readie to ioyne battaile one with an other at Vetrale. Picinino in a manner did renew the Warre on the Sabins. Hee doth wholly defeate the league-troupes neare to Imola. Marsilio Carrario is beheaded at Venice. King Alphonso is defeated at Sea by the Genoueſes neare to Gayetta. The Genoueſes reuolt from Philip. Luca is ſtreightly beſieged by the Florentines. The Emperour Constantine Paleologo, with diuers Chriſtian Biſhops commeth to Ferrara to conferre with the Pope concerning matters of Religion. All the Venetian troupes are in a manner put to rout neare to the River Adice. The Florentines ſend Cosmo de Medicis to Venice. The great exploits of Sforza and Picinino neare to the Alpes. Sforza alleth himſelfe with Philip and the Florentines. Picinino taketh diuers Townes from the Venetians on the Breſſan and Bergameſe Territories. The deſcription of the Lake of La Garda. Laſtly, the Venetians fight with good ſucceſſe in the Camonick Valley.

BY this accord for the ſpace of foure yeares there was neither certaine Warre nor Peace with Philip. At the beginning vnder-hand he moleſted Pope Eugenius, and afterwards by open Warre; which cauſed the Venetians who withſtood it, to attempt by al meanes though it were contrarie to the accord, to maintaine their Countriman in his Pontificall dignitie. In the meane time ſundrie warlike exploits were done here and there, and in ſundrie places they fought with different ſucceſſe. Moreouer, many treaſons and ſuſpitions were diſcouered on either ſide, not only abroad but at home in the Citie, as ſhall be hereafter more at large mentioned. Wee will now briefly ſet downe that which happened farre from the Citie, for the better vnderſtanding of the cauſe why the Venetian did recommence the Warre with Philip in Lombardie.

The cauſe of the renewing of the warre betwixt the venetians and Philip.

He had entangled (as hath beene ſaid) Eugenius at the beginning of his Papacie in a domeſticke warre, from whence toward the latter end of the warre of Lombardie great quarrels, and contentions aroſe as well without as within the Citie of Rome: which although ſometimes they ſeemed to be raked vp, could neuer for all that be wholly extinguiſhed. But this furie running from one place to another, did at laſt ſo farre ſpread it ſelfe abroad, that there was no Prouince, Citie, Towne, Village, nor any place belonging to the Church of Rome, which had not a feeling thereof. And not to fetch our Hiſtorie from farre; Lombardie being quieted, Franciſco Sforza diſdaining that Philip had made Picinino, his corriuall, Generall of his Armie, notwithſtanding that the Viſconte had promiſed him his future alliance, yet neuertheleſſe this braue and couragious young man, being not able to containe himſelfe, hauing after long ſuite obtained leaue to go his way, departed from Lombardie with two thouſand horſe, and a great number of foot, vnder colour to ſerue King Renatus, who laid claime to the Realme of Naples, againſt King Alphonſo. And paſſing through Flaminia, he fiercely entered vpon the Marca of Ancona, where finding all things at quiet and no reſiſtance, after that he had taken great bootie, and waſted all the countrey, he reduced vnder his owne commaund partly by force, and partly by a voluntarie reddition, all the Townes, Villages, and Caſtles, and other places of La Marca. This iourney was verie commodious to Sforzas troupes for their wintering.

Sforza ſeizeth on the Marca of Ancona.

Picinino, who greatly ſuſpected Sforzas actions, did by Philips aduiſe depart forth of Lombardy at the ſpring time with a thouſand choiſe horſe to thwart Sforzas deſigns, and giuing out that he went to the wholeſome bathes of the Sienois, he came into Tuſcanie. Then by the meanes of ſome of his friends he dealt with Nicolao ſurnamed Stella, that they might ioyne their forces together, and afterwards make warre both on the Pope and Sforza. Stella at the ſame time poſſeſſed certaine townes neere to Rome; and as a neere neighbour did greatly moleſt Eugenius, preſuming vpon the Coloneſſi. And by this meanes the Churches patrimonie being expoſed as a prey betwixt them, was at one time waſted and torne in peeces by two enemie factions, the which although they began but to ſpring vp in Italie, did neuertheleſſe ſurpaſſe all thoſe that had preceded them.

Picinino and Stella make an accord together.

Sforza in the middeſt of theſe troubles left his wintering places, and firſt marched into the Dutchie of Spoletta, where with wonderfull ſucceſſe he tooke Tuderta, Ameria, and diuers other places by a voluntarie reddition. And hauing croſſed the Tyber, and filled the whole countrey with feare and terrour, he went and encampedon the Viterbian territorie. The inhabitants of Viterbo did relieue him with victuals, and did counſell him (as it is reported) to reconcile himſelf to the Pope, and to take his partie againſt the Bracchians his enemies. Picinino was at the ſame time encamped at Montefiaſcone. This cauſed Sforza to make haſt, fearing leaſt he ſhould ioyne his forces with Bracchian, who lay not farre from Rome. For he had rather fight with one alone, if he muſt needes come to battaile, than to deale with the whole Bracchian faction, which he had like to haue done. Eugenius in the meane time being enforced by the Bracchians who were backt by the Coloneſſi forſooke his Pallace, & withdrew himſelfe all trembling to the Caſtle Saint Angelo, and from thence taking boate vpon the Tyber, and paſſing through the enemies ſhot, he went to Oſtia, and from thence to Florence.

Sforza his ſucceſſe.

Pope Eugenius leaueth Rome, & commeth to Florence.

The Pope being thus driuen from Rome, victorious Bracchian thought on nothing more than on meanes how to defeate Sforza. But Sforza hauing ioyned the troups of Micaeli Attendulo to his owne, did raiſe a verie great and almoſt inuincible Armie. Picinino and Stella came and encamped betwixt Viterbo and Riſpampane. Sforza likewiſe marched thither; whereby it happened that in a ſhort ſpace all the forces of theſe two great factions were readie to fight with one another. Sforza determined to giue battaile if the enemie would tarrie for him, and had alreadie cauſed his foot forces to ſeize on the forreſt of Vetrale, ſo as there was ſome likelihood Sforza and Attendulo ioyne together.

lihood that the Bracchians would haue that day receiued a great ouerthrow, if Vrbano de Dertonna ſent from Philip, had not arriued, who running betwixt thoſe two Armies did with teares in his eies entreate now the one and then the other, earneſtly requeſting them in Philips name not to commit ſo great an error: He beſought them to remember that they had in former time borne armes together vnder one Prince: that vnder Philip, they begain their ſtrength and greatneſſe: That thoſe Armies though they were not friends in name, neuertheleſſe they were ſuch in effect and by alliance: That the victorie of one of the parties could not but procure all miſchiefe to Philip: He entreated them then to reſpect him who held them both (as they well knew) ſo deere, and vnto whom they ought to aſcribe whatſoeuer they had either of force or reputation in both their Armies.

The two armies are readie to fight.

The remonſtrances of Vrbano of Dertonna to keepe them from battaile.

The authoritie of ſo great a Prince, although he was abſent, did mightily preuaile with both parties: and Armes being laid downe, they began to talke of agreement. At laſt it was concluded betwixt them that Picinino ſhould returne into Lombardie, and that it ſhould be lawfull for Sforza with his troups to go whither he pleaſed: thoſe townes neere to Rome excepted held by the Garriſons of Stella. But Picinino (who as it ſeemed was not well pleaſed with thoſe conditions of peace) marching within a while after againſt the Sabines, where he had renewed the warre, Sforza did likewiſe haſt thither, who hauing croſſed the Tyber, went to Ottricoli. Bracchians Armie lay at Maillana not farre from thence, where after certaine light skirmiſhes, and ſundrie poſts being come from Philip, Picinino craued that he might in ſafetie returne with his Armie into Lombardie; The which hee freely obtained of Sforza, who of a long time had beene euill diſpoſed of his perſon.

Accord betwixt Sforza and Picinino.

Picinino had alreadie peaceably entered into Flaminia, when neere to Imola he met with a great Armie compoſed of the forces of Eugenius, the Venetians and Florentines, who were leagued togither. Theſe men had aſſembled great troupes together with great Lords and Captains, to force Bolognia which at the purſuite of the Caneduli had reuolted from the Pope; And they had alreadie recouered certaine Cities of the Bologneſes, at ſuch time as thoſe of the Pope and the aſſociates quitting their enterprize came to ſtop Picininos paſſage. The charge of this reſolution being committed to Tollentino, who with all the leagues troups went and encamped at Imola, Picinino likewiſe came and encamped vpon the ſame territorie. Tollentino was accompanied by Paulo Vrſino, Cato Mellito, Guido Antonio Fauentino, Thadeo d'Æſte, and diuers other noble men.

The Pope, Venetians and Florentines in league together.

It happened in the meane time that Mellito did ſurprize two hundred horſe of the enemies, whereupon the others being ſpurred forward by iealouſie, and by a deſire of bootie, did ſodainly and inconſiderately craue the battaile, to the which comming disbanded, and in diſorder, they were broken and put to rout, and Tollentino, with Æſte, Vrſino, and diuers others, who till then had gotten much reputation, were taken by the enemie. Three thouſand horſe, and a thouſand foote were taken priſoners, and ſuch a great modeſtie and courteſie in warre was then vſed, as the like had not beene ſeene, for it is reported that foure men only were ſlaine in that encounter, and about thirtie ſleightly hurt. The victorious enemie marched towards Bolognia: And it is likely that the Pope and his aſſociates would haue done their beſt to haue diuerted him from that deſigne, for it is certaine that Philip who had ſent for him from Tuſcanie, did openly fauour the Bologneſes.

Picinino deſeateth the Armie of the league.

Picinino after that he had for a time at the requeſt of the Caneduli in vaine beſieged Caſtel-Franco, went into Lombardie, leauing his ſonne Franciſco with ſixe hundred horſe vpon the Bolognia territory. It was afterwards thought that he left that caualerie with his ſonne, becauſe he ſhould ſpeedily aid Marſilio Carrario to ſeize on Padua. This Carrario was ſonne to that Franciſco Carrario, who thirtie yeares before being with his two children impriſoned at Venice was by the commandement of the Senate ſtrangled in the priſon with them. Philip had ſent for him from Hungarie, and for a time had kept him ſecret in Lombardie, in which ſpace he did by Picinino beſieged Caſtell-Franco.

Carrario commeth forth of Gelmanie to take Padua.

faire and great promiſes winne certaine Paduans, that they receiuing him into their Citie, ſhould ſeize on the gates and the Caſtle, vnprouided at that time of Garriſon, promiſing them without all doubt to relieue them, for he was preſently ready to furniſh them with whatſoeuer ſhould be needfull for the preſeruation of the citie with the inhabitants, as ſouldiers, money and victuals, and that himſelfe (which was the chiefeſt) would ſpeedily come thither with a great Armie: That thoſe of Verona and Vincenza did ſecretly reſolue to reuolt. All which was afterwards knowne to be forged by him that he might with more eaſe induce the Paduans to doe what he would haue them.

Philip ſolliciteth the Paduans againſt the venetians.

Hauing by theſe promiſes, and ſundrie others, drawne diuers debauched companions of the Citie to commit this hainous treaſon, the fifteenth of March was the day appointed that Marſilio ſhould enter into Padua, who was alreadie come in diſguiſed habite as an Almaine marchant going to Rome: and comming vpon the Vincenzan territorie accompanied with a few, that he might the next day enter into Padua, he was diſcouered by ſome that had familiarly knowne him in his fathers life time, who cauſed him and his companions to be apprehended, and carried to Venice, where with two of Philips friends ſent to aſſiſt him, he was put to death, and twentie Paduans were conuicted of the conſpiracie.

Carrario being diſcouered was executed at venice.

Picinino within a while after returning into Flaminia with a braue cauallerie Sforza (being ſent for out of the Dutchie of Spoleta by Pope Eugenius, with whom being in fauour, he had made a league) was ſent to daſh his attempts. The conditions of the league were, That Sforza by a decree of the Pope and Colledge of Cardinals ſhould during his life enioy the Marquizat of the Marches of Ancona, and ſhould be Gonfalioniero or Captaine Generall of the Church of Rome, and haue entertainment giuen him for three thouſand horſe and a thouſand foote.

The Prouince had beene a long time moleſted, and Bracchians forces had ſufficiently runne vp downe: and that peace was treated on, at what time the Florentines with wonderfull ſpeed receiued newes, that the Genoueſes had defeated king Alphonſo at Sea neere to Gayetta, and taken him priſoner with two of his brethren, namely king Iohn, and the Infant Henrie, and Iohn Antonio Prince of Tarentum, with three hundred other noble perſons which were all brought to Genoa. This cauſed the Florentines to haſten the concluſion thereof, which was done vpon gentler conditions, than if Philip had vnderſtood before of that victorie. By this peace the affaires of Lombardie, Tuſcanie, and Flaminia ſeemed to be wholly pacified, if a new contention had not riſen betwixt the Venetians and Philip about the confines of the Cremoneſe. To end which, beſides Nicolao d' Eſte who was choſen Vmpire for both parties, Pope Eugenius did greatly labour, at what time ſpeedie newes were brought, that the Genoueſes hauing ſlaine Oppicino Alciat their Gouernour, were reuolted from Philip.

King Alphonſo is taken and vanquiſhed by the Genoueſes.

The Genoneſes reuolt from Philip.

The cauſe of this rebellion was reported to be, becauſe that Philip in deſpite of the Genoueſes had commanded that Alphonſo and all the priſoners ſhould be brought to Milan, who hauing royally entertained them, not as enemies, but as his gueſtes, he gaue them leaue to depart. Franciſco Spinola, who in the ſecond warre of Lombardie was taken by Lauretano vpon the Rapallitan Sea, was Author of this rebellion.

It is reported that the Venetians during his impriſonment did oftentimes tell him and other Gentlemen taken with him, when they came to viſite him, how wretched and ill beſeeming a thing it was to ſee Genoa, a Citie verie famous for her high attempts by ſea and land, borne in libertie and to command, and which at the ſame time poſſeſſed diuers Cities in Europe, to degenerate from the magnanimitie of her Anceſtors, and to be ſo deiected without any remembrance of her aneient ſplendor, baſely to obay an inſolent tyrant, like ſome other poore towne founded in ſeruitude. They willed them then to get them home, and to ſhake off that vnworthie yoake of tyrannie; that they ſhould not doubt but that they would relieue them with with money, ſhips, and whatſoeuer ſhould be neceſſarie to repulſe ſuch an iniurie: That they were readie with the Florentines their aſſociates (as well in diſgrace of Philip, as becauſe it was iuſt and reaſonable that thoſe who are at libertie ſhould defend that of other men) to maintaine and defend the wealth and ſafetie of the Genoueſes, as much as if it were their owne.

The venetians perſwaſions to the Genoueſes.

Theſe men being animated by theſe remonſtrances came to Genoa: But Spinola returning from his impriſonment, did voluntarily baniſh himſelfe to Gayetta, becauſe hee knew that Philip ſuſpected him: Some ſay that Philip ſent him thither to guard that Towne, which hauing beene defended againſt Alphonſos attempts, eſpecially by his diligence and valour, he thought in regard thereof that hee had done a notable ſeruice to Philip, and giuen him ſufficient proofe and aſſurance of his loyaltie: whereupon he returned to Genoa after the battaile of Gayetta, where being coldly entertained by the Officers and Magiſtrates of the Citie, hee did incite the people to recouer their libertie. Spinola Author of the Genoueſes rebellion.

Now the rebellion of the Genoueſes being knowne, Picinino was commaunded ſpeedily to march againſt them, who hauing remained a while vpon the Genoan Territories, did nothing there worthy of memorie. The Florentines at the Venetians purſute did relieue the Genoueſes with victualls and Souldiers, not caring greatly to obſerue the accord, which Philip had firſt broken, in that he had, contrarie to the treatie of peace, made a league with Alphonſo, and had a hand in the affaires of the Realme of Naples. But in ſome Authors I finde no mention made of this accord, which laſted ſo ſhort a time. The Pope had before recouered Bolognia with the conſent of the Caneduli, where the motion of peace was firſt begun. Franciſco Sforza being come from La Marca into Flaminia by the Popes commandement, had cauſed Philip to condiſcend to very reaſonable conditions. For the preſence of this yong man did in ſome ſort qualifie his obſtinacie. Truce was euery where granted by reaſon of the great hope the Pope had of peace, when the ſodaine commotions of the Genoueſes did breake all, who comming to Portouennere which lieth vpon the Genoueſes Sea-coaſts, ſurprized the Caſtle, and expulſed the Arragonian Garriſon. The Florentines relieue the Genoueſes. A treatie of peace, almoſt concluded, is wholly broken off.

King Alphonſo held three places vpon that Sea-coaſt which Philip had giuen him not long before. Picinino being called forth of the Parmeſan where he lay, vpon report of this ſurprizall (for Philip did openly then take Alphonſo's partie) went ſpeedily to recouer that Fort. But finding it to bee impregnable, both by ſituation and art, turning his forces elſewhere, hee ſeized on the Towne of Sarſane; then taking Caſtel-nouo, and certaine other Townes vpon that Coaſt; and hauing contrarie to all ancient and moderne accords croſſed the Macra, he went to Luca, where he enforced the Luquois to breake the peace which they had ſworne to the Florentines; and entring into the Piſan Territorie, hee tooke diuers Townes from the Florentines. Some ſay that the Luquois ſent for Picinino, who attempted to recouer the Towne of Bargues from the Florentines, and during the ſiege of Bargues, Picinino was defeated by Ciarpelion and Pietro Brunora, ſent by Sforza. He would vndoubtedly haue much entangled the Florentines affaires, if the hope to take Genoa by a commotion, had not made him to quit Tuſcanie, and to goe ſpeedily to the Genoueſes Territorie. Picinino his exploits againſt the Florentines.

Sforza in the meane time hauing croſſed the Riuer Arno, did in ſhort ſpace recouer vpon the Piſan Territorie, whatſoeuer the enemie had taken by force; and hauing brought his Campe nearer to Luca, and made certaine Rampiers neare to the Gates, he beganne ſtreightly to ſhut vp the Inhabitants. Picinino, being diſappointed of his enterpriſe, marched to the Parmeſan to get victualls and ſupplies. But whileſt delaies were vſed therein; The Luquois, by reaſon that their corne was partly ſpoiled by the enemies whileſt it was green, and partly reaped by them when it was ripe, fell into great want of victualls, as without ſome forraine reliefe, the Inhabitants would vndoubtedly haue beene forced to yeeld. Sforza went afterwards Sforza recouereth that which Picinino had taken.

to the ſtreights of the Appenine hills to meete Picinino, who was comming ſpeedily to ſuccour the Luquois : who hauing attempted in vaine to force the paſſages, and being out of hope to effect it, retired.

The Venetians craue aide of Sforza.

The Venetians that were in the field did earneſtly ſolicite, that the Countrie round about Luca might bee forraged, the ſooner to enforce the Inhabitants to yeeld. Sforza with a part of his Armie went into Lombardie. For they had determined, after that they had croſſed the Riuer Adda, and furniſht the oppoſite ſhore with a ſtrong Garriſon, to make incurſions vpon the Milanois Territories : from whence Philip drew great ſums of money. There was ſome likelihood that there by the power of that proud enemie would be ſo danted, as laying downe armes (which he loued too well) he would be conſtrained to embrace peace vpon any conditions whatſoeuer.

The Florentines being therewith diſcontented, conceiued ſome enuie againſt the Venetians, as though they could not endure to haue Luca a very famous Citie in Tuſcanie, to fall into the hands of their aſſociates. But the Venetians were ſo far from being blamed therefore, as on the contrarie, waiting no longer for Sforza's comming, they ſent in that iourney Franciſco Gonzaga as Generall of their troupes. Pope Eugenius was then (as hath been ſaid) at Bolognia, being come from Florence to make himſelfe maſter of the Citie by meanes of ſome excellent fortification.

A citadell made at Bolognia.

Whereupon with great expences he cauſed trenches, and a rampier, in forme of a Citadell, to be made at the Gate of La Galera. This fortification and the murther of Bentiuoglio (who being newly receiued into the Citie was ſlaine by the ſtroke of a Polax by Baltazar Offidane, Gouernour of the Citie, for that he perceiued the people to make too much of him) did in ſuch ſort eſtrange the Bologneſes from the Pope, as the rebellion which ſoone after enſued, happened vpon none other occaſion. But whileſt Eugenius made his aboade at Bolognia, there arriued at Venice Iohn Peleologo Emperour of Greece, Ioſeph Patriarch of Conſtantinople, and Demetrius Prince of Morea, accompanied with the Agents of the Churches of Alexandria, Antioch, and Ieruſalem, with the Ambaſſadours of Trapezond, and the Metropolitan Prelates of Iberia, and Miſia, who from thence being come to Ferrara where the Pope was, conferred with him in an open aſſembly about the accord and vnion of the Chriſtian faith. It chanced ſince ſome fiue hundred yeares, that from our faith which in effect and name is but one, two haue ſeemed to ſpring. For the Greekes did in ſundrie points differ from the Latine Church, who although they had beene often reconciled, were by the fault and negligence of Emperours fallen more obſtinately into the Hereſies which they had abiured. This Conference, which was rather a Diſputation, laſted diuers Moneths ; and at the laſt the matter was concluded (as ſhall be hereafter mentioned) to the Popes content.

The Grecian Emperour, and the chiefe of the Greeke Empire come to Venice to conferre with the Pope concerning Religion.

The Prince of Mantua Generall of the Venetian Armie.

The Venetians about the ſame time being out of hope of Sforza's comming into Lombardie, had commanded (as hath beene ſaid) the Prince of Mantua, Generall of their Armie, to make a bridge vpon the Riuer Adda. Thoſe that did then beare Armes for the Venetians were Mellato Tibertino, Brandolino, Pietro Nauarrini, Guido Antonio, Aſturi Fauentio, Sigiſmondo Malateſte, and Bartholomeo Coioni, Guido Rangoni, Guerriero Martiano, Antonio Martinenga, with diuers other great perſonages. Mellato who had firſt counſailed the building of a bridge, being commanded to lead the firſt battaillon ouer the water, departed about midnight with his Cauallerie, which were readie for that purpoſe, and croſſed the Riuer at a Foord ; and hauing at his leiſure ſeiſed on the ſhore, the Footmen on the other ſide without any noiſe did paſſe the Riuer that night in boates prepared to that end.

Now the Venetians being buſied on all ſides in making the bridge, that they might before day paſſe ouer all their Armie, a ſodaine raine falling the ſame night from the Alpes (which the Armie had not notice of) did in ſuch ſort ſwell the Lake of Laris, and by the morning likewiſe the Riuer Adda, as by violence of the waters roring betwixt the two ſhores, the worke new begunne was not only broken, but their

their ſmall boats became vſeleſſe through the ſwiftneſſe of the current. Hereupon diuers tried by ſwimming to returne to their fellowes. For it was likely, that ſo ſoon as it was day, and that the Inhabitants ſhould deſcry them, they ſhould in regard of the ſmall number of thoſe that were paſt ouer, be forthwith all cut in peeces. But the firſt of thoſe that in ſuch manner with their Horſes attempted the Riuer were drowned, wherewith the reſt were ſo affrighted, as they durſt not aduenture. When the Sunne was vp, the Inhabitants of the next Mountaines deſcrying the enemies on both ſides the Riuer, at firſt ſtood amazed at the ſtrangeneſſe of the matter, and aboade together in one place: but eftſoones perceiuing the ſmall number of thoſe that had paſſed the Riuer on their ſide, and what feare they were in, they inſtantly repaired to Lodouico Sanſeuerino, who wintered in the neighbour Villages, vnder whoſe conduct in troupes they ranne to the Riuer. Mellato for a time brauely ſuſtained their charge, whileſt his Footmen eſcaped to the body of the Armie, of whom many were drowned by violence of the ſtreame; but the moſt of them by ſwimming hauing gotten the other ſhore, the Horſe-men ſoone after got ouer likewiſe: Mellato himſelfe being the hindermoſt in the Rere was the laſt man that tooke the Riuer (therein imitating that Noble Roman Cocles) and ſo by ſwimming came ſafe to the Armie.

Thoſe which had croſſed the riuer are aſſailed.

Mellato his valour.

The buſineſſe hauing thus vnfortunately ſucceeded, the Venetian Generall marched into the Countrie of Gyradade: where hauing ſurpriſed Lugniana, hee would in ſhort ſpace haue made himſelfe maſter of diuers other Townes of the Countrie, if Picinino vpon the report of what had paſſed had not ſpeedily come thither with his forces. Departing therefore from Lugniana hee came to the Riuer Po where he ſpent a whole day in paſſing ouer his troupes; then three dayes after hee went and ſhewed himſelfe to the enemie. The Venetians being aduertized a while before of the enemies paſſage, did poſſeſſe a boggie place, through which only hee could come at them, and there ſtaied for a time. But afterwardes being enforced to change place either through feare, or for want of victualls, they retired into a place of ſafetie; at what time Picinino perceiuing them freely to quit that place, hauing ſpeedily led his troups through the ſtreights of the mountaines, and ouertaking them neere to the Fort of Pontoglio, hee fiercely aſſailed them, and in a manner vtterly ouer-threw them; hauing cut off fiue waggons of their baggage from them.

The Venetians take Lugniana.

Picinino defeateth the Venetians at Pontoglio.

Now this enterpriſe falling out contrarie to the Venetians proiect, who determining to aſſaile the enemie was himſelfe beaten by him, it cauſed them more earneſtly than before to entreate the Florentines to ſend Sforza vnto them who was then on the further ſide of the Po: But neither hee nor the Florentines reſoluing to doe ſo, they alleadged ſundrie excuſes: At the laſt, entreating that he might at leaſt wiſe come to Regio to enforce the enemie to retire for feare of looſing Parma, it came to paſſe as they wiſhed. For Picinino, hauing ruined Calepia vpon the Bergameſe, inuaded the vale of Treſcoria, and taken the bridge three miles diſtant from the Citie, he went on couragiouſly and beſieged the Caſtle of Bergamo.

Sforza being importuned by the Venetians letters came to Regio. But hee was ſcarce gone forth of Tuſcanie, when Picinino being aduertiſed of his departure, came likewiſe with ſpeed to Parma. Sforza being come to that place, beganne greatly to diſtruſt Pope Eugenius, notwithſtanding that he had beene reconciled to him, and made Prince of La Marca. For tyrannie leadeth this miſchiefe along with it, to make a man diſtruſt his beſt friends. Whereupon, fearing leaſt in his abſence they ſhould practiſe ought againſt his brethren whom hee had left to command in the Prouince, he ſent Italus of Friull thither with certaine troupes of horſe. Hee had likewiſe left a great part of his forces to continue the ſiege before Luca: ſo, as after Italus his departure hee had with him at Regio but the one halfe of his Armie. During his abode at Regio the Venetians on the one ſide entreating him to croſſe the Po, and Sforza on the other crauing according to the conuention to haue his troupes troupes compleate, time ranne on without any memorable exploit. Picinino in the meane time being mindfull of the Luquois, aſſembled great numbers of labouring men and peaſants, and departed from Parma towardes Luca to raiſe the ſiege. Sforza's troupes likewiſe went ſpeedily through the Countrie of Modena to the Alpes. Sundrie atchiuements were there performed on both ſides, and diuers skirmiſhes of ſmall importance: howbeit as often as Picinino (wo was ſtrongeſt) came to fight Sforza did not only make head, but couragiouſly repulſed him.

Sforza at the venetians entreaty commeth to Regio.

Sundry exploites betwixt Sforza and Picinino.

During theſe paſſages in the Alpes, or within a while after Franciſco Gonzaga hauing voluntarily giuen ouer his charge retired to Mantua. It is reported that he departed ſcarce well pleaſed from the Venetians. The cauſe of his diſcontent proceeded as ſome ſay from the Venetians diſtruſt of him, at ſuch time as the troupes croſſed the Riuer Adda, where they ſaid he had not done his dutie: Yet neuertheleſſe, he carried himſelfe modeſtly, for hee left his cauallerie behind him in the Venetian Armie: but that which followed makes it apparent to what end hee did it. Gonzaga being gone, Frederico Contareni the Prouidator did for a time take the charge of the Armie. Afterwards, Paulo Troni was ſent thither from the Citie, who by the Senates aduiſe accuſing the negligence of ſome and the treacherie of others, gaue occaſion vnto diuers that ſtood alreadie badly affected to them to craue leaue to depart, among whome were Antonio and Aſturo Fauentij, and Borſia D'Æſte ſonne to Nicholao. Theſe with many more being departed, ſuch as had ſerued vnder them, and were deſirous to ſtay ſtil, did according to their merit receiue good pay.

Franciſco Gonzaga giueth ouer his place of Generall.

Sforza his demand in Senate.

Sforza in the meane time demanded of the Florentines and Venetians payment of that which was due vnto him. And ſending to Venice for that purpoſe, his Agent being brought into the Senate, tolde them that he was expreſly come to put the Prince and Senate in mind of Sforzaes good ſeruices done vnto them, and to receiue ſuch ſummes as were due vnto him. It is reported that prince Foſcari by the Senates appointment, anſwered, That the Venetians were euer accuſtomed bountifully to ſatisfie and pay thoſe who in any ſort had loyally ſerued the weale publique, according to their promiſe; but as for Sforza, hee had beene ſo farre from employing himſelfe for them, as hauing beene earneſtly intreated to aide them, he flatly denyed it. Whereunto the Agent replying, That they ſhould doe well, eyther to pay Sforza his due, or elſe to diſcharge him both of his place and promiſe, that he might more freely prouide for his affaires; it is reported, that thereunto all men generally anſwered, That the Senate was well pleaſed, that he ſhould take his leaue and be gone.

The Prince and Senates anſwere to Sforzaes Agent.

Sforza being nettled with this anſwere, reſolued to reconcile himſelfe to Philip, whereunto till then he could neuer be induced, for that he would not abandon the Pope and his confederates. Whereupon being inflamed with choller and diſdaine, he went to the Florentines to demand that which they and the Venetians did owe him, or if they ſhould refuſe it, preſently to diſcharge him as the Venetians had done. The Florentines promiſed to pay him for them both; they onely intreated him to haue patience for a while, and to execute his charge whileſt money might be raiſed on the people, whoſe means were much exhauſted; and that they might ſend to Venice to the Prince and Senate. For they knew well enough, that Sforza being gone, they ſhould altogether be out of hope of taking Luca, and were beſides doubtfull leſt ſome other new warre ſhould aſſaile them from elſewhere.

Sforzas demand to the Florentines.

The Florentines anſwer to Sforza

According to this promiſe they ſent Coſmo de Medicis to Venice, a man, beſides his great wealth, very wiſe, and beloued of the people. Hee had in former times dwelt at Venice, at ſuch time as through enuy he was driuen from Florence, where during his abode he had behaued himſelfe with ſuch modeſtie and curteſie towards all men, as well in publique as priuate, that he was generally beloued and eſteemed. Whereupon, being afterwards reſtored to his countrey (for the hearty affection which he conceiued to that City, where he had bin ſo kindly entertained) his countrymen called him, the Venetian.

Coſmo de Medicis is ſent to Venice.

Being

Being come to Venice, and brought into the Senate, it is reported, that with great feruencie he ſpake vnto them in this manner : That his loue and affection towards the Venetians being remembred by his Countreymen, it fell out, that, not as a Tuſcan, and borne in Florence, but as a Venetian, hee was ſent to the Venetians, to acquaint them with the Florentines great want of money, and that they were no longer able to make anie leuies vpon the people for the entertainement of the Army : That his fellow-Citizens were not cauſe of the renewing of the warre againſt thoſe of Luca, but Picinino onely, who without anie cauſe giuen by the Florentines, had furiouſly entred vpon the Piſan territorie, and had enforced the Luquois to practiſe nouelties againſt them, hauing by force drawne them to the warre : But that by the diuine goodneſſe it was come to paſſe, that being enforced to take armes, they had brought their enemies the Luquois to that point, that deſpairing of peace from anie place elſe, than (according to the report) from the Venetians, they were readie whether they would or no to fall into the Florentines hands. Hee did afterwardes adde; That Sforza being commanded to paſſe the Appenine hilles, came to Regio, ſo that during his abſence the Luquois had ſome ſmall relaxation : That the Florentines had neuer hindered Sforza, who was ſo often intreated by them to croſſe the Po : But that he, diſtruſting the Pope, feared by going too farre, leſt ſome attempt would be made vpon La Marca, and that afterwards when he would he ſhould not be able to free it from warre, reſoluing by all meanes to defend it : That the Florentines had intelligence from very good place, that of a long time ſince hee had not beene payd his penſion, hee determined to reconcile himſelfe to Philip; And that without all doubt, if they did continue to depriue him of his due, he would ſpeedily doe ſo : if they ſhould loſe him, it was certaine that they ſhould not onely be out of all hope to take Luca, but their affaires likewiſe would be greatly endangered. And therefore he did intreate and adiure them by the ſacred League ſworne betwixt them, and by the particular loue which he bare to the Venetian name, more ſafely to aduiſe both for themſelues & their aſſociates in ſo great danger, and to pay Sforza, (though he had not deſerued it) that which he ſaid was due vnto him : But if they ſhould ſtill refuſe to ſatisfie him, and that for want thereof, he ſhould goe to the enemies ſide, he did let them know, that the Florentines reſolued to follow him whither ſoeuer he went, not as their Captaine, (ſeeing they could no otherwiſe doe) but as their Lord and Gouernour.

This being ſaid, Prince Foſcari by the Senates aduiſe anſwered : That the Florentines did well in holding him for a Venetian, euer ſince that being driuen foorth of his Countrey, he retired himſelfe to Venice : as alſo for that ſince the ſame time, the good will and affection of the Venetians, as well of publike as particular perſons, had euer beene ſuch towards him, as the Senate and people would willingly doe him all courteſie, and would as ſoone commit any charge of importance vnto him as to any one of the chiefeſt Senatours : By meanes whereof, the Venetians had for his ſake granted diuers things to the Florentines, which otherwiſe they would haue refuſed. But concerning his complaint, that the Luquois expecting to haue peace by the Venetians meanes, had refuſed to yeelde themſelues, he knew not how to anſwere it, becauſe it was the firſt time that euer he heard that fable : That the Florentines ſhould find that the Luquois had inuented that report, who did ſecretly write ſo to their Countrymen, diuers of the wealthieſt among them being retired to Venice : And that he ſhould not imagine that the ſame proceeded from any Senator : if it were otherwiſe, they ſhould doe well to ſhew ſome preſumptions or letters ſent to the enemie; for they would take order, that thoſe who ſhould be conuicted of ſuch a crime, ſhould ſerue for an example to others, not to enterpriſe in time to come any ſuch matter againſt the friends and allies of the weale publike; yet he would not denie but that the Ambaſſadors of the Luquois were in full Senate willed to depart, and if they could not enter the Citie by reaſon of the ſiege, they ſhould certifie their fellow-citizens by letters, that if they would quit Philips party, the Venetians, who deſired the wealth and aduauncement of the Luquois, would in ſuch ſort deale for them, as the Florentines their allies ſhould leaue both their ſiege and the warre; whereunto the Luquois had neuer ſince made anie anſwere : They did likewiſe freely confeſſe, that they had giuen them ſuch an hope, but he denyed that euer they had promiſed them anie aide or ſuccour. As concerning Sforzaes demands, hee could not accuſe the Venetians of auarice or ingratitude, tude for not paying that which they had promiſed. For, he was to beleeue that their Anceſtors had appointed ſtipends and rewards for ſouldiers to this end, that their pay-maſters who payed them, might when need ſhould be make vſe of their ſeruice. But as for Sforza, whom the Florentines ſo much affected, he neuer fought for the Venetians, but rather when they ſtood in need of him, he had boldly denied them all fauour and aide. That he might at his pleaſure depart, and that they whom he had euer ſo curiouſly aſsiſted ſhould take care to pay him his due: And whereas they threatned them to breake the league, and to follow Sforza, he ſaid that it was an eaſie matter for the Florentines to breake their faith when they pleaſed, but that he did hope, that ere long they might repent them of ſo diſloyall and diſcourteous a reſolution, and withall be puniſhed both by God and men (who had hitherunto preſerued them) according to their deſerts, for breaking their league and alliance.

Coſmo gneth to the Pope.

Coſmo with this anſwere taking his leaue of the Senate within a while after went to Ferrara to Pope Eugenius, and entreated him to ſend in his owne name to the Venetians, to trie whether they would quit their former reſolution. The Florentines after Coſmo's departure ſent Iuliano de Vantiati to Venice, who being entertained with leſſe reſpect than Coſmo, and being a verie wiſe man, did ſoone acquaint his fellow-Citizens with the ſmall account which the Venetians made of any thing that concerned the Florentines.

Picinino cannot paſſe the Alpes.

Picinino in the meane time (as hath beene ſaid) being come to the Alpes, and perceiuing that in regard the paſſages were held by the Sforzians, he could not paſſe, turned backe againe, and went into the Modenois territorie. Attempting againe afterwards to paſſe into Tuſcanie, through the territorie of the Bologneſes, marching by that of Æmilia, he went and encamped vpon the riuer Illice: And from thence (hauing ſent Aſturo Fauentio with two companies of men at Armes to forrage and waſt the Florentines countrey) he followed him at the heeles with the bodie of the Armie, and by the way tooke the tower of Aureola. In that place he receiued certaine newes of the treatie newly made betwixt Philip and Sforza, and of the contents thereof, which were (as ſome ſay) That the Florentines not mentioned in the accord (becauſe without the Venetians conſent they durſt not doe it) ſhould make truce for ten years with the Luquois, and in the meane time keepe whatſoeuer they had taken from thē, ſauing whatſoeuer lieth round about within ſix miles compaſſe neere to Luca: That Sforza ſhould be Iudge of the controuerſies which ſhould ariſe during that truce, & the reuenger of the wrongs done by either of the parties: Hereupon alliance was contracted betwixt Philip and Sforza on theſe conditions, That neither Picinino nor any elſe bearing Armes for Philip ſhould moleſt the Florentines, in regard Sforza was then as before, in their pay: And that Philip ſhould giue him his daughter Bianca to wife, whom he ſhould ſend with her traine and dowrie vpon the Parmeſan to the Caſtle Firmiano, a place appointed for the wedding.

The articles of agreement betwixt Philip and Sforza.

The Venetians and Picinino are diſpleaſed with this accord

The Venetians were diſpleaſed with this agreement: but Picinino much more; who after that he had mightily complained of Philips ingratitude towards him, and runne vp and downe void of counſell through Flaminia with his Armie, he did at laſt aſſaile Oſtaſio Polentano Prince of Rauenna, who for a long time had beene vnder the Venetians protection, and neuer gaue ouer to purſue and torment him, till he had enforced him by his owne Citizens to follow Philips partie. Rauenna by this meanes being no more at the Venetians deuotion, he attempted a greater matter. For he did at the ſame time take Imola and Bologna from the Pope.

Stellato conducteth the Venetian Armie.

At this ſtay ſtood the affaires of Tuſcanie and Flaminia, whileſt that Stellato (vnto whom after the Prince of Mantua his departure, the Venetians had giuen charge of their Armie, and yet not honouring him with the title of Generall) after he had recouered the vallies and Caſtles which Picinino had taken vpon the Bergameſe the precedent winter, entered furiouſly into the Cremoneſe, where he made great ſpoyle. Picinino being moued at theſe newes, ſent for Italus of Friuli forth of Vmbria, and his ſonne Franciſco; and commanded his ſonne to guard the Cities and ſtrong Townes which he had lately taken in Flaminia, and the other to follow him into Lombardie with his Cauallerie. Being gone forth of Flaminia, he went and incamped with his Armie neere to the Po, at that place where it neerely preſſeth the Citie of Cremona: Then hauing forthwith croſſed the riuer, he went and beſieged Caſal-maior. The Venetian hauing notice of the enemies comming, and hauing committed the guard of other townes to the Inhabitants, put a ſtrong Garriſon into Caſall-Maior, and Soncina, two ſtrong townes on the Cremoneſe: They did beſides enioyne Mellato to guard the ſhoare of the riuer Oglio with all his forces. He came and encamped at Bina twelue miles from Caſal-Maior, where after that he had fortified his Campe, hee did aide the beſieged, and by manie Sentinelles and Corps-du-gard defended the other ſhoare of the Riuer.

to

There was in the meane time a rumour ſpred, that Gonzaga, who lay ſtill at Mantua, had ſecretly made a league with Philip. This being reported to the Senate, it was thought moſt expedient to appeaſe him if it were poſſible by their Ambaſſadors. And to this purpoſe diuers of the chiefeſt Senators were ſent vnto him, who had of a long time beene verie familiarly acquainted with him. They being come to Mantua, the better to winne this Princes heart, beganne highly to praiſe him, and to extoll his perpetuall loyaltie towards the Venetians, and their reciprocall affection towards him: And although that in their paſſing by the Armie they had found a great part of the number of the Cauallerie to bee wanting, which ought to haue beene compleate, they would neuertheleſſe pay him for the whole, and whatſoeuer he could ſay was due to him, though it amounted to neuer ſo great a ſumme. Afterwards they entreated him to beare Armes againe for the Venetians, and did againe offer him the place of Generall, which hee had voluntarily left. But hee excuſing himſelfe ſometimes by reaſon of his ſmall experience in the art militarie, and afterwards ſaying, That hee was deſirous to liue at reſt, went about to ſtop his eares to the Venetians perſwaſions: Whereupon the Ambaſſadors entreating him that ſince himſelfe did determine to liue at peace, hee would at leaſtwiſe permit Lodouico Gonzaga his ſonne to bee enrolled in their pay: he did not altogether refuſe it, nor yet wholly granted it. At the laſt they came ſo farre, as to entreate him if he would not beare Armes for the Venetians, yet to continue in their ancient friendſhip and alliance. The which he did not only promiſe to the Ambaſſadors, but likewiſe by letters to the Senate, ſaying, That no man ſhould euer ſee him follow Philps partie, till newes were firſt brought him (which God forbid) that Venice were either taken or ruined by him. The concluſion of their whole diſcourſe was, That as a louer of peace he deteſted warre: And that the Venetians ought not to meruaile if he did reenforce his owne troupes; for he did it, fearing leaſt if he ſhould leaue his frontires naked of Garriſon, whileſt the warre was ſo neere him, he ſhould not be able when hee vvould, to keepe and defend them from being vvronged. The Ambaſſadours vvere heerevvith diſmiſſed.

Gonzaga maketh alliance with Philip.

Diſcourſe betwixe Gonzaga and the Venetians.

The Mantuans excuſe.

Picinino in the meane time had for nineteen daies together battered Caſal-major. His Armie conſiſted of twentie thouſand fighting men, and that of the Venetians of halfe as manie: But that long ſiege had put the Senate in hope, that Picinino's terrible attempts would be brought to nothing, before he could attaine to that which he had conceiued in his minde, in regard he had ſo long, contrarie to all mens expectation, continued before one place onely, and done no great good there: whereupon they hoped that his vehement heat would at laſt be cooled: And that Soncina in the Cremoneſe, and diuers other places elſwhere, were as ſtrong by ſituation and in munition as that which he then beſieged; euery of which might not alone amuſe the enemie, but likewiſe altogether wearie and diſtaſte him. Theſe were the Senators ordinarie diſcourſes.

Picinino encampeth before Caſal Maior.

But the fall of a Tower did in ſuch ſort daunt thoſe of Caſal, as they began openly to talke of yeelding. The enemie at the firſt would not accept their ſubmiſſion, Thoſe of Caſall deſire parley.

vſing

vſing delaies of purpoſe, till ſuch time as he had made agreement with the Gotolengians & Gambarians concerning the treacherie, which they had ſecretly practized; who were determined to reuolt. Whereunto being ſolicited by Picinino's Agents they did with him vndertake an horrible villanie; which was to encloſe Mellato, with his troupes, as he paſſed through the Breſſan Territorie; to the end that the Venetians troupes being at one time aſſailed on the one ſide by the peaſants, and on the other by the Souldiers, might be wholly defeated. This treacherous plot being thus concluded, thoſe of Caſal were receiued on compoſition. Picinino had thought at his firſt arriuall vpon the bankes of Oglio to haue broken the Venetians as they were marching; and therefore he would not compound with the Caſalins, till hee were aſſured of the ambuſcado laied for the Venetians, to the end, that whether they tarried ſtill in one place, or went forward (as he rather thought) they might certainly be defeated.

A complot to aſſaile the Venetian Armie on all ſides.

Caſall yeeldeth to Picinino.

Caſall being thus yeelded, he drew about midnight towards the Riuer Oglio, & hauing ſent certaine light horſe before to ſound the foord; he learned by them that the Venetians kept the oppoſite ſhoare: yet neuertheleſſe he held on his way, & encamped by daie-breake vpon the bankes of the Riuer Oglio, foure miles beneath Bina: And forthwith, ſo toone as his Armie drew neere to the place, he prepared all things neceſſarie for an aſſault.

Mellato ſuſpecting that it was but a pollicie of the enemie, and that his deſignes tended elſewhere than he made ſhew for, tooke diligent care of all things. The Mantuan Prince was likewiſe in perſon neere to the Towne of Macharia, which lieth in the mid-way betwixt Bina and the Po, with three thouſand men, who exhorted the Venetian Generall to ioine his troupes with his, aſſuring him that both Armies beeing ioined together, they might with more eaſe breake the enemies attempts. This he ſaid, although he was not ignorant of the enemies deſigne. Mellato in the meane time was readie to ſend Criſtofero & Giouanni Tollentino with their companies of men at Armes in Garriſon to Verona. The Mantuan was not of this opinion: The Prouidatori that were preſent at this conſultation, and repoſing more truſt in the Mantuan than he deſerued, were likewiſe of his opinion. He on the contrarie, either by chaunce, or elſe becauſe he had ſome ſuſpition, not of the whole matter, but of ſome part of the plot, did ſtill perſiſt in his owne opinion.

Treachery plotted againſt the Venetians.

The enemie remoued his campe from place to place, whereupon the Venetian was greatly troubled to ſee him ſo often day and night to ſhift places; who after he had ſpent certaine daies in ſuch like faigned ſhewes, all things being in readineſſe, about midnight he ſent the third part of his forces, without any rumor at all to paſſe ouer the Bridge, which was forth of the enemies view, to ioine with Gonzaga's troupes: And he in the meane time ſtill ſhewed himſelfe on the oppoſite ſhore the better to colour his enterprize, himſelfe reſoluing within a while after to paſſe ouer at the bridges of Macharia and Canet.

The Venetian Armie had like to haue been ouerthrowne, being encloſed by the enemies ambuſcado, and by the treacherie of the inhabitants. But that good God vnto whom (as we haue often ſaid) all Republicks are pleaſing, and eſpecially thoſe whoſe beginning (like that of the Venetians) hath beene Religiouſly eſtabliſhed, would not ſuffer it to be ſo. It happened verie fitly for this purpoſe that a certaine man whoſe name was Bareta Gotholengian ſent by his compartners to the enemie to this end, was taken by the Venetian forragers, and brought to Mellato; who, after that he had promiſed to free him from all puniſhment, did diſcouer vnto him the danger wherein the Venetian Armie was. Mellato hearing it, made no longer delay, but ſodainely diſcamping, did with all his troupes without any danger take the way of Breſſia. Picinino had alreadie about the fourth watch of the night ſent his forces ouer at Macharia, where the troupes, ſent to the Mantuans Campe, did goe and receiue them: In the meane time word was brought them that the Venetian hauing ſpeedily diſlodged was twelue miles onwards on his waie; That

The treacherie is diſcouered to Mellato.

Mellato doth ſpeedily diſlodge.

the

the inhabitants of the Countrie, did not dare to meddle with them in regard they ſaw no man purſue them.

The Mantuans reuolt being vnderſtood at Venice, they preſently decreed to Arme a mightie nauall Armie againſt him of threeſcore and fiue Gallies and fiue Gallions, with a great number of other ſmall veſſells. Pietro Lauretano Generall of this Armie entring by the mouth of the Po, into the Mantuans Countrie, was expreſly commanded to waſt and ſpoile whatſoeuer he met with. Mellato in the meane time was come to Bagnols, where he had fortified his Campe with trenches and rampiers. He determined to ſend part of his forces to Breſſia, which was not farre off, whereunto the inhabitants of the Citie oppoſing, and crauing to haue the guard of the Gates giuen to themſelues, hee thereby perceiued that the Venetians were safer abroad than in the Citie. Franciſco Barbaro commanded in the Towne, a man verie diſcreet, and well acquainted with affaires of importance. He by good aduiſe hindered them from ſo doing, & ſhewed them the danger whereto the Cities State would be brought; if thoſe of one partie alone committed to the guard of the Citie, the reſt ſhould be accounted enemies, and traitours, ſeeing they repoſed no more truſt in them: For then they would practize nouelties, and would in hate to the contrarie partie, openly hazard all things poſſible for them. The authoritie of the man did much preuaile with them, and according to his aduiſe, the Venetian Magiſtrates which were within the Citie, garded the Gates: Then he did reconcile the Martinenga's and the Auogadres together, the heads and chiefe of the two factions by a new alliance; wherein by meanes of Leonardo Martinenga, and to the great profit of the Common-wealth, he made Paris de Lodron who held certaine Caſtles in the Mountaines of Breſſia, and Pietro Auogadre who were mortall enemies, good friends.

A Venetian nauall Armie againſt the Mantuan.

The Martinenga's and Auogadres in Breſſia are reconciled together.

Picinino reſolued to ſhut vp the Lake of Benac, and the riuer Mincia from Mellato's Armie, to the end it might receiue no Venetian ſuccour: and being in this manner ſtarued (for it was certain that it could get victualls no where, but from the Towne) he aſſured himſelfe of the entier ruine of the Venetian forces: Whereupon in this reſolution he diuided his troupes into two parts. Gonzaga, and Lodouico Vermio, did fiercely fall vpon the Verona-territorie, and hauing ſeized on Valeza and the bridge thereof by treacherie, ſooner almoſt than their comming was knowne, they made themſelues Maſters in a verie ſhort ſpace of whatſoeuer lieth betwixt the riuers Adice and Mincia. The ſodaine loſſe of Valeza was cauſe that Giouanni Malauolte who conducted three hundred horſe from Breſſia to Verona, falling by miſaduenture neere to the bridge into the enemies hands, was wholly deſpoiled of his Caualleric. He did beſides reduce vnder his command all the inhabitants of the Lake of Benac: and the Mantuan Prince tooke Peſcara, ſeated at the head of the Riuer Mincia, and Lonata vpon the Mountaines of Breſſia, which had beene his.

Picinino his deſigne to ſamiſh the Venetian Armie.

The Lake of Benac, by ſome termed La Garda, (to ſpeake ſomwhat of it) is the pleaſanteſt Lake of all Italie, and is more long than broad. It extendeth in length from the Weſt to the North ſome thirtie miles, filling it ſelfe with the riuers Sarca and Ponalis on the Weſt and North ſide, and emptieth it ſelfe to the Southward into the Riuer Mincia. The water thereof is ſo pure and cleere, as one may ſee the bottome, except in the middeſt where it is verie deepe. But it is not ſo pleaſant in calme and faire weather, as it is dangerous and terrible when it is toſſed with tempeſts. It is the onely lake of all Italie which being ſtirred with the wind, hath her waues ſwelling like the billowes of the Sea. It feedeth excellent fiſh, of which the Carpes are beſt, which are in ſeaſon from the end of harueſt till the beginning of the ſpring, and are with great labour taken from forth the deepeſt places of the water. It is moreouer enuironed on all ſides with goodly Oliue trees, entermingled heere and there with delicate gardens full of excellent fruite trees, as Citrons, Pomegranates, and Peaches, which the inhabitants of thoſe places call Adams apples. That ſide thereof which lockes towards Verona on the right hand, hath beſides Peſcara, Langiſſa, Bardolin, and la Garda, whereof the Lake taketh the name, the towers of

The deſcription of the lake of Benac.

Malſeſina which ſome call Malaſelſe. And oppoſite to that vpon the Lake is the Town of Sermion, the Countrie of Catullus the ſweet and eloquent Poet, with that great huge ſtone, a marke of antiquitie, which appeares aboue water. After Sermion commeth Riuoltella, called by ſome Riualtella, Manerbia, Feliciana, Portueſia, and laſtly Sales, the chiefe of the Prouince. It hath beſides on the North-ſide, verie high and ſteepe Mountaines as farre as Riua. This place with Penetra which appeares not farre from thence vpon a Rock, did in times paſt belong to the Territorie of Trent. The Borough of Nac is to be ſeen aboue the Fort of Penetra, whereby wee may coniecture that the Lake was in olde time called Penac, which wee by changing of a Letter call Benac. The Ancients called it Penac becauſe it was ſo neere to Nac.

Now all the places from the Lake on the hither ſide and beyond the Riuer Mincia being taken, the Mantuan marched with his forces to Vidizolles, where Picimino lay encamped. Blondus ſaith that he departed from that Campe when he went the firſt time to ſcoure the Verona-Territorie: But let it be how it will, it is certaine that Philips forces during the incurſions vpon the Veronois, were encamped at that village ſeated vpon the Riuer Cleſia, in the midway betwixt Breſſia and the Lake of Benac: Againſt whom Mellato, being deſirous to oppoſe his forces, went with his troupes to Gauarda. Barbaro ſent him from Breſſia a braue troup of yong foot-men; and from the Mountaines great multitudes of Souldiers came vnto him, ſo as in a ſhort ſpace fiue and twentie thouſand men were in the Venetians campe.

Fiue and twentie thouſand men in the Venetians Campe.

Mellato with his forces ſeized on all places along the Mountaines, from S^t. Euphemius euen to La Garda. The Riuer Cleſia ſeparated two goodly Armies readie to fight, by reaſon that it was too deep in that place, nor in any ſort foordable. Mellato reſolued to fight: But vnderſtanding afterwards that Picimino's Armie was mightily encreaſed by Gonzaga's arriual, he abſtained from battaile; As alſo becauſe he diſtruſted certaine Captaines, who had a long time followed Gonzaga's campe; but the euent did afterwards manifeſt whether he had cauſe to diſtruſt them. For diuers of them hauing an inckling thereof, and perceiuing that he took from them the meanes to do hurt, did with-draw them ſelues from his camp & went to that of the Prince of Mantua. Mellato then fearing leaſt ſome ſodaine reuolt might draw the Venetians affaires into ſome danger, and being deſirous to take all occaſion from thoſe who practiſed nouelties, hauing lodged the greateſt part of his forces in Breſſia, he ſent the reſidue into Garriſon to the Cities, & Townes neere adioining, which were vnder the Venetians obedience. And by this meanes Picinino had time and leiſure to remoue his camp from place to place: whoſe only aime tending to keepe the Cities victualls from Mellato's troupes, he went with his Armie and beſieged Sales: But thoſe within it hauing brauely defended themſelues, he approched with his Armie neere to Feliciana and Manerbia.

Thoſe of Sales & other town neere adioining yeeld to Philip.

Thereupon the Forlani, and thoſe of Monteclaro embraced Philips partie. Within a while after hauing receiued thoſe of Sales, and all the other inhabitants vpon the Lake in Philips name, he marched to Bagnolls; from whence on a ſodaine coaſting about with his Armie, he firſt tooke Pontoglio, then Palacicla, and diuers other Townes without any difficultie. All this was done in the Champaine. But in the Camonick valley, they fought at the ſame time with better ſucceſſe. For Antonio Bechari with two thouſand horſe did by the conſent of the inhabitants make himſelfe Maſter of the whole valley. Barbaro ſent Giouanni la Conte, Bartholmeo Coioni, & Leonardo Martinenga againſt him with great troups of Mountaniers, who did greatly affect Martinenga, who entring on a ſodaine into the vale, and hauing made a great ſlaughter of the enemies, did put all thoſe of that rebellious valley to the ſword, ſpoiling and burning the whole Countrie..

Great ſpoile in the Camonick valley.

The end of the ſecond Booke of the third Decad.

THE THIRD BOOKE OF THE THIRD DECAD Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the third Booke of the third Decad.

A falſe rumour being ſpred in Venice concerning the battaile wonne at Cologignes doth put the whole Citie in danger of a nocturnall ſedition. Mellato attempteth in vaine to goe from Breſſia to Verona. Nicholao D'Æste maketh ſundrie attempts againſt the Venetians. The Venetians ſurrender the Poleſin to Æste. Mellato with great trauell ouer the tops of the Mountaines arriueth at Verona. A great nauall Armie commeth by the Po, vpon the Mantuan Territorie. Breſſia is ſtreightly beſieged. The Senate determineth to renew the alliance with Sforza. Mellato being made Generall of the Armie, reſolueth to relieue Breſſia with victualls. Paris Lodron vanquiſheth the enemies neere to the Riuer Sarca. The Venetians reſolue to prepare a nauall Armie for the Lake of Benac. Gallies are carried by maine ſtrength ouer high Mountaines into that Lake. Sforza allieth himſelfe with the Venetians and Florentines. Picinino and the Prince of Mantua hauing croſſed the Riuer Adice take diuers Townes on the Verona and Vincenzan Territories from the Venetians. The Venetians fight againſt the enemies by Land along the Lake of Benac with good ſucceſſe.

Whilſt al theſe warlike actions were done in the Camonicke valley, thoſe of Chiaua yeelded themſelues to Philip. This new Rebellion was accompanied with a greater loſſe. For Guerriero Martiano, and Michaeli Gritti (whom Mellato had ſent with three hundred foot, and a hundred and fifty horſe to lie in Garriſon in that place) were defeated. Picinino went afterwards & encamped before Rhoades: whereat the Venetians being moued, marched thither with a companie of Mercinarie Souldiers, all young men, choſen among the inhabitants of the Mountaines of Valtropia and Seroliana, to raiſe the ſiege. Theſe troupes ſetting forward at the beginning of the night, ſtaied neere to Paſſirana and Paderna. Picinino being aduertized of their approach did preſently diſcamp, & returned to Coloignes three miles from Rhoades: The next day hauing placed part of his forces in ambuſh in the neighbour Mountaines to entrap the Venetian, he marched with the reſidue of the Armie againſt the enemie, as it were to aſſaile him with all his forces. And being come neere to Thoſe of Chiaua yeeld to Philip.

Picinino beſiegeth Rhoades.

one another, Picinino did embattaile his Souldiers. Mellato did not refuſe the fight; but ſent ſome of his troupes diſbanded to ſcoure the plaines, and the skirmiſh being begunne, he did by little and little ſend troupes of horſe among his footmen againſt the enemie, and without any diſorder, retired his wearied and hurt men, putting thoſe that were able and freſh in their places; both ſides dealing ſo cunningly, as when Picinino's troupes came forth of the Ambuſcado, Mellato's not being moued remained firme.

The two Armies skirmiſh.

Now the fight hauing continued from day-breake till it was almoſt night, with greater loſſe on the enemies ſide than on the Venetians, both ſides retired; Picinino to Coloignes, and the Venetian to Breſſia. And although Fortune at that time no more fauoured the one than the other, neuertheleſſe to ſatisfie the inhabitants of Breſſia, who were deſirous to vnderſtand the ſucceſſe of that encounter, the Magiſtrates commanded that it ſhould bee giuen forth how that Mellato had broken and put the enemie to rout. This rumour was not only ſpred in the Citie of Breſſia, but being brought to Venice, the whole Citie receiued ſuch content, as the people being ouerioyed, came running from all parts to the Market-place to reioyce with one another; by meanes whereof the Republike had like to haue fallen into a great and wonderfull danger.

There were in the Citie great numbers of Hiſtrian and Dalmatian Marriners, and Rowers, who were ſent for thither expreſly to furniſh the Nauall Armie which was then making readie. Manie of theſe fellowes being heated with wine ranne to the Market-place, where hauing kindled fires in diuers places (in ſigne of ioy) ſeeking vp and downe for wood to feed it, they beganne to plucke downe the ſhoppes of the Bakers and thoſe that ſold herbes, which ſtood in the Market-place, to make fire-wood of them: and hauing beaten away the watch that went about to pacifie them, they gathered together about three thouſand men, who vſing no reſpect to the Magiſtrates, nor chiefe Senators that were come thither to appeaſe the tumult, they beganne to breake open greater ſhops, and to fall into an open rebellion. But at the arriuall of Pietro Lauretano this ſedition was ſoone quieted. It is reported that theſe Mechanick people at his verie name ſtood ſtill and offred to doe what ſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe him to command them; and he hauing giuen them his word that none among them ſhould bee puniſhed for that which they had done that night, euerie man returned home to his owne dwelling place.

The vnlookt for danger wherein-to the Common-wealth was like to haue fallen.

Eauretano by good deſerts had in ſuch ſort gotten the loue and good will of all men, as not onely thoſe meane people of the Citie, but thoſe of greateſt place and authoritie did reuerence and reſpect him. The which hee had eaſily obtained by his curteous meekeneſſe and heartie loue towards the Republick, which doth as much cheriſh and embrace their vertues, as it doth abhorre and deteſt pride aud ambition. As alſo for that the Common-wealth had for the ſpace of twenty yeares emploied him in euerie warre of importance. And that time alſo when the affaires of Lombardie were in great danger, and that the Venetian forces were not thought comparable to thoſe of Philip, the Senate did chooſe him, notwithſtanding his great age, for to command that great Nauall Armie which it had prepared againſt the Mantuan.

Lauretano reſpected and beloued of euery one.

It conſiſted of greater number of veſſells than had beene at any time before ſeene in any fleet vpon a Riuer. For there were more than an hundred and threeſcore veſſells of all ſorts, among whom were fiue Gallions higher and greater than were vſually made, and about threeſcore and tenne Gallies; the reſidue being ſmal veſſells like to little Brigantines. But whilſt theſe things were making readie in the Citie, Picinino foure dayes after the incounter comming backe from Coloignes to Rhoades with all his troupes, enforced the inhabitants to yeeld. The like did thoſe of Bomedes, Paternia and Paſſeria. The next day after, the Monticulans, Iulians, Omians, and Brienſes yeelded vnto him vpon his word; and at the laſt, hauing by force ſeized on Iſea, he did on the mountaines take Valtropia.

The number of the veſſels in the Venetians Nauall Armie.

Rhoades and diuers other townes, yeeld to Picinino.

And

And within a while after he poſſeſſed al the plaines on the Breſſan Territories, with a great part of the mountaines: the new Orges excepted, which hee determined to aſſaile vpon the firſt occaſion. Mellato, Barbo, and the other officers of Breſſia ſuſpecting that Picinino's deſignes did only tend to ſhut vp the paſſages from the Venetian troupes, to the end that all releife being kept from them, he might famiſh them in Breſſia; did ſecretly reſolue that Mellato, leauing certaine troupes for the guarde of the Citie, ſhould goe his way with the reſidue of the Armie to Verona, or whither fortune ſhould lead him. Picinino his deſigne.

Now Blondus ſaith, That about the th ird watch of the night hee came forth of Breſſia with fiue thouſand men both horſe and foot. We doe not find in Montanus commentaries, that he had at that time ſo manie men: Paſius of Arimini ſets downe but three thouſand: And becauſe both of them were preſent at this warre, I doe the rather follow them: But of what number ſoeuer this Armie was it marched ſpeedily to the bankes of the Riuer Mincia: where after it had attempted beneath the Bridge of Valeza to paſſe at a foord, and could not by reaſon of the depth of the waters, and for that the enemies were encamped on the oppoſite ſhoare, hauing loſt ſome horſe, it returned to Breſſia with as great ſpeed as it came thence. Picinino marched towards Breſſia with an intent to ſurprize the Venetian, but hee was preuented by his enemies ſpeed, whereupon he blamed his own negligence for looſing ſo faire an occaſion; and without more delaie hee marched againſt the new Orges, who as hath beene ſaid were ſtill obedient to the Venetians. Mellato in the meane time attempted to paſſe by another way, which although it was as dangerous as the former had neuertheleſſe better ſucceſſe. Mellato cõmeth forth of Breſſia. Mellato is conſtrained to returne to Breſſia.

Whileſt theſe things were done neere to Breſſia, Nicholao D'Æſte did make great complaints to Pope Eugenius who remained ſtill at Ferrara, how the Venetians did hate him; ſaying, That hee knew of a certaine that they had of late prepared a Nauall Armie: And becauſe he was aſſured that they did ſuſpect him to haue beene the cauſe that the Prince of Mantua had forſaken their alliance, hee had cauſe to doubt that the ſame great preparation was rather made againſt him than any other. The Pope ſought to comfort him, and to feed him with better hope, aſſuring him that he ſhould not need to feare the Venetians, for their deſignes tended to another end; and if he did ſtand in feare of them, hee would take order, that all aſſurance ſhould be giuen him on their partie. The Duke of Ferrara complaines to the Pope.

But notwithſtanding all this, Æſte leuied a braue Cauallerie, and ſent for Guido Fauentio with fifteene hundred horſe, and three hundred foote, and called home his ſonne Borſia, who was in Sforza's Campe with ſix hundred horſe; ſaying that he raiſed thoſe forces only to defend his owne, and not to offend any man, Hee did afterwards cauſe a great quantitie of ground to bee cut whichlieth betwixt the Po and Padua drawing a broad and deep trench from the Riuer to the mariſhes; commaunding the Ferrarois to take Armes, and that a ſpeedie leuie of Souldiors ſhould be made at Regio and Modena. Nicholao d'Eſte fortifieth his owne Eſtate.

The Pope beganne to exhort Nicholao D'Æſte who was with him, and the Venetians by his Ambaſſadours, to laie downe Armes, and to embrace ſome honourable accord, but with this condition, That the Venetians ſhould ſurrender to Nicholao D'Æſte Rouigo, with ſeuen Caſtles of the Polleſſin Iſland, which ſeuen and thirtie yeares before had beene engaged to them. Æſte being ouercome by the Venetians bountie, did forthwith change his determination, and releeued the Venetian Armie with victualls and all other neceſſaries, which alreadie was going vp the Po; the like did the Ferrarois following their Princes example. Nicholao d'Æſte freed from feare and ſuſpition.

In the meane time thoſe of Orges in the Breſſan Countrie did valiantly reſiſt Philips forces. But that which neither ſtrength nor any attempt could execute, was done through the trecherie of Pietro of Luca. Hee being ſent by Mellato with three hundred horſe for the guarde of the Towne, within a ſhort ſpace after it was beſieged, did deliuer both the Towne and her inhabitans into the hands of Picinino. The new Orges are yeelded vnto Picinino by trecherie.

no. But whileſt the enemie was buſied at this ſiege Mellato did attempt to paſſe towards Verona: Barbaro and the other Officers of the Citie being deſirous to haue it ſo, to the end that the Citie being diſcharged of ſuch a multitude might bee leſſe afflicted with the dearth of victualls; as alſo becauſe they thought it moſt profitable for the Common-wealth to haue ſome troupes neare to Verona that might make head againſt the enemie if he ſhould chance to march thither.

Mellato hereupon tooke that way which ſeemed moſt commodious. And becauſe that of the champain country had proued ſucceſſleſſe, he reſolued to iourny through the high Mountaines and Forreſts that were in a manner in-acceſſible. Giacomo Antonio Marcello a verie valiant perſon, and Giouanni Villano Captaine of a companie of light horſe being ſent before for diſcouerers, did diligently view the whole countrie. Now it being reſolued that Thadeo d'Æſte with ſix hundred horſe, and a thouſand foote, ſhould tarry behind for the guard of the Cittie, the reſidew were commanded, euerie man to be readie with their Armes and baggage to depart about the ſecond watch of the night. The troupes being come forth of the Citie at midnight marched through the vale of Sabia to the mountaines. Diuers Breſſans, ſome being perſuaded, but moſt of them prouoked by their owne proper motion, did follow the Venetian Enſignes, among whome were Pietro Auogadre, Leonardo Martinenga, with Antonio his brother.

Mellato departs from Breſſa and marcheth toward the mountaines.

Thoſe of the valley of Sabia being amazed to ſee theſe troupes, tooke armes, being aſſured of the hatred which the Biſhop of Trent their Lord did beare towards the Venetians; but not daring to aſſaile them openly, they brake downe the ſtrait paſſages through which the Venetians were to paſſe, and if they met with anie ſtraglers, they did either villainouſly murther them, or elſe throw them downe headlong into thoſe deepe vallies. The Venetian Captaine diſſembled all theſe wrongs, and intreated the ſouldiers to make haſte, and not to abandon their enſignes. And hauing with great labour and trauell paſſed the firſt dayes iourny, about the ſecond watch of the night on the top of the mountaine of the laſt valley, hee made a ſtand, and commaunded the wearie ſouldiours to eate and take their reſt: Then by daybreake the companies being diſlodged, Paris Lodron, who was before reconciled to the Venetians hauing driuen the enemies before him, came and ſhewed himſelfe to them, and embraced Mellato, who hauing followed him with all his forces ouer thoſe difficult mountaines of Italie, without anie feare of the Mountaniers did late in the euening encampe in an aſsured place.

Thoſe of the valley of Sabia ſeek to ſtop their paſſage.

Al men thought it fit in that place to reſt the tired ſouldiers and horſes who were wearied with a continuall march of two whole daies and nights. But Mellato would by no meanes ſuffer it, ſaying, that it behoued him to make haſte before that the Biſhop of Trent were aduertiſed of their paſsage through his territories: yet neuertheleſſe for all his haſte, the enemie had notice therof, who hauing the ſame night ſent Polonians and Maclouians to cauſe the Mountaniers to take armes, the armie had like to haue bin incloſed in thoſe ſtreights, and if it had not made great haſte (as hath bin ſaid) it would there haue receiued a great ouerthrow; howbeit it did not paſſe thoſe ſtreights, but in great feare.

There was in the middeſt of the mountaines a ragged vneaſie way; on the one ſide whereof rockes and great ruines of ſtone-quarries did ouer-hang, and on the other appeared verie deepe vallies, full of torrents, & of ſo great a diſtance to look vpon, as whatſoeuer was throwne downe into the botome, of what bigneſſe ſoeuer it were, would yet appeare leſſe by the one halfe. The cruell Inhabitants of thoſe mountaines meeting with certaine ſtraglers from the troups threw them headlong into thoſe deep bottoms. The enemie had ſeized on thoſe ſtreights, and the Venetians had alreadie perceiued his intent, which was, to rowle downe huge ſtones vpon the Armie, which would haue greatly endangered them.

The enemies intent.

Griefe and deſpaire had in a manner ſeized on all the troupes; not ſo much in regard of the difficultie of the waies, as for feare of their liues. Which the Generall

perceiued

perceiuing, he commaunded Cauacalbon, Rangon and Guido, three valiant yong men, to goe ſecretly with three hundred footmen, armed with ſwords and ſhort pikes, to aſſaile the enemies in the crooked paſſages of the mountaines. Theſe men hauing brauely executed his commandement, and driuen the enemies from the mountaine tops, the armie paſsed on in ſafetie. The enemies are driuen from the mountains tops.

Theſe iij. hundred men, leauing their heauie armor in that place from whence they had driuen the enemies, did the remainder of that night march before the armie to diſcouer the waies and forreſt. Then being come in the morning to Thegna, the Inhabitants of the place at the firſt did not ſtirre, but afterwards falling vpon the rereward, they tooke from the Venetians a great part of their baggage, and two hundred horſe. At the laſt, the armie being come downe into the plaine, neare to Arques, the ſcouts brought word that the Riuer Sarca which runneth from the mountaines of Trent into the lake of Garda was ſo riſen by reaſon of the former nights raine, as it could in no ſort be foorded.

The next day, the troupes which were to paſſe ouer, ſtaying vpon the Riuer bankes, deſcried the armed enemies on the other ſhoare, who were brought thither by Lodouico Vermio whom Picinino had ſpeedily ſent by the Lake. Some ſay that Vermio and Franciſco, ſonne to Vinciguerra, went to beate backe the Venetians in the foreſt of Penetra. Whether it were there, or neare to the Riuer (for thoſe places are not farre aſunder) that the enemie ſhewed himſelfe, it is certaine that the Venetians being greatly amazed, perceiuing the enemies before, behind, and on euerie ſide, and the Lake on the right hand which did incloſe them, ſent Leonardo Martinenga to Vinciguer Lord of Arques, whoſe neare kinſeman he was, to vſe meanes if it were poſſible by faire promiſes to draw him to their partie, but if hee ſhould refuſe the Venetians friendſhip, yet to intreate him to oblige the Venetians ſo farre to him, as not to enterpriſe aught againſt them, and to withdraw his forces forth of the foreſt of Penetra. Whereunto he was ſo farre off from giuing conſent, as on the contrarie he did forthwith, againſt the law of Nations, take Martinenga priſoner, and binding him hand and foote, ſent him to Mantua where he died. The Venetians great diſtreſſe. Great diſloyaltie

Martinenga's misfortune did much more amaze Mellato and the reſt, and there was likelihood that ſo many braue men would bee caſt away, being encloſed by the lake, mountaines and riuers, or elſe that their Armes being laid downe, they would fall into the enemies hands; and if they did thinke to attempt to open their way by armes, yet they would in that enterpriſe looſe their liues, had not Piloſus a Centurion, who being come into the foreſt of Penetra with a thouſand men, or (according to ſome) with foure hundred to open the paſsage for his fellowes, opportunely arriued. It is reported, That this man deceiued the enemie by a new ſtratageme. For the enemie poſſeſſing the forreſt, through which they were of neceſſitie to paſse, and the narrow paſsages, (where tenne reſolute men would with eaſe haue kept backe thouſands) being guarded day and night, he being not able to driue the enemie thence by force, did it by cunning. The ſubtiltie of a Centurion.

There was a wood neare to the toppe of the mountaine where the enemies lay, wherein he placed in the night time twentie tall ſouldiers, and commaunded them carefully to marke whether the number of thoſe that kept on the toppe did waxe leſſe, and if they ſhould quit the place, ſpeedily to ſeize on it: And himſelfe, as though he had deſpaired of being able to paſſe, cauſed diuerſe Torches, and other Lights to be faſtned to Lances ends, and with them fained to goe further off. This did not onely make them belieue that the Venetians were gone away, but did confirme them in that opinion, in regard it did not auaile them to tarrie there. Whereupon thoſe of the guard leauing their place, thoſe twentie ſouldiers that were left in the next wood did forthwith ſeize on the hill top, whither the Centurion came ſpeedily with the reſidew of his troupes; who with great noyſe ſhewing himſelfe afterward to the enemie, did in ſuch ſort affright him, as he quitted the forreſt and the riuers ſhoare to the Venetian. And in this manner ſo manie braue and valiant men were preſerued by the labour and induſtrie of one alone man.

men

By this meanes the troupes paſt along in ſafetie. Blondus affirmeth that the Venetians loſt aboue eight hundred Horſe in that iourney. Montanus, and Paſitus of Arimini doe not mention ſo great loſſe. During theſe exploits in the Mountaines, Lauretano being come vp the Riuer Po againſt the ſtreame, reſolued to tarrie for the troupes that were appointed for the Nauie, at the ſeparation of the Riuer, a little beneath the walls of Ficarolles. For, of eight thouſand men, appointed for the Veſſells, he had taken in but three thouſand. But whileſt the Venetians delaied time, and matters went ſlowly forward at Venice, the Prince of Mantua at Hoſtillia ſtopped the paſſage of the Po with a ſtrong Rampier, and cauſed great piles to be driuen into the Riuer: whereupon in euery foure rankes he builded Forts, encompaſſing them afterwards with three great yron chaines, and placed vpon each ſide of the Riuer great ſtore of warlike engines, which were planted in ſuch manner, as no veſſell whatſoeuer could come neare, but in a moment was ſure to receiue twentie or thirtie ſhot. He did likewiſe with the ſame care and diligence cauſe Sermena to bee fortified with a ſtrong Garriſon, which lieth on the Po in the mid-way betwixt Ficarolles and Hoſtillia.

The Mantuan fortifieth the Po.

All this was done vpon the Po. Philip after the taking of the new Orges, was very ſorrie when he heard that Mellato with his troups had eſcaped through the mountaines. And although Harueſt was ended, and that it was time to ſend his troupes to Winter, yet neuertheleſſe he ſent for Picinino, and the other Captaines of his Armie, entreating them to goe and beſiege Breſſia, telling them by word of mouth how deſirous he was to haue that Citie beſieged, and that the greateſt pleaſure they could doe him, was to haue that Towne taken by the valorous conduct of his Captaines, the which beſides the great wealth would purchaſe him a very notable victorie. He willed them then to goe their way, ſaying, that he hoped that the ſame Citie, vnprouided of a Garriſon, moleſted with famine and peſtilence, would in a ſhort ſpace either by force or faire meanes be reduced vnder his obedience. After he had thus entreated and exhorted Picinino, and his other Captaines, hee diſmiſſed them. Picinino within a while after, and without delay, went and beſieged Breſſia with twentie thouſand men, and brought great numbers of peeces of batterie neare to the walls, among which there were fifteene brought from Milan, of ſuch bigneſſe, as the leaſt of them did carrie a bullet of three hundred pound waight. The batterie was great and furious againſt the tower of Mombellano, and other places of the Citie, whereof enſued ſuch ruine of the walls, as the Inhabitants being daunted at the very firſt, beganne openly to talke of yeelding.

Philip exhorteth his Captaines to beſiege Breſſia.

Philips Armie beſiegeth Breſſia

In this ſiege the Officers of the Citie were for a time more carefull and diligent, than were the enemies attempts fearefull or dangerous. And therefore it was concluded among them that Chriſtofero Donato, the Cities Magiſtrate, ſhould remaine in his owne houſe, and curteouſly entertaine as well thoſe that ſhould come to viſit him, as ſuch as he ſhould expreſſly ſend for, and ſhould with great promiſes exhort them to continue loiall to the Venetians: That Barbaro in like manner who was Gouernour, and Generall of the Garriſon, being a valiant and braue Gentleman, ſhould ſtill be neare to the walls and gates of the Citie; ſhould place the corps-de-guard; and by his ſpeech giue hope to the Souldiers and Townesmen. The which he did ſo cunningly by feigned letters and meſſengers, and did ſo comfort them all, as there was none among them, notwithſtanding death and wounds, but had rather to obay the Venetians than to fall into the enemies hands. In this reſolution they fought thriſe with the enemie with good ſucceſſe, ſometimes from the walls, and otherwhiles by ſallies. And as much as the Bombards (for ſo we will terme theſe engines of batterie) had beaten downe by day, ſo much did the Inhabitants repaire by night with ſtrong Rampiers. In theſe reparations the Women did no leſſe employ themſelues than the Men, among whom diuided into Hundreds, and Tens, Braida Auogadre, as Valiant as Noble, did a notable ſeruice to the Common-wealth.

The order which the beſieged kept in the Citie.

The beſieged are greatly aſſured.

Notable ſeruice of Women.

But

But two inſupportable miſchiefs daily encreaſing, plague and famine, the Magiſtrates permitted thoſe who were leſſe fit for the Cities defence to goe whither they would. Hereupon diuers left the Citie, and eſpecially thoſe of the Gybelline faction. The Towne was ſo deſolate, as of ſeauen thouſand which were numbred at the beginning of the ſiege for the Cities defence, there remained but three thouſand with the Magiſtrates and the Garriſon. This ſmall number did encreaſe the enemies boldneſſe, ſo as they beganne more than before nearely to preſſe the beſieged, by new mounts and mines, and by all other warlike engines. And on the other part the beſieged did in all places very valiantly reſiſt the enemies, not eſchewing any paine or danger.

Famine and peſtilence aſſ ict the beſieged.

An aſſault being giuen to the Tower Mombellane, and the wall being beaten downe flat to the ground, they did not only make head againſt the enemie who was almoſt entred into the Citie, but valiantly repulſed him from the ruines of the wall with great ſlaughter and loſſe; and not only once, but diuers and ſundrie times. In the end, the Inhabitants loialtie was ſo great, together with the valour and induſtrie of Barbaro and the reſt, as the Citie being well defended, Picinino grinding his teeth and weeping in a manner for ſpite and rage, diſcamped in the middeſt of Winter, hauing loſt in this ſiege aboue two thouſand men, among whom were many Noble perſons; and the beſieged, accounting Townes-men and Souldiers, loſt not halfe ſo many.

The valiant defence of the beſieged.

Picinino is enforced to raiſe his Campe from before Breſsia.

The ſiege being raiſed, the Souldiers were ſent to Winter. During the ſiege of Breſſia, Mellato accounted whatſoeuer he had till then done to be nothing, if hee did not open a way to releeue the beſieged with men and victualls. And himſelfe with his troupes purſuing his iourney did in the Valley of Lagarina (as Paſius of Arimini writeth) take Burgo and Coruario by force: Then comming to Penetra, he receiued it at the hands of Franciſco, Sonne to Vinciguer. It is reported that in this iourney Piloſus, who by his valour had in former time ſaued the Venetian troupes, was grieuouſly hurt, and that the next day after hee died of his wound. His diſaſter being known at Venice, the Senate did ſpeedily ſend the skilfulleſt Phiſitians and Chirurgians in the Citie to looke to him; but by the way they had newes of his death, whereupon they returned. The Venetian Captaine ſeized on Torbolles, a place depending on Penetra, where the greateſt part of his Armie ſpent the remainder of the Winter.

Penetra yeelded to the Venetians

Piloſus death.

The Senate in acknowledgement of theſe exploits and others of great conſequence, performed by Mellato, did in his abſence declare him Generall of their Armie, and did daily ſend him ſupplies of money, and victualls, and did by letters exhort him to releeue Breſſia with victualls, if it were poſſible. For the danger of that Citie, which by Barbaro's letters they vnderſtood to bee furiouſly aſſailed by the enemie, did very much trouble them.

Mellato is made Generall of the Venetian Armie

Pietro Auogadre was preſent; who comming to Verona with the Venetian troupes, did afterwards goe to Venice, and being brought in before the Senate hee did vnfold the fortune and miſerie of his Countrie, which was moſt loiall to the Venetians, humbly requeſting them to remember it; telling them that he knew of a certaine, that his fellow Citizens were reſolued to hazard all danger, and endure all extremitie, rather than to returne vnder Philips obedience. Yet hee greatly feared that vnleſſe they were ſpeedily relieued with men and victualls, they could not long withſtand ſo mightie an enemie: That they ſhould do well to make haſt, and if they had any remembrance of their owne State and reputation, and of the ſafetie of their ſubiects, to prouide for the conſeruation of that Citie, whoſe ſingular loialtie they had already made triall off; and to prepare money, men, and victualls: That he was aſſured that the Venetians power was ſo great, as there was no warre, how difficult and dangerous ſoeuer, but they were able to end it; and yet in this, they needed nothing ſo much as good will and ſpeede: and that Time and the Venetians good fortune would performe the reſt.

Auogadre his remonſtrance to the Senate.

Prince

men were preſerued by the labour and induſtrie of one alone man.

By this meanes the troupes paſt along in ſafetie. Blondus affirmeth that the Venetians loſt aboue eight hundred Horſe in that iourney. Montanus, and Paſius of Arimini doe not mention ſo great loſſe. During theſe exploits in the Mountaines, Lauretano being come vp the Riuer Po againſt the ſtreame, reſolued to tarrie for the troupes that were appointed for the Nauie, at the ſeparation of the Riuer, a little beneath the walls of Ficarolles. For, of eight thouſand men, appointed for the Veſſells, he had taken in but three thouſand. But whileſt the Venetians delaied time, and matters went ſlowly forward at Venice, the Prince of Mantua at Hoſtillia ſtopped the paſſage of the Po with a ſtrong Rampier, and cauſed great piles to be driuen into the Riuer: whereupon in euery foure rankes he builded Forts, encompaſſing them afterwards with three great yron chaines, and placed vpon each ſide of the Riuer great ſtore of warlike engines, which were planted in ſuch manner, as no veſſell whatſoeuer could come neare, but in a moment was ſure to receiue twentie or thirtie ſhot. He did likewiſe with the ſame care and diligence cauſe Sermena to bee fortified with a ſtrong Garriſon, which lieth on the Po in the mid-way betwixt Ficarolles and Hoſtillia.

The Mantuan fortifieth the Po.

All this was done vpon the Po. Philip after the taking of the new Orges, was very ſorrie when he heard that Mellato with his troups had eſcaped through the mountaines. And although Harueſt was ended, and that it was time to ſend his troupes to Winter, yet neuertheleſſe he ſent for Picinino, and the other Captaines of his Armie, entreating them to goe and beſiege Breſſia, telling them by word of mouth how deſirous he was to haue that Citie beſieged, and that the greateſt pleaſure they could doe him, was to haue that Towne taken by the valorous conduct of his Captaines, the which beſides the great wealth would purchaſe him a very notable victorie. He willed them then to goe their way, ſaying, that he hoped that the ſame Citie, vnprouided of a Garriſon, moleſted with famine and peſtilence, would in a ſhort ſpace either by force or faire meanes be reduced vnder his obedience. After he had thus entreated and exhorted Picinino, and his other Captaines, hee diſmiſſed them. Picinino within a while after, and without delay, went and beſieged Breſſia with twentie thouſand men, and brought great numbers of peeces of batterie neare to the walls, among which there were fifteene brought from Milan, of ſuch bigneſſe, as the leaſt of them did carrie a bullet of three hundred pound waight. The batterie was great and furious againſt the tower of Mombellano, and other places of the Citie, whereof enſued ſuch ruine of the walls, as the Inhabitants being daunted at the very firſt, beganne openly to talke of yeelding.

Philip exhorteth his Captaines to beſiege Breſsia.

Philips Armie beſiegeth Breſsia

In this ſiege the Officers of the Citie were for a time more carefull and diligent, than were the enemies attempts fearefull or dangerous. And therefore it was concluded among them that Chriſtofero Donato, the Cities Magiſtrate, ſhould remaine in his owne houſe, and curteouſly entertaine as well thoſe that ſhould come to viſit him, as ſuch as he ſhould expreſly ſend for, and ſhould with great promiſes exhort them to continue loiall to the Venetians: That Barbaro in like manner who was Gouernour, and Generall of the Garriſon, being a valiant and braue Gentleman, ſhould ſtill be neare to the walls and gates of the Citie; ſhould place the corps-de-guard; and by his ſpeech giue hope to the Souldiers and Townesmen. The which he did ſo cunningly by feigned letters and meſſengers, and did ſo comfort them all, as there was none among them, notwithſtanding death and wounds, but had rather to obay the Venetians than to fall into the enemies hands. In this reſolution they fought thriſe with the enemie with good ſucceſſe, ſometimes from the walls, and otherwhiles by ſallies. And as much as the Bombards (for ſo we will terme theſe engines of batterie) had beaten downe by day, ſo much did the Inhabitants repaire by night with ſtrong Rampiers. In theſe reparations the Women did no leſſe employ themſelues than the Men, among whom diuided into Hundreds, and Tens, Braida Auogadre, as Valiant as Noble, did a notable ſeruice to the Common-wealth.

The order which the beſieged kept in the Citie.

The beſieged are greatly aſſured.

Notable ſeruice of women.

But

But two inſupportable miſchiefs daily encreaſing, plague and famine, the Magiſtrates permitted thoſe who were leſſe fit for the Cities defence to goe whither they would. Hereupon diuers left the Citie, and eſpecially thoſe of the Gybelline faction. The Towne was ſo deſolate, as of ſeauen thouſand which were numbred at the beginning of the ſiege for the Cities defence, there remained but three thouſand with the Magiſtrates and the Garriſon. This ſmall number did encreaſe the enemies boldneſſe, ſo as they beganne more than before nearely to preſſe the beſieged, by new mounts and mines, and by all other warlike engines. And on the other part the beſieged did in all places very valiantly reſiſt the enemies, not eſchewing any paine or danger.

Famine and peſtilence afflict the beſieged.

An aſſault being giuen to the Tower Mombellane, and the wall being beaten downe flat to the ground, they did not only make head againſt the enemie who was almoſt entred into the Citie, but valiantly repulſed him from the ruines of the wall with great ſlaughter and loſſe; and not only once, but diuers and ſundrie times. In the end, the Inhabitants loialtie was ſo great, together with the valour and induſtrie of Barbaro and the reſt, as the Citie being well defended, Picinino grinding his teeth and weeping in a manner for ſpite and rage, diſcamped in the middeſt of Winter, hauing loſt in this ſiege aboue two thouſand men, among whom were many Noble perſons; and the beſieged, accounting Townes-men and Souldiers, loſt not halfe ſo many.

The valiant defence of the beſieged.

Picinino is enforced to raiſe his Campe from before Breſſia.

The ſiege being raiſed, the Souldiers were ſent to Winter. During the ſiege of Breſſia, Mellato accounted whatſoeuer he had till then done to be nothing, if hee did not open a way to releeue the beſieged with men and victualls. And himſelfe with his troupes purſuing his iourney did in the Valley of Lagarina (as Paſius of Arimini writeth) take Burgo and Coruario by force: Then comming to Penetra, he receiued it at the hands of Franciſco, Sonne to Vinciguer. It is reported that in this iourney Piloſus, who by his valour had in former time ſaued the Venetian troupes, was grieuouſly hurt, and that the next day after hee died of his wound. His diſaſter being known at Venice, the Senate did ſpeedily ſend the skilfulleſt Phiſitians and Chirurgians in the Citie to looke to him; but by the way they had newes of his death, whereupon they returned. The Venetian Captaine ſeized on Torbolles, a place depending on Penetra, where the greateſt part of his Armie ſpent the remainder of the Winter.

Penetra yeelded to the Venetians

Piloſus death.

The Senate in acknowledgement of theſe exploits and others of great conſequence, performed by Mellato, did in his abſence declare him Generall of their Armie, and did daily ſend him ſupplies of money, and victualls, and did by letters exhort him to releeue Breſſia with victualls, if it were poſſible. For the danger of that Citie, which by Barbaro's letters they vnderſtood to bee furiouſly aſſailed by the enemie, did very much trouble them.

Mellato is made Generall of the Venetian Armie

Pietro Auogadre was preſent; who comming to Verona with the Venetian troupes, did afterwards goe to Venice, and being brought in before the Senate hee did vnfold the fortune and miſerie of his Countrie, which was moſt loiall to the Venetians, humbly requeſting them to remember it; telling them that he knew of a certaine, that his fellow Citizens were reſolued to hazard all danger, and endure all extremitie, rather than to returne vnder Philips obedience. Yet hee greatly feared that vnleſſe they were ſpeedily relieued with men and victualls, they could not long withſtand ſo mightie an enemie: That they ſhould do well to make haſt, and if they had any remembrance of their owne State and reputation, and of the ſafetie of their ſubiects, to prouide for the conſeruation of that Citie, whoſe ſingular loialtie they had already made triall off; and to prepare money, men, and victualls: That he was aſſured that the Venetians power was ſo great, as there was no warre, how difficult and dangerous ſoeuer, but they were able to end it; and yet in this, they needed nothing ſo much as good will and ſpeede: and that Time and the Venetians good fortune would performe the reſt.

Auogadre his remonſtrance to the Senate.

Prince

Prince Foscari his frequent exhortations likewise did herein much preuaile with the Senate: Wherein whilest all men were busied, newes was brought that Bressia was freed from the siege. This did not onely raise their daunted courages, but gaue them hope of better fortune, the which was strengthned with another more recent, namely, that for the better fortifying of their alliance, they might draw Sforza and the Florentines to their partie.

Nicolao d Æste his motion made to the Senate.

It is reported that Nicolao d'Æste was the first that motioned it to the Senate, who being reconciled to the Venetians, came to Venice to visit the Prince and Senators, where comming into the Senate clothed in white, after sundrie speeches of his great and loyall affection towards them, he began to talke of meanes how to make warre, and acquainted the Senate with the goodly occasion which was then offered, not onely to withstand Philips forces, but to make warre vpon him: which was by their Ambassadors, and faire promises to draw Francisco Sforza to their side, who was reported to haue left Philips party in a discontented humour, for that he had lately refused to accomplish the marriage betwixt him and his daughter: That he doubted not but this courageous Lord, so renowned for his high attempts, would snatch the present victorie forth of the enemies hands, as well in regard of his ancient emulation and hatred to Ricinino, as for his discontent newly conceiued against Philip.

The Senates answere to Nicolao d'Æste.

Æste his speech did greatly moue the Senators who gaue him infinite thanks for that in so dangerous a time he had, as became a faithfull friend, manifested to the Senate his sincere affection towards them, and likewise for that he had familiarly discoursed with them concerning the profit and seruice of the Commonwealth. But the Senate told him that they would more maturely determine on that which had beene propounded. Some say that the Venetians did at that time present him with Rouigo and the whole Polesin; but I thinke that it was rather an approbation of what was alreadie done, concerning the restitution of the Polesin.

The Senate being heereby put in some hope, had intelligence by letters from Giacomo Antonio Marcello, which were read in the Senate, That Mellato after the taking of Penetra and Torbolles, tooke great care by what meanes he might relieue the Bressians, and that he had certainly found an occasion to be offered, whereby to open the lake to the Venetians. This hauing more confirmed them, they did presently resolue on sundrie Ambassades. They sent Giouanni Pisani to La Marca to Sforza; Francisco Barbadico to Florence. They called Pietro Auogadre into the Senate where they acquainted him with that which Mellato had done for the victualling of Bressia, whereupon they entreated him that he would speedily goe to the Armie, to the end that both of them together might consult on that which should be necessarie for the iourney: And that he should write to Paris Lodron to entreat him still to hold firme his alliance and amitie with the Venetians: and to the Bressans, that they should want no supplies nor victuals, onely they should doe their best to hold out till necessarie preparations might be made.

The Senate send to Sforza and the Florentines.

Mellato maketh prouision to relieue Bressia.

These things were treated of at Venice. Mellato determining to relieue the Bressans after that he had gotten together a great quantitie of wheate at Penetra, resolued to passe ouer the mountaines, seeing he could goe by no other way. Therefore he did by expresse messengers request Paris Lodron to come and meet with the foragers as farre as he could. Then he commanded foure Captaines, that after they had distributed the wheate among the souldiers, they should first goe to Paris Lodron, and afterwards to Bressia. The enemies in the meane time had placed a strong Garrison in Arques and in Tengues, and had sent Italus of Friull (for they had notice which way they meant to passe) to lie in ambush with sixe hundred horse and foote, to surprize the forragers by the way. Mellato's souldiers had alreadie passed through the forrest of Tengues, and supposing that they were out of all danger, they were come downe into a deepe bottome, when the enemie shewing himselfe on a sodaine, and vnlooked for, did greatly affright them.

The enemies assaile the forragers.

There

There was by chance neere to that place a little hill, whither the Venetian ſouldiers all trembling marched with their burthens, but being inuironed in that place on euerie ſide, and moleſted with ſundrie aſſaults (for many were ſlaine there) the third day after both they and the corne fell into their enemies hands. Mellato was at the ſame time at Torbolles, where it was commonly reported that his deſignes only tended to relieue the afflicted Breſſans. Philip on the other ſide, the better to take all hope of relieſe from them, did in the moneth of Ianuarie, march with ſixe thouſand men, together with the Prince of Mantua into the vale of Sabia, where hee remained till three forts which he there cauſed to be built, were made defenſible & manned with ſtrong Garriſons, the one at Noſa, the other at Cagri, & the third at Solecetta, the which three Forts being well guarded, there was no probabilitie at all that the Breſſans could hope for any reliefe.

What Philip did in the vale of Sabia.

Some ſay that Piccinino builded theſe Forts neere to the Citie at that time, when he raiſed his campe from before Breſſia, namely the one at S. Euphemias Church, the other at the hill-top, and the third at the fountaines Monpianes. Ittalus his enterprize againſt the Venetians being executed, he was deſirous to march againſt Paris Lodron: But his purpoſe being diſcouered, Barbaro the Gouernour of Breſſia, who was verie circumſpect, did ſpeedily ſend ſixe hundred footmen to the reliefe of Paris, the Venetians friend, vnder the conduct of Gyrardo Dandula. He being come neere to the Fort at Noſa, aſſailed a troupe of Philips horſe, which hee eaſily defeated. Then diuers of the Guelpt faction of Valtropia being ioyned with him, he went to Paris with a thouſand men. Ittalus on the other ſide hauing raiſed two thouſand peaſants as wel of the Mantuan ar of the Gibelline faction of the Breſſans territories marched with them againſt the enemie, together with the footmen which hee had brought with him at the firſt, croſſing the riuer Sarca at the bridge which is vpon the confines of Romagnia. He had alreadie begun to aſcend the next mountaines, when Paris being conducted through couert vallies, went on a ſodaine, and aſſailed thoſe footmen whom he had left to guard the bridge, where in a moment he made a great ſlaughter of them. Many were ſlaine there, among whom were Ittalus his ſonne, Pietro Capocia, with Polonus Colonell of the Biſhop of Trents troupes. Ittalus cut off his iourney, and returned thither, being either called back by the great noiſe, or elſe ſent for by an expreſſe meſſenger. Paris perceiuing him comming downe like a tempeſt driuen from the mountaines, did brauely receiue him, & at laſt wearied him with fighting. There was a cruell battaile for the ſpace of three howers, but in the end Ittalus retired the next way into the mountaines. Paris being victorious, made himſelfe maſter of the latter ſquadron: and the enemie had beene wholly ouerthrowne, had not the night with her darkneſſe beene fauourable to him. The next morrow by day-breake Paris marched freely againſt the enemie, and was alreadie come to the mountaines, at ſuch time as the enemie (being prouoked by ſhame) returned likewiſe to the fight. This encounter continued with greater furie than the former, wherein diuers of the enemies were ſlaine ere they betooke themſelues to flight, but at laſt they turned their backe, Paris being victorious purſued them thus diſordered. A thouſand of the enemies were taken, and as many ſlaine. Ittalus after this ouerthrow, with much difficultie through by-waies, and ſteepe mountaines retired himſelfe to Riua d'Trente, whither likewiſe within a while after came three hundred horſe, and a thouſand foote which had eſcaped by diuers paſſages.

The Venetians ſend ſuccours to Paris Lodron.

The fight betwixt Paris Lodron and Ittalus. Ittalus being vanquiſhed retireth into the mountaines.

The bickering being renewed, Ittalus is wholly ouerthrowne.

Piccinino hauing intelligence of the route of his forces aſſembled thoſe troups which wintered neere to Breſſia, and ſpeedily marched through the vale of Sabia, and ouer the tops of the mountains to Lodron which he ſtreightly beſieged, ſo as after the fifteenth day of the ſiege he tooke it. Then he went to beſiege Romana (for this towne did likewiſe belong to Paris) but finding it ſtrong both by art & nature, & that there was a ſtrong garriſon in it, by reaſon that it was winter he raiſed his camp on the firſt day of Februarie, and ſent his troupes to winter along the lake of Benac.

This

This in briefe was all that was done in the Alpes: whileſt Lauretano hauing a long time in vaine expected forces from the Citie, went (becauſe he would not haue it ſaid that he had done nothing) and beſieged the Citie of Sermone. Gonzaga had before (as hath beene ſaid) carefully fortified that place, which could not be taken by ſo ſmal a company. The Senators were ſuſpected to haue refuſed to ſend ſupplies to Lauretano, rather through enuie than for want of meanes, which happened, for that they gaue eare to ſundry detractors, who were deſirous rather to ſee Lauretano's fame to decreaſe, than to be augmented by any notable exploit. But he falling ſicke by the diſtemperature of the aire, and waxing daily more and more weake, was brought to Venice. Stephano Contareni was ſent in his ſteed.

Lauretano beſieged Sermone.

Lauretano, after he had a while beene ſicke, died, and was buried (according as he had appointed it by his laſt will and teſtament) in S. Helens Church, his feete being bare, a ſtone vnder his head, and without any funerall pompe.

The death of Pietro Lauretano, and his ſtrange buriall.

Mellato, after he had taken Penetra, did not ceaſe by letters to aduertize the Senate, that a way lay open to chace the enemies from the lake of Benac, whereby they might afterward with eaſe relieue Breſſia. This buſineſſe was verie difficult, and euerie man demanded how it would be done, and how a nauall Armie might be ſent into that lake, ſeeing there was no forreſt neere, nor any riuer whereby to bring the veſſels. This conſultation had for certaine daies troubled the Senate, when a certaine Candiot called Sorbolla, who (as I ſuppoſe) had viewed the places, went to the Senate, and told them that he wanted neither courage nor skill to tranſport the veſſels from the Citie to the lake of Benac. This being thought by all men impoſſible for him to draw great veſſels by maine ſtrength aboue two hundred miles off, he was eſteemed to be a fooliſh and idle fellow. But being afterwards knowne to be a man of an excellent wit, and ſtill perſeuering in his opinion that it might be done if they would furniſh him with neceſſaries for the purpoſe, the Senate gaue him leaue, and committed the buſineſſe to him, who gladly accepting it, did preſently fall to worke; all things neceſſarie for ſuch an enterprize being ſupplied.

A wonderfull propoſition of a Candiot.

The veſſels were drawne vp againſt the ſtreame of the riuer Adice to Verona, from thence with great labour and trauaile vnto the burrough of Mora, by Oxen tied together: And after that he had laid ſlipperie peeces of wood to make the Gallies ſlide on, (and yet Paſius maketh mention but of one Galley) it was drawne by ſtrength of Men and Oxen through a plaine of ſixe miles in length to S. Andrewes lake, the other leſſer veſſels were carried in carts. Blondus ſaith that they drewe two great Gallies, and three other ſmaller ones, and with them fiue and twentie ſmall veſſels: Some others who were preſent at that action, ſay that there were two great Gallies, one of which was ſcarce finiſhed when they carried it from Venice.

After what manner the veſſels were brought to the lake of Benac.

Ouer this lake where the veſſels were firſt brought, a rocke ietted forth much like to a wall, which to make ſmooth and euen great numbers of peaſants were imploied, who hauing throwne part of that ſtonie ſubſtance into the lake, made the place ſo leuell, as the veſſels with all their tackling being by little and little drawne forth of the water, began to aſcend the top of the next mountaine. For betwixt the two lakes there is a verie ſteepe mountaine, which on the bending thereof is cut through by a ſtreame which runneth heere and there through rocks and precipices, through which the veſſels were firſt to paſſe. Theſe rocks being on euerie ſide made plaine, and the ſtreame filled with boughes, and trunks of trees, with earth throwne vpon them, the way was made ſo euen, as rowlers being laid to ſlide the Gallies on, they were as eaſily drawne vp the hill as on the plaine. Thoſe who haue viewed theſe places, do greatly wonder and can hardly beleeue it, that ſo great a maſſe could be drawne through ſuch craggie rockes, by any labour or skill whatſoeuer, were it not that certaine old ſteps and traces are there to be ſeene, which teſtifie to after-ages that ſuch a thing was done.

It is reported that they had no leſſe trouble in bringing them downe, than they had to get them vp: For all men feared leaſt that the ſame huge weight being caried

ouer

ouer thoſe precepices and ſteepie Rockes ſhould fall and breake it ſelfe in peices. The third moneth after their departure from Venice, they came downe to Torbolles, where the Gallies being viewed they found that one of them had neede of trimming before they could launch it into the water. The reſidue of the Armie was embattailed at the mouth of the Riuer Sarca, which was enuironed with three rankes of piles in forme of a ſemi-circle for the better ſafetie thereof. The Venetians beſides built a Fort at the going forth of the Riuer, to keepe the enemies who were reported to haue a Gallie and certaine Ganzarioles at Riuoltella, from comming to them. It was thought that the Senate did vndertake this enterprize rather to feede the Breſſans with hope than for any opinion it had that thoſe veſſells would doe any ſeruice, in regard that there were in all places vpon the lake ſuch great numbers of enemies as it was not only impoſſible to enter Breſſia in deſpite of them, but they were much incumbred with care, how they might the Summer following keepe Verona and Vincenza from them.

The Senate taketh care to preſerue Verona and Vincenza.

The Venetians affaires were (without all doubt) in great danger, when they being thus deiected, fortune turned towards them and ſmiled. Philip had the moſt part of the winter deluded Sforza with promiſe to giue him his daughter Bianca to wife. But excuſing himſelfe ſometimes by reaſon of his daughters indiſpoſition of bodie, and afterwards by the ſharpneſſe of the winter, hee did of ſet purpoſe delaie the matter. But Sforza ſoon perceiued his double dealing, and finding by his delaies that he went about to deceiue him, he ſent Troilo a truſtie friend of his own to Milan, to ſound the meaning of Philip and his daughter; from whence he bringing him back nothing but words, in rage and choller he gaue care to the Venetians more than he had done. Within a while after there aroſe a new ſuſpition. For it is reported that at ſuch time as Picinino exhorted his Souldiers to aſſault Breſſia, a certaine friend of his asked him, why he did expoſe himſelfe and Souldiers to ſuch a manifeſt danger, eeing he knew very well that the ſame Citie and all the reſt ſhould neuer be his, but were deſtined to Sforza as Philips future heire. His reply was. It is all one; let your ſelfe and the reſt only doe your beſt to take Breſſia; for that being done, wee will bee at La Marca before this delicate bridegroome ſhall haue any ſuſpition thereof, and then, I will play the bride, and ye yong fellowes ſhall be the dancers. This being reported to Sforza, he did not only hearken to the Venetians, but did forthwith diſpatch meſſengers to Florence, whither (as wee haue ſaid, according to Paſius) Franciſco Barbadico was ſent.

Philip delaieth and deludeth Sforza.

What moued Sforza to make a league with the Venetians.

Picinino flouteth Sforza.

Blondus ſaith that Giacomo Donato was ſent into Tuſcanie. The Florentines, although they were well aſſured, that Philip, ſo ſoon as the Venetians ſhould be ouerthrowne, would preſently come and aſſaile them, and notwithſtanding that they were deſirous by all meanes to withſtand the Tyrants attempts, yet neuertheleſſe, becauſe they would hardly beleeue that Sforza would forſake his Father-in-law, they were not eaſily drawne to enter into the ancient league with the Venetians. But being prouoked by this alteration, and perſwaded by Pope Eugenius who was then at Florence, they did on the eight day of Februarie conclude a league for fiue yeares with Sforza and the Venetians.

A league concluded betwixt the Venetians, Florentines, and Sforza.

In this accord it was expreſſely mentioned that Sforza ſhould be the allie of both thoſe Common-weales, and General of al their forces, and that they ſhold giue him pay for three thouſand horſe and two thouſand foot: That the Venetians and Florentines ſhould leuie ſuch forces as hee ſhould thinke fit for the mannaging of that warre. Nicholao D'Æſte was receiued into this alliance, with whome they concluded that hee ſhould entertaine at the coſts and charges of thoſe two people Guido Fauentino with fifteene hundred horſe and three hundred foot, and his ſonne Borſia with a thouſaud horſe for that warre.

Nicholao D'Æſte is receiued into the league.

I find in Montanus commentaries that two hundred and twentie thouſand Duccats were appointed for Sforza's pay, whereof the Florentines were to giue foureſcore and ten thouſand, and the Venetians the reſt: And beſides, that whatſoeuer they ſhould take from Philip ſhould be giuen to Sforza, (Cremona excepted) which ſhould returne to the Venetians, and if they ſhould take none other Citie but Cremona, that then it ſhould be allotted to the Generall. For the reſt it was expreſly concluded that Sforza ſhould preſently paſſe into Lombardie, to free the Venetians from the warre there. Paſius ſaith that the league was renewed in Tuſcanie during the ſiege of Breſſia; But if it were concluded on the eighth of Februarie (as Blondus ſaith) I cannot ſee how that could be done, ſeeing it is certaine that the ſiege before Breſſia was raiſed before Ianuarie, although it was afterwardes much moleſted by the Garriſons round about it, and the waies ſtopt by the enemies, ſo as victualls nor reliefe could come to them. But whether it were then (as hee ſaith) or afterwards; it is certaine that Philip was mightily daunted when hee vnderſtood of his ſonne-in-lawes reuolt.

But Pictuino not thinking it fit to temporize, or to tarrie till the Venetians forces ſhould be augmented by Sforza's comming, beganne to treate with the Prince of Mantua concerning the paſſage of the Adice. There was ſome likelihood that it would auaile Philips affaires, if the warre might bee tranſported into the Paduan or Vincenzan Territories. Now this ſeemed eaſie to be done, if entring into either of the Countries, they might on a ſodaine ſurprize ſome towne or other. This was reported to be the Mantuans plot who thought it fit to ſend the warre farre from his owne Gates, and to draw thoſe veſſells which were vpon the Po neare to Sermona, (for by the Senates commandement Contareni had brought backe the nauall Armie to Chioggia) by the Riuer Tartar into the marſhes and lakes of the enemies, and then from thence to tranſport them by land, (if it could not bee done by water) into the Riuer Adice. Mellato by his ſpies hauing intelligence hereof, did ſundrie times aduertize the Prince and Senate, aduiſing them forthwith to ſend a nauall Armie into the Adice.

The Mantuans plot to ſend the warre far from his owne Country.

In the meane time they were not quiet neare to the lake of La Garda. Pietro Zeno Generall of the Nauall Armie which lay at Torbolles comming forth by little and little from the Hauen, did in ſuch ſort open the way to his Countriemen on that part of the lake which is betwixt Torbolles and the mouth of Ponal, as through the crooked windings of the mountaines, by which the Riuer falleth headlong into the lake, hauing to that end cut the ſolid rocke in forme of ſtaires, he cauſed ſome ſmall quantitie of corne to bee carried vpon mens ſhoulders, firſt ouer the high mountaines, and from thence to Breſſia.

Breſſia is ſomewhat relieued.

But whileſt theſe things paſt in Lombardie newes came from the Ambaſſadours that were in Tuſcanie and La Marca that the league was renewed. It is reported that the letters and the accord being read and ſeene in the Senate, it was differently receiued, according to euerie mans humour. Diuers murmured, and often told thoſe that approued it, that they ſhould beware that ſome deceit did not lurke in that new league: That they were not pleaſed with that which the Florentines had ſet downe conditionally: That they thought it more neceſſarie to make peace with Philip (if they might obtaine it) although it were to their diſaduantage, than to thruſt the Republike into danger. Theſe complaints had moued the Senate, and diuers ſeemed to be of opinion that the league newly made with Sforza and the Florentines was of no force, had not the Princes graue ſpeech confirmed the Senatours who were in ſome ſort eſtranged.

Newes of the league is brought to Venice,

The Princes ſpeech concerning the league.

FIrſt he rebuked the Senatours for their inconſtancie, who ſo inconſiderately had repented them of the accord ſo much deſired: Hee told them that they needed not to feare and ſuſpect the Florentines, who had freely embraced warre to pleaſure the Venetians, but that they ought rather to account them mindfull and not ingratefull for the benefits which they had in former times receiued, as men that did remember how by the Venetians aide they had in time paſt beaten Philip their enemie from their Gates: That this then was an acknowledgement of that which was paſt, and no deceit: That they ſhould beware leaſt they raſhly loſt ſo goodly an occaſion offered for the preſeruation of their ſtate which came rather by diuine miracle than by any humane deuice or counſell. That he verie plainely perceiued, that by that meanes onely ſpecified in the accord, and not by any other, the State of the Republick might be preſerued and maintained in ſo wretched and dangerous a ſeaſon: He willed them then to reſt ſatisfied, and if they were deſirous of the publike good to embrace that alliance, which did not only bring them ſpeedie reliefe but likewiſe opened them a way to obtaine a gallant victorie.

The Princes ſpeech was of ſuch force, as hauing foorthwith chaunged their mindes, they did generally approue whatſoeuer their Commiſſioners had negotiated; and decreed beſides, that the Ratification ſealed with the golden Seale ſhould be ſent to Florence and to La Marca. The Senate moreouer leuied great ſummes of money, the moſt part whereof was by the accord appoynted for Sforza. They did afterwards raiſe forces ouer all Italie. Criſtofero and Giouanni Tollentino were ſent for: Theſe men came by ſea to Chioggia; for by land they could not come by reaſon of the rebellion of Rauenna.

The Venetians doe ratifie the league.

Whileſt the Venetians made theſe preparations, Picinino with his troupes was come to the riuer Adice, where attempting to croſſe it he was affronted with Andrea Donato on the oppoſite ſhoare; who being newly returned to Florence, was ſent to command in Padua, with Ieronimo Contareni in his company. Gonzaga in the meane time cauſed eight Gallies which hee had made at Hoſtilia, to paſſe at the mouth of the riuer Tartar, hauing firſt for that purpoſe with great labour opened the Channell, and brought them into the Fennes which lie betwixt Legnaga and the cawſey of the Po; and it behoued him not onely to cleanſe the Channell, but after all the mudde was taken out which lay betwixt the Riuer and the Fennes to make a great deepe dike, and through that to make a paſſage into the Riuer Adice. This riuer, the cawſeis being broken downe, did emptie a great part of it ſelfe into thoſe Fennes at the Borough of Caſtagnaria, fortie ſtadij beneath Legnaga, and at the place called Malapietra. But the Venetians had before ſtopt vp thoſe Paſſages with ſtrong Rampires, and placed great numbers of ſmall light veſſelles to defend them, vnder the command of Marino Contareni, and Lodouico de Molino.

The Mantuans pollicie for the paſſage of his Gallies.

Now the enemies firſt attempts were at Caſtagnaria, where vſing meanes to breake downe thoſe obſtacles, Molino and Contareni did valiantly withſtand them. The enemie hauing begunne the skirmiſh, and perceiuing that hee preuailed nothing, and that the ſhoare on the other ſide was kept by thoſe whom Donato had brought thither in haſt, hauing about ſunne-ſet made a fruitleſſe brauado hee departed thence about midnight, and ſailed to Malopietra; where being arriued, and the bankes beaten downe, he did without any difficultie put eight Gallies into the Riuer Adice, and landed a thouſand men vpon the ſhore, the moſt part of whom were Archers. Donato contemning ſo ſmall a number of enemies, as though hee were aſſured eaſily to vanquiſh them, to the end he might fight with them at his own pleaſure, reſolued to tarrie a little beneath the bridge of Balde, where whileſt he embattailed his forces, Tibertino Brandolino did fiercely march againſt the enemies which were paſt. The Captaines likewiſe of the Nauall Armie hauing followed the enemie,

A Nauall battaile betwixt the Venetians and the Mantuan.

mie, beganne a cruell fight in the middeſt of the Riuer, where Contareni fighting valiantly was ſlaine, being ſtricken through the bodie with a dart, and Brandolino was ſore wounded in the right legge. But at laſt the enemies being out of hope to paſſe that way, they retired to Sanguaneta, and afterwards ſailed towards the Riuer Buſſet, where with ſix thouſand Peaſants they did vnder-take to cut a trench into the Adice, the which being filled by night by the Venetian Souldiers who came thither in ſmall boates, made them to change their determination, and to vndertake a matter almoſt like to the former: which was to cleanſe and emptie the ancient channell of Panegia. And to the end the Venetians ſhould not hinder this worke, as they had lately done the other, they went and incamped at Angleria, an houſe of pleaſure in the Countrie two miles from Legnaga, vpon the high-way towardes Verona.

The Mantuan Gallies paſſe into the riuer Adice.

This trench being drawne from Panegia to the Riuer Adice, the enemie beganne to bring his Gallies into the Riuer. But whileſt his fleet lay at Malopietra, the Venetians did extraordinarily elect (without caſting lots) Dario Maripietro to command their Nauall Armie. Mellato, who lay at Penetra, being ſent for, haſted thither with eight thouſand Horſe, and ſixe thouſand foote: howbeit ſome Authors mention not halfe ſo many. Maripietro was come to Legnaga with fiue and thirtie Gallies taken from that Nauall Armie, which (as we haue ſaid) by the Senates command had been brought backe forth of the Riuer Po to Chioggia. Picinino had planted fortie peeces of Ordnance vpon the bankes of Adice, to terrifie Molino's nauall Armie, and to keep it from hindring the arriuall of the Veſſells, which they were drawing from Panegia and the old Channell into the Riuer. This being conſidered by Mellato, after that he had embattailed his troupes vpon the other ſhore, he aduertized Maripietro and Molino forthwith to ſaile vp the Riuer; and that the enemie, if the nauall Armie did not withſtand it, would paſſe on in deſpite of him. Molino beleeued it, and with his owne veſſells and fiue Gallies of Dario's which followed him, hee paſſed on beyond the enemies Armie, and the mouth of Panegia. Some ſay that one of his Gallies being pierced by the enemies Ordnance was taken: which being perceiued by Dario, he was ſo amazed as he could by no meanes be perſwaded to follow Molino. Picinino perceiuing the Venetians amazement, did forthwith cauſe the Ordnance to be drawn from thence where it was planted at the enemies comming. In regard whereof Dario and Molino not knowing what to reſolue on, nor yet daring, being ſo diuided, to aſſaile the enemie, each of them ſought by all meanes how to auoide the frequent ſhot of the Ordnance: by meanes whereof the enemie at his owne leiſure put his Veſſells into the Adice: whereat they that ſtood vpon the oppoſite ſhore being affrighted, beganne to flie diſorderly not abiding the enemie.

The Venetians Nauall Armie doth retire.

Diuers hold that Mellato was Author of that baſe flight, but the greater part lay the fault on Donato. Two things there are which induce mee to beleeue that it was rather the Venetians fault; firſt, the authoritie of Paſius of Arimini, who ſaith that Donato had ſent word to Mellato to forſake the Riuer bankes, and to retire with his troupes into a place of more ſafetie: and the ſecond is, becauſe I finde that hee was within a while after cited at the requeſt of the Aduocates Fiſcall for that matter. Thoſe which affirme that Mellato by Donato's commandement did quit the ſhore, ſtick not likewiſe to ſay that Chriſtofero Tollentino was ſent to Verona with a companie of men at armes; Tiberto Brandolino to Montagnane with his Cauallerie; Giouanni, brother to Chriſtofero to Vincenza; and that Mellato with the reſidue of his armie went and encamped at the Baths of Abana.

Sundrie opinions concerning the Venetians retreate.

The enemie hauing entred the Adice, and comming to beſiege Legnaga, he firſt of all ſeized vpon the bridges, where Carolo Gonzaga a couragious yong man did valiantly behaue himſelfe. Legnaga is diuided (as it were) into two Townes, which are ioyned together by a bridge vpon the Riuer. That part towards the Eaſt is called the Hauen; which being aſſaulted by the enemie was eaſily wonne; and at the other he found better reſiſtance. This place was kept by the Chioggians that lay there Picinino beſiegeth Legnaga.

there in Garriſon, whom the Venetians had found to be confident and loiall. Frederico Contareni, and Pietro Quirini, were there likewiſe with other Gentlemen. Some there are that in ſted of Pietro Quirini ſet downe Andrea Mocenigo, who were all ſent thither for the guard of that place. But, as it often happeneth, when fortune once beginneth to decline, ſhee cannot be ſtaied, neither by counſell nor any reaſon what ſoeuer: euen ſo it came to paſſe that by the ſodaine yeelding of the Townes-men, theſe men, together with the Chioggians, fell into the enemies power.

Legnaga is takē.

Legnaga being taken, Picinino and Gonzaga began to ſcoure the Vincenzan and Paduan Territories. They found a while ſome reſiſtance at Balde; but that once taken, with wonderfull good ſucceſſe they became maſters of Longina, Brendole, Montechia, Arciniane, Montorſe, Valderſine, and Dagne. Diuers places beſides on the Mountaines yeelded vnto them. But all theſe Townes in a manner were wholly of the Territorie of Vincenza. Vpon that of Verona, Soaue with all her dependances was taken by the enemies. Picinino being proud of this ſucceſſe brought his Campe neare to Verona, whither Gonzaga likewiſe came with all his forces.

At this ſtay ſtood the Venetians affaires along the Riuer Adice, when as they fought with better ſucceſſe vpon the lake of La Garda. Italus of Friull laie at Sales with a great cauallerie, and diuers foot companies, being followed by many of the Gybelline faction of the Breſſan Countrie. With theſe forces he ſought by all meanes how to driue the Venetian from Maderna, Penetra and Torbolles. Pietro Auogadre with a great troupe of Guelphes was there readie to withſtand their attempts. They fought cruelly at Maderna; for this Towne likewiſe did at the ſame time belong to the Venetians. Zeno, who commanded the Venetian Nauall Armie, did approch ſo neare to the place of battaile, as his Souldiers being landed had their ſhare in it. The fight laſted from three a clocke in the morning till late in the euening. At which time Italus by little and little retiring his forces from the battaile, and conducting them through a very narrow way hanging ouer the lake, Zeno with his veſſells purſued them with arrow-ſhot and did greatly infeſt them by reaſon of the commodiouſneſſe of the place. In the meane time Auogadre did ſtreightly preſſe the Rereward, and with great ſlaughter ſtaied it. The enemies being then gauled behind and in flanke with great multitudes of arrowes, did in diſorder betake themſelues to flight. The victorious Venetian gaue them chace, ſlew many of them, and took diuers priſoners: great numbers of peaſants were there ſlain. Aboue foure hundred priſoners were taken; among whome were fiftie Gentlemen. Italus by fauour of the night eſcaped to Sales.

A fierce fight neare to the lake of Benac.

The Venetians victorie neere to the lake.

()

The end of the third Booke of the third Decad.

THE FOVRTH BOOKE OF THE THIRD DECAD OF THE HISTORIE Of Venice.

The Contents of the fourth Booke of the third Decad.

SFORZA through the Countries of Flaminia and Ferrara leadeth great troupes first to Chioggia, and then to the Paduan Territorie. MELLATO ioyneth with SFORZA. The Venetian passing ouer the mountaines causeth the enemie to raise his Campe from before Verona. PICININO with all his forces retireth beyond the Riuer Adice. The Venetians Naual Armie is put to rout vpon the lake of La Garda. PICININO is defeated by night in the vale of Lodron. SFORZA in battaile vanquisheth the enemies at Thienna. PICININO and the Mantuan surprise Verona, but not the Castle. SFORZA recouereth Verona thirtie dayes after it was lost. Bressia in the middest of winter is victualled by the way of the mountaines. MELLATO falleth sicke. PICININO sendeth forces into Tuscanie against the Florentines.

Forza was in the meane time come from La Marca with diuers braue men in his companie, among whom were Alessandro, Giouanni, and Leon his brethren, Roberto Sanseuerino, Dominico Malateste, Lodouico Duke of Hadria, to whose daughter hee was betrothed, Francisco Ortonio, with many other notable Captaines. From Esia which was the Rendezuous they came to the temple of Fortune, and from thence to Arimini, where mustering his troupes hee found Guido Fauentino to bee wanting, who was gone to the contrarie side: which when he vnderstood, for a time he remained doubtfull with what place he should first begin. For he perceiued it to be Philips practise by that new enemie to stop his passage into Lombardie. But being sodain in his resolutions, supposing that there was nothing which could more auaile their intended iournie (seeing they were of necessitie by Armes to win themselues a passage to the Venetians camp) than to take Rauenna and Forlimpopoli from the enemie, from whence he might open himselfe a very short way into Lombardie, he besieged Forlimpopoli, & enforced them to yeeld the second day of the siege. From thence marching towards Rauenna, speedy newes was brought him that the enemies had crossed the Adice, and taken in a manner from the Venetians whatsoeuer they they poſſeſſed on both ſides the Riuer, (Verona and Vincenza excepted) and that thoſe of Verona were ſtreightly beſieged ; that the Paduans and Vincenzans, hauing expulſed their Garriſons had mutined; and that vnleſſe he made haſt,it was to be feared that all would fall into the enemies hands.

Forlimpopoli is taken by Sforza.

But it is reported, that concerning the commotions in thoſe two Cities, it was made by the Souldiers, who by ouermuch libertie did ſpoile and rob the wretched Townes-men, as though they had beene enemies taken in warre. As for the Paduans, if by reaſon of theſe outrages they tooke Armes,they were preſently appeaſed at the Gouernours comming. But thoſe of Vincenza being troubled vpon the like occaſion, hauing driuen away the Garriſon, ſaid, That they were loyall to the Venetians; that they needed no forraine forces to keepe them ; that their conſtancie and loialtie was well known to the Senate; and that by thoſe Rampiers their Citie would bee better guarded againſt the enemies attempts, than by any Mercinarie ſuccour. The cauſe of the commotion of Padua and Vincenza.

Mellato vpon the firſt report thereof went thither,greatly commending the Vincenzans, and exhorted them ſtill to perſeuer in their ancient loue and loialtie, and gaue them leaue, according to their owne deſire, to guard their Citie themſelues. Theſe newes being greater in apparence than in effect, cauſed Sforza to change his minde, ſo that leauing the way of Rauenna, he returned ſpeedily to the bridge of Roncanes. Then hauing enforced Guido, and Franciſco, ſonnes to Picinino, to retire to Forli with a great cauallerie,he departed the fifth day after, & by the Bologneſe Territorie,he came to Bondina. From thence hauing ſent all his baggage by the Po to Chioggia, he marched by Ferrara, which was opened to him to Goria, and preſently after to Hadria,(whereof the neighbour-ſea taketh the name.) It was a Citie belonging to the Tuſcans, and for a long time very rich : But thus much I thought good to ſpeake by the waie,becauſe I would haue no man thinke,that the Adriatick Sea did take name of that Hadria which is in La Marca. From whence the Hadriatick Sea taketh the name.

Now this mightie Armie came ſooner than it was loooked for to the Venetians aide vpon the Paduans Territorie, notwithſtanding that it was to paſſe foure great Riuers. Firſt they made a bridge at Goria ouer one of the Armes of Po,on two and thirtie long boates ſtrongly ankored,and vpon them long plankes were laid couered with ſand, with ſtrong Railes on both ſides, for feare leaſt the horſes being frighted with the ſhaking of the bridge, ſhould fall into the water, and twelue veſſells ſtrongly armed,were appointed for the guard therof,to the end, that if the enemie ſhould come downe the Riuer to make any attempt, they might defend and guard the bridge.

It is reported that Sforza's troupes held it for a prodigie,becauſe that on a ſodaine the Po did in ſuch ſort ſwell as it had almoſt ouer-flowed the bankes, and with the inundation had like to haue drowned the Campe which lay not far from the Riuer, and alſo for that great numbers of ſerpents had gotten into the Souldiers cabines. The other paſſage was at the Fornaces,on foure and fortie boats made verie faſt together : And becauſe that place was more commodious for the enemie to place an Ambuſh, twelue Gallies well armed with an hundred archers a peece were appointed for the defenſe of the bridge. The third was at the mouth of the Adice neere to the Foſſoni, compoſed of foureſcore ſmall boats, & that being paſſed, the troupes were conducted along the Sea-ſide to Brondolles, where the Armie did likewiſe paſſe. But becauſe that paſſage was verie broad, the bridge was likewiſe made longer than the reſt, containing 90. veſſels. Sforza being from thence come to the Hauen of Chioggia found three hundred ſmall veſſells,ready to tranſport the troupes to the firme Land, with the horſe and foot companies, who were with a faire wind carried through the Lakes, which are betwixt the Sea and the Land. Manie tooke great delight, and eſpecially the Generall, who was well acquainted with Land Armies, but not with Sea Flectes, to ſee at one time three hundred ſaile floting vp and downe, with more than a thowſand other ſmall boates of all ſortes, diſperſed heere and there abroad, which were come to meet him; ſome to offer him their ſeruice; others with a deſire to ſee him; ſome were likewiſe ſent in the Common-wealths name to congratulate his happie paſſage, and to preſent him with rich guifts. The Armie being landed vpon the Paduan Territorie, they numbred ſix thouſand two hundred fortie foure horſe, and ſixteen hundred footmen. Thoſe which make the number leſſe, ſet downe but foure thouſand horſe, and two thouſand foote.

and

The number of Sforzas troupes.

So ſoone as Sforza ſaw his Armie on the firme Land, he deſired nothing more than to ioine his forces with thoſe of Mellato, and with the reſt whereſoeuer they were that did belong to the Venetians, that he might preſently march to fight with the enemie: Mellato likewiſe hauing intelligence of Sforza's arriuall, did not delay to come and meete him, but the verie next day after his arriuall he came to him with twelue thouſand horſe and foot. Some ſay that theſe two Captaines did ioine their forces together vpon the Colonois Territorie, where a generall muſter being made, they found the Armie to conſiſt of foureteene thouſand horſe, and eight thouſand foote.

The number of the whole Armie in generall.

But during all theſe warlike preparations, the Breſſians were no leſſe tormented with plague and famine, than with the continuall aſſaults of the enemies. For two thouſand men whom Italus had left not farre off from the Citie, did in ſuch ſort diſturb them by their ordinarie incurſions, as they within the Citie had no more reſt, than when they were beſieged by Picinino and Gonzaga. The Inhabitants being oppreſſed with ſo many miſeries would without all doubt haue yeelded at laſt, had not Barbaro by a wonderfull prouidence foreſeen all theſe difficulties. For it is recorded, That there was nothing whatſoeuer could bee imagined, whereby to giue hope to the Citizens, and to containe them in their duties, which readily hee did not execute, ſo as it is ſcarce credible, in what manner and how great ſummes of money he raiſed from ſundrie places to paie the Garriſon. For from Venice none could come to them: all the waies and paſſages being intercepted. As alſo it was very admirable what meanes he vſed together with the aide of Pietro Auogadre, for the bringing in of ſo great a quantitie of nuts, roots, cheſtnuts, and other ſorts of fruits as he drew from the inhabitants of the Mountaines therewith to ſlack the hunger of the Citizens: And it is almoſt impoſſible to be belieued how often he deceiued the enemie, feigning one thing, and diſſembling an other; and with what patience he could temporize with that froward multitude in a time of ſo great ſcarcitie. He refuſed not to conuerſe and talke with al men, and namely with thoſe whoſe houſes he knew to be infected with the Peſtilence: for that contagious ſickneſſe was ſo diſperſed ouer that wretched Citie, as there was no daie, but it buried more than threeſcore perſons: his Gates were open at all houres, and he did euer eat in publike; & yet during that miſerable time, there was neuer ſeene any bread of Wheat vpon his table, but either of Rie or Barley. Some ſay that he did at times bring forragers into the Citie in ſted of victuallers, with ſacks full of Straw and other ſubſtance, to put the inhabitants in hope of ſome new kinde of foode; hee did moreouer priuily cauſe arrowes with ſmall skrowles about them to be ſtuck in the ſteeples and high Towers of the Citie, as if they had been ſhot thither by ſome friends of theirs, which did aduertize them not to expect any fauor of the enemie, for he had vowed, if euer he did enter Breſſia, wholly to ruine it, and to put all the inhabitants with their wiues and children to the edge of the ſword. By theſe artificiall dealings he did not only defend the Citie committed to his keeping, but had gouerned matters in ſuch ſort, as the Breſſans termed him the Father of their Countrie.

The great diſtreſſe of the Breſſans.

Barbaro his politike wiſedome.

The Breſſans terme Barbaro the Father of their Countrie.

At the laſt, at Pietro Auogadre his returne, & vpon aſſurance of aid from the mountaines, hauing on a ſodaine aſſailed the Fortes, the one at Santa Croce and the other at Mompiana, he cauſed them to be razed downe to the ground. The Breſſans being incouraged by this ſucceſſe, (for Italus was encamped at Caſtagnedola the better to free himſelfe from the infected aire) determined to beſiege Sales, ſuppoſing that it would come to paſſe, that they beſieging it by Land, and the Venetians nauall Armie mie by water, the Salodians would be inforced to yielde, either by compoſition, or force. For this purpoſe Thadeo d'Æſte with three hundred horſe of the remainder of thoſe which had bin left with him for the guard of Breſſia; Pietro Anogadre with three hundred Mountaniers, and Theoſaluio with ſix hundred ſouldiers met at Gauarda. Italus hauing intelligence of the enemies deſigne, marched to Feliciana, whither thoſe of Breſſia went fiercely to aſſaile him. But hee hauing ſpeedily diſplayed his enſignes, came foorth, and beganne the fight vnder the towne-walls, which continuing from day-breake til noone with equall valour on either ſide, both parties being tired, they beganne a ſoft retreit; but as the Venetians retired, the enemie came vpon them with ſuch furie, as hee diſordered them and put them to rout. Thadeo hauing loſt many of his ſouldiers, did without any ſtay gallop into Piedmont, from whence returning ſoone after to Gauarda, hee went with thoſe forces which Barbaro had aſſembled foorth of the Bergameſe for feare of greater loſſe, to beſiege and take the Fort which the enemies had built at Saint Euphemias.

Fight betwixt the Breſſans and Italus.

The Breſſans are put to rout.

On theſe termes ſtood the affaires of the Breſſans, when as Sforza being ioyned with Mellato (as hath bin ſaid) marched againſt the enemies which beſieged Verona, who with their ordnance furiouſly battered it. But they being aſſured of his comming, preſently ſent away their Artillerie and baggage into the Mantuan Countrey, raiſed their campe, and went to Soaue, which is a Towne lying on the Veronois territorie. In that place they fortified themſelues, and drew a trench from the next marſhes vnto the riuer Adice, which they ſtrengthened with diuers towers and rampires, ſo as thoſe Forts being wel defended, there was no likelihood that Sforza could paſſe forward to relieue Verona, Breſſia, and Bergamo.

The enemies raiſe their camp from before Verona.

Sforza in the meane time beſieged Longina, and took it the ſame day, the ſpoile whereof he gaue to his ſouldiors (as Paſius ſaith.) Blondus writeth that it endured diuers aſſaults, and that it was brauely defended, in which aſſault Pietro Brunora and Troillo, two of Sforza's ſpeciall friends were ſlaine; the one with a dart, and the other with an harquebuze-ſhot; whereupon being inflamed with choler, he cauſed all his forces to aſſaile it, intending not onely to ſacke the Towne, but wholly to raze it: For preuenting whereof the townesmen did voluntarily yield themſelues, and thereby auoided all further miſchiefe. The enemies forces lay not farre thence, and yet during the aſſaults giuen vnder their noſes, they durſt not once ſtirre.

Longina is taken by Sforza.

This towne being recouered, Sforza in a ſquare batallion marched againſt the enemies, and in their view ordered his ſquadrons, offering them battell. But they hauing anſwered that they would not fight before the new Moone, hee perceiued their feare, and marched away to recouer the townes vpon the Vincenzan territorie, diuers of which hee tooke in a ſhort ſpace, hauing promiſed them all fauour and impunitie. Some ſay, that then, and not before, the enemie incamped at Soaue, reſoluing after the loſſe of all other places, to keep that, as moſt commodious, the better to withſtand Sforza, on what ſide ſoeuer he would turne to march to Verona. And becauſe that trench drawne from the Marſhes could not be forced without great ſlaughter, Sforza and the reſt reſolued to goe to Verona by the way of the mountaines. He came to Ronques called S. Iohns before Picinino had any notice of his reſolution.

The enemies anſwere to Sforza who offered them battell.

Tollentino and thoſe that lay in garriſon in Verona, ſallying foorth on a ſodaine (which they were expreſly commanded to doe) hauing fired certaine Forts which Philips forces had built neere to the Citie, did place garriſons of their owne ſouldiors in two of them, which they had then forced. Sforza in the meane time being incamped at Ronques, skirmiſhed with Picinino neare to the forts which he had before aſſured on the toppe of the mountaines: At the beginning Sforza's troupes were ſhaken, but Troillo and Nicholao Piſani, being forthwith ſent with a great ſquadron of horſe againſt the enemies, the fight became equall, and Picinino in the night being retired with his troupes to Soaue, Sforza without anie greater reſiſtance aſcended cended the mountaines towards Verona. The Venetians being come to the top, Picinino for a time followed the troups, that he might with ſtrong garriſons defend the Townes and Caſtles which he had taken in the neighbour-hilles, abſtaining by all meanes from fight. For Sforza had left him no place fit for an ambuſcado, and was farre ſuperiour to him in number of ſouldiors.

Sforza goeth forward towards Verona.

The number of the enemies cap, and that of the Venetians.

Blondus who onely makes mention of the mercenarie ſouldiers, ſaith that there were foureteene thouſand men in the enemies campe, and ſixeteene thouſand in that of the Venetians, howbeit in the one Armie as well as the other there were great numbers of Biſognios or freſh-water ſouldiors. Sforza being come to Verona, would not lodge in the Citie, but incamped certaine furlongs from it, neere to the high way of Hoſtilia. Some ſay that hee went and incamped in the field of Mars, which is neere the Citie-walles, and that vpon the report that hee did meane to paſſe ouer Adice, Picinino (who remained neere to Porcilia) did ſodainely croſſe the Riuer, and retired to Vigaſio vpon the Mantuan confines with all his troupes. And then thereupon Sforza returning from whence he came, beſieged Soaue; and hauing taken it, in a ſhort ſpace he recouered all the townes on the other ſide of the Riuer Adice, Legnaga excepted.

The vnion of the Greek church with the Latine.

Whileſt theſe things happened neere to Verona, the vnion of the Greek church with that of Rome inſued ſoone after. This buſines after a long and ſerious diſputation, being debated in the Aſſemblie at Ferrara, was by the aſſiſtance of the holy Ghoſt brought to a happie end. For it was found that thoſe two Nations more learned than the reſt, did agree in that wherein they ſeemed to diſſent; but with ſundrie circumlocutions.

All the Townes which the enemie poſſeſſed on the hither ſide of the Riuer being recouered (as hath bin ſaid) the Venetian armie drew neere to the lake of Benac and beſieged Bardolin, in regard that all Sforza's deſignes with thoſe of his aſſociates tended onely by ſome meanes to open the lake, it being the onely way whereby Breſſia could be releeued, the which was reduced to all extreamitie by famine and peſtilence. For beſide the great loſſe it had ſuſtained during the ſiege, the contagious ſickenes had taken away fiue thouſand men: Famine moreouer did now afflict them more than before, hearbs and rootes, wherewith they had bin a long time fed, beginning to faile them. The rumor was, that this Citie oppreſſed with ſo many miſeries, would ſhortly yeelde, if by the opening of the Lake it were not ſpeedily relieued with men and victualles: And becauſe the enemies nauall armie was in ſome ſort ſtronger than that of the Venetians, Zeni durſt not come neere Bardolin which his Country-men beſieged. Whereupon Sforza perceiuing that hee did no great good there (in regard the inhabitants were relieued by the Lake) raiſed his campe.

The great extremitie of the citie of Breſsia.

Now becauſe his comming hither had been to no great purpoſe, Caualcabon, Guerrieri, Martiano, and Giouanni el Conte, Roman Gentlemen, were ſent with a thouſand horſe and three hundred foot to relieue Breſſia with men and victualles. Theſe men being come through the vale of Sabia into Piedmont, were deſirous before they entred into the Citie to feede their horſes in a medow, which were wearied with their long iourney. Barbaro in the meane time hauing determined to burne part of the enemies nauall Armie that lay at Sales, ſent Thadeo d'Æſte, Andrea Valerio, and Andrea Leon thither: Zeni Admirall of the Venetians fleete was likewiſe commaunded to be there, and to aſſaile the enemie.

Picinino and Gonzaga hauing intelligence as well of this deſigne of the enemie, as of the arriuall of the victualles, did ſecretly depart from Vigaſio with two hundred horſe, and by Peſcara came to Feliciana, where they ioyned with Lodouico Sanſeuerino and Italus of Friull: who being commanded to follow them, they fell vpon the Venetian cauallerie which ſtill remained in Piedmont, brake them, and deſpoiled them of all their baggage, and taking ſome priſoners, put the reſidew to flight who eſcaped to the Citie. From thence marching againſt the reſt who were comming ming to the Lake, they diuided themſelues into three bands. Sanſeuerino embarking himſelfe in the veſſells, was commanded to fight vpon the water; Italus with the footmen to goe vp to the mountaines of Maderna; and Gonzaga together with Picinino to conduct the cauallerie by the way which lieth betwixt the Lake and the mountaines. In this maner the enemies nauall Armie did aſſaile that of the Venetians. Thadeo vpon this rumour made haſte with his troupes, that hee might come to the timely reſcue of his Countrey-men; but the enemies with great cries fell vpon the Venetians in front and in flanke. Thadeo being incompaſſed on euerie ſide, vſed all meanes to preſerue his ſouldiers; yet neuertheleſſe, the nauall Armie and thoſe that fought on land, were in a moment defeated by the enemie: The Venetians nauall armie conſiſted of two gallies, foure brigantines, ſeuen ganzarioles, and other veſſells, two of which ganzarioles at the beginning of the fight fled to Torbolles: All the reſt with Zeni their Generall fell into the enemies hands. Thadeo likewiſe was taken priſoner, with Valerio and Leon the Prouidators.

The Venetians are put to rout at Feliciana.

The Venetians nauall armie is defeated vpon the lake of la Garda.

This ouerthrow was accompanied with an other. For the next day after this vnfortunate battell, the enemie tooke the Caſtle of Maderna. It is reported that Sforza had a long time before foreſeene this defeate, and had often aduertiſed the Senate to ſend ſupplies to the Lake, and that if they did not, it was to bee feared that their nauall Armie there would be defeated by the enemie. But hee did ſpeedily aſsure Torbolles and Penetra by a ſtrong garriſon, for feare leſt the enemie being prowd of that victorie, ſhould ſodainely march to ſurprize them. This ouerthrow being reported at Venice did greatly trouble the Senate; and yet becauſe they would ſhew no ſignes of diſcouragement, they preſently reſolued to ſend a new fleete into the Lake, but after an other faſhion than the former, namely, to ſend to Torbolles in ſix hundred cartes all the ſubſtance and matter wherewith to make them, which they had in readines, and there, as in an hauen neere to the water, to make eight gallies, as manie gallions, and foure brigantines. All the workmen of the Venetians ſhips were ſent thither ſpeedily to make an end of the worke.

The enemies take the Caſtle of Maderna.

A new venetian Army for the lake.

Stefano Contareni was choſen Generall of that Armie, and in euerie gallie a Senator was appointed to command. They did beſides ſend certaine moneths pay for the ſouldiers to the campe. All this was done in a maner during that Summer. Autumne was alreadie come, which being ſubiect to diſeaſes had in a ſhort ſpace infected the third part of the armie with agews, whereupon Sforza with his troups retired to Gibeta. The enemie was incamped at Vigaſio, where his Armie was no leſſe afflicted with ſickenes; for beſides Agews, the plague was crept into it. The Senate taking great care to free the Breſsans from danger, wrote to Sforza, and earneſtly intreated him if it were poſſible, before he ſent his Armie to winter, to relieue that loyall Citie with men and victualls. And for the ſafetie and aſſurance of that which he ſhould leaue behind him, the Senate reſolued to turne backe the Riuer of Adice into the olde channell, ſo ſoone as it ſhould be cleanſed, ſome foure miles beneath Legnaga. For that being done, it was certaine, that waters running in that maner ouer the Countrie, would make the Paduan, Vincenzan and Verona territories which lie on the farther ſide of the Riuer, more aſſured againſt the enemies incurſions, and would beſides be verie commodious for thoſe that ſhould faile to Verona. Foure thouſand pioners were imployed in this worke.

The Senates care for the Breſſans.

Contareni in the meane time (for they could not bring maſts for the ſhippes ſo farre) being come to the Campe, went to the mountaines of Trent, with skilfull workemen to view thoſe Forreſts, and to ſee if there were anie trees in it of that height fit to make maſts. All men were of opinion, that hee might there furniſh himſelfe, not onely with maſts, but all other matters neceſsarie for manie veſſells: whereupon, hee cauſed ſixe hundred Carpenters to come thither, beſides the great numbers which he had alreadie brought with him.

Picinino who had intelligence of thoſe great preparations, that he might in ſome ſort fruſtrate the enemies deſignes, did about the ſhutting in of the euening depart

depart from the Citie of Riua (whither he was secretly come) marching along the lake, through a secret and almost vnknowne way, he attempted to set fire on a Galley which was newly made. Troylo by chance had the guard of that place, who not onely withstood the enemie, but comming valiantly to the fight, made good his partie. Picinino being in the middest of the throng beaten from his horse, and being remounted, did hardly escape, having lost three hundred men, Sforza having notice therof, fearing lest the enemie with greater forces would returne to end what he had begun, commanded Mellato to go with his troups to guard those places, who being come thither, caused his souldiers to make a wall of stones without any morter, extending from the lake to the hilles of Riua, of two hundred paces long, and of twelue foot high, and as many in breadth, with a Fort on the top of the hill builded of the same matter, heaped vp together in forme of a wall, and with diuers small towers. These places being guarded with small forces, were able to assure the vessels which were then at Torbolies, and as many as should be there afterwards, against all the enemies attempts.

Picinino attempteth to burne the Venetians nauall Armie.

Mellato fortifieth the passages neere to Torbolies.

Now whilest they were preparing the nauall Armie, and that the turning aside of the riuer Adice was by a new aduise interrupted, Sforza resolued to send victualles to Brescia by the mountaines. Wherefore hauing at Torbolles and Penetra made great prouision of corne, and hoping either by entreaties or money to winne the Lords of these mountaines, or if that failed to open himselfe a passage by force of Armes, he came forth of Penetra with three thousand horse, and a thousand foote of the choisest in the whole Armie, and went and encamped within halfe a mile of Thyenna. He did besides carrie with him certaine great peeces of Ordnance meaning with them to batter some townes if occasion should serue. But whilest he remained neere to Thyenna, Philips forces who had discouered the enemies designs being come to Riua, did on a sodaine seize on the vale of Lodron: and Picinino and Sanseuerino hauing left eight hundred foot, and three hundred horse in the forrest of Thyenna to guard those passages, they went backe againe with the residue of their troupes.

In the meane time Martiano and Giouanni el Conte, being sent by Sforza had ambusht themselues with all the cauallerie at the end of the lake which is in that valley, and there lay in great silence expecting the enemies arriuall. Now so soone as Picinino and the rest drew neere them, the Venetians gaue a charge, whereupon there began a cruell fight. Martiano's troupes did not onely continue the fight all day long but a great part of the night: for when day-light failed, they fired the neighbour houses, and by that light fought so long till Picinino being weatie and tyred began by little and little to retire. But in the retreit the Venetians charged him with such furie, as they did forthwith put him to rout, hauing lost all his cauallerie, and the greatest part of his Infanterie, and himselfe getting vp to the top of the mountaine Ponall, which looketh vpon the lake of La Garda, and by the helpe of an Almaine (whom he still kept neere him for such purposes) with much difficultie escaped those fearefull precipices. At length being come to the bankes of the lake, he embarked himselfe in a poore boat, and went to Riua. Sanseuerino in great feare escaped through the mountains with twentie horse to Maderna: Fourescore of the chiefe prisoners were by Barbaro his commandement brought to Brescia.

A new designe of Sforza to relieue Brescia.

Picinino is put to rout.

Picinino nothing danted with this ouerthrow, taking Sanseuerino along with him, presently marched to seize vpon the pace of Thyenna. Sforza was already vpon the mountaines, resolued to passe forward, although it were through the middest the enemies. Thyenna is seated vpon an high hill, there being on either side of it dangerous precipices in one of which on the right side of the towne standeth a Castle strong by art and nature; the left side is verie barren and craggie. The enemie with a companie of footmen seized on that place: Carolo Gonzaga had embattailed his cauallerie forth of the Citie gates: The Venetians Generall stayed at the foot of the hil, where the enemies footmen were encamped, where he perceiued

that

that the paſſages being on euerie ſide kept by the enemie, he could not paſſe without fight. Thus ſtanding amazed, not being reſolued by what meanes to paſſe through the enemies, he did from farre deſcrie a freſh band of men at Armes comming from Riua to Thyenna. And ſuppoſing that the enemie had ſent for the reſidue of his troupes which lay at Vigaſio, he did on a ſodaine cauſe Troilo with all the cauallerie to march againſt Gonzaga, and then turning himſelfe towards his Infanterie (of whom he had euer a braue band neere vnto him for his guard,) he ſhewed them the toppe of the mountaine which was couered with armed men, and did earneſtly exhort and entreat them, That if they did deſire to be accounted ſuch as he had euer eſteemed them, if they would euer acknowledge thoſe many benefits which they had receiued from him, if (in a word) they were deſirous, as became loyall and valiant ſouldiers, to execute ſome generous action in his preſence, that they ſhould by that daies valour purchaſe immortall glorie and renoune, and march couragiouſly againſt the enemies, who being defeated and ouerthrowne, they ſhould not onely preſerue a Citie moſt loyall to the Venetians, but open themſelues a way to obtaine a gallant victorie.

Sforza exhorteth his ſouldiers.

In this manner did he ſpeake vnto them, and then marched vp towards the hill at the head of the Armie with a pike in his hand. And although the ſouldiers did with great difficultie march vp that craggie and ſteepie mountaine, yet neuertheleſſe being animated by their Generals ſpeech and preſence, they mounted to the top thereof. Then Sforza ſhewing them his friend Troilo valiantly fighting neere to the Citie, he did entreat them to make haſt, and to take from the cauallerie the honor of that victorie. Afterwards running to an high place from whence he might be ſeene and heard of his ſouldiers, he began with a cheerefull voice to call out aloud, ſometimes to Troilo, then to Nicolao Piſani and the reſt, willing them to breake the enemies Armie with a cloſe battaillion, telling them that himſelfe with a troup of footmen had beaten the enemies from the top of the mountaine.

Sforzas great valour.

Then turning towards his Infanterie, and running to encourage them, he perceiued his ſouldiers a farre off to throw the enemies into thoſe fearefull precipices, and with a cheerefull voyce ſhaking his pike, he ſaid vnto them, On, on, my valiant fellowes, charge and purſue this fearefull enemie on euerie ſide, that he may no more returne to the battaile: and hauing done thus to the foot forces, he returned to encourage the Cauallerie.

The part of a true Generall of an Armie.

The Victorie in that place was ſomewhat difficult by reaſon of the arriuall of certaine companies of men at armes, but when they vnderſtood that the Garriſon had beene throwne headlong downe the mountaine, the enemies beganne to giue backe. In this bickering Cæſar Martinenga fighting valiantly in the middeſt of the battaile was taken priſoner: Whereupon the enemies forſaking the place, did openly betake themſelues to flight. Sforza's victorious ſouldiers purſued them vp and downe, ſlew great numbers of them, and tooke make priſoners. Beſides Cæſar, Carolo Gonzaga was taken with two hundred horſe, and three hundred foot. Sforza at the beginnnig thought that Picinino had beene taken, but not finding him after ſearch made among the priſoners, he promiſed fiue thouſand crownes to any man that would vndertake to fetch him backe. All this notwithſtanding hee eſcaped to the Citie, where he hid himſelfe for one whole day, fearing if the enemie ſhould know that he were in Thyenna, he would preſently haue beſieged the Citie, and taken all meanes of eſcape from him. Therefore about midnight diſguiſing himſelfe in ragged habite like to a poore lame ſouldier, he was carried vpon mens ſhoulders forth of the Citie, and through by-waies at length came to Riua, whither a great part of the cauallerie had eſcaped.

The enemies are vanquiſhed at Thyenna.

Picinino eſcapeth in diſguiſed habit.

The next day after the battaile, Sforza beſieged the Citie, and during the ſiege, certaine light skirmiſhes were made, where Malateſte Prince of Ceſenna a couragious young man, comming forth to fight with the enemie was taken priſoner. Paſius of Arimini ſaith, That the Venetian Generall after the victorie at Thyenna, marched in order of battaile to Riua, and that Malateſte was taken in a ſalley there. Alardo of Verona in his Oration made in praiſe of Sforza ſaith, That Picinino the next day after that he eſcaped from the battaile, came with his Army & preſented battaile to the Venetians. Wherein his valour appeareth more notable, by how much his forces ſeemed wholly to be ouerthrowne. For therby all men knew; that Sforza and the reſt had to doe with an enemie, who whether he were victor or vanquiſhed, could not be at quiet. Yet neuertheleſſe howſoeuer it happened, it is moſt certaine that Sforza ſent victuals to Breſſia, and would daily haue ſent more, had not the loſſe of Verona which happened at the ſame time, called the Venetian forces elſewhere. Philips Captaines had laid a plot to ſurprize the Caſtle of Verona which ſtandeth on the Weſt ſide. For they had intelligence from an Almaine ſouldier, who was (as Blondus ſaith) one of the dead paies there: That ſmall Guard was kept there in the night. Paſius ſaith, That a Mantuan gaue them this intelligence, who being taken priſoner the Summer before, had for a time dwelt with Giacomo Bologneſe, the Gouernour of the Caſtle, whileſt his ranſome was prouiding, and that during his impriſonment, he went freely about the walles, and had at his leiſure viewed the munitions and all parts of the Caſtle.

Malateſte prince of Ceſenna is taken priſoner.

The diſpoſition of Picinino.

An enterprize vpon Verona.

They had (as hath beene ſaid) a long time before determined to vndertake this enterpriſe: but they had deferred it till the enemie ſhould ſend his troupes to winter, that they might the more ſafely fortifie themſelues in Verona, and before the Venetian ſouldiers could be drawn from their garriſons. But perceiuing matters to be brought to that paſſe, that they could not hinder Sforza from going to Breſſia, they reſolued to put this enterprize in ſpeedie execution there, the better to draw him from that iourney. To this end hauing ſecretly aſſembled their forces, leauing Riua, they came to Peſcara, before thoſe whom they had ſent for thither arriued, and commanding them to follow after, they ſpeedily marched to Vigaſio, and tooke along with them all the ſouldiers that lay there in garriſon.

Departing from thence on the eighteenth day of Nouember at the beginning of the night, they came in great ſecrecie neere to Verona. Afterward about midnight rearing their ladders againſt the walles, the Author of the enterprize mounted firſt, who was forthwith followed in great ſecrecie, by all the reſt, who killing the guardes, and breaking open the next gate, the Captaines with all the troupes had enterance. The cries and groanes of wounded men, with the clattering of Armour, did aſſure thoſe who had the guard on the walles neere to the old Caſtle, that the enemie was entered, whereupon the Allarme was giuen. At theſe fearefull cries and nocturnall rumours the whole Citie ranne to Armes, and comming forth on euerie ſide, they put themſelues in order in the market-place. The enemies were alreadie heard to come forward, and Picininos & Gonzaga about the fourth watch of the night had ſent their troupes into the Citie. But perceiuing the reſiſtancce which was made by night they changed their mindes, and abſtayned from fight, becauſe that all their troupes were not yet arriued. Some ſay that the bridge Raffiolane being broken downe by the force of the aſſailants, the fight in that place ceaſed.

Allarme in Verona.

The enemies are in Verona.

But whether it did ceaſe or no, they began to affright the inhabitants, by breaking downe the houſes behind the Caſtle: In the meane time many that did affect the Venetians being come to the Market-place counſelled the fearefull Magiſtrates which knew not what to doe, that in regard they had no Garriſon to defend them, euerie man ſhould that night retire to ſome place of ſafetie, and take order for the Guard of the ſtrong places: For they being well defended, there was no doubt but that the enemie would be forthwith enforced whether hee would or no to abandon the Citie: That they ſhould beſides, ſuffer the wretched inhabitants to giue place to the miſerable condition of the times. Bartholomeo Peregrino, a man of great authoritie amongſt them and a friend to the Venetians, did accompanie thoſe that went

went their way as farre as the ſame Bridge, for feare leſt ſome iniſter miſhap might hinder their eſcape. But ſo ſoone as it was day, the enemie without any reſiſtance entred the Citie at the Gate Raffiolane. Paſius ſaith that he entred it before breake of day.

A terrible feare had ſeized vpon the inhabitants being ignorant what would become of their Citie. For it was doubtfull whether the victorious enemie would preſerue it, or giue it as a prey to his Souldiers. Lodouico Vermio was one of the formoſt amongſt the enemies, who after that Carmagnolla his father-in-law had beene condemned did ſtil follow the contrary party, and had voluntarily baniſhed himſelfe. He comming to his owne houſe, where hee vnderſtood Mellato's richeſt goods and houſhould ſtuffe was, being inflamed with choller did preſently giue them to the ſpoile of his Souldiers. By his example others that were hard by, being deſirous of bootie fell to breaking open of Citizens houſes. Some ſay that Franciſco Picinino, ſonne to the Generall, was the firſt that beganne to ſpoile, who had the guard of the gate Raffiolane. But whether it were he or the other, it is certaine that the Citie would that day haue ſuſtained a notable miſchiefe, had not Maguis, one of the excellenteſt Lawyers of his time, and a man of great authoritie among his Countriemen, gone to the Prince of Mantua, and entreated him not to ſuffer that Citie which had euer deſerued well of him, and was fallen into that danger to be ruined without the fault or deſert of the inhabitants; That hee ought to bee ſatisfied with being Conquerour of ſo noble a Citie, and not to defile it with bloud and rapine.

The doubt of thoſe of Verona

Maguis entreateth the Prince of Mantua not to ſpoile Verona

These words no leſſe profitable, than true, did greatly moue the Prince; who preſently commanded the ſouldiers to deſiſt from ſpoiling, and that all the Enſignes ſhould be drawne vp in order of battaile to the Pallace, where within a while after he was proclaimed Prince of Verona. For in the league betwixt him and Philip, againſt the Venetians, it was expreſſely mentioned, that if Verona and Vincenza ſhould chance to bee taken in that wurrey, that then they ſhould bee giuen to the Prince of Mantua. After this proclamation, he, determining to recouer the ſtrongeſt places in the Citie, did ſpeedily make himſelfe maſter of the Gates, Bridges, Walls, and all the reſt except the two Caſtles on the top of the mountaine, and that which is in the plaine, called the old Pallace. Then hee reſolued to batter the old Pallace, whither he vnderſtood that his ſonne Carolo was lately brought as a Priſoner, and he determined either to breake downe the bridge which is neare to it vpon the Riuer, or elſe to make a great trench before it with a Fort, to take all hope of ſuccours from thoſe within it. He did likewiſe ſend Giouanni Gonzaga his brother to the Caſtles vpon the Mountaine to depriue them likewiſe of all reliefe. Hee did moreouer attempt to ſeize on the ſtreights of Cluſina to keepe Sforza from comming to the reliefe of the Citie. He ſent word to Giacomo Maranico Gouernour of the vale of Policella, that he had the night before ſeized on Verona, that with the Citie he had his wife and children in his power, and that vnleſſe he did ſpeedily take order to haue the ſtreights of Cluſina ſhut vp and ſafely guarded, hee would giue his houſe in ſpoile to the Souldiers, and put his wife and children to death. But he was ſo farre off from being daunted with his menaces, as one the contrarie, hauing roughly repulſed his meſſenger, he ſpeedily marched with a troupe of Peaſants to meet with Sforza. For the night of the very ſame day that the Citie was taken, newes was brought thereof to Sforza's Campe.

The Mantuan is proclaimed Prince of Verona.

The Mantuans preparation for the defence of Verona.

The Generall who firſt heard of it was much amazed at the newneſſe of the matter, being ſcarce able to belieue it, had not certaine Letters written to him from particular friends confirmed the truth thereof, and entreated him ſpeedily to come to the reskue of that which was almoſt loſt. Whereupon, he raiſed his Campe, and ſending for Mellato from Torbolles, hee marched thitherwards with his Armie, ſtaying in no place, but a little vpon the banks of the Adice, which hauing paſſed he went about Sun-ſet with a ſmall troupe to the ſtreights of the Mountaines. The Sforza marcheth to the reskew of Verona.

Riuer Adice in that place, where a Caſtle is to be ſeene vpon a craggie Mountaine, doth wax verie narrow towards the end of the valley Lagarina, and glideth through the ſtreights of the broken Mountaine, hauing on euery ſide feareſull rocks in forme of a wall aduancing ſtill forward as high as a man can ſhoot an arrow more than two thouſand paces in length, and betwixt the Riuer and the rocks there lieth a narrow way wherein two Armed Souldiers can hardly paſſe in front: but neare to the Caſtle, both ſides of the Mountaines doe ſhut themſelues vp together, ſo as the Riuer betwixt the two rocks makes a great Gulphe: on that ſide likewiſe where the Caſtle ſtandeth, there is a path cut through the rock a croſbow-ſhot in length, where one man at once whether he be on foot or horſe-backe can but paſſe. I dare affirme that theſe two hilles which are at this day to be ſeene there, haue in former times beene but one, the which by viewing them may be eaſily diſcerned. For both their tops, and the cutting of the rocks, doe ſo much reſemble one another, as nothing can bee more like.

The deſcription of the riuer Adice.

Now Sforza being come thither (as hath beene ſaid) in the euening, had intelligence from thoſe that lay in Garriſon in the Caſtle, that Franciſco ſon to Picinino had attempted to take that place, but perceiuing his labour to proue vaine he had retired his troupes. But the Venetian Generall fearing ſome Ambuſcado, did by day-breake ſend Nicholao Piſani before with armed horſe to diſcouer thoſe ſuſpitious wayes, and chiefely the ſtreights. He preſently returned galloping, telling him that great numbers of enemies were at the going forth of the ſtraights. Sforza being greatly moued with his report, ſpake to Mellato, Marcello, and the reſt, telling them, That they were that day either to die in thoſe ſtreights, or to paſſe forward to the enemies coſt. That he was certaine that the enemie before them had encloſed the going forth into the valley, and that hee was moreouer in doubt that they had done the like behind them. It behoued them therefore to goe forward, and in the companie of Sforza and his good fortune to runne fiercely vpon the enemie: That they ſhould be well aſſured, that there was nothing ſo difficult, nor any power ſo great, which the valour of braue men accompanied by fortune, could not vanquiſh and ouercome. And thereupon he marched forward in battaile, reſoluing to fight with the enemie; at what time certaine word was brought him that there was no danger at all, and that Giacomo Mordnico was beneath in the valley with a thouſand Souldiers to keepe the enemies from ſeizing on the paſſages; and that he might boldly march on without any feare of Ambuſh.

Sforza his ſpeech to his Captaines.

This newes made Sforza ioyfull, who cauſed the enſignes & Souldiers ſpeedily to march. Being come into the plaine the enſignes made a ſtand at Volarnea, till ſuch time as the whole Armie was embattailed, that they might from thence march in a ſquare battalion to the Citie. In ſome Authors there is no mention of this feare, nor of Sforza's ſpeech to his Captaines. At night the Venetian Armie encamped at Saint Ambroſe Burrough ſome eight miles from Verona. There they vnderſtood of whatſoeuer had been done in the Citie for three daies ſpace; what attempts the enemie had made vpon the Caſtles; and how that the Mantuan Prince being come to batter the olde Palace with his ordnance, the Gouernour of the place ſent him word, that vnleſſe he did giue ouer that manner of beſieging, hee would binde and lay his ſon Carolo on that part of the wall which he firſt battered that he might be beaten in pieces with the Canon, whereupon the Prince being daunted with his threatnings, did preſently withdraw the batterie.

The braue meſſage of the Gouernor of the olde Palace, to the Prince of Mantua.

Now the fourth day after they were come from the Mountaines, they came to the Fort of Feliciana. Some ſay, that the enemies for a time fought at the Rampiers and trenches which they had made, to keep backe the Venetians, and that being driuen thence by the valour of Sforza's troups, they did eaſily giue place. And that then Sforza did with eaſe put a companie of foot-men into the Fort; ſending his brother Alexandro, Mellato, and the other braue Captaines, with all the cauallerie to the Biſhops Gate, where certaine Veronois ſtanding by chance, were entreated to goe and open the Gate for their friends, and if they could not doe it by faire means

Sforza puts ſupplies into the Fort of Feliciana

to

to breake it open by force. So ſoone as the enemies knew that it was taken, and that Sforza's Souldiers were in the Citie, they forthwith fled ouer the Riuer; and the amazement of the horſe-men neere to the new bridge was ſo great, as the woodden bridge which ſtands betwixt that of ſtone, and the Tower, being broken with the great weight of Runawaies, fiue Knights, or nine according to ſome Authors, fell into the water; and by the weight of their armour together with their horſes, were all drowned; only one man by the goodneſſe of his horſe eſcaped to the ſhoare.

The enemies feare in the Citie.

The enemies flie from Verona.

Sforza vnderſtanding that his Souldiers were in the Citie, and that the enemie fled, cauſed his foot-men to march forth of the Caſtle. They did for a time fight vpon the bridges: But fire-workes being throwne vpon that of wood, and by the helpe of the inhabitants, Sforza's troupes made themſelues way into the middeſt of the Citie. Thus writes Blondus: But Paſius ſaith, That the troupes came from the Caſtles in two bands and marched againſt the enemies, ſo as beyond Saint Zenes Church which ſtands at the Hills foot, the Cauallerie went on the left hand, and the bodie of the Infantrie, was ſent from beyond the Fort of Feliciana, and that of Saint Peter, which is ſomewhat lower directly to the Citie, and that about ſunne-ſet there was a cruell fight with the enemie on both ſides the new bridge: after which, the enemie fled; and that in feare running by heapes ouer the bridge, it brake vnder them. The ſame Author affirmes that Giouanni Gonzaga was ſore wounded in that fight, whereof within a while after he died; and yet for all that Blondus ſaith, That he was ſlaine before the Fort of Feliciana with an harquebuze-ſhot before Sforza's arriuall. But both of them agree, that the woodden bridge was burnt by night, and that the ſame being broken, Picinino and Gonzaga, who had ſtood all night in battaile before the Palace, hauing notice of the violent incurſions of Sforza's forces into the Citie, did ſpeedily retire into the Citadell. Some others ſay, That it was in the euening. But, whether they quitted the place then or about midnight, all of them agree together, that before day they ſpeedily left Verona, and went to Vigazio. The enemies flight being diuulged, Troillo and Ciarpelion being commanded to follow them, gaue in vpon the taile of the Runawaies, and ſlew many of them. A great multitude of Mantuan peaſants were taken in the Citie; ſome of whom, in hatred to Gonzaga, were murthered by thoſe whom they had rob'd. Al the townſmen that had kept themſelues ſhut vp in their houſes for feare of either partie, expecting the doubtfull iſſue of the bickering, perceiuing the chance of the dice to be ſodainely turned, the enemie in feare & amaze, did from their windowes raile vpon them, & furniſhed the Venetians that night with victualls, light and counſell; and ſo ſoone as it was day they came into the Market-place to congratulat Sforza & Marcello for their victorie, and with teares in their eies called them Fathers of their Countrie, recommending to them all their publike and particular means, and entreated them to beleiue, that the enemie had not taken the Citie through the Citizens fault, who were altogether innocent thereof; ſaying that at the firſt newes that the Citie was taken, they ranne with their Armes to haue repulſed the enemie; but that they were enforced to giue place for feare of greater loſſe, ſeeing the magiſtrates did the like: And that now ſo ſoone as they ſaw the Venetians enſignes, they had not only giuen them entrance, but many of them had preſently taken Armes and ioined with them to expell the enemies, and had ſtill aided the Venetians neere to the bridges.

The Veronois proteſtations to cleere themſelues.

The apparent loyaltie of the Veronois was much eſteemed, and after many embraces and ſalt teares ſhed they were willed to take courage, and that none ſhould ſuſtaine either generall or particular loſſe, but ſuch as were guilty: For if they could finde any one (which they did not thinke to doe) that had beene Authour of that treacherie, he ſhould be puniſhed according to his deſerts. Then, Sforza, Marcello, and the reſt did comfort the ſorrowfull inhabitants, and did put them in hope of better fortune. It is reported that Ciarpelion had almoſt ſpoiled Magnis by force dragging him, like a Traitour, before Sforza: And that he did ſo conſtantly iuſtifie his his owne cauſe with that of the Citizens, as he did not only cleere himſelfe from all obiections, but gaue them to vnderſtand, that the Citie had beene taken neither by his fault nor by any of the Citizens : whereupon by the conſent of all men he was declared guiltleſſe, and as one that had well merited of the Venetian State, was greatly commended.

Magnis brought before Sforza, is cheered.

Sforza from the vale Cluſiana had aduertized the Senate of the diſaſter of Verona, and how that he was going thither with an intent to reduce it quickly vnder their obedience, or elſe to hazard the liues of himſelfe, his brethren, and the reſidue of the Armie. He wiſhed them therefore to be patient for a while, and in the meane time to pray vnto God for the happy ſucceſſe of that iourney, for they ſhould ſhortly heare either the one or other. The Senate after theſe newes were continually in the Pallace, and the Nobilitie, ſad and diſconſolate, walked vp and downe the Market-place, floating betwixt hope and feare, when on a ſodaine by letters vpon letters both of publike and particular perſons, they had notice of the recouerie thereof, and the enemies ſhamefull flight the fourth day after it was loſt. The Cities ioy was then ſo great, as the Senate being ouerioyed could not refraine from teares, and great multitudes of people from all parts of the Towne ranne to the Pallace : the Senatours and common people reioycing together: Generall proceſſions were made for three dayes together : with prayers and thankſgiuings vnto God in all Churches. The poſts were recompenced according to their ſpeede, ſome more than others.

The great ioy in Venice vpon the recouerie of Verona.

The Commiſſioners of thoſe of Verona who came thither within a while after, had audience. Theſe men with teares in their eyes did relate the wretched eſtate of their Citie, proteſting their own innocence, and that the cauſe of their comming was to aſſure them of their loyaltie in generall. The Senate did curteouſly entertaine them, and congratulate the preſent victorie; aſſuring them that their fidelitie had beene a long time knowne to the Prince and Senate, in regard whereof they had euer beene deſirous of the conſeruation of that loyall Citie, and that they did therefore greatly reioyce, that the matter was ended without any further loſſe or danger to them. Sforza's valour was highly commended, with Mellato's proweſſe, and Marcello's ſpeed, for that they had opportunely recouered that which was almoſt loſt, and vanquiſhed the enemie ſo ſoone as they ſaw him: Wherefore they thought it not onely well beſeeming, but did allow of it, that the Magiſtrates of their Citie ſhould preſent Sforza with ten thouſand crownes for hauing ſo brauely borne himſelfe in that action; and Mellato with two thouſand.

The commiſſioners of Verona, come to Venice.

The Senates anſwere to the Commiſſioners.

The Commiſſioners, being diſmiſſed and rewarded, returned to Verona. Sforza in the meane time (becauſe winter was wel forward) reſolued to tarrie at Verona. But his care for Breſſia did greatly afflict him and the reſt : which cauſed him to leaue his winterning-place before the firſt of Ianuarie, and returne to the ſiege of Aranes and Thienna. The Campe abode certaine daies in the plaine of Arques; where many were reported to periſh with extreme cold. Mellato by the ſharpnes of the weather loſt all feeling, and was ſo benummed, as he lay like a dead man, who was preſently by the Riuer Adice carried to Verona. Sforza being then enforced by the vehement cold, and by the enemies reſiſtance, to returne to his wintering place, did ſend by Ciarpelion and Troylle, accompanied with three hundred men, certaine victuals to Breſſia by the way of the mountaines.

It was reported, that the Breſſians were reduced to ſuch extremitie and want, as they ſuſtained themſelues with filthie and vnholeſome diet. And moreouer, That at ſuch time as the enemies took Verona, accounting all for loſt and deſperate, they were at the point to haue yeelded: which they had done, had not Barbaro opportunly come to the aſſembly, & with great importunity brokē that which they had determined. Beſides, it is moſt certaine that Picinino and Gonzaga, had by Philips commandement ſent new forces, who with great heed were to keep the Breſſians more cloſely mewed vp, & carefully to prouide that no victuals might from any place be brought vnto them.

The great extremitie of the Breſſians.

Now

Now Sforzas troupes being come to Franzacorte, or (as others ſay) to Guzac, they fell to blowes with Philips forces, who being daunted with Sforza's arriuall; before day fled, and loſt three hundred Horſe. But the better to diſburden the Citie (freed now from the ſiege, and in ſome ſort from famine) of ſo great a multitude, thoſe which had brought the victualls, returned by the ſame Mountaines and went to Winter with Sforza. The Nauall Armie in the meane time went forward at Torbolles, where they had ſlowly wrought, becauſe that after the taking of Verona, the Carpenters and other workmen being ſcattered here and there for feare, the worke had for a time beene diſcontinued. Likewiſe Mellato, who had the charge of the Hauen, and the workmen, by extremitie of cold which he had taken, died the ſame winter: but it happened not in the Armie, as I finde in ſome Authors. The remainder of the Winter was more free from troubles, by reaſon of the extreme cold weather.

Preſſia is releeued with victualls.

It was reported that Gionanni Cornetano, of the Familie of Vitelli, who commanded the Popes troupes, and who for the ſecret practizes he then made was much ſuſpected of the Pope, had about the beginning of the ſpring-time made a ſecret league with Philip and Picinino: who had concluded together, That at one time Cornetano with his troupes ſhould inuade La Marca, and Picinino ſhould croſſe the Po, and come into Tuſcanie; the one wholly to ruine the Florentines ſtate, and the other to ouerthrow Sforza's Principalitie. The report hereof was hardly beleeued; when Picinino vpon the eighth day of Februarie, was then alreadie come forth of Garriſon, and with his troupes had croſſed the Po. Sforza being troubled with theſe newes, went himſelfe to Venice to conferre with the Prince and Senate about the ſtate of that Warre. He was afraide leaſt Cornetano would ſpeedily inuade La Marca, which was wholly vnfurniſhed of aide and Garriſons. The Venetians at his entreatie ſent to the Pope, who dealt ſo with him; That whatſoeuer had beene granted vnto Sforza as Prince of La Marca, ſhould in peaceable and ſafe manner remaine vntouched. They did likewiſe entreate the Florentines ſpeedily to arme, and not only to driue the common enemie from their confines, but to ſtop him if it were poſſible from making incurſions vpon Sforza's ſtate. Picinino in the meane time made diuers and ſundrie attempts on Flaminia which were valiantly withſtood by Sigiſmund Prince of Arimini, and Malateſte his brother (who being taken at Thyenna, was exchanged for Carolo Gonzaga) who receiuing a thouſand Venetian footmen, and as many from the Florentines, together with Sforza's Cauallerie made haſt to the aide of La Marca.

A league betwixt Philip and Cornetano the Popes Generall.

Picinino maketh warre in Flaminia.

The enemie hauing left Guido Fauentino to continue the ſiege of Magellana, came to paſſe the Appenine hills. In the meane time the two bretheren Malateſtes went to the enemies ſide. Picinino tooke certain Townes in the Appenine Mounts, which he forthwith pillaged. Philip ſuppoſed by meanes of that voiage, that Sforza would altogether quit Lombardie and runne to the reſcue of his owne State, and to that of his Neighbours; Now whileſt he ſoothed himſelfe with this hope, ſodaine newes was brought him, That by the Popes commandement Giouanni Cornetano was impriſoned by Antonio Ride of Padua, Captaine of the Caſtle of S. Angelo. Theſe newes made him thinke that Picinino in deſpaire would returne into Lombardie. But this could not reſtraine him: For ſending for the Malateſtes, Guido, and Aſtorre Fauentini, hee came more furiouſly than before from the top of the Appenines into Tuſcanie, hauing (not without great labour) cauſed the Snow to bee taken forth of the waies through which hee paſſed. The Florentines during theſe troubles were not idle: For they leuied forces from all parts. Pope Eugenius, who was an Aſſociate in that warre, commanded Biſhop Lodouico, That as Legate Apoſtolicall, he ſhould conduct all thoſe troupes which had beene Cornetan's, into Tuſcanie.

The Malateſtes take the enemies partie.

Giouanni Cornetano is committed to priſon in S. Angelos caſtle.

The Florentines gaue entertainement to Paulo Vrſino, and Michaeli Attendulo with a great Cauallerie, and many foote companies: they did likewiſe procure to haue Troyllo (whom Sforza, with a companie of men at armes, had ſent to La Marca) to be

be ſent to ioyne with them, that with all theſe forces together, they might be able not only to withſtand the enemie, but brauely to aſſaile him.

During the Florentines preparations, Picinino although he had beene brauely repulſed and with great loſſe from Primolcoria by Nicholao Piſani, who then was at Florence, and had beene ſent with a band of yong Souldiers to guard the ſtreights of the mountaines, yet he hauing ſoon after ouercome the difficultie of the mounts went and encamped at Politiana. The newes that he had paſſed the Appenines did greatly terrifie the Florentines, and moſt of all in regard of his great ſpeede, ſo as at firſt they knew not what to reſolue on. Watch by night was placed ouer the Citie, with ſtrong guard at the Gates; But the arriuall of Borſia and Troyllo, reuiued the appalled Spirits of the fearefull Citizens.

Picinino paſſeth the Appenines & encompeth before Politiana.

The feare of the Florentines.

The enemie lying incamped before Politiana, greatly afflicted theſe two renowned Common-weales, and draue Sforza for a time into many doubts; which was the cauſe that at the Spring-time he came not into the field ſo ſoone as men did expect him. The Florentines likewiſe on the one ſide were very importunate with him, to haue him come to them. And the Venetians on the other ſide did detaine him and earneſtly intreated him to tarrie ſtill; fearing if he ſhould change his former courſe of warre, that he would afterwards be enforced to begin againe (as it were) and to recouer a new victorie forth of the enemies hands, which he had already in a manner with ſo great trauaile taken from them; with all alleaging, That the Florentines ſtate might be eaſily defended and kept by the Popes forces, and thoſe of the other Confederates; but that the Venetians affaires (being expoſed as it were in an open Theater in the middeſt of Lombardie) could not by any meanes ſucceed well without him.

With theſe ſundrie cogitations was Sforza greatly perplexed; whileſt all men beganne to condemne his long ſtaying. But in the meane time Picinino, after the taking of Politiana, marched againſt the Caſentines, ruinating all places that hee met with in his paſſage. This miſchiefe alſo was accompanied with an other, almoſt as great as it. For Borſia d'Æſte (on whoſe arriuall in regard of the great Cauallerie he brought with him, as on the ſole refuge of the warre, the Florentines had grounded their hope) did on a ſodaine take Philips partie. All which accidents notwithſtanding Picinino's affaires in Tuſcanie became euer after leſſe fortunate and ſucceſſefull: For being come to the Pace of Arezzo, as if he had meant to make incurſions on the Sienois, or on the Territories of the Church, he dwelt ſo long vpon his reſolutions, as he did wholly foreſlow the courſe of his happie fortune. For in the meane time the Popes forces entred the Towne, and ſhortly after Vrſino, Troyllo, and the reſt came thither likewiſe with the whole bodie of the Armie: whereupon hauing intelligence of the leuie of ſo great Forces, with all ſpeede hee retired to the foote of the Mountaines.

Politiana is taken by Picinino.

Picinino his good fortune beginneth to decline.

The end of the fourth Booke of the third Decad.

THE FIFTH BOOKE OF THE THIRD DECAD

OF THE HISTORIE Of Venice.

The Contents of the fifth Booke of the third Decad.

SFORZA determineth on the passage of the Riuer Mincia. CONTARENI Generall of the Venetians Nauall Armie, defeateth the enemie vpon the Lake of Benac, and retoureth the Townes neare to the Lake. The Venetian Armie hauing crossed the Mincia, recouereth all the Townes on the Bressan Territorie. SFORZA vanquisheth the enemie in battaile, betwixt Soncina and the new Orges, and bringing his forces to the bankes of the Riuer Adda, putteth those of the Countrie of Gyradade in great feare. LEON, SFORZA'S brother, is slaine with an Harquebuze-shot before Caruazza. PICININO in a set battaile is vanquished at Anglare in Tuscanie. Winter approching SFORZA commeth to Venice. Great Triumphs are made at Venice in fauour of GIACOMO FOSCARI the Princes Sonne, which continue three daies. PICININO returning from Lombardie in the middest of Winter takes diuers Townes on the Bressan Territorie. The Venetians Armie and that of PHILIP commeth at one time to Martinenga. Peace is made with PHILIP according to SFORZAS will and pleasure. Hee marrieth BIANCA, PHILIPS Daughter, in Cremona, and after the publishing of the Peace he commeth with his Wife to Venice, where he is most magnificently entertained.

THe Spring-time was farre spent, and Sommer was at hand, when Sforza hauing intelligence of the successe of the affaires of Tuscanie (for he was out of feare of any danger towards his owne state, or that of his Associates) with a mightie Armie marched against the enemie. It is reported, that the Souldiers neuer before had so large pay as at that time, whereby they were all exceedingly well furnished with Armour, Horses, and all other furniture for the Warres. And for the speedie relief of Brescia with men and victuals, hee resolued to passe through the middest of the enemies; for he was greatly encouraged by that which Contareni had lately done vpon the Lake of La Garda.

Sforza with a mightie Armie marcheth against the enemie.

This man (as hath beene said) being declared Generall of the Nauall Armie, which the Senate had with wonderfull speed made ready at Torbolles, had already lanched lanched certaine Gallies into the lake, together with other veſſells: but the number of Gallies is not agreed vpon by out Authors. Paſius of Arimini mentioneth but foure; Lagiſiano of Verona, ſixe; and Montanus halfe as manie, nor can we certainly finde in what part of the Lake they fought. Some ſay, That the enemies departed from Riua, and that they fought neare to Torbolles. Others, That it was betwixt the mouth of the Riuer Ponalis and Riua: And others againe, That Philips Armie departing from Peſcara, and being toſſed with the waues and a contrarie winde, met with the Venetian Armie in the middeſt of the Lake: But they agree generally, That the enemie at the ſame time, had many more veſſells than the Venetians, which were commaunded by Blaſio Aſſereta a Genoueſe, a man verie skilful in marine matters, who was accompanied with many other Genoueſes that were inured to ſea-fights. Italus of Friull had manned their veſſells with ſouldiers. Pietro Brunorio was with Contareni, with whom were certaine bands of choice footmen.

Now whileſt Italus remained at Riua, hee brought his army many times arranged in battell before Torbolles, to fight with the Venetians, if he had found them ſo diſpoſed. But Contareni did by all meanes ſhunne the fight, diſtruſting the ſmall number of his veſſells: Howbeit growing afterwards more bold (as Paſius ſaith) in regard of foure new-come Gallies and diuerſe other ſmall veſſells of ſundrie ſortes which were well armed, and perceiuing moreouer that the enemies had the winde againſt them, he ſent a Gallie to charge two veſſells loaden with victualls and armor which were going to Riua. Now the enemies perceiuing from their hauen, that the ſame Gallie made way againſt theirs, they forthwith, to reſcue them, made towards the Venetians: Likewiſe Contareni being loth to leaue his Gallie as a prey to the enemie, ſpeedily came forth of his Hauen, and with full ſailes viered towardes him: All which his haſte notwithſtanding Italus had well neere taken his Gallie. Some there are that ſay, that the enemie did take it, before it could be reſcued: but withall, that at the ariuall of the Venetian with the reſidue of his gallies and twelue other veſſells, there beganne foorthwith a cruell fight betwixt them, which for a long time was very doubtfull; and likewiſe that they fought hand to hand, in regard of the yron hookes and chaines that grapled them together.

A battell vpon the lake betwixt the Venetians and Philips forces.

This was a bloudy battell to the beholders: great numbers of ſlaine bodies on euerie ſide dropping into the water. But that which made it more hideous and frightfull were the ceaſleſſe and terrible reports of the cannon, together with the lamentable cries that were heard: all which (as it were at once) reuerberating the concauities of the neighbour-mountaines, gaue a double Eccho of thoſe crackes of thunder. The aire, earth, and waters being troubled by the winde, and forcible motion of the veſſells, did all together make a terrible noiſe. Many and different were the dangers of death; of all which one only is moſt remarkable: There was a rope tied athwart two Gallies, vpon which fifty men had taken hold that were fallen into the water by ſundry accidents, thereby to ſuſtaine themſelues from drowning, eſteeming that (vnder God) the onely meanes of their ſafetie; but it ſo fell out that one of the ends being cut aſunder, they did all in one inſtant miſerably periſh. After a long fight, the Venetians had gotten the vpper hand of the enemies, by the valor and proweſſe of Contareni and the reſt, when Italus perceiuing fortune to frowne, entred into a little boate, and betooke himſelfe to flight: Aſſereta and his fellowes being amazed at their Generalls abſence, ſought meanes likewiſe of eſcape. Then the Venetian on euery ſide did ſtraitly preſſe and enuiron them, and followed the victorie, till ſuch time as hee had made himſelfe maſter of all the enemies veſſels, two only excepted which eſcaped. Contareni with great ioy drew them to Torbolles, where with great difficultie his helmet was taken from his head, in regard it was extreamely battered with violent ſtrokes in that fight receiued.

The venetians are victorious vpon the lake.

The valour of Contareni.

The newes of the victorie being brought to Breſſia did greatly comfort the afflicted Citie, and gaue euery one hope of better fortune. For it was likely, that the

Lake

Lake lying free and open to the Venetians, nothing could hinder them from receiuing aide and victualls in aboundance. Therefore they reſolued to ſend Ambaſſadours to Venice, to congratulate the Senate for that victorie. Pietro Auogadre was the chiefe Commiſſioner who carried thither a golden enſigne, wherein was written, Brixia magnipotens, Cæteris vrbibus fidei præbuit exemplum. Breſsia the magnificent hath giuen an example of loyaltie to other Cities, the which in the Common-wealths name, as a preſage of the future victorie was hung vp in Saint Marks church, where it is ſtill at this day to be ſeene.

This victorie did greatly reioyce the Breſſans. The Breſſens ſend Ambaſſadours to Venice.

Contareni and Brunorio in the meane time ſtood not breathing in ſo faire a way, but departing on a ſodaine from Torbolles, they went and beſieged Riua both by land and water, which though it was valiantly for a while defended, yet at laſt they forced it, and being taken, it was ſacked as an enemie. They dealt roughly with the Inhabitants, becauſe that they, more than the enemies, had abhorred the Venetian name; young children were violently dragged foorth of their parents armes, virgins were defloured, and wiues with their husbands were grieuouſly tormented. The Venetian preſently after this recouered La Garda, which as ſome ſay was ruined; and as others, that it had no hurt. Next, for the recouerie of La Garda they tooke Bardolin, Lanſiza, and diuers other townes vpon the Lake; whereof thoſe which they tooke by force, were giuen in ſpoile to their ſouldiers; thoſe that voluntarily yielded, they did freely pardon.

Riua is taken by the Venetians.

Great cruelty.

La Garda, Bardolin and Lanſiza are taken.

During this fortunate ſucceſſe of Contareni vpon the Lake, Sforza had brought his Campe neare to Manerba, where hauing intelligence (as Paſius ſaith) that Borſia d'Æſte was gone to the enemies ſide; that many thouſands were on the Breſſan territorie; and that Gonzaga their capitall enemie was with great forces come to Marmirolla to aſſaile them in front and in flanke, he remained for a time doubtfull whether he ſhould paſſe the Riuer Mincia, or not. For, hauing paſsed it, he was to open his way to Breſſia by dint of ſword; but his greateſt care was, from whence to haue victualls to ſupplie his Armie; for there were twentie thouſand men in his Campe: wherein, becauſe he would doe nothing without counſell, he was deſirous to conferre with the Prouidator and the other Captaines. Being in conſultation about this expedition, it is reported, That he did oftentimes aduiſe them heedfully to conſider the greatnes of their enterprize, and how, the Riuer being once croſſed, they were to march to Breſſia through the middeſt of many thouſand enemies, and that then if anie thing ſhould fall out vnluckily, it would be too late to talke of had-I-wiſt.

Sforza's aduiſe to the Prouidator and Captains of the Armie.

Paſcali Maripietro was at the ſame time Prouidator in the Armie, who anſwered, It becommeth not me, O Sforza, nor anie here, who vnder thy commaund doe follow the Venetian enſignes to preſcribe a Law vnto thee concerning martiall affaires: but it belongs vnto thee who art our Generall; and by long experience art moſt expert in martiall diſcipline, to aduiſe that which is neceſſarie to be done, and afterwards to command it. For it is our dueties which fight vnder thy conduct to follow thy counſell and commaundement. At this ſpeech hee made no ſhew of any ſodaine reſolution; but Pietro Auogadre being come to the Armie did incite him by a vehement Oration. The ſumme whereof was, That acquainting him with the ſtate of the affaires of Breſsia, he told him, that vnleſſe it were ſpeedily relieued with victualls, men, and armour, it would come to paſſe (which hee ſhould be verie ſorie for) that that moſt loyall Citie, through want of timely ſuccour, would be forced in deſpaire to yeelde to the enemie: and therefore he earneſtly intreated him hauing obtained ſo faire a way, not to abandon ſo well-deſeruing a Citie, ſurpaſsing all others in conſtant affection and loyaltie to the Venetian Republike, ſaying, That hee needed not feare the want of victualls, ſeeing that corne was alreadie ripe on the ground; which being reaped, he for his owne part promiſed to furniſh out of his owne lands, a ſufficient quantity to feede the Armie for ten daies.

The Prouidators anſwer to Sforza.

The effect of Auogadres ſpeech to Sforza.

Sforza being moued by theſe ſpeeches cauſed the bridge to bee inſtantly made, whereupon the Armie croſſed the Mincia neere to Monzabane, which towne being

ing

Monzabane is taken.

Riuoltella yeeldeth.

Sales taken.

ing being assailed, was forthwith taken and sackt by the souldiers. From thence he went to Riuoltella, where the inhabitants perceiuing themselues to be streightly besieged by land and water, did presently yeeld. Contareni drew neere to Sales, and Sforza being come to the riuer Celsia, encamped within tenne miles of Bressia. Thither did Barbaro and the chiefe of the Citie come to salute him. From thence Brunorio, and Scariot Fauentino, being sent with two bands of men at Armes to assault the towne of Sales, by helpe of Contaren's nauall Armie, they tooke it by force; where the Venetian dealt cruelly with the townsmen. Those of Caluisa, Gauarda, Calcina and Bagnols, did by their deputies yeeld themselues to Sforza whilest he remained at the riuer Celsia.

The Generals sodaine resolution.

In this fortunate progression the Generall changed his determination, and in steed of going to Bressia, he resolued to march against the enemie. Barbaro (whom Sforza highly esteemed) exhorted him thereunto, telling him that it was much better to pursue the victorie almost wonne, than to goe to Bressia, which was by newes of his arriuall alreadie sufficiently assured. Being come to Bagnols, to make incursions on the enemies (who were said to be encamped at Manerbia) those of Otholenga and diuers other townes sent their Commissioners to him, suing for peace, and giuing him to vnderstand that the enemies being terrified at the report of his approach were retired from thence. The next day a thousand of the gallantest yong men of Bressia came to the Campe to salute the Generall, vnto whom, (for their ancient hatred to Philip) they offered freely to follow him, and to beare Armes at their owne cost. Sforza did courteously entertaine them, and willed them to follow the ensignes.

Vpon the report that was bruted that Lodouico Sanseuerino, Ittalus of Friull, and Vermio, Philips Captaines, had fortified themselues betwixt Soncinna and the new Orgies, the Generall departing by night, went speedily against them, and hauing fiercely assailed them being fortified with trenches, and two bridges vpon the riuer Oglio, sent part of his cauallerie in front, & his infantery in Flanke, to prouoke them with Arrow-shot and warlike engines. Then hauing vnder colour of flight, drawne them on the other side of the riuer, he returned couragiously to charge thē. He rode vp and downe among his troupes, commending those who did valiantly, and sharply rebuking those that were backward. The enemies likewise did their best for a long time to make good the place. But Ciarpelion comming with a band of old souldiers ouer the wodden bridge which lieth on the Oglio, & hauing filled the trenches and broken downe the Rampiers, the victorie eftsoones inclined to the Venetians, the which being perceiued by the enemies, who were able to make no longer resistance, in great disorder they betooke themselues to flight. Pasias saith that a thousand of them were either slaine or wounded, and two thousand horse, and as many foot taken. Others lessen halfe the number. The chiefe of the Armie with those which escaped from the fight, fled to Crema. Some Authors affirme, That the victorious Venetian being mingled with the runnawaies, entred pel-mell with them into Soncina, and that the Citie was in that sort taken, with great numbers of the enemies. Others againe maintaine that the inhabitants did voluntarily yeeld after the battaile. Borsia d' Æste lay at the burrough of Ienepalt with fifteene hundred horse, which is two miles from the place where the battaile was fought, determining in the shutting in of the euening to ioyne with Philips Armie. Sforza's souldiers pursuing the enemie, gaue in on a sodaine, and vnloked-for vpon him, who supposing that the whole Armie was there, fled, hauing lost his baggage and the third part of his cauallerie. It is reported by some others, that he came to the latter end of the battaile, and that he fought there together with his cauallerie, but that the victorie inclining to the Venetians, and not being able to remedie it, he fled with the rest.

Sforza vanquisheth the enemies.

Soncina taken.

Borsio de Aste is put to rout.

Philips affaires by these defeats being reduced to extremitie, those of the new Orgies returned vnder the Venetians obedience: And not that they alone, but all the the Townes, Castles, Forts, and Villages of the Bressan and Bergamese territories; together with the inhabitants of the Camonicke valley. The price of victuals did afterwards greatly fall at Bressia. Corne and all other fruites were sold for a lower rate by the tenth part than before they were. Bergamo likewise had a share in this good fortune. The Ambassadors of these two Cities came to Sforza's campe, first to congratulate him for his victorie, then to giue him thanks for that by his valour, and that victorie, they had beene freed from so long and tedious a siege, which had continued almost three yeares, at such time as they were able to haue made no more resistance. Therefore they acknowledged and did promise euer after to confesse, That there was none next to the Venetians, vnto whom they were so much bound as to himselfe; that they did through him alone enioy their safetie and wealth, and generally all whatsoeuer they possessed, and life it selfe, which to men is more pretious than all things else. These speeches were followed with some presents, befitting the time and their pouertie, who with teares in their eies entreated him to respect the Bressans loue, more than their presents, saying that they certainly knew how that a generous Captaine craueth nothing of his followers aboue their means but onely loue and obseruance.

Ambassadors come to Sforza from Bressia and Bergamo.

Now Sforza after his victorie hauing crossed the Oglio (for corne was ripe, and therefore there was no feare of any want of victuals in the Armie) hee recouered Casal-Maior, and diuers other townes in that countrey: Carauazza except which he besieged. But because there was a strong Garrison in it, and that he likewise knew that, in regard of the riuer Adda which runneth vnder the walles, they might both by day and night bring all manner of victuals thither, he raised his campe, and went first to recouer Bregnam, then Triuill and Reinolca, townes in the Gyradade. In regard of these approaches those of the Dutchie of Milane were greatly affrighted: The poore countreymen bringing their cattell and goods into the good townes.

Sforza recouereth Casal Maior.

Bregnan, Triuil, and Rinolca in the countrey of Gyradade are recouered by Sforza.

Philip hauing from all parts assembed forces, builded certaine Forts vpon the riuer Adda, placing strong Garrisons in them. After the battaile of Oglio, hee did continually send messengers to Picinino to call him from Tuscanie where hee remained.

The Venetians not being ignorant how many places of importance, which were still possessed by the enemie he left behinde him, and receiuing certaine intelligence that Philip had called home Picinino into Lombardie, fearing an alteration of fortune, that if by chance he should be enforced to retire, he should not easily do it vpon an vrgent necessitie: Notwithstanding that oftentimes he made shew as if he were desirous to crosse the riuer Adda, neuertheless he abstained. Afterwards returning to besiege Carauazza, Leon his brother being shot into the bodie with an Harquebaze died within a while after, whereat being enflamed with choller, with greater courage than before he oppugned the besieged, vsing all meanaces and other fearefull meanes to make them yeeld; which soone after had happened. Some say, That Leon, Sforza's brother, died of his hurts after Carauazza was taken.

Sforza taketh Carauazza.

Picinino in the meane time hauing notice of the ouerthrow of Oglio, and being pressed by Philips importunate letters to returne with speed into Lombardie, supposing that after his departure from Tuscanie, his associates together with the townes which had yeelded to him, would be afterwards defeated, and taken by the enemie, resolued to giue a battaile, to the end that, if he wanne it, the forces of the Florentines and the Pope being broken, his associates with the rest might more easily be wonne to persist in their affection.

Picinins proiect.

Now all hope of taking Perugia being lost, the which he had promised to himselfe to get by means of some within it, and hauing besieged Tiphernu in vaine, he passed on to the burrough of S. Sepulcher, and from thence marched in battaile to Anglare where Bishop Lodouico Paulo Vrsino, and others were encamped. This towne standeth at the foote of the Appenine hilles in a verie high place, and beneath it is a bot-tome. In this place, because the ascent is not steepie, the Florentines troupes with those of the Pope were encamped, although some of them lay in the bottome as farre as the riuer, ouer which is a little bridge.

At Picinino's arriuall the first encounter was neere to the bridge. It is reported that some had assured him that he should that day defeate the enemie, as being vnprouided and not expecting his comming, especially vpon that day which was the nine and twentith of Iune, a day religiously obserued, in regard of the Feast of the holy Apostles. Thus being confident and full of hope, he left the burrough, hauing brought with him some thousand of the townesmen to make them spectators of his assured victorie. But finding the enemie at his comming readie ranged in battaile, he was inforced to change his manner of fight, and to order his Armie after an other fashion. Neere to the bridge (as hath beene said) and the riuer side was the first encounter, where Picinino's sonne giuing a furious charge, the Tuscane was beaten backe, and the bridge wonne, but at the foote of the rising hee made a stand. Nicholao Pisani a braue Captaine was surprized neere to the riuer, and Attendulo fighting valiantly was almost taken by the enemies. Now in that little space of the bottome which lieth betwixt the riuer and the mountaine, they fought without any aduantage; Picinino did all he could to beat the enemies from their place, but all his attemptes were vaine. Whereupon, perceiuing that the enemies Armie stood fast, hee commaunded Asturo Fauentino, and the other valiant Captaines, to march with the Cauallerie in a close Battallion against the enemie. The Popes troupes comming fiercely from aboue vpon these men, did assaile them with such valour, as in great disorder they draue them as farre as the riuer. Asturo and many more of note being taken in that place, the enemies on a sodaine in verie great feare did repasse the bridge, and dislodged.

The battaile of Anglare betwixt Picinino and the league.

The defence & flight of the Venetians.

Picinino afterwards supposed, That by reenforcing the troupes, he might easily march thence in battaile, but it fell out otherwise. For being readie to depart, the Florentines horse with those of the Pope did not cease to pursue him, euen as he mounted on horsebacke, and with their whole forces did so charge him, as they gaue him no time to reenforce his Armie, but disordering his troupes: they enforced him to flie, and slew greate numbers of his souldiers. The slaughter was great, but the number of the prisoners exceeded. For, besides Asturo, who was (as hath beene said) taken in the middle of the fight, eight and twentie Captaines, and eighteene hundred horse, with all the Inhabitants of the burrough, were carried away prisoners.

The great number of prisoners.

Picinino thus vanquished, escaped to the burrough, where vnderstanding, whome hee had lost, he cried out aloud; That Philips state was ouerthrowne, vnlesse the enemie sent backe the flower of all Italie which hee had then taken. Lagisiano writes; That with verie griefe he would twice haue slaine himselfe, and had vndoubtedly done it, if his sonne Francisco had not stayed with him day and night to comfort and perswade him.

Picinino dispaireth after the losse of the battaile.

Whilest these things were done in Tuscanie, Sforza, after hee had taken Carauazza, and left Auogadre of Bressia at the siege of the Castle, departed thence, and at that time (as some say) recouered Casall Maior and diuers townes vpon the Cremonese. The Castle of Cauazza being yeelded, hee tooke Azola and Caneda from Gonzaga. They lay a while before the Castle of Macharia, those within it refusing to yeelde till such time as they perceiued part of their walles to be beaten downe with the Cannon. Those of Lona hauing seene Sforzas ensignes, did forthwith put themselues vnder his protection, the like did those of Monteclaro, Cauriana, and Riuoltelles. At the last, the campe drew neere to Pescara.

Sforzas great conquest.

This Citie (as hath beene elsewhere said) is seated at the mouth of the Riuer Mincia. It hath a goodly Castle neare to the Riuer with a bridge, and diuers Turrets. Sforza being encamped before it, Nicholao D'Este came thither vnlookt for.

He,

He, reſoluing to motion a peace, came to the Camp to talke with Sforza and Alripietro the Prouidatour. And after a long diſcourſe of the inconſtancie of fortune (which he ſaid, the Venetians and Sforza were to remember) made a motion of procuring a peace with Philip, and promiſed, if Sforza thought it fit, to bee the Author and Agent thereof. He added beſides, (which hee knew would bee verie pleaſing to Sforza) that he would doe his beſt to cauſe Philip to giue him his daughter Bianca to wife, which till then hee had refuſed, and that hee ſhould ſend her to the Campe (if he pleaſed) with a rich and ſumptuous traine. Sforza made anſwere, that he craued nothing but peace and quiet, and that hee likewiſe knew, that the Venetians did deſire it; prouided that Philip were ſo content; As for Bianca, hee would conferre with her father and kinſfolkes. Æſte departing with this anſwere went to Milan to Philip. Peſcara in the meane time, the fourth day of the ſiege, was taken by force, by the valour of Centareni and his Marriners (for the Nauall Armie came thither at Sforza's arriuall) and was ſackt. Then they planted a great piece of batterie (wherewith the walls of Macharia of a meruailous greatneſſe had beene beaten downe) to ouerthrow the Citadell, which ouerlooked the Citie. Some write that the report of this peece was ſo great and forcible as diuers houſes of the inhabitants fell downe at the only noiſe thereof, and that the ſhips which lay at ankor vpon the lake, aboue fiue hundred paces off, did ſtrike one againſt another as often as the peice was ſhot off.

Nicolao d'Æſte commeth to Sforza's campe to treate of peace.

The Venetians take Peſcara.

Now this Tower being battered with that Engine, was at the tenth ſhot beaten downe to the ground, whereat thoſe of the Citadell being daunted did forthwith yeeld. Sforza croſſed the Mincia, and in a ſhort ſpace made himſelfe maſter of Villa-Franca and Vigaſio, then of Valleſſin and the bridge ouer the Riuer, with diuers other ſmall townes gotten from the Mantuan.

During thoſe exploits along the Mincia, Æſte hauing remained a while with Philip, brought Bianca dowe ne to the Po to Mantua. This cauſed the Venetians to ſuſpect Sforza, for that he was ſo ſoone reconciled to his father-in-law; and they were afraide leaſt the Common-wealth would receiue ſome detriment by that reconciliation. But Sforza being intreated to goe to Marmarioles a village of the Mantuans where Bianca lay there to conferre of peace and Marriage, hee anſwered that hee would not goe without the Senates leaue to an enemies Countrie, the which hee thought they would not ſuffer him to doe. This anſwere cauſed the Venetians no more to doubt of his loyaltie. Hereupon the Ladie was by the Riuer Po brought from Mantua to Ferrara; and Æſte three daies after followed her thither.

Nicolao d'Æſte bringeth the Ladie Bianca to Mantua.

Sforza's anſwere to thoſe that entreated him to go thither where Bianca lay.

Picinino after the ouerthrow receiued at Anglare, departed from the Burrough whither he had retired after the battaile, and went into Flaminia; and being ſafe in the companie of his aſſociates, hee did by great iourneis arriue at Milan. Lodouico, Generall of the Popes Armie, did within a while after goe into that Prouince, where (the Brethren Sigiſmund and Malateſte being called backe to the Popes ſeruice, although Malateſte did afterwards returne to Philips partie) hee recouered in a ſhort ſpace certaine Townes by a voluntarie reddition. The Forlani would haue done the like, had not the garriſon with Picinino left in their citie kept them in awe. Then ioyning with the troupes of Giacomo, Antonio Marcello, who was ſent from Lombardie into Flaminia with fiue companies of men at Armes, hee thought it verie neceſſarie to beſiege Rauenna.

Oſtaſio in regard of his ancient friendſhip with the Venetians, did vpon Marcellos word, receiue the Venetians into the Citie, committing the gouernment thereof to him, whereupon hee with his wife and children re-withdrew himſelfe to Venice: Some ſay that the people yeelded in deſpight of Oſtaſio, which ſeemeth vnto mee to be moſt true, becauſe that I find within a while after that hee was baniſhed into Candie. But whether he or the inhabitants were Authors of that yeelding, it is certaine that Lodouico tooke it in ill part; and in indignation thereof did within a while after giue Bagna and Cauallo, which he had taken by force to Nicholao D'Æſte.

Rauenna vnder the Venetians.

And becauſe the Autumne of that yeare had beene very vnſeaſonable by reaſon of the continuall raine, they were enforced by the bad diſpoſition of the aire to ſend the troupes to Garriſon ſooner than they vſed to do. Thereupon the Popes forces left Flaminia, went into Tuſcanie, and from thence to Rome.

Sforza likewiſe, Winter drawing on, hauing recouered all ſauing Legnaga, which for a time he beſieged in vaine in regard of the ſtrong Garriſon within it (although it is moſt certaine that it was more defended by the continuall raine and tempeſts than by Armes) ſent his Armie to winter, all ſauing one band of men at Armes which hee led with him to Verona for his Guard. Hee diſtributed the reſidue of the Armie along the riuer Adda as far as the Treuiſans Territorie in townes and villages. This being done he came to Venice with a ſmall traine to ſalute the Prince and Senate.

The great entertainement giuen to Sforza at Venice.

Neuer was any Generall of an Armie entertained with greater ioy both of the people and Senate, than Sforza was. For they did not only commend him but had him in great admiration, they gazed attentiuely vpon him in regard of his great valour, and thought that they ſaw ſomewhat in him that was venerable and more than humane. All the States of the Citie went to meet him and brought him to the Pallace where he was magnificently entertained. Franciſco Barbaro, who by the Senates appointment after Sforza's arriuall was come to Venice with Pietro Auogadre and an hundred Breſſan Gentlemen, was likewiſe highly prayſed and eſteemed. All men did no leſſe admire him than the other, for that hee had preſerued Breſſia, and was of all men greatly honoured. The Breſſans likewiſe were entertained and embraced by the Prince and Senate with teares in their eyes, being ouer-ioyed: and their loyaltie was infinitely commended; all men were of opinion that it ought to bee commended to poſteritie by ſome acknowledgement; whereupon they were declared worthie of all franchiſe and exemption. And to the end that the common people might likewiſe taſte of his grace and bountie, the yearely tribute of the Mills amounting to twentie thouſand Duccats was for euer quitted to the people.

Franciſco Barbaro highly eſteemed in Venice.

The Breſſans are recompenced for their loyaltie.

Pietro Lodron ſonne to Paris, for that he and his Father had deſerued well of the Common-wealth, had great guifts giuen him, with three houſes; the one in Padua, the other in Vincenza, and the third in Verona. Beſides, diuers gallant and vnuſuall ſhewes were to bee ſeene in the Citie, all of them in honor of Giacomo Foſcari the Princes ſonne, who at that time was married in great magnificence. But of all the ſhewes, one eſpecially, being very rare and delightfull, hath deſerued aboue the reſt to be commended to poſteritie: which was, That from Saint Samuels Church vnto Saint Barnabies ſhoare, a bridge was made for that time ouer the water, for the pompous traine of Knights to paſſe ouer to goe to the Palace of Leon Contareni Father to the Bride: who comming forth of her Fathers houſe entred into the Bucentaure which was richly tapeſſed, wherein ſhe was accompanied with all the Ladies and Gentlewomen of the Citie ſumptuouſly apparrailed. Afterwards fights at barriers, and other kindes of ſports continued ſundrie daies and were acted by ſundrie perſons in honour of the Prince.

Great triumphs at Venice at the wedding of the Princes ſonne.

In theſe ſhews was the Citie buſied, whilſt Picinino (who as hath been ſaid though neither victorious nor vanquiſhed, could not liue at quiet) hauing renued his Armie in Lombardie, came in the mideſt of winter, when no man thought he would haue come into the field, and made a fierce march vpon the Breſſan Territorie, filling the whole Countrie with feare, ſo as before Sforza's departure from Venice, he enforced all the champaigne Countrie of Breſſia, and whatſoeuer the Venetians held vpon the riuer Adda, and on the Bergameſe confines (the new Orges excepted) to yeeld; and likewiſe defeated twelue hundred Venetian horſe at Monteclaro. Sforza's troups being ſpeedily drawn from their Garriſons retired into the ſtrongeſt Towns. This loſſe was accompanied with the reuolt of Ciarpelion, who with three hundred horſe went to Picinino's ſide: The Duke of Hadria within a while after did the like.

Picinino his vnlookt for arriuall into the Countrie of Breſſia.

For

For he forſooke Sforza, and carried a great Cauallerie awaie with him.

During theſe ſtirres there happened a meruailous reuolt of Townes; but within a while after there followed a greater, vpon the falſe rumours that Picinino. ſpread abroad concerning Sforza, How that being at Venice he had beene committed to priſon, and afterwards ſecretly murthered by the Senates commandement. The enemie by theſe forged matters made all things more eaſie for himſelfe, vntill that Sforza to wipe out theſe falſe imputations, came ſpeedily to Breſſia. And becauſe the extreame colde weather would not permit him to execute anie enterpriſe, after that hee had by his preſence confirmed thoſe that had continued loyall, and put them in good hope, hee returned to Verona, where hauing intelligenee of that which had beene done at the bridge of Valeza which the prince of Mantua had taken, he ſent for all the troupes that wintered thereabouts, and went in haſte to beſiege it; and being taken in a ſhort ſpace, he manned it with a ſtrong garriſon. Some write, that at his departure from Breſſia, Monteclaro, Soncina, Martinenga, and Caſal-major reuolted; and that he was not greatly troubled for that loſſe, hauing rather to looſe them in that manner than by force, knowing for certaine that thoſe Townes would proue his, who the next ſummer ſhould be ſtrongeſt in the field. Philips troupes ſpent the remainder of the winter in thoſe places.

Sforza recouers the bridge of Valeza.

The Spring-time being come, they beganne on both ſides to make great preparations for warre, and to prouide armour, victualls, and generally, whatſoeuer might ſerue for the obtaining of a victorie. Lombardy did not only attend the ſucceſſe of that warre, but all Italie. For all men perceiued that the warre would neuer end but by the death of one of thoſe two great Captains, or by his entire ouerthrow. Michael Attendulo being ſent for by the Venetians, was in the meane time come foorth of Tuſcany into Lombardy with two thouſand men to command the troupes in Mellato's place, who drew towards his end.

The Venetians place Attendulus in Mellato's rowme.

Sforza (whoſe great authoritie and commaund did not onely extend ouer the Venetian forces, but ouer all thoſe of the aſſociates) in regard it was time to leaue the Garriſons, had aſſembled all his Armie, when as the enemie, who was wont by his Spies to haue intelligence of the leaſt of his proceedings, was in the field a little before him with ſixteene thouſand men, and incamped vpon the Bergameſe on the bankes of the Riuer Serioles. His Campe neere to Algeſia was in this ſort fortified. Before him lay the Riuer, and on both ſides of him were the high mountaines, at his back the Riuer Oglio with a bridge guarded by a ſtrong Garriſon. I find in ſome Authors Mella for Serioles, and Legnaga for Algeſia. But whether hee incamped there or not, (for vndoubtedly it was in a place naturally ſtrong) he thought himſelfe able by long delayes to fruſtrate all Sforza's deſignes.

After what maner Picinino incamped.

But it fell out otherwiſe than he expected. For ſo ſoone as the Venetians Generall with a gallant Armie came in view of the enemies, and that he had conſidered the ſituation of the places he foorthwith reſolued to ioyne battell, and to enforce the enemie to quit the place. Therefore he beganne to exhort his ſouldiers to the fight, telling them: That it was greater in ſhew than ſubſtance, and withall aſſuring them, that with eaſe they might defeat Philips ſouldiers, and their feareſull Generall in thoſe narrow ſtraights, wherein they had encloſed themſelues; and that they being vanquiſhed, they ſhould purchaſe fame and a great booty: He told them that hee would vſe a longer ſpeech, if thoſe with whom they were to deale were not already ſufficiently knowne vnto them: being euen the ſame men whom ſo often they had ouerthrowne, beaten, taken, and baſely diſgraced. He willed them then to march forward, and at the firſt ſignall of the battell to beate downe the enemie, who by his owne confeſſion was more than halfe vanquiſhed; For hee did not ſend them to the fight, but to the victorie, as being much ſtronger than they in number, valour, courage, and good fortune.

Sforza his ſpeech to his ſouldiers.

This being ſaid, hee called for the croſſebow-men, and hauing giuen the ſignall to the fight, the battell beganne to be very cruell on the ſhore, where Caualcabon a valiant man, and diuers other men of note were ſlaine; many likewiſe were hurt, among mong whom was Troillo. And certainely there would haue bin great ſlaughter on both ſides, had not night giuen end to the battell which beganne very late. Some ſay that it laſted from morning to noone. Paſius writes, That Philip willed Picinino not to fight, and that by reaſon thereof, the night after the battell hee croſſed the Oglio about midnight; and leauing a ſtrong Garriſon at the bridge, hee went and incamped on the Cremoneſe. But that which Montanus ſets downe ſeemeth moſt credible, to wit, That they fought more than once with ſundrie euents, and that the enemie did not paſſe ouer the Riuer, before that Bartolomeo Coyone, a valiant man, had taken Pontologia fiue miles from thence, or as others ſay Antonio Martinenga: and vntill he had notice that the Venetian troups were come vpon the Cremoneſe. I can not certainely tell which of them paſſed firſt ouer the Riuer, in regard of the great diuerſitie of Hiſtorians. But all agree in this, that ſo ſoone as Sforza came into the enemies Countrey, he went and beſieged Martinenga.

The fight betwixt Picinino and Sforza is broken off by the approch of night

Sforza beſiegeth Martinenga.

Giacomo Gaiuano was in the Towne with a gallant troupe of horſe. There were likewiſe great numbers of footmen, ſo that the mercenarie ſouldiers were farre more in number than the Townesmen. There was in the Venetian Armie more than an hundred and thirtie troups of horſe, and great numbers of foot-forces. The Venetians Generall vpon the aſſurance of his forces, did encompaſſe the whole Towne: and hauing fortified his Campe with trenches and rampires, he reſolued to keep the enemie beſieged vntill he ſhould conſtraine him by force or faire means to yeeld vp the place. The next day after that the Venetians were incamped, Picinino retired a mile off into a place full of wood and water, watching all occaſions, that if the enemie ſhould commit anie errour, he might cut off the Victuallers, or thoſe which kept the guard, determining not to fight with his whole forces.

Philip is reduced to great neceſſitie.

At this ſtay were Philips affaires, who although hee were reduced to that want, as after Picinino's returne he was inforced for the renewing of his Armie to borrow money of certaine of his Courtiers, to take vp Armes on credite in ſhops, and horſe and victualls forth of the townes vnder his ſubiection, yet neuertheleſſe, becauſe he perceiued that the whole burthen of the warre would light vpon him, and being of a great and inuincible courage, and alway buſied in warre, he vſed all poſſible meanes to aſſure his ſubiects by new ſupplies. The Venetians in like maner did the ſame, beeing already in a manner victors. And to make a greater ſhew of their power, they leuied ſouldiers from all parts with greater pay than had euer bin giuen, ſo as in a few daies they had before Martinenga aboue thirtie thouſand fighting men, beſides the Souldiers boyes, Laundreſſes, and mechanicke people which vſe to follow Campes.

The number of the Venetian armie before Martinenga.

The ordnance in the meane time ſtill playing, had made a very great breach, which might haue beene eaſily approached, if Sforza had giuen an aſſault: But hee would not doe it, fearing (as ſome thought) that Picinino would haue aſſailed his Campe, while he ſhould be buſied at the aſſault. At the ſame time it was by ſome ſuppoſed that the buſineſſe was expreſly drawne forth at length without any battel by the two Generals; and that there was ſome ſecret practize and agreement betwixt them to diuide together the towns of Italie, they ſuppoſing by the aſſurance of ſo great forces, to be able with eaſe to ſeize on the Prouinces. But this rumor had no certain author, though perhaps ſome held it for certain. But the Venetians who in no ſort doubted of Sforza's loialtie, had no miſtruſt thereof. Sigiſmond of Arimini, vnto whom Malateſte gaue his daughter Polixena in marriage, came at the ſame time to Sforza's Campe.

Oſtaſio Polentano, who lay at Treuiſo, being taken as hee was going to the enemie with Ieronimo his ſonne, were confined into Candie, where both of them not long after died by ſickneſſe. In the meane time nothing was done before Martinenga. The two Armies were not farre off from one another; the one intending the ſiege, and the other how to ſurprize. But the buſineſſe on both ſides went ſlowly forwards.

Philip

Philip being either incited by the reports that were diſperſed of the trecherous accord made betwixt the two Generalls; or elſe being wearied with the great expences of the warre: or rather, as ſome affirme, being vrged with the inſolent demands of Picinino and the reſt that were in pay vnder him, turning ſodainly from Armes to peace, reſolued to commit his daughter Bianca and all his meanes to the truſt & diſcretion of Sforza. He ſecretly therefore ſent one called Vrbano Roſan of Pauia, or as others write, Euſebio Caiman to Sforza's Camp: Howbeit thoſe that haue moſt faithfully written this Hiſtorie, ſay, That Antonio Guidebon of Derthonna was firſt ſent to ſound him how he ſtood inclined to peace, and preſently after him, Euſebio Caiman, who finiſhed the buſineſſe. Philips reſolution.

It is reported that Sforza alone treated with this man from the ſecond watch of the night, till brode day-light concerning the conditions of peace: and that in the morning both of them comming forth of his cabinet, they publikely ſhewed themſelues with ſmiling countenances. Manie were already come to the Generalls tent (as the manner is) to bid him good morrow, among whom was Muripietro the Prouidator: Sforza turning towards him and the reſt ſmiling ſaid, Gentlemen I proclaime peace to you, wee muſt talke no more of warre nor Armes, we muſt only thinke on peace and quiet. Peace is concluded by Sforza and Philips commiſſioner.

This aduertiſement being new and vnlookt-for, ſeemed verie ſtrange to the Venetian and the reſt, who asked of one an other what was meant thereby, and why Sforza was ſo ſoone turned from Armes to peace, and of Philips capitall enemie become his friend. Theſe newes were forthwith ſpred ouer the whole Campe: And the Generall preſently commanded the Souldiers no more to execute any hoſtile actions. The like did Philips Commiſſioner cauſe to be done in Picinino's Armie. It is reported for a wonder, that the verie ſelfe-ſame day, there was ſuch a mutuall congratulat on among the Souldiers, and ſuch frequent comming to and fro, from one Armie to the other, vpon the only ſpeech of peace, as both Campes ſeemed to bee but one, and that the next day the Captaines did publikely embrace and entertaine one an other.

Sforza in the meane time had ſent Angelo Simonetto to Venice to acquaint the Prince and Senate, with what had beene done, Picinino did not long conceale his griefe; but hauing drawne the Garriſon forth of Martinenga, he marched to the Territorie of Lodes, where he greatly complained on Fortune and Philip; for that they had betraied a poore, lame, and olde man.

O Fortune (quoth he) and thou Philip moſt ingrateſull, could ye without my knowledge treate of a buſineſſe of ſo great conſequence? and is this the recompence of my ſeruices for the ſpace of ſo many yeares in heate and cold, faire weather and foule, done to an vnthankfull Prince? O how vaine are all my toiles and forepaſſed dangers? To what purpoſe hath my loialty beene, to what end my induſtrie? why hath my labour and ſpeed ſo often reſtored Philips affaires wholly ruined? I haue ſerued and defended him in his ſouereigne authoritie, that now proueth mine enemie; for certainely hee holdeth mee for ſuch an one; nor doe I thinke but that hee hates mee more than an enemie. Hee hath giuen his daughter to Sforza, he hath committed all his meanes vnto him; But of wretched Picinino, of whoſe loue, affection, and induſtrie, he hath had ſo great triall, hee hath no remembrance, eſteeming him not only vnworthie of greater honour, but reputeth meanely of him, not vouchſafing to acquaint him with the motion of the peace. O how more than true is that ſaying, That there is nothing more vaine and vncertaine than the fauour of a great Prince, and that there is no more aſſurance in depending vpon ſuch an one, than in the wordes and actions of a mad-man. Picinino his complaints vpon the report of peace.

Such were Picinino's complaints: when Sforza, after that he had recouered Martinenga, and other Townes on the Cremoneſe, and committed the troupes to Muripietro the Prouidator, went to Venice, where comming into the Senate he ſpake in this manner to the Senators.

Sforza

Sforza his Oration in the Senate.

WEe haue O Prince and Senators by the fauour of Almightie God and your good fortune, till now, ſo daunted Philips great forces, and in ſuch ſort leſſened his greatneſſe by many ouerthrowes one after an other, as hee hath beene of late enforced to ſend to your Campe, and humbly to ſue for peace whereof he hath made me Iudge and Authour. Your Armie is ſafe and in good eſtate, wee haue recouered the Townes which hee tooke from you, which are vnder the commaund of your Prouidator. Beſides, I bring you peace if you thinke it worthie of you, and ſuch, as being receiued may profit the Common-wealth. Receiue it if ye ſo pleaſe, with as good a will as it is offered. But if yee thinke it more expedient ſtill to continue the warre (ſeeing it lieth in you to embrace which of the two yee ſhall beſt like of) command what you will haue to be done. As for my ſelfe, I will endeuour, if fortune anſwer any deſire, to finiſh this war to your contentment, with as great loialtie and conſtancie as I haue vndertaken it, and by Gods helpe to continue it to the end.

Sforza's arriuall was very pleaſing, much more his ſweet and gratious ſpeech; but peace moſt of all. For they could not haue wiſhed for one more iuſt and aduantagious: Therefore they highly thanked him, for that by the ſelfe-ſame valour and loyaltie as hee had begunne that long and tedious warre, he had brought it to the deſired end. And concerning peace they anſwered him, That the Venetians were pleaſed with it, and would hold that for firme which he had made with the enemie: Hee had leaue then when he pleaſed to depart, and to diſpoſe, (they praying God that it might be to the profit and honour of the Republike and his owne) of the publike buſineſſe, as hee ſhould thinke fit. For they were aſſured that he could doe nothing, but that which would be profitable and honourable for the Common-wealth.

The Senates anſwere to Sforza.

In this manner he went forth of the Senate, reioicing as much for that peace as for a victorie, and ſo returned to the Campe. From whence ſending the Armie to Garriſons, he ſtayed at Capriana, to giue audience to Ambaſſadours who he knew would come thither to him from all parts of Italie. There came to him at the ſame time the Patriarke Lodouico Nuncio to Pope Eugenius; who taking his leaue of him to returne to Rome, Blondus of Furli the Hiſtorian remained with Sforza. Nerius Capare and Angelo Acciarole were ſent from the Florentines; Franciſco Barbadico and Paulo Troni from the Venetians, to the end that if neede were, ſome might be there to defend the Venetians cauſe. Nicholao Arcimboldi, and Franchino Caſtellone were ſent by Philip from Milan: diuers others came thither, as Ambaſſadours from other Princes and Common-wealths.

Philip according to his promiſe at the beginning, hauing called backe his daughter from Ferrara, did ſend her with a gallant Nuptiall traine to Cremona. Commiſſioners likewiſe were appointed from him & in his name to giue the Citie and Caſtle of Cremona to Sforza for her dowrie; The which to receiue together with the Ladie, he came thither, attended on by three thouſand horſe. And entring the Caſtle gliſtring in Armes with a numer of his choice friends, comming neare to the Ladie he ſpake vnto her in this manner.

Sforza's ſpeech to his future Bride.

IHaue a long time laboured (my deareſt Spouſe) to attaine to this ſo much deſired marriage. The good will which I haue euer borne to thee ſince I firſt made ſuite to haue thee to my Wife, hath neuer ſuffered me to take reſt, but night and day thou haſt beene imprinted in my minde: And it did greatly deſpight me to ſee thoſe that enuied our good fortune, to haue ſo much credit with thy Father Philip, as that by their meanes hee denied mee his Daughter. I reſolued either either to die valiantly, or elſe to winne thee: if not by faire meanes, at leaſtwiſe by force of Armes. I will not deny but that I tooke armes, and did enterprize a dangerous warre, but it was to let thee ſee how that there is nothing how difficult ſoeuer but I would attempt for thy ſake. I neuer hated Philip, becauſe he was thy father, and by thee my father-in lawe: nor did I euer ſo much deſire to hurt him, as I was willing to keepe him from offending mee. The which may eaſily be diſcerned by the effects that enſued. Hee was deſirous to haue mee lay downe Armes, I preſently did ſo; He made me Iudge and Vmpire of the peace, I haue procured him a perpetuall peace with the Venetians. Whereunto hath all this tended, but to let thee know that I neuer had anie intent either to hurt thee or thine? And doe not thinke, because thou ſeeſt me armed, that thou art ſent to an enemie, and not to a louing husband. For it beſeemeth the daughter of a great Prince, to be in this manner firſt ſaluted by a ſouldior and great Captaine her husband. There remaineth nothing to doe, but that with mutuall affection we loue one another, and that by thy meanes thy father may hereafter thinke well of vs: And for mine owne part, I will loue and honour him as our common father, with the like affection as thy ſelfe.

This he ſpake (according to Paſius of Arimini) and the better to oblige the Ladie to him ſelfe he preſented her with many rich gifts. Others ſay that hee was betrothed vnto her in Saint Sigiſmonds Church without the Citie; and they make no mention of Sforza's ſpeech to his wife. The Nuptialls being ſolemnized hee ſpent certaine dayes in diſpatching the Ambaſſadours. For on the one ſide the Popes Nuncio craued Bolognia which Picinino held, and Rauenna which was poſſeſſed by the Venetians. On the other ſide the Venetians were not well pleaſed, becauſe that Legnaga, and thoſe Towns which they had formerly poſſeſſed in the Gyraldade, were taken from them. Philips cauſe was well debated there as was that of Prince Gonzaga by thoſe whom they had ſent thither. The one craued Lonada Peſcara and diuers other Townes; and the other Breſſia and Bergamo, two moſt excellent Cities, In the end after ſundrie contentions, Sforza pronounced his ſentence in this manner, That Philip ſhould pretend no claime to the Breſſan nor Bergameſe Territories, but that thoſe two Cities with their dependances ſhould remaine to the Venetians: Cremona and all the Cremoneſe ſhould bee the dowrie of Bianca his wife: That the Venetians ſhould ſurrender Martinenga to Philip, with all the Cities in the Gyraldade: That they ſhould haue Lonada and Pescara: And Gonzaga ſhould haue againe whatſoeuer belonged to the Mantuan confines, on this condition neuertheleſſe, That after he had drawne his Garriſon from Legnago, he ſhould deliuer both it and the Hauen to the Venetians: That the Venetians ſhould enioy Riua, Torbolles, and Peretra, which they had wonne by right of Armes, together with Rauenna: That Pope Eugenius within two years ſhould haue Bolognia reſtored from Picinino: That Aſturo Fauentino hauing reſtored to the Florentines thoſe Townes which he had taken from them and which hee yet held, ſhould bee freed from his imprisonment: That the Genoueſes ſhould enioy their libertie and ſhould haue no more to do with Philip: And beſides, concerning peace (whereof he had an eſpeciall care) his will was, That euerie one ſhould religiouſly obſerue it.

Sforza is buſie in hearing and ſatisfying the Ambaſſadour.

Sforzas ſentence concerning the ſtrife betwixt the Ambaſſours.

This ſentence of Sforza being with conſent of the reſt approued, was by the Popes Nuncio reiected, who went about to cauſe others to diſlike of it, becauſe, as he thought, they had done no great matter for the good of the Roman Church. Whereupon, in a rage hee went to Florence, and from thence to Rome. Peace was in this ſort concluded on the fiue and twentieth day of September, the yeare one thouſand and twentie from the Cities foundation, and in the fourth yeare of the laſt warre with Philip. In Venice, enerall proceſſions were made for three dayes ſpace, & thankſgiuing to Almightie God for that the Common-wealth was not only freed from a moſt dangerous war, but, for that by peace they had encreaſed their State. The Priſons were ſet open, and offenders quitted. Thoſe that lay for debt vnder the ſumme of one hundred pounds, were diſcharged, and thoſe that ought more paid but the one halfe.

Sforza

Sforza with his wife commeth to Venice.

Sforza the third yeare after his comming into Lombardie, went to Venice with his wife: the Prince and the whole Senate went forth to meet him. The Princes wife being attended on by all the Ladies of the Citie receiued the new married wife in the Bucentauro, and were lodged in the Pallace of the Bernardi, which for that purpoſe was ſumptuouſly furniſhed. The publike ſtreets, and all the ſhoppes from Rialto to Saint Marks were ſtuffed with all ſorts of rich merchandize, which gaue great admiration to ſtrangers. All the treaſure which is kept in a part of the Church, was laid abroad to be ſeene and viewed of all men: Then great preſents were giuen to both of them: And at laſt, when they tooke their leaue to goe to La Marca, the Prince and Nobilitie accompanied them as far as Malamoc.

()

The end of the fifth Booke of the third Decad.

THE SIXTH BOOKE OF THE THIRD DECAD

Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the ſixth Booke of the third Decad.

WArre is renewed by Evgenivs and Philip. Sforza's troupes hauing continued aboue foure yeares in La Marca, were at the laſt driuen thence. Warre at the ſame time was made in ſundrie places againſt the Turkes. The Honourable entertainement giuen in Venice to the Wife of Lionello D'Æste. The Bologneſes recouer their libertie. Francisco Picinino in his Fathers abſence is wholly bereft of his forces in the Mount Volmea. The great reuolt of Sforza's Captaines was the cauſe of his defeate in La Marca. Nicholao Picinino, the great Captaine, dieth at Milan. Michaeli Attendvlo hauing taken armes neare to Cremona, defeateth Philips troupes vpon the Gyradade. The Senate hauing intelligence of the new alliance made betwixt Philip and Sforza, taketh from him all the benefits which the Common-wealth had beſtowed vpon him. The Venetian Armie approcheth twiſe neare to Milan. The Venetians doe greatly moleſt the enemies neare to the Lake of Coma. The death of Philip Duke of Milan. The Venetians reduce Lodes and Plaiſancia vnder their obedience. Sforza comming into Lombardie taketh Plaiſancia by force and ſacks it. He burnes the Venetians Nauall Armie neare to Caſal-Major, and defeateth the Venetians at Carauazza. The Venetians make a league with Sforza againſt the Milaneſes. Thoſe of Milan with in a while after, hauing made a league with the Venetians, doe attempt to defend their libertie againſt Sforza.

LOmbardie after Sforza's departure was for a time peaceable, but in the meane ſpace, the Venetians affaires were not very quiet: Their care for the Warre of La Marca, and the tumults of the Bologneſes did a long time hold them in ſuſpence, till ſuch time as Philip renewed the Warre againſt them vpon the Cremoneſe, the which after his death was diſperſed ouer all Lombardie: but wee will hereafter ſet downe what was the cauſe thereof, and likewiſe what end it had. And now ſeeing that the order of the affaires doe ſo require it, we will inſiſt a little vpon that which the Venetians did as well at home in the Citie, as abroade forth of Italie. The which we thought fit to inſert in the beginning, becauſe we finde it firſt mentioned in the Venetian Hiſtories.

Now

Andrea Dandulo is ſent Ambaſſador to the Soldan of Babilon.

Now Lombardie being at quiet, Andrea Dandulo was ſent Ambaſſador to the king of Babylon, vpon a rumour that was ſpred, how that the Venetians had carried away diuers of his ſubiects forth of the countrey, and tranſported them into the Weſt, hauing ſlaine them, and ſold the reſt, to the end that the Soldan might know that it was not done by the conſent of the Commonwealth, ſeeing that the Author thereof for want of appearance at an appointed day had beene condemned as guiltie, although that a while after comming by the Senates leaue to iuſtifie himſelfe, hauing proued that he had beene enforced ſo to doe, it is reported that by a generall conſent he was acquitted.

Mellatos death.

About the ſame time Mellato that excellent Captaine, who had ſo well deſerued of the Republike, died. The Senate in memorie of his good ſeruices cauſed his ſtatue on horſe-backe to be erected neere to S. Antonies Church in Padua. The ſame yeare three new Procurators of S. Marke were created. Lodouico Lauretano was choſen at the firſt aſſemblie, Paulo Troni at the ſecond, and Fanciſco Barbarico, ſurnamed the rich at the laſt, ſo that then, they who were wont to be but ſixe, were encreaſed to nine. There were beſides at the ſame time three ſhips of burthen armed, and one galley, which were ſent to Sea to free it from Pirates. For it was reported that the Sotolani verie famous Rouers, did ſcoure thoſe Seas: And within a while after, foure Gallies departed from the Citie vnder the command of Antonio Diede for the guard of the Gulph. This man by meanes of ſome others of the contrarie part that ſa-

Three new Procurators of S. Marke created.

The Citie of Antiuari ſubiect to the Venetians uoured the Venetians, tooke the Citie of Antiuari in Albania by force: the which he reduced vnder the Venetians command.

The ſame yeare which was the thouſand and two and twentieth from the foundation of the Citie, on the ſixth day of Nouember, the Sea did in ſuch ſort ouerflow all the ſtreets in the Citie, as an incredible quantitie of Marchandize was therewith ſpoiled. It is thought that the marchants loſt by that inundation more in value than a million of Gold. The Hungarians at the ſame time fought againſt the Turkes with proſperous ſucceſſe, who within a while after receiued a greater ouerthrow in the lower Miſia, at this day called Valachia.

A great deluge at Venice.

The Pirates in the meane time were ſo ſtrong at Sea as the Marchants vpon all the Sea-coaſts had no ſafe place of retreat, ſo that the verie hauens of Apulia, and Calabria where the marchants comming from the higher Sea were wont to touch, were not free from their piracies. The Venetians hauing oftentimes complained to Alfonſo, and receiuing no other anſwere, but he was ſorie for it; that the merchants were not wronged by any of his ſubiects; and that he could hardly beliue it: Diede being moued with indignation, went to beſiege the town of Biſtonia, the onely harbour at that time of thoſe theeues (I ſuppoſe that the ſame Sea-towne which ſtands vpon the confines of the Florentines, which at this day is called Biſtice, was in time paſt ſo named) and at his arriuall ſummoned the Inhabitants to deliuer into his hands the Pirates that were there, and in ſo doing, he promiſed them to depart thence, and to hurt none of them. Vpon the toweſmens refuſall, who threatned to diſcharge their ordnance vpon him if he made any attempt, Diede ranne to Armes, and comming to aſſault the towne, he would greatly haue endangered the enemie, had not a terrible tempeſt ſodainly aroſe, which ſcattering his veſſels heere and there, threw the Venetians into the enemies hands, whereupon the Generall of the fleet with his whole companies were taken, who afterwardes by Alphonſos commandement were ſet at libertie, and had their ſhips and goods reſtored to them: and of his bountie, the king added his promiſe to make good to the Venetians whatſoeuer they had loſt in that incounter, which could not bee recouered.

Biſtice aſſailed by the Venetians.

Andrea Quirini drew forth the veſſels which had beene taken from the Hauen of Biſtice, and to blot out that firſt diſgrace, purſuing the Pirates, he recouered from them diuers Venetians ſhips, and tooke ſome of theirs, who fearing the puniſhment that would haue beene inflicted vpon them if they ſhould be taken and carried to Venice, they would by no meanes fall into the Venetians hands, but forſaking their Liburnian veſſels, they went on ſhore in the next Hauen they came to, where they continued till ſuch time as they vnderſtood that the nauall Armie was returned to Venice. For then they began more fiercely than before to ſpoyle and take whatſoeuer they met with. But their vnbridled libertie laſted not long. For Philippo Canalus was ſpeedily ſent againſt them with three ſhips of burthen, and one Galley. Some write that about the ſame time certaine Gallies were armed at Venice againſt the Turkes; but they that write this, doe not ſet downe the number of the Gallies, nor vnder whom they were ſent forth.

to

Of thoſe ſhips which returned from Syria loden with marchandize, that of Contareni by a ſodain tempeſt was caſt away, the marriners hardly eſcaping with their liues to the bordering ſhore: But afterwards being taken into Antonio Abramo his ſhip, they did againe ſuffer ſhipwracke, and were caſt all away neere to Modon. This carried with it two loſſes, namely of men, which was the greateſt, in regard they were many, and alſo in rich marchandize, which was thought to be worth fiftie thouſand crownes.

The king of Arragons daughter commeth to Venice.

Two Gallies were likewiſe furniſhed in the name of Lionello d' Æſte, the ſailes of one of them were of purple ſilke, which brought from Ortona, a towne of the Peligniani, to Venice, the king of Arragons daughter betrothed to this young Prince. Victor Capello, and Franciſco Lauretano commanded thoſe two Gallies. The Bride for the Princes ſake her husband, who was a friend to the Venetians, was honorably entertained at Venice. The Arcenall was ſhewed vnto her, and to the great Lords that attended her, among whom was the Prince of Salerne: From thence being brought backe to the Rialto thorugh the Mercers ſtreet, it was ſo abundantly ſet out with coſtly warres, as all men did admire it. Such great multitudes of people came from all parts to ſee her, as with their weight both ſides of the Bridge of Rialto fell downe into the water, and carried with it many people who were ſpoiled and drowned. At her departure from Venice ſhe was honoured with ſundrie rich preſents. For which, within a while after Lionello came in perſon to Venice to ſalute the Prince and Senate, and to thanke them for the honourable reception of his Bride.

Lyonello d' Æſte comes to Venice.

At the Spring-time eight Gallies were on a ſodaine armed at Venice againſt the Turkes, at the expence of Pope Eugenius. The Pope referred the execution of that buſineſſe, to Cardinall Iohn his Nephew, of the familie of the Candelmares. Lodouico Lauretano, Pietro Zenti, Marini de Molino, Paulo Lauretano, Lorenzo Moro, Nicolao Contareni, and Antonio Candelmare were Captaines of the Gallies. Beſides theſe, the Duke of Burgondie cauſed foure others to be armed there at the ſame time, which were commaunded by foure Venetian Gentlemen, namely of the familie of the Venieri, Contareni, Lauretani, and Georgij. This French and Papall fleete being readie to ſet ſaile againſt the Turkes was commaunded by Lodouico Lauretano their Generall, who departing from Venice with the Cardinall Candelmare, and with all mens prayers, that their iourney might bee proſperous, put out to Sea. The Chriſtian fleete opportunely arriued at the ſtreight. Amurath Ottoman Emperour of the Turkes hauing left his ſonne at Salonica, departed at the ſame time, by the aide of the Genoueſes (as it is ſaid) forth of Europe into Aſia, whither he was ſpeedily recalled by ſundrie meſſengers. The rumour was, That king Caraman marched againſt him with a mightie Armie: But haing compoſed the affaires of Aſia, returning into Europe, he found the ſtreight to be ſhut vp and guarded by the Chriſtian fleete. This had put all men in hope, that this cruell enemie being diuided from his forces, might by his abſence receiue ſome notable ouerthrow in Europe. For it was reported that Ladiſlaus King of Poland, hauing cauſed his Armie to croſſe the Danubie in three ſeuerall places, did fiercely march againſt the Turkes in Europe.

Diuers Gallies armed at Venice againſt the Turkes.

The Chriſtians poſſeſſe the ſtreight.

But it is now time to returne to the affaires of Italie, from which wee haue somewhat digressed, the better and more plainely to dispatch that which remaineth behinde. Eugenius (as hath beene said) tooke it in euill part, That by Sforza's sentence, he might not enioy Bolognia till two yeares were expired. But Philip was more displeased to see that all his sonne-in-lawes attempts were bent against Alfonso whom at the Spring he meant to assaile with his greatest forces. Although Sforza's hatred seemed to be hereditarie from his father (for Sforza's father seruing valiantly in the Realme of Naples in the quarrell of Queene Ioane, had brauely withstood all Alphonso's attempts) it was neuertheless augmented by a new displeasure, which was, that Alphonso had seized vpon all the townes which by succession belonged vnto him in Samia and Apulia; vpon which occasion whilest he remained at Cremona, he had made a league with king Renatus by meanes of Nicolao Mice, who for that purpose came to him to intreate his aide.

The Pope and Philip discontent

The cause of Sforzas hatred to king Alphonso.

Alphonso being troubled with the report of this league, entreated Philip if it were possible in some sort to mitigate the furie of his sonne-in-law. Philip, being moued by the intreaties of the King his inward friend, and displeased likewise with Sforza for that hee had rather recommended Cremona to the Venetians than to him, as also because that since the marriage with his daughter, hee was in a manner estranged from his partie, did importune Eugenius to take Armes against him: withall aduising him to take Picinino into his seruice, seeing he could not finde a better Captaine, nor one that was more readie to procure his ruine. To this end they made a league together, and King Alphonso was receiued into it as a third man.

The Pope, king Alphonso and Philip make league against Sforza.

Sforza was fully resolued to relieue king Renatus whom Alphonso by sea and land had besieged in Naples, and vndoubtedly would haue performed it to the vttermost if before his comming to La Marca, Pope Eugenius had not entangled him in a ciuill warre. Whereupon, changing his determination, because he might not himselfe be so farre from home, he sent his brother Giouanni to the aide of Renatus. But his iourney proued vnfortunate. For ioyning with the Cappilistes, and comming by chance to fight with Alphonso, he lost at Carpenona both his campe and cauallerie. Afterwards the king entering Naples, did not only fauour Picinino in hatred to Sforza, but adopted him into the familie of Arragon: who hauing receiued of the Pope and King money for his pay, went with great rumour through the territorie of Perugia into the Dutchie of Spoleta, where at his arriuall he tooke Tuderta from Sforza. Then marching through the territorie of Sisa to La Marca, he did straightly besiege Bellafort. Diuers that were present at that iourney say, that warre was begunne in La Marca before Sforza departed forth of Lombardie: and that from thence proceeded Sforzas great hatred to Ciarpelion who came to meete him, which was thought to bee the cause of his death: For being of a bold courage and free speech, he taunted Sforza, telling him, That whilest he spent the time in kissing and embracing his wife Bianca, he basely suffered the enemie to take the countrey of La Marca from him.

Sforza sends his brother to the aide of Renatus.

Warre being thus kindled, Sforza came to La Marca, and within a while after comming in sight of the enemies, he enforced Picinino that was retired to Amandola, a verie litle towne, to sue for peace, which was granted him on condition, That he should depart forth of the countrey of La Marca, and all other territories belonging to Sforza.

Picinino departeth from La Marca.

The Prouince being in this sort quieted, Sforza marched against Alphonso; And it fortuned in his way that through the stubbornesse of the Transionates he commaunded their Citie, which stands on the frontires of the Prouince to be sacked and spoiled.

Picinino hauing thereupon taken an occasion, and being prouoked thereunto by the Popes Agents, as though hee had outraged one of the Popes townes, did presently seize vpon Tollentino, Galde, Nucernio, Asisio, hauing driuen Alexander, Warre renued in La Marca.

Sforza's,

Sforza's brother, from thence. Sforza being called backe vpon theſe ſodaine newes was inforced to winter in La Marca.

Renatus in the meane time hauing loſt all hope, returned home into Fraunce. Whereupon Alfonſo, within a while after entring the royall Caſtle, which till then had beene in the enemies hands, was by Pope Eugenius declared King, on condition that hee ſhould preſently march into La Marca to ouerthrow the power of Sforza.

At this ſtay ſtood the affaires of La Marca, and there was likelihood that there would be great warre about the poſſeſſion of that Prouince, when Franciſco, ſonne to Picinino, whom his father had left at Bolognia at the beginning of the warre of La Marca, tooke Hanibal Bentiuoglio, who had bin a long time ſuſpected in regard of the great power and authority of thoſe of his partie, and ſent him priſoner to the Caſtle of Variana. But he eſcaping thence by meanes of Galeas Maraſcot and Virginio Malueſta, went to Bolognia, where hauing incited the people to regaine their libertie, he defeated by ſurprize Franciſco Picinino, and moſt of his Garriſon. Franciſco was afterwards exchanged for Gaſparo and Achilles Bentiuoles. But the Bologneſes, the better to aſſure and maintaine their recouered libertie, ſent to the Venetians and Florentines to craue aide of them, and to be receiued into their alliance, vnto whom both their demaunds were preſently granted.

Hanibal Bentiuole priſoner.

The Bologneſes hauing recouered their liberty craue the alliance of the Venetians and Florentines.

Being confident vpon the alliance and forces of theſe two great States, they did not onely maintaine their libertie, but after they had driuen Lodouico Vermio from their confines, in a ſhort time they recouered all their Townes and Caſtles. And the better to increaſe their Republike, they thought fit to repeale Baptiſta Canedola with all thoſe of his faction, who had beene baniſhed from the Citie ſince the time that Eugenius had recouered Bolognia, whoſe neece Hanibal Bentiuoglio ſhould marrie, thereby to extinguiſh all their ancient enmitie: But neither the new alliance, nor any other bond of affinitie could root out the hatred which time had planted. For Hanibal being treacherouſly ſurprized by Bertucio Canedola and other his complices was moſt inhumanely murthered. The Bologneſes being mooued with this monſtrous impietie foorthwith ranne to Armes, and on a ſodaine ſlew the chiefe of the Canedoli with diuers others, amongeſt whom Baptiſta was the firſt that taſted of their furie: whoſe bodie after they had dragg'd it ignominiouſly about the Cittie, was at laſt in the market place burnt to aſhes. Their libertie notwithſtanding by the ſupportance of their aſſociates, ſtood inuiolate. But theſe two Common-weales were not onely carefull for Bolognia, but likewiſe for the danger they ſaw Sforza engaged in. And now the Venetians beganne to repent them that they had ſo ſoone diſmiſſed Chriſtofero Tollentino, with diuers other excellent perſons; and that Bartholomeo Coioni was gone to Philips party. In the meane time Philip had ſent William of Monferrat, and Carolo Gonzaga to make warre on thoſe of Bolognia. The Venetians being troubled with ſundrie cogitations, diſpatched thither Tiberto Brandolino, Thadeo d'Æſte and Guido Rangone. The Florentines had ſent thither not long before, Aſturo Fauentino aud Simonetto. Theſe men hauing eaſily broken the enemie, did in a ſhort ſpace expell them out of the Bologneſes territories. Whereupon all places neere Bolognia being in this ſort pacified, the aſſociates troupes departed by ſeuerall wayes.

Hanibal Bentiuole is treacherouſly ſlaine by his enemies.

The Venetian Captaines were by ſundry meſſages called backe into Lombardie by reaſon of the warre renewed vpon the Cremoneſe. The Tuſcans were commanded to goe to La Marca to Sforza's aide: For vpon the arriuall of King Alfonſo and Lodouico the Popes Legate, both of them were come to La Marca with great forces, where Sforza was brought to great extremitie by meanes of ſundrie ouerthrowes happening one vpon an other. But nothing hurt him ſo much as the reuolt of his friends: For Troillo with a thouſand horſe went to the Kings ſide, hauing firſt deliuered vnto him the Towne of Eſia where hee lay in Garriſon: and Pietro Brunora had alreadie done the like with eight hundred footmen. This valiant captaine taine being amazed with thoſe loſſes and many others, although of himſelfe hee was of courage inuincible, after the loſſe of Stella, and whatſoeuer almoſt hee poſſeſſed in La Marca was retired to Santa Maria de la Fortuna. It is thought, That at this time hee ſued to Philip, and made a ſecret league with him; wherein it was agreed, That Philip ſhould inuade the frontires of the Cremoneſe: Againſt whome there was ſome likelihood that the Venetians would oppoſe themſelues, and preſently take armes to defend that which belonged to Sforza: who comming afterwards to fight, ſhould (as a man enforced) turne to his father-in-lawes ſide, and fighting for Philip in Lombardie, ſhould ſtrait preſſe the Venetians.

In this manner, as they had plotted it, not long after warre was renewed in Lombardie, but with farre better fortune to the Venetians than the enemies expected. But before we proceede to that which was done in Lombardie, we will briefly ſet downe, what was the end of the warre in La Marca. The Venetians vpon report of Sforza's loſſes had ſent Thadeo d'Æſte, Guido Rangone and Tiberto Brandolino to his aide; and the Florentines had ſent Simonetto: who being all ioyned together, had foure thouſand men in their Campe at Marignane. But Picinino lay vpon the hill Laura to keepe them from ioyning with Sforza; which although for a time he endured, yet at laſt he aſſembled all his troupes and marched againſt the enemie, who being in battell vanquiſhed, left his campe to be poſſeſſed by the Victor. This happened in the ſpace almoſt of three yeares: But in the fourth yeare of the warre of La Marca, Picinino and Alfonſo hauing renewed the warre about Spring time, Picinino was vanquiſhed by Ciarpelion vpon the mount Millo: and Alphonſo not beeing ſatisfied with raiſing a land-Armie at Eugenius inſtance, did beſides, arme eight gallies to moleſt Sforza by ſea.

Picinio entirely defeated by Sforza.

The Venetians (as ſome ſay) vpon report of Alphonſo's nauall Armie, did likewiſe arme certaine veſſells of theirs, which were appoynted for the guard of Rauenna. In this ſort was Sforza ſtreightly preſt by ſea and land, when Philip ſent Franciſco Landriano to call home Picinino, vnder color to conferre with him concerning the affaires of the warre. Franciſco his ſon, in the meane time being left with the troupes in La Marca, and vanquiſhed in the mount Volmia by Sforza, hauing loſt his Campe and the greateſt part of his forces, was taken priſoner in the companie of Cardinall Firmiano the Popes Legate in the Armie, with diuers other great Lords. Manie at that time thought that it was Philips pleaſure to haue it ſo, to the end that Picinino's Armie being defeated, Sforza his ſonne-in-law might bee freed from that warre: whereby wee may perceiue that the common reports then currant, were moſt true, That Sforza was before then reconciled to his father-in-law, and that hee had ſecretly made a league with him, to the vtter ſubuerſion and ruine of the Venetian eſtate.

But Picinino vpon the news of this rout, was not able to conceale his griefe, but lamented and exclaimed, taxing Philip oftentimes, That he had left him nothing but his life, and that he ſhould doe well to depriue him of that; and in this manner falling ſicke with extreame ſorrow, the greateſt and beſt aduiſed Captaine of his time, did in a ſhort ſpace deceaſe at Milan. Sforza at Philips intreatie ſet Franciſco at libertie, and ſoone after peace inſued with the Pope, although Sforza poſſeſſed diuers Townes of La Marca, and Pope Eugenius ſome others.

Picininos death.

Carpelions death

At the ſame time Alexander Sforza's brother did cauſe Ciarpelion to bee hanged, who was a man very famous for his skill in martiall diſcipline, onely becauſe he had an intent to goe to Philips partie.

About fiue yeares after the Pope renewed the warre, and ſent the Patriarke of Aquileia to La Marca, who in a ſhort ſpace reduced all the Prouince (Firmia excepted) vnder the Popes obedience. And it was not long after but that Firmia likewiſe with the Caſtle was recouered by his Holineſſe Armie.

La Marca is reduced vnder the Popes obedience.

Sforza being retired to Piſaura with his wife, did there ſpend the remainder of the Winter. At the ſpring time beeing ſolicited by ſome of his friends, hee came through through the Dutchy of Spoleta, an hauing croſſed the Tiber, the better to diſturb the quiet of the Citie of Rome, he encamped vpon the Viterbian Territorie: From whence in haſt departing, and returning into Flaminia by the Lake of Traſimene, he ſtaied at Metaura. In the meane time, his brother Alaxander with the Tower of Piſaura reuolted from him. Being on euery ſide enuironed with enemies he came within a mile of Vrbin, and after that, no great exploits were done on either ſide, vntill his arriuall in Lombardie.

Alexander, Sforza his brother reuolteth from him.

Philip on the other ſide in the Countrie of La Marca cauſed Italus of Friull, and Giacomo Guiuano to be beheaded, vpon ſuſpition that they had intelligence with the Florentines. Soone after hauing notice of Ciarpelions death, as if that had giuen him new occaſion to hate Sforza, he commanded Franciſco ſonne to Picinino, whom hee had ſent for into Lombardie, to ſcoure and waſt the Cremoneſe Territorie. Whereupon Franciſco making a furious roade into the Countrie, after ſundrie ſpoiles and depredations, he beſieged the Citie of Cremona: which gaue occaſion to the Venetians to haue recourſe vnto Armes. But becauſe they would not ſeeme to doe any thing raſhly, they ſent Lodouico Foſcari to Philip; who, according to the cuſtome of their Anceſtours, ſhould denounce war vnleſſe he would deſiſt from inuading that which did belong to Sforza. Anſwere was made him, that Philip had no time nor leiſure to heare any Ambaſſade, and that Milan was no ſafe place for him: That he ſhould doe well preſently to get him forth of the Citie, vnleſſe he meant to be outraged. The Venetians being moued at this indignitie, commanded Michaeli Attendulo General of their Armie, to march ſpeedily againſt the enemie, who by this time had ſeized on the greateſt part of the Cremoneſe. He making haſt, according as he was commanded, with ſix thouſand horſe, and as many foot, hauing croſſed the Oglio, went and encamped vpon the Cremoneſe at Caſall-major; but on a ſodain diſlodging thence, hee marched againſt the enemie, who with his Armie was in the Countrie of Gyradade very neere to Caſal. There, ioining battaile, after a cruell fight which continued from daie-breake til noone, the Venetians draue the enemies from their Campe, and in their diſorder, tooke foure thouſand horſe from them. This victorie was not obtained without loſſe: For diuers of their braueſt men were ſlaine in fight, a great number of whom periſhed in the water. Diuers of the enemies were likewiſe taken. And it was thought that Picinino would haue made one of the number if, when he firſt ſaw the alteration of fortune, he had not gotten into a little boate, and eſcaped forth of the battaile. Others ſay that hee went ouer the Po, at a Bridge.

Italus of Friul and Giacomo Guiuano are put to death.

The Venetians in Sforza's behalfe, denounce warre to Philip.

Diſgrace offered to an Ambaſſador.

The Venetians vanquiſh Philips forces.

After this famous victorie, the Venetian Generall did in a ſhort ſpace recouer whatſoeuer the enemie had taken on the Cremoneſe; and being ſtrengthened with the troupes of Lodouico Gonzaga hee went and encamped on the Gyradade. In this place likewiſe did the Venetians affaires ſo proſper, as Attendulo in a ſhort ſpace left Philip nothing on the hither ſide of Adda but Crema and Lodes. From thence his Armie croſſed the Riuer; where ſome ſay they fought againe vpon the bankes, and that ſix hundred of the enemies horſe were taken, & with them two thouſand peaſants, two Ganzares, and as manie Galliots, which Lodouico of Seuerine had ſent to breake the bridge, by which the Venetians had ioined the Riuer to the Marſhes. Pietro Auogadre, Giacomo Antonio Marcello, and Antonio Martinenga, becauſe they had fought valiantly that day, and borne themſelues more brauely againſt the enemies than any elſe, were honoured with the order of Knight-hood.

An other victory of the Venetians.

Whileſt the Venetians were entangled in this warre of Lombardie, Sforza, as though he had beene reduced to the laſt extremitie, did at the perſwaſion of Pope Eugenius and King Alphonſo, who enuied the Venetians greatneſſe in that Countrie hauing quitted La Marca, went openly to Philip. The Venetians had beene before aduertiſed of his meaning, and vpon the firſt intelligence of it, they thought it fit to commit Angelo Simonetto to priſon, who was then in Venice, and to take away Sforza's penſion, and the Pallace which the Prince and Senate had giuen him: To reuoke

The Venetians reuoke all that which had beene giuen to Sforza.

reuoke likewiſe all gifts giuen to Sforzas friends, which were ſo many and ſo rich, as that it is ſcarce credible which we find in the Venetian Hiſtories; how that in the laſt war of Lombardie the Venetians ſpent fiue Millions of gold. And afterwards they drew from Simonetto the true ground of Sforza's reuolt. The Senate vpon this new rebellion did forthwith leuie 400. Archers for the guard of Rauenna together with certaine veſſels: Commandement was likewiſe ſent to thoſe forces which the Florentines had ſent to Bologna; to ſuffer none whoſoeuer to come forth of Lombardie.

Philips Ambaſſadors come to Venice to treate of peace.

Philip after al theſe ouerthrowes ſent his Ambaſſadors to Venice to treate of peace; who were not only entertain'd as friends & louing gueſts, but were moreouer ſuffred to tarrie a month in the Citie: But the buſineſſe being for a time debated on, had not ſuch ſucceſſe as was deſired wherupon, they returned, the matter being imperfect.

Attendulo after the battaile of Adda hauing fortified the bridge which iojned the Riuer to the marſhes, and placed a ſtrong Garriſon vpon it, did with great rumour make incurſions into the State of Milan, and in the middeſt of winter did with his cauallerie runne to the verie gates of Milan, from whence, hauing ſet fier on diuers houſes of the ſuburbes, he carried away manie priſoners, and great ſtore of Cattaile.

Whilſt theſe things were done in Lombardie, one of thoſe gallies which in trade of marchandize had been at the Tana, & was commanded by Zeni Moroſino, was caſt away by a ſtorm on the Pontick-ſea; but the goods within it & al the Marriners being caſt vpō the ſhore were taken by the Turks; the other gallies arriued ſafely at Venice.

Pope Eugenius death.

Such ſucceſſe had the Venetians affaires, when newes was brought of Pope Eugenius death, in whoſe place, Thomaſo Sarſania was choſen, who was afterwards called Nicholas; in whom we haue ſet before our eies, the onely example of humane happineſſe. For in one yeare he was made a Biſhop, created Cardinall, and elected Pope. The Venetians preſently decreed to ſend Ambaſſadours to him. Foure of the chiefe of the nobilitie were choſen, Lodouico Lauretano, (who after ſundrie braue exploits againſt the Turkes had brought home the fleete to Venice) Lodouico Venieri, Paſcalis Maripietro, and Chriſtophero Moro, who was Aduocate to the Common-wealth, & the other two were Procurators of Saint Marke. But Moro not being able to trauaile through extremitie of ſickneſſe, Zacharia Treuiſano was ſent thither in his ſted.

Ambaſſadours ſent to the new Pope.

Giacomo Foſcari the princes ſon, being cited by the councel of Ten, was in his abſence condemned, for not appearing at the day prefixed; But afterwards his innocence (as I thinke) being knowne he was by the Senates decree ſent from Thryeſte where he remained to Treuiſo, with expreſſe charge, not only not to go forth of the Citie, but not to walke vpon the Meſtrine without the leaue of the Poteſtate: but afterwards, either for his Fathers ſake, who was at that time matchleſſe for his wiſedome & pietie towards his Countrie, or as I ſuppoſe, rather for his innocencie, he was repealed from Treuiſo home to Venice. But as Fortune when ſhe once beginneth to frown vpon a man, doth euer after purſue him, euen ſo it hapned, that ſoon after his returne to the Citie, he was accuſed of a murther, & that by his procurement Hermolao Donato had been ſlain, as he returned in the night from the Palace towards his own houſe: wherupon diligent enquirie being made, and no greater proofes found, he was confined into the Iſle of Candie. After that, being again brought to Venice in a Gallie ſent of purpoſe to fetch him, for that the Senate knew by his letters that he practiſed treacherie, and being vpon the torture demanded if he had written thoſe letters which were directed to the enemies, he confeſſed that he had written them, and that he had vſed meanes to haue them fal into the magiſtrates hands, that therby he might be called home into his countrie, which though it might not be as he deſired, would neuertheleſſe be as it might. At the laſt when they found he was guiltleſſe, he was againe confined into Candie: where he died. Andrea Donato likewiſe being at the ſame time accuſed to haue been corrupted by Sforza, was ſent for from his gouernment of Candie, and being enforced by the Senates decree to anſwere before the Lordes of the Councell of Tenne, he was put to torture, and by them condemned in 1400. Ducats, and being depriued of all publik gouernment, to endure ayeares impriſonment.

The Princes ſon is confined into Candie.

Andrea Donato being accuſed to haue beene corrupted is condemned in a pecuniarie fine.

In

In the mean time, Carolo Montone ſon to that great Captaine Brachio hauing intelligence that Philip & Sforza were recõciled, did in hatred to the cõtrarie faction come to the Venetians ſide. The Venetian Armie had alreadie taken from Sforza Caſalmajor & other ſtrong towns neere therunto: Afterwards Attendulo going again vpon the territories of Milan, commanded Tiberto Brandolino with a braue troup of horſe to ſcoure as farre as the Citie Gates, where in the enemies view erecting the Venetian enſignes, he inuited the Milanois to recouer their libertie; But perceiuing the enemie not to ſtir, he turned his forces elſewhere, & went on waſting the Countrie as far as Pauia; from whence hauing carried away a great booty, he again drew neere with his Armie to Milan, and inuited manie of the Townes-men to recouer their libertie.

Carolo Montone taketh the Venetians partie.

Attendulo his incurſions vpon the Milanois.

In this place, as they abode neere to the riuer Adda, foure valiant men were knighted hard at the Citie gates; namely Tiberto Brandolino, Theote Saluia of Bergamo Lodouico Malateſta, and Giberto Correggiano. At length, the Venetian hearing no tumult in the Citie, after he had ſpoiled all that quarter where he had planted his enſignes hee went to beſiege Brebia in Brianſa, which he preſently tooke. From thence hee ſcoured and waſted all the Prouince of the Briantines. It is reported that they did there vſe great crueltie vpon the inhabitants not onely killing men, but young children of two yeares olde, rauiſhing maides, and abuſing married wiues. The Souldiers did not commit this crueltie, but the Voluntaries of the contrarie partie, who to glut their hatred towards the poore vanquiſhed, did like brute beaſtes fall to murther and ſpoile. The bootie which they brought from thence was thought to be more worth than two hundred thouſand Crownes.

The Venetians take Brebia.

Beſides, Mount Barri being forced by Attendulo was ſacked and ſpoiled. Leco afterwards which is ſeated on the mouth of the Lake of Coma being for a time beſieged could not be taken. Moreouer, diuers ſmall townes neere to the Lake, whoſe inhabitants were ſuppoſed would not long continue loiall were giuen ouer to be ſpoiled. In this manner all places from the riuer Adda as far as Coma on both ſides the Lake being reduced vnder the Venetians obedience, the Souldiers being loden with bootie were brought back on the hither ſide of the riuer.

Mount Barri is taken.

Whilſt theſe things were done abroade, the Citie of Venice was greatly afflicted with the plague, the which daily increaſing, generall proceſſions were made, & praiers ſaid at the Saints Altars which were in the ſtreets (ſo greatly was the citie at that time giuen to deuotion). Great fiers were made in the night time in ſundrie places of the Citie, with ſweet & odoriferous perfumes, to amend and purge the aire. Beſides, al thoſe that were infected with the ſickneſſe were carried two miles off from the Citie to a place commonly called the Lazaretto. Six boates were by the Signorie appointed for that purpoſe to the end there might be one in euery of the ſix quarters of the Citie, into which the towne is diuided. And becauſe this place was found to be verie commodious, not only to leſſen the ſickneſſe, but likewiſe for the reliefe of the poore (for the ſicke were there better and more commodiouſly look't to) it hath been ſince then by little & little ſtored with buildings & all other neceſſaries. An other hath been added neere vnto it for the ſame purpoſe, of a coſtly ſtructure, which a far off ſeemeth to be a little towne.

The plague in Venice.

Philips affaires were (as hath beene ſaid) much diſiointed, when Sforza departing from Flaminia with 4000. horſe & 2000. foot whither he was come from La Marca to aſſemble forces, went through the Territorie of Ferrara to that of Parma. At his departure the Pope recouered al places of La Marca, Ancona excepted. For the Anconitans being beſieged by Land and Sea (Alphonſo's nauall Armie did vex them by Sea, & that of the Pope by Land) fearing if they ſhould too raſhly giue credit to the Souldiers, who ſolicited them to yeeld, their towne would be ſacked, did erect the Venetian Enſignes, whereupon, ſhippes of warre came preſently from Venice, who entring the Hauen, defended the Citie; The Anconitans beeing receiued into the alliance of the Venetians and Florentines as were thoſe of Bologna not long before. Lorenzo Mini was ſent thither with ſeuen Gallies for the guard of the Citie:

The Anconitans yeeld to the Venetians.

Some

Some Historians write thus; But many make no mention at all of the tumult of the Anconitans. Two ships of war at the same time departed from Venice against the Pirates, who troubled all the Sea-coasts the one was set forth by Giacomo Morosino, and the other by Andrea Leone.

At Sforza his arriual in Lombardie, the cauallerie which the Senate had appointed to withstand him, marching through the Paduan territorie comming by an other way was sent on the hither side of the Po to Attendulo's Campe. The preparations for war were great on both sides, at what time Philip the greatest warrior that euer was in the family of Viscontes, being first troubled with a feauer, and then with a flux, dyed. By his death all those of his partie and his subiects being amazed were possessed with sundrie thoughts: Those of Lodes louing the name of libertie, did voluntarily yeeld to the Venetians. Foure daies after those of Plaisantia opened their Citie gates to the Venetians. Giacomo Marcello, placed strong Garrisons in both these Towns: Then causing his troupes to crosse the Riuer Oglio, he did in a short space recouer Colombana and in a manner all the Countrie of Lodes.

Philips death.

Lodes yeeldeth to the Venetians Plaisancia doth the like.

The Milanese's in the meane time did with great courage vndertake to pursue in their owne name the warre begunne by Philip, and chose Sforza for Captaine Generall of their troupes against the Venetians, on these conditions, that if hee could take Bressia from the Venetians, it should be his owne, and if he should become master of Verona likewise, that then Verona should be his, and Bressia should returne to the Milanese's. Some say that presently after Philips death, Sforza wrote to all the Captaines of the Armie, entreating them to perseuer in their loyaltie, that hee would shortly be with them, if those of Milan would send for him, and that then, their forces being ioined together he did hope with ease to ouerthrow those of the Venetians. He then being made Generall by those of Milan, came to Cremona. From thence, hauing crossed the Riuer Adda at Picigatone, he ioined with Francisco & Giacomo Picinino, and with the other Captaines of deceased Philip, and presently departing thence, he did in a short space recouer Colombana.

An accord betwixt those of Milan and Sforza.

Sforza comes to the field.

The Venetian Armie, because it was lesse than that of the enemies, retired towards Lodes. Those of Pauia being prouoked by their owne particular passion, did proclaime Sforza's sonne by his wife Bianca, Earle and Lord of their Citie, in memorie of his Grand-father. The Milanese's in a short space sent three Ambassades to the Venetians one after an other, to demand of them that which had belonged to Philip. The Ambassadors were still answered after one manner, that notwithstand all those Townes till then taken from Philip, were well purchased by right of armes, yet neuertheless, that the world might see that the Venetians did loue peace better than war, they were readie to surrender that which they demanded, so that the Milanese's would truely pay them the great quantitie of gold which they had disbursed in that warre: But they offering nothing, were dismissed with nothing.

Ambassadours sent from Milan to Venice: with the Venetians answere.

The Senate perceiuing the great warre they were to sustaine against Sforza and the Milanese's, decreed to set forth a nauall Armie, which should saile vp the Po, to the farthest places of Lombardie, and to that ende foure Gallies were armed, and two and thirtie Galliots vnder the command of Andrea Qurini and Georgio Lauretano.

A nauall Armie determined against the Milanese's.

During these preparations at Venice, Sforza hauing assembled all the forces of Lombardie went on a sodaine and besieged Plaisancia, and hauing beaten downe a great part of the Walls betwixt the gates of Saint Lazarus and Saint Raymond, and the Po being so risen at the latter end of Harueſt, as the vessells might easily come to the Walls, he did by an assault by Land and Water take the Citie, which was giuen to the Souldiers to spoile. Gerardo Dandulo and Thadeo D'Æste that lay in Garrison there with a thousand footmen and great troupes of horse were taken prisoners. The one yeelded, with the Castell of the Garrison, and the other was taken as hee fled, when he perceiued all to be lost.

But whilest Plaizancia was besieged, Attendulo hauing crossed the Adda at Colom-lombana, went to waſte the territorie of Pauia, from whence he carried away a great bootie. From thence, the better to diuert Sforza from his enterprize, he ſtill marched vp and downe the territorie of Milan waſting and ſpoyling it, where, as wee finde in ſome Authors, he ſeized on Melſſa: He had determined if Plaizancia had not beene taken, to haue beſieged Cremona. Marcello being at the ſame time called from the Armie returned to Venice: After his departure, Lodouico Lauretano and Matheo Victorini, came as Prouidators into the Prouince. And becauſe winter drew neere, and the Armie not being able to lie in campe by reaſon of the cold weather, they went to winter in the villages and farme-houſes neere adioyning, where the Common-wealth had like to haue beene endaungered by a mutinie amongſt the ſouldiers.

Attendulo es incurſions vpon the Milaneſe.

Peace was again motioned, by the commiſſioners of the Venetians and Milaneſes, who for that purpoſe met at Bergamo: Thoſe of Milan demaunded Lodes, the Venetians on the contrary refuſed to ſurrender it, vnleſſe they might be ſatisfied for the expences of the warre: And although the Florentines and the Popes Ambaſſadors did exhort both ſides to imbrace peace; yet neuertheleſſe they would not bee drawne to anie agreement. At the Spring, although the Senate had wholy bent their deſignes vpon the war of Lombardie, yet neuertheleſſe, becauſe there was a report that two ſhippes of burthen returning from trafficke forth of the Ponticke ſea had beene taken by Pirates, there was a decree made to arme three ſhips of warre and fiue Gallies to chace thoſe Pirates from the Seas. Lorenzo Lauretano was appointed to commaund the Gallies, and Lodouico Bembo the other ſhippes.

A motion of peace.

A nauall armie againſt pirates.

Sforza in the meane time was not idle, but comming from his wintering places he tooke certaine townes from the Venetians.

The nauall Armie which was ſet forth againſt the Pirates (as hath beene ſaid) defeated Vitalis Sarde whom it encountred at ſea, who not long before had ſurprized three ſhips of burthen who were going to the Vintage of Candie: hee being taken, was hanged. Within a while after, it ſurprized two other ſhips of Pirates neere to Naples, where all thoſe that were in them were likewiſe hanged. Alphonſo being moued with the matter, commaunded all the Venetian Marchants that were in his realme to be impriſoned, and their goods to be ſeized on. The Senate ſent meſſengers to the King, to know whether he would haue peace or war, and why, without proclaiming war againſt them, he had contrary to the law of Nations outraged their Marchants & Factors. Alphonſo after he had complained of the Venetians, for that in the view of the chiefe Citie of his kingdome, they had ſuncke ſhippes which had offended no man, and ſhamefully put their Captaines and Mariners to death, who peraduenture had not deſerued it, tolde them, that notwithſtanding that iniurie was very great, hee would not at that time re-ſent it, nor by anie meanes preferre warre before peace, but that hee deſired to haue the Venetians deale with him in ſuch ſort, as hee might haue occaſion to be at peace with them: Therefore they might when they pleaſed depart, and with a proſperous winde returne home into their Countrey with their Marchants and all their goods, and thereupon he commaunded all the Venetian priſoners to be enlarged, and all their goods to be reſtored to them.

Vitalis Sarde the pirate hanged.

Alphonſo impriſoneth all the venetians in his kingdome.

Alphonſoes anſwere to the Venetian Ambaſſadours.

Bartolomeo Coyone whom Philip for a time had kept priſoner (who after his death had found meanes to eſcape, and went to the territorie of Pauia, where he vnderſtood that Philips cauallerie wintered vnder the commaund of Nicholao Guerriero of whom he was kindely entertained, and within a while after honoured by the Milaneſes with the command of 15. hundred horſe) marched and fortunately fought with (whilſt Sforza beſieged Plaizancia) Renaldo of Dreux, who after Philips death had beene ſent by king Charles into Italie with a mightie French Armie.

By an accord made betwixt them againſt the Venetians, the French had receiued the town of Aſt of Viſconte, but after his death, they not only ſeizd vpō Aſt, but vpon a great part of the Countie of Alexandria. Coyone being accompanied with

Aſturo

Aſturo Fauentino, went & aſſailed them before Boſca which they held beſieged, & in open field defeated them and draue them from their campe: Diuers of the French were ſlaine in that fight, and many were taken priſoners. Coyone being renowmed for this victorie, did within a while after go to the Venetians ſide with fifteene hundred horſe.

Coyne takes the Venetians party

The Spring time was almoſt ſpent, when as Sforza comming from garriſon, beſieged Mozzaniga, and ſpeedily inforced the inhabitants to yeeld: from thence going into the Countrie of Gyradade, hee did in a ſhort ſpace become maſter of the whole Country, Carauazza excepted. He did beſides take Caſſan from the Venetians. Attendulo likewiſe was incamped with his Armie at Calce beyond the Oglio. And both the Armies remained for a time in thoſe two places without anie exploit worthy of memorie. At the laſt Sforza going from thence, went by land and water againſt the Venetians nauall armie which waſted all the Cremoneſe. All Quirino's deſignes aimed at the breaking of the bridge, which Sforza during the ſiege of Plaizancia had cauſed to bee made vpon the Po neere to Cremona. There was a ſharpe fight, and the Venetian did not ceaſe to aſſaile it, till hee vnderſtood that the enemies approached.

Sforza tobrib diuers townes.

Sforza had ſixe and twenty Galeots, which were not well furniſhed with men nor armor. At his arriuall the Venetians were repulſed as farre as Caſal-maior. The Venetian veſſels being there inuironed by the enemies both by land & water were by reaſon of the vnfitneſſe of the place in ſuch ſort beaten with the artillery which that skilfull Generall had planted vpon the Riuer bankes, as being all bruzed and battered Quirini like a deſperate man, hauing about midnight cauſed all their tackling and furniture to be carried to the next towne, burned the veſſells, for feare leſt they ſhould fall into the enemies hands. Quirini being come to Venice, was by the Senate deliuered ouer to the Procurators fiſcall, by reaſon that they ſuſpected that hee had not done his dutie in ſauing the nauall Armie. The Procurators condemned him to perpetuall impriſonment. Some thought that Quirini might at the firſt haue retired with the fleet into a place of ſafetie, and that he would haue done ſo, had not Attendulo promiſed him, that ſo ſoone as he ſhould beginne the fight, hee with all his forces would come to his reskew (which not being done) the Venetian being betrayed, did through an other mans fault receiue a verie great ouerthrow.

The Venetians nauall armie is broken.

The enemy being gone from them (for he needed no longer to ſtand in feare for Cremona) went and incamped before Carauazza, which was manned with a Venetian garriſon. Attendulo who had followed Sforza when he went againſt the Venetian nauall armie, almoſt to the verie place where the execution was made, ſo ſoone as after the rout he vnderſtood, that Sforza being come into the Gyradade had beſieged Carauazza, he likewiſe approached with his troupes neare vnto that place, to make it famous by the Venetians ouerthrow. Neuer before in any other warre of Lombardie had there beene ſeene ſo great Cauallerie, nor ſo many notable men aſſembled in one place. For the Venetian armie beſides Attendulo, who was their Generall, had in it Lodouico Gonzaga, Bartolomeo Coyone, who not long before was come to the Venetians party, Gentil Leoneſco, Carolo Montone, Tiberto Brandolin, Giouan la Conte a Roman Gentleman, Guido Rangone, Alberto Bodienſe, Ceſar Martinenga, Nicolao Guerrieri, and with them twelue thouſand horſe, and great numbers of footmen. In Sforza's Camp were Aliſſandro Borſia and Conrade his brother, Roberto Sanſeuerine, Franciſco and Giacomo Picinini, Gulielmo of Montferrat, Carolo Gonzaga, Lodouico Vermio, Giouan Tollentino, Criſtofero Tourello, and Bartolomeo Quartiero, and with them ſixteene thouſand horſe. They often fought in that place by skirmiſhes, which ſometime continued from morning till night, not comming to battell with all the forces.

Sforza beſiegeth Carauazza.

The number of both the armies.

Frederico Contarini, and Hermolao Donato were at the ſame time come to the campe with commandement to enioyne the Venetian Captains, to relieue Carauazza. Frederico

Cerico at the ſame time being bitten with a dog, died. Hermolao and Gerardo Dandulo, who before was Prouidator in the Armie continuing the ſame requeſt, Attendulo and diuers other Captaines, although they were aſſured that vnleſſe the inhabitants were relieued they could not long hold out, were not for all that of opinion in Councell to giue battaile: but others inſiſting on the contrarie, they did at laſt conclude, that it was better to hazard the laſt fortune of warre, than by a lingering encamping to ſuffer the inhabitants being tired with the ſiege to yeeld: This determination held good for certaine daies. For they could not reſolue, principally by what way the Venetians might paſſe through the enemies. Tiberto Brandolin offered to giue the firſt charge, by the new way, becauſe that the ſame ſide by reaſon of the marſhes was not well guarded by Sforza. For he, being diſguiſed like a meane ſouldier had beene ouer all the enemies campe, and had at leiſure well viewed it.

Diuerſitie of opinions in the venetians camp.

Tiberto, Guido Rangone, and Alberto Bodienſe were commanded to go vpon a holiday when no man would thinke on their comming, to giue in behind vpon the enemies camp. Sforza was gone to heare diuine Seruice in our Ladies Church of Carauazza which is not farre from the towne, whither certaine horſemen one another comming to him told him that the enemies were in the trenches, who comming with great furie to aſſaile the campe, had alreadie forced the Rampiers, where vndoubtedly all would be loſt without ſpeedie remedie: Some ſay, that returning from Seruice as he was ſitting downe to meat, this word was brought him, and others ſay, that riding about noone towards the new way, he was in haſt aduertized how that the enemie aſſailed the campe. But whenſoeuer, or whereſoeuer it was that he vnderſtood of the enemies comming, it is certaine that without any trouble or amazement he gaue order for all matters.

The venetians on a ſodaine and vnlookt for, doe aſſaile Sforza's campe.

The Venetian troupes in the meane time made good the way which lay betwixt the two Armies: Carolo Gonzaga, Alexandro, and Sforza's other Captaines being at the Venetians firſt approach beaten backe into the Rampiers, could hardly ſuſtaine the enemies charge: Some ſay that Carolo Gonzaga being wounded, did not onely leaue the fight but the campe, and that being affrighted, he went to Milan, where he aſſured them that the Venetians had defeated Sforza: Such at the beginning was the enemies feare. But being afterwards encouraged by Sforza's preſence, who with the body of the Armie ran to that place where the fight beganne, the fight was not only made equall, but they did beate the enemies forth of the Rampiers: Then giuing a fierce charge, the Venetians who had fought in the forefront being tired by the enemies who were ſtronger than they both in force and courage, Alberto, and Guido Rangone, who were much troubled to renew the battaile, and to keepe the ſouldiers in their rankes, being enuironed with a troupe of enemies were beaten downe dead: and then the Captaines being ſlaine, the ſouldiers began openly to flie: wherein beſides the difficulties of the places, the enemies purſuits did much hinder them. For thoſe of Mozainga ſo ſoone as they ſaw the Venetians had the worſt, ſtopt the runnawaies, ſo as they were enforced to yeeld or to fall headlong into the neighbour marſhes.

Sforza defeateth the venetians.

On the other ſide, the two brethren Picinini which were at Triuia on the one ſide of the Armie, did giue inwith two thouſand horſe in another place vpon the Venetians camp. Coyoni who was left to guard it, did for a time make it good, but perceiuing his friends to flie, and the lower end of the campe to be taken from the enemies, did on foote eſcape into the neighbour forreſt: Attendulo and the reſt, ſo ſoone as they knew the formoſt ranke broken (whether they did it vpon malice, or elſe becauſe they knew that all was paſt remedie) betooke themſelues to flight. Eight thouſand men both horſe and foote were taken together with the Prouidators. Dandulo the Prouidator being aduiſed by Attendulo to ſaue himſelfe by flight, anſwered, That he had rather die neere the publike enſignes, than eſcaping by a ſhameſull flight purchaſe a perpetuall diſgrace. The Victorious enemies were maſters of the Venetians campe which was ſtored with meruailous abundance of all Dandulos braue anſwere.

all things, wherein were two thousand waggons. Attendulo retired to Bressia, whither the enemie pursuing his victorie within a while after brought his campe.

A new Armie of the venetians.

The Venetians notwithstanding this great losse were not discouraged, but hauing speedily appointed two new Prouidators, Lodouico Lauretano, and Pascalis Maripietro, they did leuie the greatest forces they could. The Prouidators being sent to Sforza besigeth Bressia.

ressia with thirtie thousand crownes could not enter into the Citie, which was enuironed by the enemie. For Sforza being come thither with his Armie, had by the commandement of the Milaneses diuided it to Lodouico Verinio, Carolo Gonzaga, and other noble persons. The Prouidators were day and night at Verona busied in making new leuies. They did in a verie short space by meanes of great pay assemble many troupes of horse and foote: Diuers great Lords likewise did by their expresse letters and messengers promise to enter into their pay, and to be quickly with them if the Senate thought it fit, with great numbers of horse.

Many townes yeeld to Sforza after the battel.

Victorious Sforza in the meane time recouered Casal-Maior, Riuoltelles, and diuers other townes from the Venetians. Carauazza the next day after the ouerthrow yeelded. But whilest he lay before Bressia, Picinino went with the residue of the Malan troupes, and encamped before Lodes.

The Milaneses. suspect Sforza.

On these termes stood the affaires of Lombardie, when those of Milan had, not-without cause, some suspition of Sforza, as fearing that he did secretly aspire to the same principalitie like Philip. They then being desirous to preserue their libertie, did by little and little, retire their forces, and did daily diminish his credit, and reputation. But Sforza perceiuing that ere long he should bee esteemed no more a friend to those of Milan than to the Venetians, he resolued to renew his ancient league and alliance with them, for he knew well enough that the onely power of that Commonwealth might serue him for a ladder to mount vp to the principalitie.

Sforzas resolutiõ

Now among all the prisoners of note that were taken at the battaile of Carauazza, and carried to the castle of Cremona, was Clemento Thealdino one of the Secretaries of the Signorie, with Hermolao Donato. Angelo Simonetta had beene acquainted with him a long time, whereupon he brought him secretly to Sforza, who sent him to the Prince and Senate, to let them know from him; that if peace were pleasing to them, they should secretly send to him Giacomo Antonio Marcello, or Pascalis Maripietro.

Sforzas secret practises with the venetians.

The Senate although it had after the ouerthrow at Carauazza, by vertue of their ancient alliance obtained great supplies of the Florentines, & had at that time mightily encreased their Armie, yet for all that, supposing the successe of warre to be vncertaine, they did willingly hearken to peace. And because Marcello was at that time Gouernour of Verona, they sent Maripietro to the Fornaces, a place neere to Pescara. The Venetian and Simonetta had many secret conferences in that place, where they agreed vpon these conditions of peace: That Sforza and the Venetians should declare themselues enemies to the Milaneses; That the Senate should furnish him with foure thousand horse, and two thousand foote vntill he had conquered Milan, and should besides for his entertainment send him monthly thirtie thousand crownes. Moreouer, it was expresly mentioned, that the Venetians should possesse whatsoeuer Philip had held on the hither side the riuer Adda, and should purchase Milan and the residue of the Dutchie for him.

Accord betwixt the venetians and Sforza.

Sforza marcheth against the Milaneses.

The accord being in this sort made, and all the prisoners set at libertie, Sforza crossed the riuer Adda, & marched against those of Milan. The Venetians hauing dismissed Attendulo from his place, sent him to the Treuisan territorie. Those of Lodes, because they would not fall into Sforza's hands, hauing sent away the Venetian Garrison, yeelded to them of Milan. Sforza in a short space recouered whatsoeuer the Milaneses held betwixt the Adda and the Thesin (Lodes and Coma excepted.) Then from thence he went and encamped within fiue miles of Milan.

The same yeare about the end of Haruest, there was a bloudie fight betwixt the

Turks

Turkes and the Hungarians vpon the confines of Adrinople wherein foureſcore thouſand Turkes were ſlaine, and of Chriſtians halfe as manie. The Venetian Gallies ſurprized a Foiſt of the Pirats, all the Rouers were hanged, and they that were leſſe faultie were made Gallie-ſlaues: within a while after they met with a Marchants ſhippe belonging to the Gotholans which was loden with oile, the which they tooke in hatred of their Countrie-men who were all Pirates. A battaile betwixt the Turkes and Chriſtians at Adrianople.

Tortona in the meane time, Nouara, Alexandria, and at the laſt, Parma, yeelded to Sforza: Theſe newes being brought to Venice, did greatly reioice the whole Citie; and this ioy was by ſo much greater, as they ſuppoſed theſe conqueſts to haue beene made in part by the valour and conduct of Marcello: The Senate according to the treatie had ſent him with two thouſand horſe, and two Prouidators, Lorenzo Lauretano and Paſtalis Maripietro: and Sforza had afterwards ſent him with Aleſſandro his brother to recouer diuers Townes beyond the Po; moſt of which being recouered and aſſured by ſtrong Garriſons; this valiant Captaine called for the Venetian forces, and went to beſiege Milan. In the meane time newes was brought that Lewis Duke of Sauoy, who had leagued himſelfe with the Milaneſes againſt Sforza, had ſent great troupes into Italie, vnder the command of Iohn Compenſio to waſt and ſpoile the confines of Nouara; who at their firſt arriuall attempted to ſurprize Nouara: But their enterpriſe failing, they went from thence and encamped vpon the Territorie neere adioining. Diuers townes of the ſtate of Milan yeeld to Sforza. Sforza beſiegeth Milan.

Coyoni whom the Venetians had ſent with Marcello to Sforza, was commanded to march againſt them, who were reported to bee ſixe thowſand men. Hee ioining fight with Compenſio vpon the bankes of Theſin, did put them to rout, and took Compenſio priſoner with foure hundred of his horſe. This victorie did highly renowne Coyoni and did greatly further him afterwards in mounting to thoſe honours which he obtained. Coyoni his victorie.

At the ſame time Lrrenzo Piſaure was ſent with a Gallie to the King of Babilon: The cauſe of his Ambaſſade was, for that the Venetian Marchants had beene badly dealt with by the Barbarians in the Faires of Syria. Angelo Piſaure did likewiſe put to Sea with two Gallies againſt the Pirats.

The Milaneſes in the meane time affecting libertie which they had a little taſted, did on a ſodaine murther diuers of the chiefe in the Citie who were ſaid to take Sforza's partie, then going forth of the Gates in heapes, they ranne towards the enemie: Sforza did at that time batter the Fort of Mellignana, who vnderſtanding of the enemies comming forth who were reported to be threeſcore thouſand men, hee did in ſuch ſort order his battallions, as thoſe of Milan hearing of the excellent order of his Armie, durſt not approch Marcello who was with him, perceiuing the great skill and dexteritie of that braue Captaine in a matter ſo ſodain, did write to Venice, that not only the Venetians, but all Italie would haue had cauſe to haue feared that inuincible Captaine if he had taken Milan. The enemies being retired he continued the ſiege. But all his deſignes tended to famiſh the Citie; Therefore he did ſo ſtreightly beſiege it, as at times running to the very Rampiers hee did with ſodaine incurſions ſet fier on the Suburbes. At this ſtay ſtood the Citie of Milan, at ſuch time as the Citie of Venice, had like to haue ſuſtained a loſſe as great as vnlookt-for. The people of Milan come forth diſbanded againſt Sforza. The Milaneſes feare of Sforza's Armie.

A certaine Greeke named Stamatus, borne in Candie, being by chance at Venice at that time when they did ſhew (according to their manner to great Lordes that were ſtrangers) vnto Borſia D'Æſte the publike treaſure which is kept in a part of S. Markes Church, it happened after this manner; That this Greeke being vnknowne, and thruſting himſelfe among his houſehold ſeruants, did enter into the Veſtrie. Then he was ſo far off from being amazed at the view of ſuch great and admirable wealth, as on the contrarie, hee did forthwith determine in his minde to commit a notable theft. The Walls of Saint Markes Church, which in the beginning wee haue termed the golden Church, in regard of the excellent guilding thereof both The famous theft which a Greeke did enterpriſe.

within and without, is down to the pauement ſeeled as it were with great tables of marble. In that part of the Church where the Innocents Altar ſtandeth, this cunning theefe remoued a marble table, Then falling to worke in the night time (becauſe the wall could not be ſodainely opened) he did before day light put the ſtone in the vſuall place, and ſtopt all the chinkes and crannies with lime, ſo that nothing might be diſcerned, and long before daie carried all the rubbiſh which he had made to a place farre from thence; And hauing wrought in this manner ſundrie nights at laſt he got into the treaſurie, from whence by little and little he began to carrie all thoſe rich and exquiſite iewels, which are admired of al thoſe which behold them. For beſides great numbers of ineſtimable ſtones richly inchaced, there were twelue Crownes of gold; and as manie corſelets curiouſly inriched with ſundrie pretious ſtones, whoſe ſparkling luſter doth no leſſe dazell the vnderſtanding, than the ſight; There are moreouer diuers Cups of verie precious ſtone, whoſe brims and feet are enterlaced with an other kinde of ſtone of an ineſtimable valew: I ſpeak not of Altar cloathes, candleſticks and other things for the Churches ſeruice, whoſe ſubſtance being of pure gold is nothing in compariſon of the faſhion and worke-manſhip wherewith they are adorned, & pretious ſtones of ſundrie coulours wherewith they gliſter: nor of Vnicornes horne of an vnualuable worth; nor of the Princes attire for his head, nor of diuers other matchleſſe peeces of worke, which this famous theefe had at leiſure taken from thence. But (according to the prouerbe) Adulterie and theft will not be long concealed, and becauſe it would haue beene an hard matter to haue diſcouered this of a long time it fell out that himſelfe bewraied it. Hee had a Goſhip whoſe name was Zacharie Gria a Candiot like himſelfe, but of a noble family, and a man, as this one example can witneſſe, of an exceeding good conſcience: Stemmatus after that he had ſworne him vpon the Altar, told him what hee had done, from thence carrying him to his poore cottage, he ſhewed him his great and famous theft; But this honeſt vertuous man, being ſtricken dumbe with beholding it, could not of a long time make him any anſwere; The ſacrilegious villaine was once minded to haue murthered him, and would haue heaped ſinne vpon ſinne, if he had not preuented him, by telling he was fallen into an extaſie with ſodaine ioy to beholde ſo great wealth: this his ſpeech made the theefe forbeare to hurt him: Gria in the meane time hauing receiued a moſt rich ſtone of him in guift, which for the worth thereof was well knowne, (for it was the ſame which the Prince at this day weareth on the fore part of his ducal Crowne) tooke his leaue of him, ſaying that he would go and diſpatch ſome buſineſſe, who preſently went to the Palace, and being admitted to the Princes preſence, he did diſcouer the whole matter to him, ſaying, That it behoued him to make haſt, for feare leaſt he whom he had with much to do deceiued with faire wordes, ſhould change his minde, and hide himſelfe with his bootie in ſome ſecret place: and to manifeſt the truth of what he ſpake, hee drew the pretious ſtone forth of his boſome, which being knowne, men were preſently ſent to apprehend him; he being committed to priſon, they recouered whatſoeuer he had taken away (without loſſe of any one thing) which was eſteemed to bee more worth than two Millions of gold. The theefe was hanged betwixt the two Columnes: His accuſer, beſides a preſent recompence, had by the Senates decree a perpetuall penſion allotted him forth of the publike treaſurie.

The ineſtimable valew of the treſure of Venice.

The theefe is hanged betwixt the columnes.

The accuſer is recompenſed.

The Picinines in the meane time forſooke the Milaneſes, and came to Sforza's ſide with three thouſand horſe, and two thouſand foote: but becauſe it was certainly reported, that the Picinines being drawne by Sforza's faire promiſes had left the Milaneſes, the Venetians tooke it not well, by reaſon that it was expreſly mentioned in the accord made betwixt them, that it ſhould not be lawfull either for the Venetians or Sforza to receiue any into their pay that had borne Armes for the Milaneſes. This did in ſome ſort leſſen the Venetians affection towards Sforza; for his potencie did beginne, more than was needfull, to be ſuſpected of the Venetians: but the Picinines being ſoone after ſuſpected to practiſe againſt Sforza's life, where-

The Venetians ſuſpect Sforza.

of

of Marcello had often wiſhed him to beware, they on a ſodaine returned with their troupes to Milan: Some neuertheleſſe doe ſay, that the Picinines came from Milan to Sforza, with an intent to ſpend the winter abroad, and then to returne to Milan at the beginning of Summer, as they did.

Sforza in the meane time did greatly vex and moleſt the Milaneſes, when as Alphonſo, to free them in ſome ſort from this warre, did by an Edict expell all Venetians forth of his dominions: This warrelike threatning, did preſently cauſe the Venetians to make readie a great nauall Armie: They armed fiue Gallies and ten ſhippes of burthen againſt the King, whereof Lodouico Lauretano was made Generall: This warrelike preparation of theirs by Sea made Alphonſo to attempt, both by Lionello d'Æſte, and by Ambaſſadors to obtaine peace, who being come to Ferrara, the Senate ſent them word that they ſhould not come to Venice, where mens courages being once moued, it was but in vaine to ſeeke to appeaſe them.

Alphonſo expelleth the Venetians out of his dominions.

The Venetians nauall army againſt Alphonſo.

Victore Capello in the meane time who lay at Sea for the guarde of the Gulph, did giue chace to a Gallie of the Gothelans as farre as Ortona, which long before had taken a Venetian Gallie; ſo ſoone as he ſaw the enemies landed, and that by aide of the townesmen, they prepared to offend him, he turned the prowes of his Gallies and commaunded his ſouldiers to leape on land, which they perfourming, there was a fierce fight vpon the ſhore: The enemies being there put to rout and enforced to enter the Citie, their Gallie was drawne from thence and burnt, together with ſome other ſhippes. At the ſame time the houſes in the ſuburbs which were full of Marchandize, being ſpoiled, the victorious Venetian retired to his vſuall place of abode, where he reſolued to tarry for the nauall Armie which was prepared againſt Alphonſo.

The Gothelans are vanquiſhed at Ortona.

The Venetians being tied to the warre by ſea, did by their Ambaſſadours ſent to Sforza trie if they could ridde themſelues of that by land. Vrſo Iuſtiniano and Paſcalis Maripietro went to him in the name of the Common wealth with commiſſion and commaundement to treate of peace, which the Milaneſes propounded very aduantageous for them: The motion thereof had beene alreadie made when as Crenia hauing beene many moneths beſieged by Malateſte (for the Florentines according to their league, had ſent him after the battell of Carauazza to aide the Venetians with two thouſand horſe, and one thouſand foote) did yeeld vnto the Venetians by meanes of Andrea Dandulo, and by Sforza's aide likewiſe, who would not haue accepted of their yeelding: Gentili Leoneſio was commanded to go and receiue them with a ſtrong Garriſon.

A motion of peace betwixt Sforza and the Milaneſes.

Crenia yeeldeth to the Venetias.

Peace at the ſame time being almoſt concluded with the Milaneſes, was referred to Sforza vpon theſe conditions, That ſeuen cities which had obeyed Philip, ſhould be his, but that he ſhould leaue Lodes and Pauia to the Milaneſes. If hee did accept of theſe conditions, hee ſhould bee a friend and allie of both the Commonwealths: And Lombardie being by this meanes at peace, the Venetians ſhould entertaine ſixe thouſand horſe, the Milaneſes two thouſand, and Sforza one thouſand, and no more: And if he would not haue peace with the Milaneſes, hee ſhould be declared an enemie to them both, and that the Venetians ſhould make warre vpon him with eight thouſand horſe, and the Milaneſes with ſix thouſand.

The articles propounded to Sforza.

Maripietro hauing propounded theſe Articles of peace to Sforza, hee did neither allow nor reiect them; but it is reported, that gnaſhing his teeth, he did lament and complaine of the Venetians loyaltie, and that hee made anſwere, that hee was not onelie content to quit Lodes which the Venetians had decreed ſhould be ſurrendred to the Milaneſes, but all thoſe townes which by an accord made betwixt them were to be his owne, if hee did but thinke that they would haue it ſo, in regard his onely deſire was to obey them: That he would ſend his brother to Venice, there in the Senates preſence to ratifie that which had beene concluded. After this, Aleſſandro, Angelo Simonetta, and Andrea Biraga were by him ſent thither, who hauing a while debated the matter, did ſoone returne without any reſolution, firſt to Sforzaes anſwer to the propoſition of peace.

Ferrara, and from thence to Sforza. Some write that these men did approoue the peace with the vsuall solemnities, but Sforza would not ratifie that which Alessandro and the rest had doone, as though hee had giuen them no such commission.

Accord betwixt the Venetians and Milanese's.

So soone as the truce was expired which had beene graunted for certaine dayes, that they might in that meane space treate on the conditions of peace, the Venetians and Milanese's made an accord. For which agreement, if the Venetians had not some reason, they might seeme to haue degenerated from their ancient custome, by contracting a new league, and abandoning Sforza. But without all doubt they did it vpon great occasion, because Sforza not long before had forsaken them, and he merits no pardon that sinneth by an other mans example: Besides, the loue to libertie (which the Venetians haue euer as much maintained in forren Cities as in their owne) caused them to forget all accords, and to follow their new associates. Nor can any man therein accuse them of disloyaltie or auarice; I meane if he wil exactly and iustly consider the matter. For by the accord made with the Milanese's the Venetians purchased no greater part of anie thing that had belonged to Philip, than by that which they had formerly made with Sforza: Notwithstanding, they did not cease to doe all good offices for this Prince their friend: For whatsoeuer (in a manner) had belonged to Philip (Milan excepted which they desired to set at libertie, together with Lodes which before then was tributarie to it) did by their meanes become his owne.

Supposing therefore that he would be satisfied with these conditions, they were desirous to treate with him of peace. Nothing therein was done vnder-hand or fraudulently, but openly and plainely, and in the selfe same manner as they had dealt with him from the beginning. Now as the Venetians had taken Armes against Philip in the Florentines behalfe: euen so by a solemne defiance, (as beseemed a free and potent Republique) warre was denounced as well to this man, as to them. But this inuincible Captaine by a fortunate aduice made choice rather to follow the victorie which he had in his owne possession, than the Senate, and accepted warre against both those Common-wealths, which by his owne valour and conduct hee fortunately ended.

Sforza maketh warre on both the Common-wealths.

The end of the sixth Booke of the third Decad.

THE SEVENTH BOOKE OF THE THIRD DECAD Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the ſeuenth Booke of the third Decad.

THE Venetians nauall Armie burneth diuers ſhips in the Hauen of Siracuſa. GIOVANNI PICININO, and SIGISMVND MALATESTE, victuall Milan. Thoſe of Milan hauing ſlaine the Venetians Ambaſſador proclaime SFORZA their Prince. The Honourable entertainment in Venice giuen to the Emperour FREDERICKE and LEONORA his wife. King ALPHONSO maketh great warre vpon the Florentines. The Venetians Armie fighteth with good ſucceſſe againſt SFORZAS forces neere to Otholenga: They fight afterwards with different ſucceſſe in ſundrie places. King RENATVS in the behalfe of SFORZA and the Florentines commeth into Italie againſt the Venetians: STEPHANO PORCIO is beheaded at Rome. The taking of Conſtantinople by the Turkes, giues terrour to all Chriſtians. Two nauall Armies prepared againſt the Turke. Peace with SFORZA and the Florentines is publiſhed. The Citie of Venice and all places neere adioyning are greatly aſtoniſhed by a terrible tempeſt. And laſtly are mentioned ſundrie exploits of the Turkes, in Greece and Aſia.

DVring theſe new Treaties, Lauretano with a mightie nauall Armie, hauing coaſted all the higher Sea, came vpon that of Sicily, where with ſodaine incurſions he aſſailed the hauen of Meſſina, and ſet fire on a new Argozey of the kings of a wonderfull bigneſſe, which had neuer beene lanched, and on diuers ſhips which rode neere to the hauen. He did ſink moreouer neere to the neighbour ſhoars ſuch Gallies & other ſmaller veſſels as came to the aide of thoſe of Meſſina. From thence entering farther into Sicily, he aſſailed two ſhips of burthen of fifteene hundred tunne a peece which lay at Anker in the Hauen of Siracuſa. The Genoueſes, who owned one of theſe ſhips, with diuers others, and for feare of the Venetians, had in haſt gotten from Sea into that place, had ſunke two ſhips of burthen at the mouth of the Hauen, and drawne a great chaine athwart it, with a Rampier, ſo as they thereby ſeemed to be out of the enemies danger: They had beſides made bridges from the top of the Citie wals to the ſhips, that they might with more eaſe if need ſhould be, defend them from aſſaults. Lauretano at his firſt arriuall attempted after he had beaten downe their fortifications, to enter by force into the Hauen, and neere to thoſe ſhips there began a cruel fight. But the Venetian hauing loſt many of his men, perceiuing that he laboured in vaine, went backe to Sea. Then he inuented another meanes to offend the enemie, he filled a ſhip of burthen with drie vine branches and brimſton, and manned it with thirtie valiant men, whom by faire promiſes he had drawne to that buſineſſe, who with the wind and tide ſailed towards the Hauen. This ſhip by the force of the wind ſtriking vpon the Chaine & Rampier, did deſpight of all the enemies attempts, and to their amazement paſſe forward to the ſhips that lay in the Hauen: thoſe within the ſhip after that they had on a ſodaine ſet fire to the ſulphurie matter, leapt into a boate which they had expreſly brought with them, and by force of oares eſcaped to the fleete.

A cruel fight at the mouth of the hauen of Siracuſa.

In the meane time the vehement flame which came forth of the Venetian ſhip, tooke hold vpon the reſt, which could by no meanes be quenched, ſo as diuers others which at that time lay in the Hauen beſides thoſe two great Argozies were burnt in the Cities view.

The Venetian departing thence, ſailed to Corfu, from whence he diſpatched Zacharia Donato with one Galley to Venice, to acquaint the Prince and Senate with what he had done in that voyage, & how that by a wonderfull ſucceſſe he had burnt ſeſſen and fortie of the enemies ſhips: As alſo to know from them, whether they would haue the fleete to tarrie abroad, or elſe after that he ſhould haue cleared the Seas from the Pirates and enemies, to bring it home to the Citie againſt the beginning of Winter. The whole Senate and Citie were verie ioyfull for theſe newes, and all men commended Lauretano in his abſence, there was no talke but of him: The Senate was of opinion to call home part of the fleet to Venice, and that the reſt ſhould continue at Sea to aſſure the nauigation.

Ambaſſadors aſſembled at venice.

In the meane time the Ambaſſadors of the Pope, Florentines, Milaneſes, Sforza, and Duke of Sauoy, remained for certaine daies at Venice, where firſt of all the contention betwixt Sforza and the Milaneſes was amply debated. But when they perceiued that the matter would not be ended without Armes, the Venetians made choice of Sigiſmond Malateſte for Generall of their Armie, and commanded the Florentines to trade no longer with their Citie, becauſe they would not make warre on Sforza.

The venetians reſolue on warre againſt Sforza, and chooſe Malateſte for their Generall.

Sforza likewiſe had opportunely prouided for warre with the Venetians. For during the treatie of peace he had fortified his townes. He had manned Lodes and Picigithone with ſtrong Garriſons, and made a league with Lewis Duke of Sauoy. And to take all hope from the enemies of any reliefe by the Venetians, he made an attempt to ſurprize Brebies, wherein failing he encamped not farre from thence, where he builded Forts, and leauing a ſtrong Garriſon in them, (becauſe Winter drew neere) he reſolued to inuade the Milaneſes in the next townes and villages. Sgiſmond within a while after came and aſſailed the Forts neere to Brebies, two whereof he tooke, and preſently burnt them, and would haue taken the reſt had not Sforza in time arriued, at whoſe comming Malateſte retired beyond the riuer Adda. Coyoni likewiſe comming through the valley of Saſsina to the lake of Coma, did for the eaſier getting of victuals attempt to ioyne himſelfe with the troups of Giacomo Picinino: Franciſco being newly dead. But the Cauallery which was ſent him from Milan, by the treacherie of certaine perſons fell into the enemies hands. Sigiſmond afterwards arriued, who ioyning with Coyoni in Bianza, in a ſhort ſpace became maſter of mount Barri, and then by ſtealth victuals were ſent to Milan: but in regard of the great multitude of people within it, the dearth was little amended, or rather on the contrarie it ſo mightily encreaſed, as a buſhell of wheate was ſold there for twentie crownes. The Venetians in the meane time did by all meanes ſeeke to draw Sforza to a battaile, who was encamped or rather lodged at Vimercata, Meize, and Sforza his preparations.

A great dearth in Milan.

Caratta.

Caratta. But he ſtill auoided it, knowing like a wiſe and diſcreet Captaine, that by the continuance of the ſiege, the Milaneſes would by famine be ſodainly reduced to ſuch extremitie, as they would be enforced whether they would or no, to yeeld. The Venetians Armie after the taking of the mount of Brianza went to Frezzia. Winter was alreadie much ſpent, and yet neither the one or other were idle, but ſtill as occaſion was offered by one of the ſides ſometimes towards the Rampiers of Brebies, and then neere to the bridges which were made ouer the riuer Adda, there did daily in a ſhort ſpace happen ſundrie light encounters, and yet all their forces neuer ioyned.

Sforzas wiſe & diſcreet reſolution.

Sforza's conſtancie was admirable in the continuation of that ſiege, who although he vnderſtood, that beſides the Venetians and Milaneſes, king Alphonſo did openly arme againſt him, neuertheleſſe conſtantly continued his ſiege, till ſuch time as the Milaneſes being by famine reduced to all extremitie, hauing on a ſodaine taken Armes, and murthered Lenoardo Venieri in the Pallace, who from the beginning had beene ſent thither by the Venetians as their Ambaſſador, yeelded themſelues and ſaluted Sforza for their Prince, whom they ſent for into the Citie.

The venetians Ambaſſador is murthered in Milan.

Sforza is proclaimed Duke of Milan.

Sforza hauing obtained what he deſired, commanded the Venetians to be ſet at libertie, who had beene impriſoned after Veniero's death: This valiant Captaine was deſirous to oblige the Venetians to him by all good offices: for they being reconciled, he knew well enough that he needed not feare any warlike menaces from any place elſe. He had an inkling that there was a motion of peace made with king Alphonſo, which if it tooke effect, he was in ſome feare of great warre not onely againſt the Venetians, but in a manner againſt all Italie. The buſineſſe being begunne at Ferrara whither Paſcalis Maripietro had beene ſent to that purpoſe, had at laſt ſuch ſucceſſe as they deſired: for peace enſued about the fifth of Iune: the treatie hauing continued certaine monethes.

Peace betwixt the Venetians and king Alphonſo.

This yeare was the yeare of Iubilie, and from all parts of Europe multitudes of people came to Rome. It happened that a Germane Ladie in the companie of certaine knights going in pilgrimage through the Mantuan & Verona territories, was ſeized on to be rauiſhed, and her friends ſlaine: But ſhe abhorring ſuch wickedneſſe would neither by intreaties nor force be drawne to conſent to the vnbrideled appetite of the rauiſher. Whereupon ſhe choſe rather to ſuffer her chaſt bodie, after it had beene miſerably tormented, to be put to the edge of the ſword, than to defile it by a voluntarie ſinne. Sigiſmond of Arimini, whom the Venetians had newly caſſed, was at the ſame time encamped there about, who becauſe he was young and valiant, was ſuſpected to haue ſeized on this ſtrange Ladie, being enflamed with her rare beautie. But he, in regard the Senate was highly moued at the matttr, to cleare himſelfe from that imputation, ſent ſome of his Captains as guiltie of the crime, bound hand and foote to Venice, who being found to be guiltleſſe, were ſent backe againe without any hurt.

An excellent example of chaſtitie in a Germain Ladie.

Peace being concluded at Ferrara, was to the great content of euerie one publiſhed ouer all the Citie by ſound of trumpet. Lauretano who had beene commanded to ſend ſeuen Gallies for ſupplies, at ſuch time as they were vncertaine of peace, hauing left ſome of his Gallies for the guard of the Gulph, brought home the reſt of the fleete to Venice. This yeare was not onely famous for deuotion, but for the arriual of the Emperour Fredericke and Leonora his wife into Italie, who were crowned with the imperiall Diademe by Pope Nicholas in S. Peters Church.

The Emperour Fredericke with his wife commeth into Italy.

The ſame yeare the Venetian Prince was by the ſame Pope honoured with the golden ſword, with the girdle, and ornament for his head. Nicolao Canalis, who at that time was Ambaſſador for the Signorie with his Holineſſe, brought theſe preſents to Venice, which the Prince in great ſolemnitie did weare vpon that day that the peace was publiſhed. Peace at the ſame time was treated of with Sforza by Ambaſſadors. Paſcalis Maripietro was to that end ſent to Crema, whither Ambaſſadors were come from Milan to treate of that buſineſſe. The Senate likewiſe ſent Ambaſſa-

The Pope honoreth the venetian prince with the golden ſword the girdle, and ornament for his head.

A motion of peace with Sforza.

Ambaſſadors to congratulate Borſia d'Æſte for his promotion to his new principalitie, who after the death of Leonello had beene with a generall conſent proclaimed Prince. At the ſame time likewiſe Hermolao Donato, a Venetian Gentleman, was murthered. The Senate by a decree, made ſharpe ſearch for the murtherers, and promiſed a perpetuall penſion (beſides a preſent recompence) to him that ſhould bewray them. The Duke of Auſtria, the Emperours brother, in his iourney from Rome towards Germanie came to Venice: The Prince and Senate went to meete him, and being receiued into the Bucentauro, he was conducted to the Pallace of Æſte which was ſumptuouſly prepared for his lodging: and hauing at leiſure viewed the Citie, he went home into Germanie. In the accord which they made with king Alphonſo; the Sienois, the Duke of Sauoy, the Maqueſſe of Montferrat, and the Lords of Corregia were included: their Commiſſioners ſent for that purpoſe, did at one time meete at Venice.

The death of Hermolao Donato.

The Duke of Auſtria commeth to Venice.

Ambaſſadors came from the king of that part of Illiria, which at this day is called Boſſina, who from their maſter did preſent the Prince with foure gallant horſes, hawkes, and flagons of ſiluer; they ſaid that they came, to bring the preſents, and in their maſters name to congratulate in the preſence of the Prince and Senate, the marriage of his daughters; one of whom had married Stephen the Vayuod, and the other, Caloianes Viceroy of Hungarie. And that therfore the King their Lord did wiſh perpetual happineſſe to the Prince, Senate, and people of Venice his friends, for that he had made new alliance with two ſuch great perſonages. That he did beſides take a ſolemne oath to continue a perpetuall friend to the Venetians, which ſo long as he ſhould liue, he would religiouſly keepe. The Prince and Senate did highly thanke the king, and gaue kinde entertainment to the Ambaſſadors.

The king of Boſſina ſendeth preſents to the venetian prince.

Whileſt theſe things were done at Venice, Gentilis Leoneſio, and Tiberto Brandolino, (ſome Authors mention Picinino in ſteede of Brandolino) did by the Senates commandement take fifteene hundred horſe from Coyoni which he had with him on the territorie of Verona, againſt whom, (hauing practiſed ſome noueltie) they came on a ſodaine as they had beene commanded: But himſelfe eſcaping, went to Mantua to Prince Lodouico. At the ſame time king Alphonſo, the Venetians and their aſſociates, did chace the Florentines from their confines, in hatred to Sforza whom they had aſſiſted with money. Carolo Gonzaga vpon the firſt report of this warre came to the Venetians to implore their aid and ſuccour againſt his brother Lodouico, who he ſaid had wrongfully bereft him of thoſe lands which he had till then poſſeſſed by his fathers teſtament. The Venetians did louingly receiue him, and did put him in hope, whether that they had peace or warre ſoone to repoſſeſſe him in his eſtate: and the Commonwealth gaue him in the meane time a thouſand crownes a moneth for the entertainmenr of himſelfe and familie.

Coyone is on a ſodaine and vnlookt for aſſailed by the Senates command.

Carolo Gonzaga imploreth the venetians aide.

Lodouico Biſhop of Aquileia came to Venice, and within a while after Pietro Barbe Cardinall (who when hee came to be Pope, would needs be called Paulo:) great troupes of Gentlemen went forth to meete either of them, and both of them were honorably entertained. But the Emperour Fredericke had more princely reception, who with Leonora his wife came to Venice about the Spring time of the yeare following. For ſuch great numbers of boates neuer went forth to meet any Prince whatſoeuer. It is reported that beſides the Bucentauro richly hung with cloath of gold wherein the Prince and chiefe Senators were, foure great veſſels were ſet forth, whoſe poopes were all guilded, in which were the whole nobilitie of Venice: Theſe followed the Bucentauro as their Admirall: The Gallies went after them. The Ganzares and patiſchermes which are leſſer veſſels, to the number of ſixſcore, were as gallantly decked as thoſe of the Clariſſimi, in which were the common Citizens, who did ſtriue to exceed one another in brauerie. The whole Citie was hung that day with cloath of gold, purple, ſcarlet, and violet colour: In euerie place muſicall inſtruments, ſongs, and ſweet voyces were heard, which did in a manner rauiſh the hearers. Fredericke being come to S. Clements Church, where the

The great entertainment giuen to the Emperour Fredericke, and Leonora his wife at Venice.

Prince

Prince met him, came forth of the Duke of Ferraraes Barge, and went into the Bucentauro where the good old Prince Foſcare welcomed, and ſeated him in a throne of Golde, and then ſate downe next to him : He was with great ioy and generall applauſe conducted through the middeſt of the Cittie to the Pallace of Æſte; which the Common-wealth had richly furniſhed for his lodging.

The Empreſſe Leonora within a while after came to Venice; and to the end that her entrie into the Cittie might be more magnificent, ſhee tarried three dayes at S. Nicholas on the ſhoare; then vpon an holiday ſhe was receiued into the Bucentauro, by the Princes wife, and two hundred of the faireſt Ladies gliſtering with gold, purple, and pretious ſtones : The ſame order of boates as had ſerued for the Emperours reception did wait vpon her through the Cittie, as farre as Saint Euſtace his Church vnto the pallace of the Vitturi where ſhee landed : The chiefe Senators went to viſite her, and to doe her ſeruice in the Morning and Euening : The day was ſpent in feaſting thoſe great Gueſts: The Councell Chamber was richly hung which was filled with the faireſt and nobleſt Ladies of the Cittie : The Senate preſented the Empreſſe ſo ſoone as ſhe entred her Chamber with a Crowne of Golde ſet with three pretious ſtones which were eſteemed to be worth two thouſand ſixe hundred crownes, and with a coate for a little childe as a preſage of her future progenie, with a Cradle-cloth of purple, powdered with pearles. Both of them danced together; The day was ſpent in all delights and pleaſures; And the whole Cittie did keepe many Holie-daies in honour of her great Gueſts, although they had not neglected their care for the warre of Lombardie. Heereby wee may perceiue how curious the Venetians haue euer beene, more than any other people of Italie to giue entertainement to forraine Princes. Fredericke being gone, the Senate the better to prouide for the expences of the warre, made a Decree, that all Officers, aſwell in the Cittie, as abroad, Iudges, Regiſters, and others of meaner qualities vnder great Officers, who in anie kinde had penſion of the Common-wealth, ſhould pay a certaine tribute to the Signiorie : And that the Gentlemen, after that they had executed their yearely charge (for euerie one at the yeares end receiued his pay) ſhould ſerue the Republique gratis for ſixe moneths longer : At this day they ſerue but foure moneths, whereby wee may perceiue that as the tribute hath beene altered (the which is very true) ſo hath the time prefixed likewiſe beene.

The Senates Decree to get money to furniſh the expences for the warres.

At the Spring time warre was renewed with Sforza when Leoneſſo the Venetians Generall, hauing for a time ſcoured the Countrey round about Lodes, Otholenga, Manerbia, and Pontoglio, and taken certaine ſmall Townes by a voluntary yeelding, croſſed the Riuer Adda, at the bridge of Ripata, and went as farre as Milan, vpon the aſſurance of ſome Bandetti, who ſaid, That if the Venetian troups would approach the Cittie, that the people within it would preſently riſe in their behalfe : But notwithſtanding the Venetians arriuall, and that certaine of their light horſe rode into the ſuburbs, there was neuertheleſſe no commotion in the cittie. The Venetian within a while after beſieged Soncina, and battered it with his ordnance.

The Venetian troupes come to the gates of Milan.

The Venetians beſiege Soncina.

The enemie thinking to raiſe the ſiege did croſſe the Oglio at Canedulla, and with twentie thouſand men marched into the Countrey of Breſſia, where hauing taken Gambare by aſſault he beſieged Ponteuico. The Venetians hauing made a reaſonable breach at Soncina, inforced the Inhabitants to yeeld; and from thence, hauing made themſelues Maſters of Romanenga, they marched towards the enemie, who in the meane time had taken Ponteuico vpon the Riuer Oglio, and were gone to Gella, thereby to be the better able to preſſe thoſe of Breſſia: Leoneſſo being incamped in a verie commodious place neare to the enemie, did ſeize vpon the ſtreights of the Marſhes: They fought many times in thoſe places with different euents: There were great numbers of ſouldiers in both armies. The Venetians had fifteene thouſand horſe, and ſixe thouſand foote; and Sforza had three thouſand foote, and eighteene thouſand horſe. Some Hiſtorians ſay, that they fought fiercely Sforza with 20000. men commeth into the Breſſan territorie.

The Venetians march againſt the enemies.

The number of both Armies.

ly at that time for three houres ſpace and more, neare to the Towne of Porſane, and that the loſſe was equall on both ſides, but, that by reaſon of the vnfitneſſe of the place they loſt more horſe than men, and that both ſides would haue fought till they had gotten the victorie, had not darke night ſeparated them, Fortune inclining to neither partie.

William of Montferrat is vanquiſhed by Sacromor Viſconte.

This was done neare to the Riuer Adda, when as William of Montferrat with foure thouſand horſe made fierce incurſions vpon the territorie of Alexandria, and from thence riding towards Tortona and Pauia, he waſted and ſpoiled the whole Countrey: Sacromor Viſconte, and Antonio Burgeſe whome Sforza had ſent againſt him to withſtand his attempts, comming ſodainely to ſtrokes with him vpon the confines of Alexandria, did defeate and inforce him to retire to Caſtelnouo. But whileſt theſe things were done in Lombardie, twelue Venetian Gallies vnder the commaund of Marco Zeno, hauing ſcowred the high and lower Seas, came to Liuorne. And King Alphonſo's royall armie vnder the conduct of Ferdinand, hauing attempted to cauſe Cortona to rebell, went to the Territorie of Rezza, where aſſailing Foilano, they tooke it the fortieth day of the ſiege after ſundrie toyles and interchangeable loſſes.

It is reported that Aſturo Fauentino whileſt Ferdinand lay before Foilano, was twice put to rout by the Kings armie; ſo that at both times hee loſt a thouſand horſe, and certaine foote troupes. From thence the Arragonian Enſignes beeing come to the territorie of Siena, hauing in vaine beſieged Caſtelina, went to winter vpon the ſea-coaſt. Sigiſmund of Arimini Generall of the Tuſcan troupes did greatly vex them.

The Florentines ſend to the French King.

The Florentines fearing the Arragonians and Venetians forces by ſea and land, did by Sforza's aduiſe ſend Angelo Acciola knight of the Order, to the French king, who hauing repreſented to his Maiſtie the Florentines ancient affection towardes himſelfe and his predeceſſors, the King graunted that hee would commaund the Duke of Sauoy to ceaſe from making warre on Sforza, and would perſwade King Renatus (promiſing him to that intent men and money) to vſe meanes to recouer his kingdome of Sicill. This did the Florentines craue, that they might diuert the Venetians and Alphonſo's attempts from Italie.

Sforza likewiſe had ſent to the ſame King to intreate him to procure Renatus to come ſpeedily into Italie. But Lombardie was ſtill in tumult. Bartolomeo Coyone, who (as hath beene ſaid) was by the Senates command diſpoiled of his forces, being followed with a thouſand horſe, tooke manie priſoners and great ſtore of cattell from forth the Breſſan territorie.

Coyone makes incurſions on the Breſſan territorie

Within a while after Giacomo Picinino and Tiberto Brandolino with foure cornets of horſe, defeated ſix Enſignes of Sforza's troupes. The enemie being aduertized by chaunce, that the Venetians departing from the new Orgies were gone to make incurſions vpon his territories, did ſpeedily from his Campe at Quinſſana ſend Bartholmeo Quartiero and Giacomo Salernitano with ſixe Companies of horſe to ſurprize them. But the Venetians hauing intelligence of the enemies comming, and being charged with greater hope than diſcretion neere to Iauenotta a towne on the Cremoneſe, they did couragiouſly abide them, and without anie difficultie did abſolutely defeate them.

It is reported that more than an hundred and ſixtie of Sforzaes men at Armes were taken that day, and that within a while after they tooke a great bootie foorth of the enemies Countrie. For Leoneſſo hauing made a bridge ouer the riuer Adda at Caretta, and fortified both the ends thereof with ſtrong Rampires, ſent part of his cauallery to ſcoure the Milaneſes territories neere to Pauia: whereupon Sforza to inſnare theſe Venetian boot-halers, commanded Aleſſandro his brother to march thither with part of the troupes: Leoneſſo hauing intelligence of the enemies deſigne, cauſed Carolo Montone to march with like number of horſe, to be there before him. Now Aleſſandro ſtaying in a place not farre from the Venetians Fort, and not

not hauing any thought that his enemies were ſo neere him, Carolo on a ſodain gaue a fierce charge vpon him: with which vnexpected accident he was ſo affrighted, as without any other fight he forthwith brake him and became Maſter of the Campe and the whole bagage. But ſome few of them by good fortune eſcaped to Lodes with their Captaine, who otherwiſe had all beene taken priſoners by the Venetians. Sforzas troupes are defeated.

Sforza being troubled with this loſſe departed from his Camp at Gades, and marched to Quinzzana. Mattheo Campana being fauored by the Venetians good fortune, made a furious rode with his cauallerie into the ſtate of Milan. At his returne, being loden with ſpoile, hee met with Thadeo D'Æſte who then ſerued the enemies, with diuers others: both ſides comming preſently to the incounter, after a confuſed fight, the victorie remained to the Venetians: who hauing taken foure hundred horſe from the enemie, retired with his whole bootie to a place of ſafetie. They had no certaine intelligence what Sforzas purpoſe was, after that he had croſſed the riuer Mella, and therefore the Venetians Generall went ſpeedily and encamped at Bagnolls. Sforza within a while after tooke Caluiſiana, hauing made his iournie thither to none other end, but to make it a wintering place for his troupes in the enemies Countrie. Leoneſio went to Gades. This is that which was done in Lombardie during the ſummer ſeaſon. Sforza taketh Caluiſiana.

The Venetian Captaines hauing intelligence by their eſpialls about the middle of harueſt, that great ſtore of victualls was going to the enemies Campe, with a thouſand horſe to conuoy it; Giacomo Picinino, Carolo Gonzaga and Tiberto Brandolino, did with part of the Armie encounter the enemies betwixt Othelenga & Iſſea, two towns on the Breſſan Territorie; who iſſuing forth as from an ambuſcado, did at the firſt charge breake and defeate Sforza's his cauallerie, and tooke diuers waggons loden with victualls, armour and other warlike neceſſaries. But as they were carrying away this rich bootie to their Campe, Sforza being vexed with this loſſe, with expedition made after them, and aſſailed them on their waie: whereupon the Venetian ſodainely turning from his bootie to fight, did couragiouſly ſuſtaine the furie of the enemies. Now fight being fiercely begunne, Hector Brandolino brother to Tiberto, a valiant Gentleman, fighting in the foremoſt rankes was ſlaine, by his death amazing thoſe that were neere him; And although the Venetian for a time brauely withſtood the enemies aſſaults, he would notwithſtanding in the end haue been enforced to giue place, had not Leoneſio come to their reskue with the reſt of the Armie. By his arriuall the battaile was not only reenforced, but made equall, where the fight on either ſide was a while verie doubtfull. In the end Sforza being enforced by the enemies great multitudes, quitted the bootie and retired with his whole forces to the marſhes neere to Otholenga. And thus the Venetians being Maſters of the bootie, went home to their Campe. The death of Hector Brandolino. A fierce fight with victorie on neither ſide.

Winter alreadie was at hand, when as the enemie hauing ſent his bagage before him, ſoone after repaired to his wintering places. But it is reported that Sforza before his departure, at ſuch time as he remained at Caluiſiana, preſented battaile to the Venetians. They were at that time at Gades and had twentie thouſand men in their Armie, wherefore they reſolued to fight and came downe into the plaine. But the enemie beeing retired, the Venetian Armie followed him ſomewhat cloſely, where Sforza being againe inuited to fight could not be drawne to it. Wee finde in ſome Authors that Sforza had ordered his Armie readie to fight, but that whilſt he expected the Venetian, there fell a great ſhower of raine which enforced him to retire before the Venetians arriuall. This ſeemeth to be truer than that which ſome Annaliſts write: How that he durſt not fight, but did flatly refuſe the battaile. If this were true, I doe greatly wonder that ſo valiant a Captaine who had ſo often fought with diſplaied Enſignes, and obtained ſo manie victories, (and who, if any of our time may be compared to Cæſar the Dictator either in magnanimitie, proſperitie, or good fortune, is the only worthie reputed Captain in moſt mens iudgement) hauing purchaſed ſo goodly a Principalitie with ſuch gallant forces and braue Souldiers, without any great loſſe, & being prouoked to fight, ſhould refuſe the battaile. Sforza compared to Cæſar.

It

It may be that fearing the alteration of fortune, he was become more deliberate: as he to whom we haue compared him was likewiſe in his later yeares: who after ſo manie gallant victories is reported not to haue fought ſo vehemently as hee was wont. Perhaps his new purchaſed State was the cauſe thereof, the which, being on euery ſide encompaſſed with enemies, he might haue endangered, if he ſhould haue put it to the hazzard of a battaile: But whatſoeuer it were that kept him from it, it is reported that without fight he went to his winter-garriſons. After his departure, certaine townes of thoſe which he had taken the ſummer before, in the following harueſt returned to the Venetians obedience. Coyoni, or (according to ſome Authours) Aleſſandro, Sforza's brother, hauing giuen an aſſault to the Fort which the Venetians had built at Sarretta, tooke it by treacherie. He was afterwards commanded to march againſt the Marquis of Montferrat, where being deſpoiled of part of his troups, and bagage, he returned like a Run-awaie to the Camp. The Venetians on the other ſide were not idle, but being come from their winter-garriſons, they entred furiouſly vpon the Mantuan Territorie, where hauing taken Streueres, they brought awaie great bootie. Carolo Gonzaga in like manner draue all thoſe of the Gybelline Faction forth of the valley of Saſſina in the Bergameſe, and left it free to the Venetians. During theſe exploits in Lombardie, King Alphonſo did ſtill purſue the Florentines, intending wholly to ruine them, and to thoſe endes made great warlike preparations againſt the ſpring time: For it was reported that his intent was to take Liuorne, hoping thereby within a while after to become Maſter of Piſa; And to that ende he ſpeedily cauſed two Argoſies to be made of a wonderfull greatneſſe. The Venetians likewiſe by the accord betwixt them, did furniſh him with certaine armed Gallies. The French king on the contrarie partie had cauſed the Duke of Sauoie to lay downe armes, and had perſwaded Renatus to paſſe into Italie againſt Alphonſo, aſſuring him that by the helpe of the Florentines and Sforza, who promiſed him men and money, he ſhould ſhortly recouer his kingdome.

Sforza refuſing to fight retireth to his winter garriſons.

Alphonſo purſueth the Florentines.

About this time newes came from Greece How the Turkes grew ſtrong neere to Conſtantinople, and that Mahomet Ottoman their king, a Potent, rich, and ambitious Prince, and then in the prime of his yeares, had builded a Fort at the Out-let of the Pontick-Sea, neere to Saint Georges Arme, and that thereby it was euident to all men that his deſignes tended to the entire ſubuerſion of the Greeke Empire. Pope Nicholas being troubled theſe warlike menaces, as well abroade as in Italie, whileſt hee firſt made meanes to ſettle a peace in Italie, was by a domeſticke conſpiracie like to haue beene vndone himſelfe. Stephano Porcieri or Portius, was the Principall conſpirator, Diuers of that family ſo terme themſelues and deriue their originall from Marcus Portuis Cato that noble Roman; but the armes of their houſe doe argue the contrarie.

The Turkes intend to inuade Conſtantinople.

This man being richer in nobilitie of birth than wealth & ſubſtance, & withal verie eloquent, was alreadie ſomewhat ſuſpected by the Pope in regard of his inſolent carriage; & therefore to reſtraine him from practizing any ſedition in Rome he ſent him firſt into Germanie vnder colour of ſome negotiation, from whence returniug home, he was inioined to dwell at Bologna, on condition neuertheleſſe, dailie to ſhew himſelfe to the Biſhop of Nice who commanded there as Viz-legate: But he being deſirous of innouation did practiſe vnder-hand by truſtie meſſengers, or rather by letters written in caractters, (for it is not certainely knowne how it was) certaine debauched Romans, to execute a damned act; which was, That vpon a preſixed day all the conſpiratours ſhould meet at Rome, where hauing at once aſſailed the Pope and Cardinalls in the Church during the time of Diuine ſeruice, they ſhould kill them all, and then inuite the Roman people to embrace their libertie. Heereupon feigning to be ſick he kept his houſe, till he had aſſured notice that the conſpirators were all readie in Rome. For then leaping on horſe-backe, hee came by great iournies to the citie. But his departure was not long concealed from the Biſhop, who doubting ſome treacherie, did by ſundrie meſſengers aduertized the Pope, how that Stephano Porcio his conſpiracie againſt the Pope.

Ste-

Stephano Porcio without his knowledge had left Bolognia, and that he could not learne whither he was gone, but that hee chiefly feared that he was gone to Rome, to diſturbe the peace of that Citie. Porciero being wearied with his long trauaile and watching, betooke himſelfe to reſt, which gaue the meſſengers leiſure opportunely to deliuer their letters, which the Pope receiued the night before the day of execution, who being amazed at the matter, did ſodainly reſolue to put him to death: The charge thereof was committed to Giacomo Lauaniola of Verona, who at that time was a Senator of Rome, and to diuers others. Theſe with a troupe of armed men being come where Stephano was, he heard a noiſe, and being amazed, eſcaped to his ſiſters houſe, hauing left Baptiſta Sarra in his, with the armed men whome he had aſſembled for the execution of that miſchieuous plot. Now Baptiſta being a valiant man, ſo ſoone as he perceiued himſelfe enuironed with fire and armes, made way by force through the Popes ſouldiers. But the Author of the conſpiracie being taken at his ſiſters houſe, was put to death. This matter in ſome ſort diuerted the Popes affection from peace.

Stephano Porcio is put to death.

About the Spring-time of this yeare, the Florentines aſwell with their owne troupes as with thoſe of Sforza, recouered Foglian which they had loſt the yeare before, when Alphonſo as yet had not raiſed any tumults in Tuſcanie. Sforza in the Winter-time came to Cremona to aide Lodouico Gonzaga whom his brother Carolo did neerely preſſe: But he thought it neceſſarie rather to relieue the Manerbians whom the Venetians had a long time beſieged. The Venetian hauing repulſed him after ſome skirmiſhes betweene them which neuer came to any ſet battaile with a reſolued conſtancie continued his ſiege. But whileſt Leoneſio in that place performed the part of a vigilant Captaine, he was ſhot into the bodie with an arrow, whereof ſhortly after he died. Some ſay that he was ſlaine before that time, and that the Generals place was giuen to Picinino, before Sforza came forth of his Winter Garriſons.

The Florentines recouer Foglian

Leoneſio his death.

This diſaſter was within a while after accompanied with another. For Carolo Gonzaga hauing made a raſh attempt vpon his brothers troupes betwixt Gades and Villafranca was broken and put to rout, with the loſſe of ſeuen hundred horſe. Picinino was not idle, for after that he had taken Manerbia, Quinzano, and within a while after, Ponteuico, which was manned with a ſtrong Garriſon, he went and beſieged Seniga, from whence by reaſon of Sforzas arriuall, he diſcamped and retired to Ponteuico. The enemie gaue an aſſault to Gades, and tooke it. Then there was a cruell fight neere to that place by meanes of Picininos arriuall, where Lodouico Gonzaga whom Sforza had ſent for thither, had like to haue beene defeated by the enemie (for the Venetian charged firſt vpon him) had not Sforza opportunely come to his reskue. The Venetians departing thence went and encamped at Porciana betwixt two marſhes. Sforza in the meane time commanded Roberto Sanſeuerino, and Tiberto, to go and waſt the Breſſian countrey. Picinino went and aſſailed them being loden with ſpoile, and tooke the greateſt part of their bootie from them. Sforza thereupon ſpeedily marched againſt him, but the bickering being quickly ended, the Venetian with his Armie retired ſafely to his campe.

Sundrie combats and incounters betwixt the Venetians and Sforzans.

Both Armies did often skirmiſh with one another as occaſion was offered; and Summer was halfe ſpent, when king Renatus hauing driuen the enemies from the confines of Alexandria, came to Sforza with foure thouſand horſe. At his arriuall he ſent an Herald at Armes to denounce warre to the Venetians. The enemies forces being thus encreaſed (for they had in their Armie, together with the French ſuccours, ſixe ſcore companies of men at Armes) they departed from Gades, and hauing croſſed the riuer Mella, they went and encamped at Baſſan betwixt Manerbia and Ponteuico. The Venetians likewiſe (for Antonio Marcello, and Paſcalis Maripietro were come as Prouidators to the camp) marched to Manerbia, and from thence went and encamped at Porciana. The enemie ſo ſoone as the Venetian had diſlodged, did by a voluntarie yeelding enter into Manerbia. Then Sforza and Renatus gaue an aſſault to Ponteuico, which they tooke by force, hauing beſieged it a while, and ouerthrew the walles down to the ground. It is reported that the French in that place did deale verie cruelly with the wretched inhabitants, which did in ſuch ſort amaze all the townes round about, as whatſoeuer the Venetians held in the plaines of Cremona and Breſſia, (Soncina and Romanenga excepted) did in a ſhort ſpace yeeld themſelues to the enemie. Picinino by this reuolt being enforced to giue place, did ſodainly march towards Breſſia, and encamped in a verie ſtrong place, betwixt the Citie, the mounraines, and a lake, which commeth forth of the riuer Cleſia, from whence he might eaſily defend the inhabitants of the mountaines, and all the Breſſan countrey which lieth towards the lake of La Garda.

King Renatus commeth to Sforzas companie.

Manerbia and Ponteuico yeeld to Sforza.

Such ſucceſſe had the Venetians affaires in Lombardie. But the Senate was not ſo much troubled for the danger of this warre, as with the newes from Greece, How that Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour had beſieged Conſtantinople. Whereupon, for feare of looſing ſo commodious a place for Chriſtians (for, that being left there was no more hope of trafficke vpon the Ponticke Sea) the Senate made a decree to ſend forth tenne Gallies to the aide of the Citie vnder the command of Giacomo Lauretano: They did beſide command two great Argozies of two thouſand tunnes a peece to be made readie. Lauretano within a while after departed from Venice with fiue Gallies, for by the Senates command he was to take other fiue out of Dalmatia and Candie. Alphonſo promiſed to ſend tenne Gallies, and the Pope as many, which fleet of thirtie Gallies was in their names to be ſent to the aide of Conſtantinople.

Conſtantinople beſieged.

But Othoman in the meane time had beſieged the Citie by Sea and Land with three hundred thouſand fighting men, and three hundred ſeuentie fiue ſhips of warre, among which were ſeuenteene Gallies of three Oares on a banke, and others of two, with many other ſmaller veſſels. This they report which were preſent at the ſiege. The Venetian Annals ſet downe leſſe by the third part, as well of ſouldiers, as of veſſels.

Conſtantine Paleologus did at that time command the Greeke Empire, who to withſtand the enemies, had cauſed an yron chaine of a wonderfull greatneſſe to be drawne athwart the Hauen from Conſtantinople to Pera. The Venetian Gallies returning from trafficke forth of the Ponticke Seas, remained in the Hauen for the aide of that Chriſtian Citie. Certaine ſhips of Candie were likewiſe there, and an Argozie of Genoa of a wonderfull bigneſſe, whereof Georgio Doria was Captaine. Then three other Genoa ſhips of like bigneſſe which came from Chios arriued there being loden with men and victuals. As they entred the Hauen in the Cities view, the Turkes veſſels went and aſſailed them, whereupon there began a bloudie fight on both ſides, which laſted long without any aduantage to either partie. In the end, the Gallies and other veſſels that lay at Anker not farre from thence comming to their reskue, the Turkes quitted the place, and retired to the pillars of Pera. The laſt that arriued there, was Giouanni Iuſtiniano of Genoa ſurnamed the Long, with two Argoſies wherein were three hundred ſouldiers.

Aide entereth into Conſtantinople by Sea.

The Emperour hauing embraced him, and entertained him with faire promiſes, he committted vnto him the guard of the Romane gate. Nicolao Molino, and Giouanni Lauretano kept the gate Cherſina: Baptiſta Gritti with diuers other Venetians, who by chance were at thoſe troubles of Conſtantinople, guarded the Pallace of Paleologus: And by reaſon that the enemies nauall Armie had beene beaten forth of the Gulph, all was ſafe on the Sea ſide: The Turkes greateſt furie was towards the land. They had brought diuers great peeces of Ordnance in ſundrie places neere to the walles, and eſpecially at the gate Sutrina.

There and elſewhere the continuall ſhot of Ordnance had beaten downe a great part of the walles: But the Turke, that he might diuide the forces of the beſieged in ſundrie places, and thereby make them weaker reſolued, (for otherwiſe he could not doe it) to cauſe part of his veſſels to be carried by land ouer into the Gulph. He did without reſiſtance draw ſeuentie fiue Gallies from the pillars of Pera into the waters of the cattle neere to the walles, & commanded an aſſault to be giuen to the Citie on that ſide with threeſcore and ten thouſand men. He himſelfe came to guard thoſe veſſels whileſt they were drawne forth of the water for feare leaſt the Armie ſhould on a ſodaine come and ſet fire on them. He had beſide planted certaine peeces of ordnance ouer-againſt the mouth of the Gulph, oppoſite to the cittie, not ſo much to batter the walls, as to keep the Chriſtian Gallies from approaching. Some ſay that thoſe of Pera might haue hindered the Turkes in their enterprize of carrying their Gallies into the Gulph, but that they were vnwilling to doe it for feare of drawing that warlike tempeſt vpon themſelues.

vvaters

The Gallies being thus drawne into the Gulph, there was nothing more certaine, than that ſuch ill neighbors would ſoone procure the ruine of the cittie. The Venetians and other Chriſtians, although in number of men and ſhips they were farre inferiour to the Turkes, did neuertheleſſe reſolue to aſſaile them; ſuppoſing that by a ſodaine aſſault they might amaze them, and in that feare, to ſet fire on their veſſelles. To further whoſe purpoſe the night was verie darke and miſtie, whereby the enemie was ſo farre off from diſcerning them, as they could hardly deſerie one another. It is thought, That the enemie could by no meanes haue diſcouered the intent of our men, and that perhappes the Turkes nauie might haue beene defeated, and Chriſtendome thereby freed from the loſſe of ſo noble a Citie, or at leaſt wiſe, that it would not haue happened ſo ſoone; if thoſe of Pera, who deſired the ruine of the Citie, had not diſcouered the Chriſtians deſigne to the enemies: By whoſe aduertiſement Mahomet ſent the ſame night as many ſouldiers to ouerthrow our nauall Armie, as he had done at the former time.

The Captaines of the Chriſtians veſſells being full of hope and courage, ſet forward againſt the enemie, thinking that their comming had not beene knowne; but the Turkes being prepared for fight, waited for them, and did not onely courageouſly receiue them, but hauing on a ſodaine diſcharged a piece of ordnance vpon a Candiot gallie, which was commaunded by Zacharia Gria, they went to inuiron all the reſt. The Chriſtians being amazed to ſee them in that readineſſe, turned theyr backes. One Gallie which was commaunded by Giacomo Cocco comming inconſiderately with two others to charge the enemie, was by a cannon-ſhot ſuncke in the enemies view, with all thoſe in a maner that were in her; Three and thirty men that fell into the enemies hands, were murthered before the Cities gates.

A great quantitie of the wall in the meane time on the other ſide of the Cittie neere to the gate Sutrina was beaten downe. This breach was foorthwith repaired with new fortifications according to the vſuall maner. The Turke attempted to enter the Cittie by a mine, which tooke no effect; for by a counter-mine it was made vnprofitable. A Tower at the Roman gate which the canons had much ſhaken, fell downe, and had made a great breach, and neere thereunto the enemie had raiſed a rampire and gabions againſt the Chriſtians ordnance. There was a great breach neere to the gate Cherſina, which cauſed Mahomet, vpon hope to enter the cittie there, to giue a furious aſſault. The Turkes, the more to amaze the beſieged, did before day enter the rampires with fearefull and terrible clamours. The Emperour riding vp and downe the cittie, incouraged his ſouldiers to fight valiantly for their Countrey, wiues, children, and liues, telling them, That the time was come, that vnleſſe they did brauely beare themſelues, that famous Cittie would not onely be loſt, but the fame and renowme of ancient Greece would bee cleane extinguiſhed. Hee tolde them moreouer that they had to doe with an enemie, from whom they were to expect no grace nor fauour: It therefore behoued them, either to liue with their Countrey, or to die with her ruine. The Emperours exhortation to his ſouldiers.

This did hee ſpeake to the ſouldiers as hee walked the round vpon the walles; but comming to the Roman Gate, hee found Iuſtiniano the Genoueſe grieuouſly wounded, who began to talke of yeelding, from which the Emperour could by no meanes diuert him. It is reported that the Emperour perceiuing thoſe that fought in Iuſtinians companie, to thinke on nothing but flight, did ſtand in his place with thoſe few forces that he brought with him, and that hee did brauely attempt to beate the enemies from the walles; but perceiuing that his ſouldiers were too weake to reſiſt ſuch multitudes, hee was well-neere ready to haue ſlaine himſelfe. But conſidering that it did not become a Chriſtian to vſe ſuch deſperate meanes, he did intreate his owne ſouldiers to kill him, and vpon their refuſall ſo to doe, he reſolued to die more nobly. For hee threw from him his Imperiall ornaments, fearing if he ſhould be knowne, that they would take him aliue, and with his ſword in hand ran in among the thickeſt of the Turkes that were entring, where this Prince, worthie of eternall memorie, fighting valiantly with the enemies was ſlaine by them. His bodie falling downe, together with that great Empire, was confuſedly mingled among his other ſubiects: and being afterwards knowne among the dead bodies, his head by Mahomets commaund was ſtricken off, and borne in triumph through the Campe and Cittie. Some ſay that hee was ſmothered at the Roman Gate among the throng which fled, and that hee was afterwards knowne by his Coate-armour. The enemies nauall armie was not idle in the meane time: for the Venetian Gallies, and the reſt of the Chriſtian nauall armie, with diuers others who came running to the ſhippes at the enemies firſt aſſault, being out of hope to defend the cittie, preſently went their way, but the Turkes tooke diuerſe of them neere the ſea-ſhoare. The city was wholly ſacked, Virgins were defloured, yong boyes forced, and wiues tormented with deteſtable filthineſſe, according to the maner of that cruell Nation. Men that eſcaped death were made ſlaues. Diuerſe Venetians were on that day ſlaine and taken, among whom were ſeuen and fortie Gentlemen.

The Emperour in deſpaire.

The death of the Emperor of Conſtantinople.

The Turkiſh crueltie.

In this manner was Conſtantinople the chiefe cittie of Grecia taken by Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour, and thus was that moſt ancient Grecian Empire ouerthrowne, the yeare 1121. after the eſtabliſhment thereof. The newes of this loſſe gaue great terrour to all Chriſtendome. Pope Nicholas ſent to Venice to haue fiue Gallies armed at his charge againſt the Turkes, and propounded to as manie as ſhould take armes vnder the Enſignes of the Roman church againſt thoſe Infidells plenarie remiſſion of all ſinnes, which they had till then committed: And if anie ſouldier that was forth of pay ſhould refuſe to enroule himſelfe for that warre, hee did incurre his bitter curſe.

Pope Nicholas recompence to as many as ſhold take armes againſt the Turkes

The Venetians ſent Bartolomeo Marcello to Mahomet, to craue reſtitution of their countrymen with their goods. An other Meſſenger went ouerland before Marcello, who promiſed to returne to Venice from Conſtantinople within fiue and thirtie dayes. The Senate was verie deſirous to vnderſtand what was become of thoſe Venetians which were in Conſtantinople when it was taken, whether they were ſtill aliue or dead, and if they were liuing, in what ſtate they were, either at liberty or captiues. The aboue mentioned Gallies, with certaine ſhippes of burthen, had alreadie before then ſailed to ſea vnder the commaund of Giacomo Laurctano, who vpon newes of the taking of Conſtantinople retired into the Iſle of Nigrepont.

The Senate thought vpon this new warre, whileſt all Lombardie was filled with armes and ſouldiers: for Sforza hauing recouered all towns vpon the plaine approched with his armie neere to Rhoades, that he might become Maſter of the mountaine: where during his abode, the townes of Romans, Martinenga, the Camonick valley, and Briſanza yeelded to him; the like did all the Inhabitants of the Gyradade. Rhoades alſo being afterwards taken, hee went to beſiege the new Orgies, in which meane ſpace, thoſe of Soncina yeelded to him. At the laſt, the Orgies being recouered, Romanenga, who alone did obey the Venetians, did voluntarily yeelde as the reſt had done. Afterwards, there were no greater exploits done in Lombardie.

Sforzaes exploits in Lombardie.

He takes Rhoads the Orgies, Soncina, and Romanenga.

Toward the latter end of Harueſt when Winter drew neere Sforza was deſirous in the behalfe of Lodouico Gonzaga to take Aſola, but he was inforced to giue ouer his his enterprize, and to put it off till ſome other time, as well by reaſon of a mightie tempeſt which then happened, as in regard of the continuall raine that followed it. Renatus being in a rage (as it is ſuppoſed) againſt the Florentines and Sforza, went hisway in the middeſt of Winter, and returned through the countrie of Aſt and Thurin into Fraunce.

But to returne to the affaires of Greece. The Venetians being deſirous to vnderſtand of the welfare of thoſe, who with the cittie of Conſtantinople had beene taken by the Turks, had intelligence within a while after by ſome that came to Venice, that the Venetians that were taken in Conſtantinople were priſoners, and that the enemie had vſed no crueltie on thoſe whom Fortune had ſaued: within a while after Lauretano's letters did aſſure the Senate of the priſoners redemption, and that the Turkes for ſeuen thouſand crownes would ſet them at liberty. The very ſame day of theſe newes, the Popes Nuncio came to Venice, who was receiued by great troupes of people. Hee ſpake to the Senate concerning peace which he ſaid he had motioned at Florence, and ſaid, that at his departure thence, he would go to Sforza to treate likewiſe with him: And that the Pope did determine to quiet Italie, the better afterwards to preuent the great daunger which threatned all Chriſtendome from the Turkes, and to that end, he was deſirous to be Iudge and Vmpire of that peace, and that hee which ſhould impugne it, ſhould be held as excommunicate, and for an enemie, not onely to Italie, but to all Chriſtendome. This aduertiſement beeing giuen, which the Venetians did willingly entertaine, hee tooke his leaue of the Venetians, and went to Sforza.

The Popes Nuncio commeth to Venice to treate of peace.

Lauretano who had intelligence (as hath been ſaid) of the taking of Conſtantinople, was gone to Nigrepont, from whence he writ to the Senators, certifying them That he was reſolued to tarrie there for the guard of the Iſland; that he had ſunke foure of the enemies great Gallies, and thirteene other ſmall ones; that their Rowers and Mariners ſwimming to Land had beene all ſlaine by the Countrie people; and that he had hanged thoſe whom he tooke in the Gallies. No ſooner were Lauretans letters read in the Senate, but the Popes Gallies which were readie to ſet ſaile were commanded to goe and ioine with their Nauall Armie; with which Lauretano being ſtrengthened, determined to tarrie for the Gallies from Alexandria and Syria, and then with that mightie Fleet to ſet forwards againſt the enemies, whom he had ſtill forborne to meddle with, till ſuch time as the troubles of Italie being pacified, he might increaſe the number of his veſſells.

Lauretano his exploits in the Iſle of Nigrepont.

Within a while after, Chriſtophero Moro and Vrſo Iuſtiniano were ſent to Rome to treate of peace with the other Ambaſſadors of Italie in the Popes preſence. The Venetian cauallerie before the Ambaſſadors departure had ſurprized certaine victualls from the enemie, together with thoſe which conuoied it, but after that the treatie of peace was mentioned the Venetians made no more incurſions into Lombardie: Yet, becauſe they would not ſeeme quite to abandon the Prouince, they ſent a certaine number of Archers and ſome veſſells thither by the Riuer Po. They did afterwards make a league with the Genoueſes and thoſe of Luca, for which, generall proceſſions were made in the Citie. They did likewiſe at the ſame time procure Bartilmeo Coyoni vnderhand to come and ſerue them.

Chriſtophero Moro and Vrſo Iuſtiniano are ſent Ambaſſadors to Rome.

But whileſt this was done, the Popes fiue Gallies which at the beginning went againſt the Turkes, about the Spring-time returned to Venice without Lauretano's leaue. Giouanni Dandulo, Antonio Quirini, Andrea, and Nicholao Contareni who were Captaines of them, were by the Senates decree committed to priſon: Andrea Contareni and Giouanni Dandulo being found guiltleſſe were acquitted, and the reſt condemned in a pecuniarie fine and to indure impriſonment for half a yeare, & were declared vnworthie euer after to haue any command at Sea: And againſt foure others of meaner qualitie who were known to haue been the cheefe motiues of leauing the army, they proceeded more ſharply than againſt the gentlemen; for they were whipt from the market-place to Rialto, and their noſes being ſlit they were for euer banniſhed the Citie.

The Captaines of the Gallies are puniſhed becauſe they left the fleet without leaue.

The conditions of peace concluded by meanes of an Hermit.

Within a while after, peace was concluded with Sforza & the Florentines, which, contrarie to the Popes opinion was effected by meanes of Simon Camertes the Hermit, who after ſundry iournies concluded it on theſe conditions: That Sforza ſhould reſtore to the Venetians whatſoeuer he had taken from them in the laſt warre (the Townes of the Gyradade excepted) That the Marquis of Mantua ſhould reinueſt his brother Carolo in his State: That the Florentines ſhould receiue from Alphonſo whatſoeuer he had taken from them, (Chaſtillon excepted and the Sienna Territorie belonging to the Florentines): And for the greater confirmation of that peace, the Pope interpoſed his authoritie, and it was expreſly mentioned, that if hencefforward any ſtrife did ariſe betwixt them, that the Pope ſhould haue ample authoritie to decide and end it, That either of them which ſhould firſt take Armes againſt the other, after the wrong knowne ſhould preſently be declared an enemie not only to the partie wronged, but to the Pope, and to as many as had beene preſent at that accord. And in this manner by theſe conditions of peace, euerie one was ſatisfied, ſauing the Genoueſes. For Alphonſo would ſtill continue warre againſt them; which we muſt ſuppoſe to haue beene graunted him, becauſe otherwiſe hee would hardly haue beene drawne to haue conſented to the peace which enſued.

The great reioicing at Venice in regard of the peace.

The Citie of Venice being tired with ſo long a warre had neuer a more welcome day than that, when peace was publiſhed ouer the Citie with ſound of trumpet: They did firſt appoint praiers to be made in Churches, and generall proceſſions, in which, the relicks and images of Saints were carried about with great ſolemnity, the whole Clergie following them with the Prince and Senate, and all the orders of the Citie. The night following manie torches were lighted, and other ſignes of ioie were ſhewed ouer all the Citie. This was in the yeare of our Saluation 1454, and the eighth after the warre was renued in Lombardie againſt Philip concerning Cremona, & the fifth againſt Sforza in the behalfe of their aſſociates the Milaneſes. Italie was afterwards a long time quiet, and eſpecially Lombardie, which was very peaceable till ſuch time as it felt the terrible tempeſt of the Ferrareſe war.

Ambaſſadours ſent into Germanie to the Emperour.

Zacharia Trenſano and Nicholao Canalis were ſent Ambaſſadors into Germanie to the Emperour Frederick who had written to moſt parts of Europe, That Commiſſioners might be ſent to him, with whom to conſult in open aſſembly concerning the warre with the Turke. Bartilmeo Marcello did in the meane time returne from Conſtantinople, who in the Republikes name had made peace with Mahomet and freely obtained of him whatſoeuer he craued. Mahomets Ambaſſadours followed Marcello to Venice to cauſe that peace to be ratified. But the Senate fearing to do any thing inconſiderately, did delay the buſineſſe a long time, till the league among Chriſtians was contracted, and then, (for they rather wiſhed the wealth and commoditie of Italie and all Chriſtendome than any good to the Turke) they would haue war and no peace with him. Yet, in the mean ſpace, becauſe they would not ſeeme to contemne the friendſhip of ſo mightie a Prince, they returned the ſame Marcello together with the Turkes Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople with new Articles, & commiſſion, that if Mahomet ſhould receiue them, then to conclude peace in the name of the Common-wealth, and that he ſhould remaine there as their Magiſtrate.

The Venetians great diſcretion in doing nothing without good aduice.

But heere an occaſion may ſeeme to be offered to condemne and tax the Venetians. It was very well knowne that the Venetians had forſaken the Chriſtians alliance (will ſome detractor ſay) in regard they had inioined their Ambaſſador, that if the Turke ſhould entertain the offred conditions, then to make peace with him, the which being once ſworne to, it would not haue beene lawfull for them (their publike faith ſaued) to alter. But we muſt imagine that they did foreſee this; for wee finde no certainetie thereof, becauſe that the enterpriſe againſt the Turks had been propounded in the Emperors preſence two moneths before, ſo as it is to be ſuppoſed, that it was then concluded, whereupon they had time ynough to determine which was the profitableſt way for their commonwealth, though perhaps ſome wil be of another opinion. But according to al mens ſaying, the Venetians dealt very diſcreetly, creetly, as they haue alwaies done, who would not raſhly thruſt themſelues into ſo dangerous a warre, wherein being entangled by Sea and Land, the other Princes of Europe might in deriſion haue looked a farre off vpon their loſſe and ouerthrow, as it hapned within a few yeares after, when the Venetians beeing enforced to make warre on the Turke, they were not onely forſaken of all other Chriſtians, but were betraied in the verie confines of Italie. But we will ſpeake of this in his place.

Let vs now returne to that which happened after the peace in Lombardie, which ſeemeth to be worthy the noting becauſe that armes being ſcarce laied down, a new war had like to haue entangled the Venetians at their doores. The Senate demanded Bagnacauallo a dependant on Rauenna, and ſome other Townes of the Polleſin, of Borſia D'Æſte. To this end they ſent meſſengers to him to Ferrara to denounce war according to their cuſtome, vnleſſe he did ſurrender thoſe Townes which they demanded. But he being a louer of peace, and one that made great account of the Venetians friendſhippe, did by his Ambaſſadour write to the Prince and Senate, that hee deſired peace with them and no warre, and that hee would referre himſelfe to their diſcretion: Vpon this honeſt anſwere they did preſently lay down their Armes which they had alreadie put on, and attempted nothing aga nſt him.

The honeſt anſwer of the Ferrarois.

Then the Venetians hauing changed the warre by Land to that by Sea, did Arme two veſſells againſt Nauipator the Venetian, who hauing receiued ſome diſgrace of his fellow-Citizens, was become a Pirate. The Senate accounted it an heynous matter that any Venetian ſhould in thoſe dayes ſcoure and robbe the Seas, ſeeing that their Anceſtors from the firſt foundation of their Citie had rigorouſly purſued ſuch theeues. About the ſame time Victore Capello was ſent to the Princes of Morea, who foreſeeing the great danger which threatned them from the Turkes had ſent to the Prince and Senate of Venice, to treate with them about the deliuering vp of their Iſland into the Venetians hands, prouided that they would giue them in recompence as much reuenue in Italie as would ſuffice for their honourable entertainment according to their preſent fortune, though not ſo much as they were wont to haue.

The Genoueſes come into Morea for the ſame purpoſe as the Venetians did.

At Capels arriuall, the Genoueſes had approached the Iſland in hope to become Maſters thereof, their Nauall Armie conſiſting of tenne Gallies and eighteene other ſhippes of warre. Lauretano likewiſe was come thither with his Gallies; Each of them did but waite for a fit occaſion. The ſame yeare there were ſuch Terrible tempeſts ouer all Italie and eſpecially vpon the Venetians Coaſts, as wonderfull hurt was done thereby. It is reported that one ſtorme brake as manie glaſſe windowes in Venice, as were thought to be worth ſeuen thouſand Ducats. The Venetians being at peace euer ſinte the taking of Conſtantinople, there was no Prince nor Common-wealth in all Italie that had warre, but only Pope Calixtus and the Genoueſes: who for the loſſe of Pera (for ſo ſoone as Conſtantinople was taken, thoſe of Pera yeelded) had ſome attempts vpon the Turkes. Calixtus all the time of his Papacie did not ceaſe both by Letters and meſſages to ſtirre vp all Europe to take Armes againſt thoſe Infidells, and to thoſe endes, himſelf Armed thirteene Gallies, whereof Lodouico Patriarke of Aquileia was made Generall. This man for three yeares ſpace, did ſcoure all the Sea Coaſts of Aſia, doing great harme, and tooke diuers Iſlands from Mahomet.

This cruell Tyrant in the meane time preuailed ſo farre in Europe by an admirable courſe of victorie as he ſubdued all Thrace, the Tribals, and Macedonia: and in Aſia likewiſe he vtterly ſubuerted the Empire of Trebiſond, howbeit rather by treacherie than force of Armes: Then he tooke the old & new Foglies; and drawing one war from an other, he ſeiſed on Imbria and Smirna: Then he tooke from the Gatheloſis of Genoa (againſt whom he began the war about a child) the Iſle of Leſbos which yeelded on conditions: He did afterwards vſurp vpon Boſſina, killing the king there-thereof: And in a manner, reduced vnder his Empire whatſoeuer the Chriſtian Princes had till then enioied, from Conſtantinople as farre as Albania and Dalmatia, betwixt Hungarie and the Danubie, and the Ionian and Ægean Seas. But whileſt the Infidell made all theſe conqueſts, the Venetians attempted nothing, although their aide ſundrie times had beene earneſtly implored. Morea onely (which at laſt they tooke from the Princes Thomas & Demetrius) did certaine yeares after Arme againſt the Turke. We will in the bookes following ſet downe the originall and ſucceſſe of that warre. But whileſt Othoman executed theſe exploits the which we thought good briefely to touch, in regard they do in ſome ſort belong to our Hiſtorie, the Venetians had no warre.

The Turkes good ſucceſſe both in Aſia & Europe.

The end of the ſeuenth Booke of the third Decad.

THE EIGHTH BOOKE OF THE THIRD DECAD

Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the eighth Booke of the third Decad.

THE Prince accompanieth the funeralls of his Predeceſſour, which was neuer ſeene before, ſince the cuſtome of aſſociating a Colleague was aboliſhed. The cauſe of the warre againſt OTTOMAN. The Deſcription of Morea. The Venetians hauing taken Argiers, fortifie the Streight. The Venetian Armie hath no good ſucceſſe at the ſiege of Corinth. The Venetians in Italie beſiege Thryeſte. The Turkes driue the Venetians from the Streight. They fight twice with good ſucceſſe againſt the Turkes before Naples. The ſieges before Thryeſte and Arimini are raiſed at one time. The Venetians being vanquiſhed at Talamata in Morea, receiue a notable ouerthrow. VRSO IVSTINIANO doth twice aſſaile thoſe of Mitylene in Lesbos with great loſſe of his ſouldiers. SIGISMVND of Arimini taketh Sparta by aſſault. VENIERI his Gallie hauing in the night-time paſſed beyond the Dardaneans, returneth ſafely to his Countrymen. Pope PIVS being come to Ancona, dieth within a while after that the Prince and Venetians nauall Armie came thither. Supplies of money are giuen to the King of Hungarie in the name of all Chriſtendome. VICTOR CAPELLO after that hee had fortunately executed diuers gallant enterpriſes vpon the enemies, at laſt receiuing an ouerthrow at Patras, dieth with griefe. BARTHOLOMEO of Bergamo, ſurnamed COYONI, comming into Flaminia had like to haue endaungered the Venetians with a new warre. NICHOLAO CANALIS Generall of the Venetians nauall Armie ruineth Oenos. MAHOMET hauing a long time beſieged Negrepont, takes it in fine, to the great hurt of the Venetians.

THE Venetians State for the ſpace of tenne yeeres had peace both by Sea and Land. But this ſecuritie was mixed with feare and care. For the Venetians in this meane time might well be likened to that man, who ſeeing his neighbors houſe on fire although his owne be free from it, can not for all that but feare, leſt the ſame flame being diſperſed ſhould take holde of his, and runneth foorthwith (according to the prouerb) to the Riuer. Euen ſo the Venetians, though they had no open warre againſt the Turkes, omitted not carefully to obſerue his tenne yeeres actions in Aſia and Europe; to ruminate diuers things in their minds; and to premeditate on that warre which they foreſaw they ſhould one day be inforced to make vpon that barbarous barous Tyrant. Yet in all that time they kept themſelues from taking Armes, till ſome iuſt occaſion ſhould enforce them. But heereof we will ſpeake heereafter. Now wee muſt ſet downe that which happened at Venice during that peace. The Venetians limits were mightily extended during Foſcari his principalitie. Which came to paſſe, as well by reaſon of the publique felicitie and good fortune of the State, as by the long time of his gouernement, which was managed with ſingular skill and diſcretion: And not the State alone, but the cities ſelfe was illuſtrated with rare and coſtly buildings. For in his daies, the Porch of the Pallace was on the outſide beautified with white Marble. Saint Gregories church, which was begunne to be repayred from the foundations, was finiſhed in coſtly manner. After all this the Prince, when hee had gouerned the Common-wealth foure and thirtie yeeres, being foure ſcore and tenne yeeres old, and in regard of his age being no longer able to manage the publique affaires, was depoſed from the ſoueraigne Magiſtracie. And becauſe his fortitude and vigor of ſpirit was not yet diminiſhed, although his bodie were enfeebled, hee was reduced among the ranke of Gentlemen.

The happineſſe and content of the city of Venice during Foſcari his principalitie.

¶ PASCALIS MARIPIETRO, the 66. Duke of Venice

PAſcalis Maripietro (the other yet liuing) was ſubrogated in his ſted. But Foſcari ſuruiued not long after the creation of the new duke. The honorable Enſignes that had beene taken from him in his life time, were reſtored to him after his death: For he was buried with Ducal pomp in the Church of the Friers Minors; and by this meanes it came to paſſe, that one Prince accompanied anothers funeralls, which had neuer hapned till then, ſince that the cuſtome of aſſociating a Colleague was aboliſhed. His Nephews built him a Tombe of white Marble, richly guilded, neere to the high Altar.

One Prince waiteth vpon an others funeralls.

In the time of Maripietro that great Earthquake happened, which about the fift day of December, did ſhake all Italie, eſpecially the Realme of Naples. This Prince was adorned with diuers eminent vertues: Hee had a ſound and excellent iudgement, without faining or diſſimulation. He was a louer of peace, a friend to Religion, and a ſeuere puniſher of vice: Hee did execute offenders according to their deſerts, or at leaſtwiſe baniſhed them from the citie. The peace which hee had receiued from Foſcari, as by tradition, which had beene well obſerued in all times and places, was by him deliuered entire to his ſucceſſor.

The new Princes vertues.

To this felicitie and other fortunate euents which happened in his time, the Art

of

of Printing may be added, which in thoſe daies was inuented in Italie. The inuention thereof is attributed to a Germane. But this diuine art being by ſucceſſion of times diſperſed ouer all Italie, the chiefe workemen in that miſterie did openly contend for the garland of ſingularitie: In which art we finde Nicolao Ianſonio of Venice to haue exceeded all the reſt. Maripietro hauing gouerned foure yeares and a halfe, departed this life, and his bodie lieth honourably buried in the Church of the Twyns.

The inuention of the Art of Printing is attributed to a Germane.

¶ Christophero Moro, the 67. Duke of Venice.

Chriſtophero Moro ſucceeded him. The ſecond yeere of his gouernment, the warre began againſt Ottoman: We muſt briefly ſet downe the cauſe thereof. The tyrant hauing done much hurt to the Chriſtians of Grecia and other Prouinces of Europe, determined to take Morea. This Prouince is almoſt like an Iſland, and is (as they terme it) one of the three rockes of Europe, ioyning to the ſtreight of Corinth. For the Ionian Sea on the one ſide, and the Ægean on the other, doe in a manner make an entire Iſland of it. It is in forme like to a leafe of a Plane tree, by reaſon of the Seas which enuiron it, towards the North the Ionian, the Sicillian towards the Weſt, the Greeke on the South, the Ægean on the Eaſt, and that of Mirtona towards the Solſtitiall. It is in circuit (according to Iſidore) three hundred and threeſcore thouſand paces. Towards the ſtreight on the North ſide lieth the Sea of Corinth, at this day called Patras: Iuſt oppoſite to that is the Saronic Sea, where in times paſt the ancient Hauen of Cencrea was, and in the other, that of Leches. This whole countrey in former times was called Iappigia, afterwards Pelaſgis, and for a long time Peloponeſſus, which name by diuers is yet giuen vnto it. It is commonly at this day called Morea.

The deſcription of Morea.

Ottoman hauing mightily enlarged the confines of his Empire was deſirous to take this Prouince as a member of the Greek Empire from the brethren Thomas and Demetrius. In regard of the ſituation therof they might haue defended it a long time, if they had beene aſſured to haue beene relieued by the Chriſtians in time, or if the brethren with a mutuall conſent would haue vndertaken it: But both thoſe meanes were wanting. For Demetrius went to the Turkes ſide, which was the firſt and chiefeſt cauſe of the ruine of that ſtate. He gaue his daughter in marriage to Ottoman, and gaue him entrance into one of the goodlieſt Prouinces of Grecia. Thomas made ſome reſireſiſtance neere to the ſtreight, but in vaine. And hauing loſt all, flying from the rage of that cruell enemie, he went to Rome whither he brought with him S. Andrewes head: in regard whereof, Pope Pius being accompanied with all the Cleargie went to meet him as farre as the Miluian bridge, and appointed a marble Chappell to be built in that place where he had firſt ſaluted the Apoſtles head, and another larger than that in S. Peters Church where the head was afterwards laid vp with great ſolemnitie.

The occaſion of the Ottomans warre againſt the Venetians.

Saint Andrewes head is brought to Rome.

The Dominion of the Grecks being extinct in Morea, the Venetians ſtill kept thoſe townes there which they had a long time enioyed. But the violent and perfidious inclination of the enemie would not long let them reſt. For after that he had taken Argers by treacherie, he entangled the Venetians in a warre more neceſſarie than profitable. The Senate being thereby enforced, did preſently take armes againſt him. Victor Capello was then Admiral of the Sea, who being entreated by the chiefe of the Iſle of Lesbos, (at that time when Ottoman tooke it from the Cateloſes of Genoa) to come & defend the Iſland, would not do it: as alſo when the Theodorans ſent to him who dwelt in a part of the Iſland, that he would aide them, and receiue them vpon their homage, when the Iſle of Mitilene was taken, he refuſed it, notwithſtanding that he had a mightie nauall Armie, fearing leaſt by any inconſiderate attempt, he might precipitate the Repulicke into a manifeſt danger of warre, although he might iuſtly haue taken Armes, ſeeing Ottoman had contrarie to the ancient accord, which the Venetians had made with Amurath his father, and afterwards with himſelfe, croſſed the ſtreight of Gallipolis with his Armie. This is the report of ſuch as were there preſent. For there is no Venetian Annall, nor any other Hiſtorian whatſoeuer which makes mention therof: Cepio exepted, who in an eloquent ſtile hath written the notable actions of Pietro Mocenigo. Neuertheleſſe it is certaine that ſo ſoone as the warre was proclaimed againſt Mahomet, it began in Morea where the wrong had beene firſt offered. And whileſt they expected greater forces from Italie, certaine foot companies vnder the command of Pietro Palmiero together with two hundred light horſe, which the Greeks call Stradiots, entering fiercely into the enemies countrey, did by a ſodaine incurſion ſurprize a ſmall towne betwixt Arcadia and Modon; the Garriſon whereof being put to the ſword, they brought away a great bootie.

The warre againſt the Turks is begun in Morea.

Within a while after, Bertoldo d'Æſte, Betin of Calcina, Cicco Brandolino, Giouanni Attellano, Roberto Thyente, Giouanni Maſſano, Leon Illirico, and diuers other great perſons with gallant forces arriued at Modon: From thence the whole Armie went ſpeedily to Naples, where making no long ſtay, Æſte, who was Generall of the Armie, went to beſiege Argers. This towne among all others of Greece was verie famous, as well for the originall thereof, as for the reſidence and Court of kings. It was eaſily taken, and as ſoone giuen to the ſouldiers who ſpoiled it. The Turks in the citie who were no great number were retired into the Caſtle. Two daies after the Chriſtians arriuall in that place fiue hundred Turkiſh horſe came and aſſailed the Chriſtians neere to the Citie, & in the skirmiſh ſlew an hundred of our ſouldiers, and among others Martin of Dalmatia, who held an honourable ranke in the Venetian Armie. Thoſe of the Caſtle yeelded within a while after. The Prieſt who had deliuered the towne to the Turkes being taken in that place, was put to death. Bertoldo hauing left three hundred Candiot Archers in the Caſtle, brought backe the troupes to Naples.

The Venetian Armie before Argers.

The traitor puniſhed according to his deſerts.

VVithin a while after, the Venetian Generall departed from Naples with fifteene thouſand men. He went firſt and encamped at Baſilia, the which being taken at his firſt arriuall, he marched the morrow after to the ſtreight through the territorie of Corinth, and fortified his campe neere to the Saronich Sea. Lodouico Lauretano was there with a mightie nauall Armie. They had before placed a Garriſon on the the other ſide of the ſtreight, oppoſite to that place: Sixe Gallies rode at Anker not farre off. Now (becauſe that the Sea and Land troupes were come thither for that purpurpoſe) they preſently with great courage began an admirable peece of worke, which in 15. daies was finiſhed. They fortified with a wal & double trēch the whole length of the ſtreight, which from the Ægean Sea to the Ionian containeth 4000. paces, though the circuit of the walls makes it appeare greater. It is reported, that in the ſame place they did ſet 30000. men on worke, but the great number of men did not ſo much preuaile for the ſpeedie ending of the worke, as the aptneſſe of the matter wherewith it was made, which was readie at hand. The ſtones of old buildings were ſcattered heer & there which had bin in times before cut foure-ſquare for the ſame purpoſe. With that the wall was eaſily builded, with Rampiers & trenches on both ſides. This Streight was by the Greeks in Xerxes time encloſed with wals. It is certain that many great Princes in diuers ages haue attempted to cut through that ſtreight to make it Nauigable: King Demetrius firſt, then Cæſar the Dictator, next him Caligula, and laſtly Domitius Nero, whoſe enterprizes neuertheleſſe were in vaine.

The Venetians make a wall at the ſtreight.

Foure thouſand Turkes that were encamped neere to the walls of Corinth, did within three daies after their comming thither, attempt to diuert the Venetians from their enterprize; but being repulſed and enforced to retire to their Campe, the night following before that the ſtreight was encloſed with walls, they diſlodged without any rumor at all, and went their waie through the places which were yet left open, leauing no Garriſon in the whole Iſland. The Venetians being freed from their encombrances, did at the ſame time as they were buſied in the worke execute ſome ſlight attempts. Benedetto Coyoni was ſent to Miſiſtrate. Some Coſmographers ſay, That the ſame Towne is that which was in olde times called Sparta. All the places round about it were taken at the firſt: the Caſtle excepted, with the enemie held, at the aſſault whereof, Coyoni the chiefe of the enterprize was ſlaine.

The Turks attempt to hinder the Venetians enterpriſe.

The death of Benedetto Coyoni.

Iohn, ſurnamed the Great, with a troupe of Souldiers hauing aſſalted the Citie of Londaria, did preſently take it, but not the Caſtle. The Fortification of the ſtreight beeing finiſhed, and manned with a ſtrong Garriſon, Bertoldo went with the reſt of the troupes to beſiege Corinth. This Citie is ſeated in a place as difficult as commodious; whereupon, Philip King of Macedon was wont to call it one of the keies of Greece: It ſtands almoſt in the middeſt of the ſtreight neere to the Mountaine in times paſt called Ephiro, threeſcore ſtadij diſtant from the one and other ſhore: From the heighth of the Caſtle which is called Acrocorynth it looketh vpon two Seas, the Ionian on the one ſide, and the Ægean on the other. The Venetian aſſailed it in three ſundrie places. Bertoldo encamped toward the Weſt, Giouanni Attellano on the Eaſt ſide, and Lazaro Pontoliano towards the North, neere to the Walls, with certaine foote companies. They gaue two aſſaults to the Citie, but the firſt was in ſome ſort moſt fortunate, becauſe that Attellano tooke a very ſtrong place from the enemie, which did afterwards keepe them more ſtreightly ſhut vp. But whileſt they prepared for the ſecond aſſault, and that Bertoldo was very buſie in ordering matters, and approaching the ordnance neere the Walls, hee was grieuouſly hurt in the head with a ſtone which was throwne from the towne, of which hurt within a while after, he died. The Generalls misfortune did not diuert the Souldiers from the determined aſſault, but they gaue in furiouſly vpon the enemies Rampiers, & though all the defences wherewith the Souldiers couered themſelues the more ſafely to approch the Walls, were broken, neuertheleſſe with great valour they made good the place which they had once taken. But the night following thoſe of the Citie making a ſodaine ſalley, as many as remained neere to the Walls were throwne downe head-long from the Caſtle rocks, where they all died. And becauſe great numbers of Turkes were reported to be neere at hand, they raiſed the ſiege and retired into the ſtreight.

The deſcription of Corinth.

Bertoldo D'Aſte is ſlaine at the ſiege of Corinth.

The Venetians raiſe their camp from before Corinth.

Bertino of Calcina, who after Bertoldo his death was made Generall of the Armie and the other Captaines, hauing in that place aſſured intelligence of the enemies number, who were ſaid to be foureſcore thouſand horſe, diſtruſting their owne ſmall number) for beſides the Seatroupes which kept the veſſells, they were far inferiour in number to the enemie) hauing left the ſtreight without a Garriſon, they ſpeedily retired to Naples; whither they were ſcarce come, but word was brought them that the enemies were arriued. For after that they had recouered and burnt Argers, and made a great maſſacre of the poore Countrie people, they did the next morning by daie-breake without any rumour ſhew themſelues before the Walls of Naples. But before their approch thoſe within the Caſtle had diſcouered them from farre. Their arriuall beeing diuulged ouer the Citie, certaine mercenarie Souldiers would needs make a raſh ſalley vpon them, who being enuironed with thirtie horſe, moſt of them were in a moment ſlaine before the Citie gates, the reſt eſcaped into the Rampiers. The Turkes ſeized on a ſmall Riſing beneath the Towne, but great numbers of them were there ſlaine as well by the Archers which continually ſhot, as by the ordnance which ſcoured amongſt them, wherewith they were not onely tormented, but in a manner wholly ouerthrowne.

The Turks before Naples.

The Turkes loſſe before Naples.

The Venetians would not looſe ſo faire an occaſion, but diuers troupes did with great cries enuiron the Riſing, and gaue great terror to the enemies: Others ranne fiercely vpon the troupes of horſe which ſtood cloſe together before the Cities Rampiers, and ſlew great numbers of them. Diuers that were there preſent report, That fiue thouſand Turks were ſlain at that time; others leſſen the number. They skirmiſhed likewiſe vpon the Dike of the Citie, and along the rampiers from whence the Barbarian was repulſed with great loſſe. The enemie being diſcouraged with theſe two loſſes ſo ſoone as he perceiued that he loſt but his labour to lie any longer before Naples, did on a ſodaine make incurſions vpon the Territorie of Modon, where at his firſt arriuall hee tooke Molines, and certaine other ſmall Townes by force. This ſtorme ſpred it ſelfe likewiſe vpon the Territorie of Coron, where the Greekes were wonderfully moleſted. The Turkes beeing deſirous to depart from Morea, they did for three daies ſpace beſiege the Towne of Zonchia. Giouanni Craſſo of Coma lay in Garriſon there and did brauely defend it: whereupon the enemies diſlodged, and went to their wintering places. After their departure the Venetian Captaines would needes haue their reuenge, and went with three thouſand men to ſcoure Arcadia, from whence they carried awaie a great bootie. They did beſides make an attempt to force the Towne which at this day beareth the name of the Prouince, but not beeing able to doe it, they ſacked the ſuburbes and went their way.

The Turkes leaue Naples.

This happened in Morea during the ſummer and harueſt ſeaſon. The Venetians likewiſe in the meane time had ſome troubles in Italie, about a contention betwixt the Thryeſtines & thoſe of Cap-Hiſtria, by reaſon of tributes and high-waies; the ſtrife on both ſides grew ſo hot, as although the Senate were buſied in a greater warre, they were neuertheleſſe conſtrained to ſend forces thither. But for the eaſier vnderſtanding of the matter, wee muſt fetch it a little farther off. The Aiman marchants were woont to come directly to Cap-Hiſtria & other townes of the Prouince to trade, not comming neere to Thryeſte by fiue miles. The Thryeſtines perceiuing that them ſelues had no profit at all by this commerce were greatly vexed. Wherupon they ſent an Ambaſſador to the Emperor Frederick whoſe ſubiects they were, to craue that it might be lawfull for them to enforce all Germaine marchants which came into Hiſtria to paſſe by Thryeſte, ſuppoſing thereby that their citie would become the chief Mart of all Hiſtria. And becauſe the Emperor had not flatly graunted nor denied their requeſt, they ſought by faire and curteous meanes to diuert the Marchants from their vſuall way and trade, but if gentle meanes would not ſerue, they reſolued to vſe force, and to proceed by conſtraint. Thoſe of Cape-Hiſtria taking the matter in bad part, did ſpeedily diſpatch Meſſengers to the Prince and Senate, who complaining of the wrongs done to them by the Thryeſtines, did vnfolde the great diſcommodities which all Hiſtria was like to receiue by that new inſolencie of their neighbours. The Senate beeing moued with theſe complaints

The cauſe of the war betwixt the Thryeſtines and thoſe of Cap-hiſtria.

plants, commaunded that certaine armed veſſells ſhould lie at anker neere to the moare of Thryeſte, and ſhould haue a ſpeciall care not to ſuffer any victualls to enter into the city by Sea. The Thryeſtines ſeeming to make ſmall account thereof, and conſtantly diſſembling their griefe, it was reſolued, the better to bring them to reaſon, to put garriſons for the ſame purpoſe in the fitteſt places by land. Gauardo Iuſtinopolitano was ſent thither with ſome horſe, who hauing borrowed a certaine place of Count Gorician, and ſtreightly ſhut in their confines, ſhould aduiſe the Marchants to keepe their ancient way: And if the Thryeſtines ſhould attempt by force (as they had done) to hinder their iournies then by Armes to repulſe them.

Gauardo Iuſtinopolitano is ſent againſt the Thryeſtines.

By chance, one of thoſe ſouldiers that were appointed to conuay the marchants, was ſlaine by a ſodaine incurſion of the Thryeſtines, and the reſt put to rout; Gauardo not digeſting this iniurie, went with a braue troupe of Hiſtrians, and waſted the Thryeſtines territories on the other ſide of the Sea. The Senate, in regard this tended to an open warre, commaunded thoſe of Cap-Hiſtria to ſend three of their Townesmen to Venice that might inſtruct them more amply in the matter. The Senate by theſe mens report perceiuing that the ſtrife could not bee ended but by armes, warre was on a ſodaine concluded againſt the Thryeſtines: And according to this Decree, Antonio Martiano, Bernardino ſonne to Carolo Montone, a young man, Girardo Martinenga, Antonello Cornetano and diuers other Noble men were ſent into Hiſtria with foure thouſand horſe, and gailant companies of foote. Diuers that were preſent in that action ſay, that the armie conſiſted of tenne thouſand men; others ſay the number was not ſo great. With theſe forces, ſuch as they were, it was reſolued to beſiege Thryeſte. The Venetians encamped in three ſeuerall places. The firſt was at S. Francis Gate on a little riſing. The ſecond towards that part of the cittie, which is oppoſite to the high way of Pucina: And the third not farre from thence on a high place vpon the way of Cherſina. The Inhabitants were firſt aſſailed with the ordnance which did beate downe the toppes of the houſes; whereupon they craued truce for three dayes to conſult about the yeelding vp of the towne. Vitalis Lande Prouidator in the Armie did freely graunt it, for he had determined to plant ordnance againſt S. Francis Gate, the which during that ſpace he hoped to doe without impediment, becauſe there was ſome likelihood that he could not otherwiſe doe it without fight. But ſo ſoone as the enemies perceiued the ordnance to be remoued, doubting the matter, they did preſently breake the truce, and ſhot at the peſants that wrought in the worke.

An Armie ſent againſt Thryeſte.

Thryeſte is beſieged.

News in the meane time was brought to the Campe, that a companie of German horſe was comming to the reliefe of the towne. The Prouidator ſent Gauardo Iuſtinopolitano before with a braue troupe of light horſe, to ſurprize them by ambuſcado.

On theſe termes ſtood the affaires before Thryeſte, when Giacomo Antonio Marcello came as Prouidator to the Armie. This man before then had beene Gouernor of Vdina. He at his arriuall hauing altered the forme of warre, the enemies Caualleric without any let entred the Citie, and giuing in on a ſodaine vpon the camp toward the high way of Cherſina, tooke two hundred horſe from the Venetians, and did not onely afterwards defend the cittie, but as long as the ſiege laſted, did greatly moleſt the Venetians by their coutinuall ſallies and incurſions. And becauſe that by frequent ſhot of the ordnance, part of the wall had beene beaten downe, and that the ſouldiers in an other place craued to be ſent to their wintering Garriſons, they reſolued to giue a generall aſſault to the cittie. But the buſineſſe had no great good ſucceſſe. For an houres ſpace they fought valiantly on both ſides, ſome with ladders mounting the walls, but the hotteſt fight was at the breach. The citie was brauely defended by the valour of the Almans and the townesmen; and the ſouldiers were inforced to retire with bad ſucceſſe.

Antonio Marcello Prouidator before Thryeſte.

The Almaines make ſallies vpon the venetians.

The aſſault giuen to Thryeſte hath no good ſucceſſe.

The ſiege continued all Autumne, and would haue laſted till the enemie had been ſubdewed by famine or force: But Pope Pius, who beſides his ancient friendſhip and alliance with Fredericke, was much vnwilling to haue the Thryeſtines receiue any harme, in regard hee had beene their Biſhop, had from the beginning of the ſiege ſolicited the Venetians to abſtaine from purſuing them, and euer after had not ceaſed to intreate and exhort them, to draw their troupes vpon certaine conditions from their Gates. It was concluded betwixt the Pope and the Venetians, That the Pope ſhould ceaſe from making warre on Sigiſmund Malateſte whom he beſieged in Arimini after that he had vanquiſhed him in fight by Frederico of Vrbin, and had taken from him the greateſt part of his State; and the Venetians did raiſe their Campe from before Thryeſte: and ſo by this accord thoſe of Arimini, and the Thryeſtines, were wholy freed from the warre about the thirteenth day of Nouember.

Thryeſte and Arimini are freed from the ſiege.

Sigiſmund hauing obtained the Popes pardon, for that in the warres of Lombardie hee had moleſted and waſted the Country of Flaminia, on promiſe euer afterwards to be obedient to him, and to the Venetians, went the Summer following into Morea againſt the Turkes.

Lauretans nauall Armie at ſuch time as the land troupes abandoned the ſtreight, and after it went foorth of the Sarronic Gulph, and had inuironed all the Iſlands, receiued of Cominius the Pirate the Iſle of Lemnos in Morea. He with two Gallies had taken it from Mahomet, who had made it his owne, by reaſon of the Empire whereon it depended, and after that hee had held it for a time, diſtruſting (as it is to be ſuppoſed) his owne forces, he did deliuer it into the Venetians hands.

The Iſle of Lemnos deliuered to the Venetians.

The nauall Armie wintered in the confines of Modon, Zonchia, Naples, and Coron. Vrſo Iuſtiniano did at the Spring time ſucceede Lauretano in the place of Generall. He departed from Venice about the beginning of Ianuary, but in regard of the extreme cold he arriued in the Prouince three moneths after with three gallies. At Zonchia he receiued one and twenty Gallies that lay in the Hauen; with thoſe, and them which he brought with him, he ſailed towards Modon, where halfe way he met Lauretano with three great Gallies, who after ſundrie reciprocall embracements did according to the Senates commaund ſurrender the charge of the Gallies to him, and retired himſelfe to Sapienza.

Vrſo Iuſtiniano is Generall of the venetian nauall Armie.

Vrſo ſtayed at Modon till the whole Armie were come thither together, then departing thence with two and thirtie Gallies, he ſailed towards Coron, and within a while after, paſſing by Naples, he came in a ſhort ſpace to Nigrepont, and from thence, hauing coaſted all the Iſlands of the Ægean Sea, he had heedfully obſerued what ſtate they were in. But whilſt Vrſo made theſe reuiewes, Nicolao Ragio, and Iohn ſurnamed the fatte, Captaines of the bands of men at Armes, with thoſe troupes that they had with them, tooke certaine ſmall townes from the enemie vpon the Gulph of Patras. Franciſco Sidicino, Cicco Brandolino, with diuers other Venetian Captaines were encamped with three thouſand men at Mantinea, and the enemies at Pithyma, fiue hundred of whoſe horſe beeing come to Tulmutha (which was a towne betwixt both Armies) came to defie the Venetians, who contemning the ſmall number of the Barbarians went forward preſently to aſſaile them, who a long time ſtood firme againſt the formoſt rankes of the Venetians, vntill that the reſt of their Cauallerie whom they had ſent for by ſundrie meſſengers did arriue. For then, by their comming, thoſe which beganne the fight beeing ſlaine, they which were left aliue, were without armour, Captaines and enſignes, miſerably maſſacred heere and there. It is reported that fifteene hundred Chriſtians lay dead vpon the place, among whom were Brandolino and Giouanni Attellano, who the day before was come from Modon to Mantinea with Andrea Dandulo the Prouidator, Giouanni Maſſano, and diuers other noble men, who had commaund in the Venetians Armie. The Republique had no better ſucceſſe neere to the Iſlands. For Vrſo hauing viewed them, went to Lemnos, and from thence returned to Nigrepont, where within a while after hauing receiued ſupplies from thence, and hauing for-

tie

the Gallies in his companie, he ſailed fiercely againſt the Iſle of Lesbos. From Nigrepont he came directly to Lemnos, & hauing by the way taken a ſhip of the enemies he did put terme Turkiſh Marchants to death that were in it, and hung vp the reſt.

Vrſo Iuſtiniano ſaileth againſt the Iſle of Lesbos

Then about midnight departing from Lemnos, he went with great rumour about the third houre in the morning, and encompaſſed Mytelene, the chiefe Citie of the whole Iſland. It hath two hauens on the North ſide, and one towards the South: The Armie entered into this as being further off. Thoſe of the countrey betooke themſelues to flight, and the whole Iſland was in allarme. Then three hundred Turkes that were brought to the Gallies, were by Vrſos command, impaled, throwne into the Sea, and ſome of them hanged. Within a while after, he did by day-breake giue an aſſault to the Citie by Sea and Land, hauing firſt ſent a ſhip of Genoa, which to that end he had ſtayed by the way, and a Dalmatian Galley, to take the tower vpon the hauen: And himſelfe in the meane time landed his troupes on the other ſide of the Citie. The two veſſels being ſent againſt the tower, did preſently retire by reaſon of the Ordnance ſhot. The troupes being landed, went brauely to the aſſault, throwing themſelues inconſiderately to manifeſt daunger, whereupon the fight laſted with wonderfull furie for ſixe houres ſpace to the loſſe and ruine of the Venetians, who being vanquiſhed by the multitude of ſhot, and grieuouſly wounded, after a great ouerthrow were enforced to retire. It is reported that three thouſand of them were ſlaine that day.

The Venetians do giue two aſſalts to Mytilene

This loſſe did not abate the Venetians courage, for within a while after, returning againe to aſſault the enemie with greater furie, they were after ſundrie vnprofitable attempts beaten from the wall with like loſſe as at the firſt. In the meane time newes was brought, that the enemies nauall Armie did approach, the which beſides, other ſmaller veſſels: conſiſted of fiue and fortie Gallies. It was likewiſe reported that two thouſand horſe, landed on the other ſide of the Iland, would preſently arriue. Vrſo being daunted with theſe newes, after that hee had loſt fiue thouſand men, and the reſt for the moſt part hurt, quitted Mitylene, and came to Nigrepont, where with remorſe of conſcience for ſuch bad ſucceſſe, he fell into ſo great ſorrow and melancholy, as notwithſtanding that he was a man of a great ſpirit, did neuertheleſſe behaue himſelfe like one that had loſt his ſenſes. From Nigrepont being brought to Morea, and from thence to Modon, he was landed by his owne ſeruants, where on a ſodaine being oppreſſed with griefe, he died within halfe an houres ſpace. Such was the end of Vrſo Iuſtiano, a man valiant and noble among his countrimen.

Vrſo Iuſtinians dieth with griefe

Giacomo Lauretano was after his death ſent to command the Armie. He departing from Venice, was followed by Sigiſmond Malateſte accompanied by a thouſand Italians. A long time before, Pope Pius had made a league with the Venetians, the king of Hungarie, and Philip Duke of Burgondie againſt the Turks. But Malateſte ſo ſoone as he came into the Prouince where he heard of the death of Giouanni Attellano, and Brandolino, and ſaw the ſmall forces there, made a lowde proteſtation, that he would neuer haue imbarked himſelfe for that warre, if he had but knowne in what ſtate the affaires of that Countrey had beene: yet, becauſe men ſhould not ſay that his comming thither was in vaine, he marched with all the troupes he could leauie to take Sparta (a Citie in old time moſt famous among the chiefeſt Cities of Greece) the which in a ſhort ſpace he forced. It being taken which at this day is in a manner inhabitable, he began to batter the Caſtle with his Ordnance. That ſiege continued many moneths, and it could not be taken by reaſon of the ſtrong Garriſon within it.

Malateſte beſieg eth Sparta.

About the latter end of Autumne, fifteene thouſand Turkes arriued there, who encamped verie neere to the Venetians. Sigiſmond diſtruſting his owne ſmall number (for he had but two thouſand men in his camp) durſt not aſſaile them with his whole forces at once, but ſkirmiſhed oftentimes with them: And ſo long as the enemie remained there, he did by cunning and force ſo amaze him, as the Turks hauing put ſome ſupplies into the Caſtle, diſlodged without any loſſe to the Chriſtians: And perceiuing his encamping there to be but to ſmall purpoſe, after that he had burnt the Citie, he brought backe his troupes to Naples. During the ſiege of Sparta, Lauretano beſieged Rhodes, and did great harme to the inhabitants, he ſpoiled and burnt their farmes and countrey-houſes. He did afflict them in this manner, becauſe that the Rhodians not long before had by force taken forth of the Venetians ſhips which lay in the hauen certain Syrian marchants with their goods, and would in no ſort giue ſatisfaction to the Venetians that carried it: This being done, he returned to Nigrepont. From whence he craued all the Iſlands on the Ægean Sea, without any other memorable exploit for that yeare.

The Venetians aſſault Rhodes.

But at the beginning of the next, he did put to Sea and came verie neere to the ſtreight, meaning by force of Oares to paſſe through betwixt the Dardans, that hee might afterwards ſcoure the coaſt of Galipollis. The Dardanes are two Caſtles iuſt oppoſite to one another at the mouth of the ſtreight, in which was great ſtore of Ordnance to ſinke all enemies ſhips that ſhould paſſe that way. Mahomet ſo ſoone as he had made himſelfe maſter of the Coſtantinopolitane Empire, cauſed one of theſe to be reedified which was in a manner ruinate, and builded the other from the foundat ons, that he might with a continuall Garriſon keepe thoſe of Europe from entering into the ſtreight.

The Dardanes are two forts at the mouth of the ſtreight.

The fleete being come thither (as hath beene ſaid) Venieri his Gallie which according to the manner went before for diſcouerie, being deceiued by the Admirals ſignall, which as he thought willed him to paſſe through the ſtreight, being driuen forward by the winde and Oares, went through notwithſtanding all the ſhot. Some ſay that Venieri craued leaue to be the firſt to attempt that paſſage, and that the enemie would not ſpend all his ſhot vpon this one Galley, but determined to beſtow his bullets vpon the reſt of the fleete that would attempt to paſſe, whereupon, the next that followed it, being ſtrucke through with the Ordnance, and many of her men ſlaine, and in great danger, returned: the like did the reſt of the fleete, except the firſt Galley that went through. Venieri, who although he was Prouidator of the Gulph, did neuertheleſſe follow the publike enſignes vnder the commaund of Lauretano being a man of ſingular iudgement and experience in marine matters, did comfort his ſouldiers, and willed them to hope well: but in the darkneſſe of the night, he returned towards the enemies, ſailing faire & ſoftly without vſe of Oares. Diuers canon ſhot were made at him, and to ſpeake truly, he did not auoid them all, yet at laſt, with the loſſe of ſome few of his men, he did contrarie to all mens hope returne to the fleete.

Giacomo Venieri returneth ſafe to the fleet.

This ſame Summer Pope Pius determined to ſet on foot the voyage againſt the Turks which had beene propounded in the Councell at Mantua, and was afterwards neglected by the ambition and auarice of ſome Princes. For although all his aſſociates ſhould haue failed him (the Venetians excepted) he neuertheleſſe reſoluing to bring it to paſſe, came to Ancona. Vpon the rumour of this holy voyage, great numbers of people from Lombardie, and both the Germaines were come to Rome before his departure thence. But as he paſſed through the Dutchie of Spoleta and La Marca, he met with greater multitudes. Theſe men with plenarie remiſſion of their ſinnes, he ſent home againe into their countries, becauſe they were come as well without meanes to defray the expences of that iourney, as for that moſt of them were men vnfit for warre. Chriſtophero Moro, the Venetian Prince, came to meete him there with ten well-armed Gallies, to the end the Venetians might haue a ſhare in the honour of that warre. Two daies after his arriuall the Pope died of a lingring feauer. To ſpeake truly he had but ſmall ſtore of money for ſuch an enterprize, which by a decree of the Colledge of Cardinals was giuen to Prince Moro, on condition that he ſhould ſend it to Mathias king of Hungarie towards the expences of his ordinarie warre with the Turkes.

Pope Pius commeth to Ancona to prepare an Armie againſt the Turkes.

The Pope dieth at Ancona.

Some thinke that the whole ſumme amounted but to fiue and fortie thouſand Duccats.

Ducats. But the Venetian did not onely ſend this ſumme into Hungarie to king Mathias, but a greater quantitie of gold for many yeares after, that he might with his forces ſtop the incurſions of thoſe Barbarians into Dalmatia and Hiſtria. After Pope Pius death, the Venetians alone did for a long time vndergo the burthen of ſo great a warre, in the view not only of all Italie, but of all the Princes of Europe, who were not aſhamed to be idle ſpectators, whileſt the cruell enemie had alreadie ouerthrowne two mightie Empires, and many kingdomes: and yet it cannot be denied but that king Ferdinand and the Pope did at times ſend aide by Sea, but it was ſeldome; and then, when as they had no need of it. There was no memorable matter either by Sea or Land done during that Winter in Grecia. The next Summer, the peſtilence being diſperſed in Naples, Sigiſmond went into Laconia, againſt whome came ten thouſand Turkes, but vpon their arriuall, he with his ſouldiers retired to Mantinea. After his departure the enemies aſſailed Pithimia, and hauing beaten downe the fortifications, entered it by force. In the meane time Victor Capello ſucceeded Lauretano, who hauing receiued the flee at Sapienza, ſailed to Modon, from thence departing within a while after with fiue and twentie Gallies, he went to Nigrepont, and afterwards, going into the enemies countrey, he tooke Aulida by force, which ſtands in the firme land ouer againſt Nigrepont, with Larſa on the Saloniche Sea. Then he took Imbra in the AEgean Sea betwixt Thrace and Samothrace neere to the mount Athis. At the laſt, comming to Pirea, he beſieged the Citie of Athens, the nobleſt of all Greece, and hauing made a breach there before day, and burnt the Cities gates, he entered it. It is at this day called Sethina. Capel ſackt the Citie, the bootie whereof was ſo great, as it did enrich the Marriners and Rowers.

Victore Capello Generall of the nauall Armie.

Capel his exploits.

Within a while after, the Fleet left Pirea, and came to Nigrepont, where taking in victualls, it went to Modon, from whence departing in ſecret, it ſailed into the Gulph of Corinth. Thoſe of Patras had promiſed him to deliuer the citie into his hands, and to kill all the garriſon. Capel had three and twentie Gallies, and ſix and thirty other leſſer veſſells well armed for the fight; and beſides the ſouldiers and mariners, Nicolao Ragio was there with two hundred men at armes. The ſouldiers, who the day before had been grieuouſly toſſed in a tempeſt, and by reaſon thereof could not hold vp their heads, were preſently conducted to the citty by Giacomo Barbadico the Prouidator, they were in number foure thouſand: And being come to certaine Farmes within a mile of the cittie, the ſouldiers being deſirous of bootie, did without any commaundement fall to pillaging thoſe country houſes. Whileſt theſe were buſied in ſpoyling, and expected nothing leſſe than the enemies arriuall, three hundred Turkiſh horſe did with great cries inuiron and aſſaile them, who were all ſlaine there, hauing no meanes of defence or eſcape. Barbadico riding vpon a Mule, and comming by chance to that place where the enemies made great ſlaughter, was beaten downe among a number of thicke buſhes, and there trodden to death vnder the horſes feete. His body beeing afterwards knowne by his Coate-armour and Signet was carried to the Caſtle of Patras, and impaled vpon the higheſt tower thereof: and of ſo great a number, one thouſand onely eſcaped. Ragio being taken by the enemies, was impaled aliue.

The Venetians are defeated, and Barbadico the Prouidator is ſlaine.

Capel for all this was not diſcouraged, ſuppoſing it to haue happened, rather by the careleſneſſe of his owne ſouldiers, than by the enemies valour and proweſſe. Therefore eight dayes after, he ſent the braueſt men of his troupes together with the Enſignes to aſſaile the Cittie. Vincimanica the Sicillian, who commaunded the nauall Armie as Vice-admirall, with Dominicke the Blacke, and other valiant men that followed the Enſignes, went and diſplayed them before the cittie. The enemies did not refuſe the fight, but making a furious ſalley, came couragiouſly vpon the Chriſtians. There was a cruell fight for ſome houres ſpace, at the laſt, fortune inclining to neither ſide, the Venetian reſolued to ſend threeſcore horſe of the remainder of thoſe which were Ragios, downe the hill which was on the one ſide,

to

to charge the enemie in flanke, and thereby to make him retire, and abandon his ſtanding: but they were not gone farre ere they diſcouered the Turkes comming forward for the ſame purpoſe; at the ſight of whom, Ragios horſe betooke themſelues to flight, and fell in among the troupes of the Iſlanders. There a great ſlaughter of men, and horſes, was preſently made. The Turkes in the meane time arriued who did cut the diſordered ſquadrons in peeces. And this loſſe would haue proued farre greater than the former, had not a great duſt riſen vp into the aire like to a black clould which tooke away the ſight both of Turkes and Chriſtians. A thouſand Chriſtians lay dead vpon the place, and the reſt with the enſignes eſcaped to the veſſels.

The Venetians are againe put to rout neere to the former place

Capello being daunted with theſe two ouerthrowes, went to Xant, from thence to Modon, and within a while after to Nigrepont where he remained ſixe whole moneths without any memorable exploit. After the ouerthrow at Patras, he was neuer ſeene to ſmile, though Giouanni Diede the States Secretarie with diuers others of his familiar friends told him that it hapened not through his default. At the laſt being waſted with griefe and melancholie, eight monethes after the battaile of Patras, he died at Nigrepont. Giacomo Venieri after his death commanded the Armie vntill that Giacomo Lauretano ſent by the Senate to ſucceed the late Capello, arriued in the Prouince.

Capello dieth with griefe.

This man for the ſpace of ſixteene monethes that he was Generall of the Armie, did brauely defend all the Iſlands and Sea-coaſts from the enemies aſſaults and incurſions.

About the ſame time likewiſe, or ſoone after, or rather a little before Lauretans departure to the Armie, although the Venetians were in ſome ſort quiet in Italie, the cauſe neuertheleſſe is not knowne why Bartholomeo of Bergamo a great Captaine in his time, did by his ſodaine incurſions into Romagnia, in a manner trouble and entangle them in a new warre. This man departed from Lombardie with great troupes of horſe and foot at the purſuit of Angelo Accaiuola, and Nicolao Soderino that were baniſhed from Florence, vpon hope that they gaue him of good ſucceſſe in Tuſcanie by meanes of a popular commotion: this was the common rumour. But others ſuppoſed that he departed in Armes from Lombardie at the ſoliciting of Pope Paul, to the end, that bringing his troupes through Romagnia and La Marca, he might on a ſodaine in his name make warre on king Ferdinand, who refuſed to pay vſuall tribute to the Church of Rome. But whatſoeuer the cauſe was, it is certaine that all his attempts which ſeemed at the firſt to be fearefull to all Italie, did ſoone deceiue euerie mans expectation. For ſo ſoone as he came into Romagnia Galeas Maria Duke of Milan, a braue and couragious young Prince, made head againſt him: Then did the forces of king Ferdinand and the Florentines withſtand him, wherewith this great Captaine being troubled, did in ſome ſort begin to decline. A battaile was preſently giuen at Molinella, a towne on the confines of Bolognia, which was fought in the abſence of Galeas vnder the conduct of Fredericke of Vrbin. Thoſe that were at the battaile affirme that in memory of man there was neuer a more furious or mortall in Italy.

Bartolomeo of Bergamo bringeth forces into Tuſcanie.

The battaile of Molinella.

The Senate fearing if his forces ſhould be broken (for till then he had euer beene in the Venetians pay, and therefore it was thought that the Venetians did fauour him) the aduerſe Princes and Commonwealths being armed, would caſt the whole burthen of the warre vpon them, ſent him ſome ſupplies of horſe and foote, with expreſſe charge to make peace, and ſafely to bring backe the Armie into Lombardy. Ieronimo Barbadico, a man of excellent wiſedome and aduiſe, and who not long before was made Procurator of S. Marke, was in the Armie; yet this new dignitie, nor the entreaties of his friends were of power to keepe him at home, nor to ſtay him from aſſiſting the Republike in ſo great a danger. But his authoritie and wiſedome being grealy feared of the enemies, it fell out that before peace was concluded, he was by their meanes, (for ſo it was thought) poiſoned. Thete is no other mention made

The death of Ieronimo Barbadico made of Lauretans exploits at Sea, beſides that which hath alreadie beene ſaid.

Nicolao Canalis ſucceeded him. He departing from Venice with two Gallies arriued at Nigrepont, from whence ſetting ſaile with twentie Gallies, hee ſpoiled certaine farme houſes, and villages in Theſſalie, and then returned to Nigrepont; and from thence went to Modon, and afterwards to Coron. He reſolued to ſeize vpon the cittie of Lagoſtitia on the Sea of Patras, which the Turkes had forſaken, and ſpeedily to fortifie it, the which hee eaſily performed without any reſiſtance. Ieronimo Nouello (for Malateſte had left Morea) had well fortified it; and there the whole Armie remained, conſiſting of ſix thouſand men, at ſuch time as two thouſand Turkes made an attempt to recouer it: but they being beaten from the rampires with great loſſe did within a while after diſlodge. Nicolae Canalis Generall of the nauall Armie.

Canalis hauing left Giacomo Venieri with ſix Gallies for the guard of the citie, returned with the reſt of the fleete to Nigrepont; and hauing there re-enforced the fleet with freſh ſupplies he ſailed to Lemnos, and thence to Imbres, where he determined to aſſault Oenos; and comming by day-breake to aſſaile the citie he commaunded his ſouldiers to reare ladders againſt the walls, which being done, they mounted them, and hauing broken open the Gates, they gaue entrance to the reſt of the Armie. The towne was ſpoyled, and for the moſt part burnt, many were ſlaine, but more were made ſlaues, men and women that were taken priſoners were villainouſly handled, the Sacred places were polluted and prophaned without any reſpect to the name of Chriſtians; for although they obeyed the cruell Turkes, they had not changed their Chriſtian Religion; beſides all theſe outrages, Nunnes were rauiſhed and defloured, whom the barbarous enemie for reuerence to Religion neuer durſt touch. Diuers haue thought that for the puniſhment of this ſinne, the taking of Nigrepont enſued, together with the Generalls baniſhment. A great bootie was brought to Nigrepont, with two thouſand captiues. Within a while after he took and ſpoyled the new Foglies. But at the Spring time the Turkes with a mighty Nauall Army ſurprized the cittie Coccina in the Iſle of Lemnos, and after they had ſpoiled it, and carried away the Inhabitants, they made it deſolate. Canalis vpon report hereof, being come to Lemnos with foure Gallies, ſo ſoone as he perceiued all places to be ruined (for the enemie was alreadie gone from thence) returned to Nigrepont. There he found ſix Gallies of new ſupplies, which were come from Venice. With theſe and the reſt, he went to Modon, whither ſending for all his Gallies that had wintered in ſundrie places, hee made a fleete of fiue and thirtie Gallies, and preſuming on his forces he returned to Nigrepont, determining to aduaunce forwards againſt the enemie. But whileſt he was buſied in preparing his fleete, thoſe in Albania fought with good ſucceſſe againſt the Turks. Alexis, and Nicholas brethren, ſtraue for the principalitie there, who followed ſeuerall parties. Nicholas being aided by the Venetians, had 1200. ſouldiers, which were commaunded by Ioſepho Barbaro as Prouidator. Alexis had aſſembled a thouſand Turkiſh horſe. He comming in haſte with his cauallerie encamped in the valley of the Blacke Hill, vpon the Riuer Drimon, where the next day hee drew his brother to battell, by whom being vanquiſhed, all his horſemen were ſlaine, except two hundred that fled. Canalis was ſtill at Nigrepont, when news was brought him thither, that the Turkes had aboue an hundred Gallies neere to Tenedos, and that their fleete did daily encreaſe by new ſupplies. Beeing moued with this report, hee departed from Nigrepont, and went to Lemnos, and from thence to Imbres, where at his arriuall hee vnderſtoode by the Iſlanders, that the Turkiſh fleet lay vpon the other ſide of the Iſland, and they being not able to tell him in Latine the number of their veſſells, did by plucking the haires from their heads demonſtrate vnto him, that it was very great. The venetians take Oenos. Great outrage committed in Oenos. The Turkiſh fleet at Tenedos.

The Venetian gaue no great credit to this aduertiſement, nor did he altogether reiect it. Matters ſeemed more terrible by the Iſlanders report, than they were diſcerned then to be. Now becauſe he would be throughly ſatisfied, he commaunded

Lorenzo

Lorenzo Lauretano to goe with tenne of the beſt Gallies in the fleete, to diſcouer the enemie, and if hee ſhould perceiue that hee had but three ſcore Gallies, to turne his prowes towards him, and hee foorthwith would come to his reskew with the reſt of the fleete; if they were more, then to put to Sea, and to auoide the fight.

Lauretano ſent Franciſco Quirini with one Gallie, to deſcrie the enemies number, who ſhould afarre make it knowne to him by his ordnance ſhot. Their number being knowne by Quirini his ſignall, the Venetian fleet ſpeedily returned, and put to Sea-ward. The Gallies that were ſent abroad for diſcouery, ſo ſoone as they ſaw the Turkiſh fleete, beganne to flie with ſaile and oares: for ſo ſoone as the enemies had from farre deſcried the Venetian Auiſoes, and the reſt of the fleete that came after, they preſently ſent tenne Gallies foorth of the Hauen, who gaue chace to the Venetian fleete till late in the euening. Canalis with foure Gallies went into the Hauen of Paleocaſtra. The Turkes hauing by the darkeneſſe of the night loſt ſight of the Venetians directed their courſe to the Iſle of Scyros.

The Venetian fleete eſcapeth from the Turkes

The morrow after, the Venetian Gallies being all together, ſailed in cloſe battallion towards the Iſle of Scyros. The enemie was on the other ſide of the Iſland, and fiercely battered the cittie. Againſt him thus buſied in the ſiege the Venetian ſent tenne Gallies which durſt not goe neere to fight, but by their Ordnance ſhot, did from farre attempt to offend them. The Venetian would not aſſaile them, fearing leſt the reſt of the enemies fleete ſhould come and inueſt his Gallies, the which without all doubt would haue beene done, if hee had offered to fight. The enemies ſailed from Scyros into the Iſle of Nigrepont, where at their arriuall they tooke Stora by force, a Towne in the Iſland ſeated towardes the Weſt, and afterwards, that of Baſilica: both which were burnt and ſpoyled. This being done, they went directly to beſiege Nigrepont. The Venetian was come from Scyros to Cape Martillo. This place is neere to Nigrepont, and from thence before hee had poſſeſſed all the paſſages, hee ſent three Gallies loden with victualls, through the chanell of Loretto to Nigrepont, and commaunded the Captaines of them to tarrie there for the guard of the Cittie, if the officers of the Towne ſhould thinke it expedient. The victualls being receiued, the Gallies were returned to the fleete.

The Turkiſh fleete before Nigrepont.

Not long after Giouanni Troni was commaunded to go thither with two Gallies. But all paſſages neere to the Cittie being alreadie ſtopt, and his owne Gallie beeing bruiſed with the ſhot of the enemies canon, he was inforced to returne.

Now the better to vnderſtand the State of the ſiege, wee will make a briefe deſcription heere of the ſituation of the Iſland. The Iſle of Nigrepont being diuided from Boetia, is an hundred and fiftie thouſand paces in length, the breadth thereof is not aboue fortie thouſand, and the narroweſt not aboue twentie thouſand. It is in circuite three hundred three ſcore and fiue thouſand paces. There are two little hills in it, the one termed Geraſa, and the other Caphareа. It was in auncient time inriched with very goodly cities, at this day there is in it but Nigrepont. The citie of Nigrepont which is ſeated right ouer-againſt Aulida, is diuided from Beotia by a ſmall Gulph: Wherefore the Turke the better to beſiege it, made a bridge ouer that Gulph, ſo ſoone as the land forces were wholly arriued.

The deſcription of the Iſle of Nigrepont.

On the fifth of Iune the enemies fleet, wherein were three hundred veſſells, and amongſt others aboue an hundred Gallies, approached the citie; but by the valour of the Inhabitants and the ſouldiers which were in it, the enemies that then landed were beaten backe to their ſhips. The 13. of the ſaid moneth, the Emperour Ottoman being come with threeſcore thouſand ſoldiers through Beotia, cauſed a bridge to be made ouer the chanell, as farre as Saint Marks Church, within a mile of the Citie. In that place all the forces being landed, the Cittie was inuironed, and diuers peeces of Ordnance were planted in ſundry places: and with fiue and fiftie canons euerie day the wall was much battered. The ſiege continued 30. dayes, in which time, beſides ſundrie light skirmiſhes made before the walls vpon occaſions, the Turke, with all his forces, gaue three aſſaults, wherein he loſt fiue and twenty thouſand thouſand men, as it was afterwards knowne at the muſter of the Armie. Some report that they haue heard the Turkes ſay, that after the taking of Nigrepont, more than fortie thouſand were found to be wanting in their Armie.

The enemie buildes a bridge ouer the Gulph.

But during this ſiege by Sea and Land, the Venetian Fleete wanting victualls by continuing too neere Nigrepont, ſailed to Candie, where by the way meeting with ſome Turkiſh Futs, it ſanke them, and tarried there foure daies. Ieronimo Molino Gouernor of the Iſland, did preſently take order to furniſh them with neceſſarie victuails, and did beſides in that ſhort ſpace cauſe ſeuen ſhips of burthen to be armed. Being ſtrengthened with theſe armed veſſells, and with his owne fleete of 35. armed Gallies, the Venetian returned from whence he came. The newes in the meane time of the ſiege of Nigrepont being brought to the Senate, did afflict them with griefe and feare. It was certaine that without ſome ſpeedie remedie, that moſt excellent Iſland of all others of the Ægean Sea would be ſubdued by that cruell enemie, to the great loſſe of the Common-wealth: whereupon they ſpeedily decreed to ſend as manie Gallies as could poſſibly be made readie one after an other without intermiſſion, to the reliefe of Nigrepont. Canalis in the meane time, departing from the place where he ankored, went with his whole fleet, & lay in the ſtreight of the channell neere to Laureta: then with ſailes, oares, winde and tide, he went forwards againſt the enemie.

The Senate is grieued at the newes of the ſiege of Nigrepont.

The Venetian Fleet entreth the the channell of Nigrepont.

Thoſe within the Citie beeing tired with continuall fight, had already endured the ſiege almoſt a moneth; and yet they durſt not well truſt ſome of their owne Citizens. For Thomaſo of Sclauonia that was ſent with a troupe of Souldiers to guard the citie, being conuicted of treaſon, and ſent for before the Magiſtrates, was by commandement cut in peeces, Some ſay that hee did by ſecret intelligence ſollicit the Turke to vndertake that enterprize: and that at the beginning he would haue deliuered the Citie to Ottoman, if he would haue but graunted him and the townesmen their liues & liberties. Ottoman promiſed the traitor any thing ſauing that which he demaunded, and he would haue none other recompence but that. Now whilſt theſe practizes continued on either ſide as well by thoſe which fled to the enemies, as by letters tied to arrowes, the whole matter was diſcouered to the Magiſtrate by a yong maide of Nigrepont.

The treaſon is diſcouered.

The beſieged being afflicted with ſo many miſeries, had in their extremitie but only one hope left, which was, that the Venetian Nauall Armie, hauing firſt broken the bridge ouer the channell, would come and bring them aide and aſſiſtance. This did they talke of day and night, and wiſhed for it with teares in their eies, when on a ſodaine they deſcried foureteene Gallies and two ſhips of burthen, within view of the Citie, with which Canalis was come before the reſt of the Fleet. There was then great ioy in the Citie, and the townesmen from the walls beganne to crie out vpon the enemies thereby to terrifie them. This Generall noyſe did altogether amaze them.

Some ſay that Ottoman hauing intelligence of the Venetians approach, began to thinke on flight, and to that end he mounted a very ſwift horſe, determining preſently to paſſe forth of the Iſland into the firme Land, and that without all doubt he would haue gon his way, had not Mahomet the Gouernour of Aſia, a valliant and courageous man, diſſwaded him from it, telling him, That if he fled, the Souldiers and his Nauie being affrighted with the departure of their Generall, would at one time together fal into great danger: And therefore that he ſhould do better, to giue a generall aſſault to the Citie by Land and Sea, more fierce than all the former, and promiſe the ſpoile thereof to the Souldiers, with a great recompence to him that ſhould firſt aduance his Enſignes on the Walls. The great Turke being moued with this good counſell commanded his Souldiers to giue the laſt aſſault: His Gallies at Sun-ſet came forth of the channell neere to the Walls.

The Venetians that were come forward with the Generall (as hath beene ſaid) went with full ſaile within a mile of the bridge. Then, becauſe the winde, tide, and neceſ-neceſſity did inuite them to ſet forward againſt the enemie with as great courage as they were come thither, all men cried out that a fit time and occaſion was offered to do a notable peece of ſeruice. Canalis alone was of opinion to tarrie for the reſt of the Fleet, which ſtaied at Politia; no man knoweth whether they did it for feare, or elſe becauſe the Captaines of the Gallies were commanded ſo to do; howbeit Canalis did condemne their ſlowneſſe: Thoſe which were there did earneſtly ſolicite him to ſet forward, ſaying aloud that there was no good meaning in that delay. The Pizamanes of Candie, bretheren, Captaines of a ſhip of Burthen, craued leaue that they with their ſhip might Saile againſt the enemie, promiſing, by the force of their ſhip, and by the winde and tide to breake the bridge, and if their enterprize ſhould ſucceede badly, they would at leaſt thinke themſelues happy to haue expoſed their liues and fortunes in the ſeruice of the Common-wealth. The Generall commanded them and all the reſt not to ſtir, but to tarrie ſtill where they were, till the reſt of the Fleete were arriued.

A memorable offer of two bretheren of Candy.

Thoſe of Nigrepont who in the meane time were furiouſly aſſaulted by Sea and Land, perceiuing by day-breake that their Fleete Lay ſtill, like men amazed could hardly hold their weapons in their hands. Great numbers of Arrowes couered the wretched inhabitants: The ordnance confuſedly beat downe whatſoeuer it encountered, ſteeples, towers, walls, and people. Leonardo Caluo Gouernour of the Citie, Giouanni Bondomaria the Prouidator, Paulo Hericio the Magiſtrate, and manie other Venetian Gentlemen were vpon the Wals and in the trenches, ſome to exhort and encourage the Souldiers, others to run vp and down to thoſe places which had moſt neede of help. And although many thouſand enemies were neere to the wals, they did not ceaſe for all that ſtill to fix their eies on that ſide from whence they had deſcried the Venetian Gallies: The wretched inhabitants held vp their hands and eies to Heauen and them. Then by day-breake they erected a black Enſigne vpon the higeſt tower of the citie to demonſtrate their miſerable condition, to the end that thoſe which lay in the channel being moued with their diſaſter might come and relieue them. The fierce aſſault continuing without intermiſſion, had in ſuch ſort tired the beſieged as thoſe which guarded the gate Burchiana being grieuouſly wounded and weakned with hunger and watching, did quit the walls to the enemies, which they on a ſodain ſeizing on, all other parts of the wals were in an inſtant abandoned.

A generall aſſault giuen to the citie

The Turkes take the Nigrepont.

Then they began in euerie place to murther the poore inhabitants, together with the Magiſtrates and officers. Leonardo Caluo was murhered in the Palace, Bondemario in the houſe of Paulo Andreatio, who hath written the hiſtorie of the taking of Nigrepont. And Hericio comming vpon Ottomans word forth of a verie ſtrong place which he had made good, was by the tirants cõmand ſawed a ſunder in the middle; that trecherous ſcoffer ſaying, That he had promiſed to pardon his head, but not his flanks. Then he made a cruell decree, That all yong men of twentie yeeres of age ſhould be ſlaine, and that he which ſhould ſaue any one of that age, ſhould himſelfe be put to death. Then was a horrible ſlaughter made vpon the townes-men, and againſt thoſe whom aduerſe fortune had brought thither, all places reeking with bloud. The heads of thoſe that were ſlaine being laid on an heape in S. Francis market-place neere to the Palace before the Patriarkes houſe, did ſerue for a pittifull ſpectacle to women & children. The dead bodies lying heere and there, for feare leaſt the ſtench ſhould infect the aire, were throwne into the neighbour channell. At the very ſame time that the citie was taken, the Gallies whom the Generall had ouer night ſent for, arriued when it was too late: And perceiuing that the Venetian Enſignes were no more vpon the towers, and that by other euident ſignes they knew that the Citie was loſt, they did in ſad and lamentable manner with teares in their eies, behold the Cities wals; and becauſe there was no ſafetie in abiding there, they weighed Ankors and ſailed thence.

The end of the eighth booke of the third Decad.

THE NINTH BOOKE OF THE THIRD DECAD

Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the ninth Booke of the third Decad.

OTTOMANS nauall Armie contrarie to all mens expectation returneth whole and vnbroken to Conſtantinople. CANALIS attempteth in vaine to recouer Nigrepont. PIETRO MOCENIGO commeth to the Armie. CANALIS is confined to the Port Gruario a Caſtle of the Forlani. Peace being for a time treated of with OTTOMAN, taketh none effect. MOCENIGO goeth to the frontires of Ionia, and returning within a while after into the ſame Prouince, he mightily waſteth Pergamene, and the inhabitants of Gnidos. He doth the ſame on the confines of Caria. He doth with the ſupplies of the Pope, and King FERDINAND take the Citie of Sattalia in Pamphilia. MOCENIGO giueth courteous entertainment to the Ambaſſador of VSSAN-CASSAN king of Perſia, who was ſent to the Venetians. The Turkes begin to make incurſions into Albania, Dalmatia, and other places on the frontires of Italie. The troubles of Ferrara doe for a time hold the Venetians in iealouſie. MOCENIGO taketh the Citie of Smyrna by aſſault: He waſteth and ſpoileth the territorie of Clazomene. A young man of a noble houſe doth in a night burne OTTOMANS Arcenall at Gallipolis. MOCENIGO reſtoreth CARAMAN to his kingdome. He doth confirme the widow of the late king of Cyprus, who was a Venetian Ladie of the familie of the CORNARES, in her kingdome. OTTOMAN fighteth with good ſucceſſe againſt VSSAN-CASSAN the Perſian.

AFter the taking of Nigrepont, the Venetian fleet was for a time baniſhed as it were from their countrey, wandering vp and downe in the neighbour Iſlandes. At laſt, returning to their firſt Rendeuous, it was in a ſhort ſpace, (though too late,) meruailouſly encreaſed. Giacomo Venieri came to it with fiue and twentie well-armed veſſels, and within a while after fourteene other Gallies arriued, who were followed with ſixteen others, after them preſently came diuers more, ſo as in a verie ſhort time, the number amounted to more than an hundred veſſels fit for ſeruice. The ſhips of burthen, becauſe they would not ſaile without winde, were left at the Iſle of Cea, neere to Negrepont. The Gallies gaue chace to the enemies fleet which was loden with bootie as farre as Chios. For Ottoman hauing left a ſtong Garriſon in Nigrepont was gone forth of the Iſland, and retired by land with all his troupes.

Deſcription of the Iſle of Chios.

The Iſle of Chios lieth betwixt Lesbos and Samos, Ephorus hath termed it Ethalia by the ancient name: Methodorus and Cleobulus ſay that it was called Chios, of the Nimph Chione. It is in circuite an hundred and fiue and twentie thousand paces, and it is seated right ouer against Erithrea. It was in former times free, now it acknowledgeth the Genoueses for her Lords, who by a corrupted speech call it Sio. The Venetians being come to the Promontorie of Mastic in the enemies view, Canalis fearing if he should loose the battaile which he determined to giue, that then he should more encrease mens hatred towards him, called all the Captaines of the Gallies to councell, and craued their aduise, if they thought it expedient for the Commonwealth to fight that day with all their forces, and to giue the enemies battaile. Their opinions thereupon were various. At last, most of them being of opinion not to precipitate the Commonwealth into an apparent danger, the fleete returned to Sea without fight.

The enemies fleet is afraid of that of the Venetians.

It is reported that so soone as the enemie descried the Venetian Gallies neere to Chios, he presently determined to make away, resoluing by no meanes to fight in regard of his small number of men, so as some of them were alreadie embarked in light vessels fit for flight; and others soosoone as they perceiued the Venetians comming towards them, determined to leaue their vessels, and to swimme to the neighbour shoares. But when they descried that the Venetian fleet shaped another course, they presently left Chios & sailed to Lesbos to man their vessels with rowers. From Lesbos going to the streight, they were afraid lest the Venetian fleete should be at Tenedos, and there whither they would or not, enforce them to fight. But hauing intelligence by their discouerers, that all there was quiet, after that they had passed by Tenedos, they sailed with great cries and wonderful ioy to a safe Hauen. It is reported that the Generall of the Turkish fleete hauing crossed the streight turned towards his souldiers, & with a smiling countenance said vnto them: The Venetians haue dealt verie courteously with vs, for they haue accompanied vs with great numbers of Gallies from Tenedos to Nigrepont, & then from thence to Chios.

The losse of Nigrepont did affect the Senate and people with such discontent, as they would hardly haue receiued greater if they had lost all that they possessed on the firme land or at sea. All men generally said that this losse did not onely concerne the Venetian State, but all Italie: That they had no Island, channell or sea-streight left, that was able to withstand the attempts of that barbarous enemie, but that he might at his pleasure with a direct course saile to Italie: That their owne negligence with that of others, had beene the cause therof, who hauing beene able in time to haue quenched that fire, had by their mutual hatred & auarice, suffered it to encrease: That they were to blush for shame, & to repent that they had not relieued that loyal Citie, during the siege. Therefore all men with one consent detested both the fleet and the Generall: and a Decree was made that hee should be dismissed of his place, and being sent for home, he should giue an account why he had not relieued Nigrepont.

The venetians great griefe for the losse of Nigrepont.

Pietro Mocenigo is chosen Generall of the naual Armie.

Pietro Mocenigo was by a generall consent subrogated in his place: who was presently commaunded to make hast to the Armie. In the meane time, after the fleete had made some aboad at Sea, Canalis and the rest determined to surprize Nigrepont, and by an vnlookt-for assault to attempt the recouery of the Citie. They concluded then among themselues that Giouanni Trono, Nicolao Molino, and Frederico Iustiniano should saile before with nine Gallies, and so soone as they from the channell should perceiue the fleete to be neere the Citie, then to land their men, and march to assaile it on the other side. But these men were somewhat too forward, for being enuironed with great troupes of Turkes, more than two hundred of them were in a moment slaine: among whom was Giouani Trono, a man whose valour did greatly appeare in that fight, although their forces were not equall. The rest of the fleete landing on the shoare being daunted with the death of their fellowes, and perceiuing those in the channell to goe slowly to worke, escaped to their Gallies: And in this manner the fleete retired without any good successe to Aulida, not farre from Nigrepont.

The venetians enterprize vpon Nigrepont is to no purpose.

The same day somewhat before Sunne-set Pietro Mocenigo with three Gallies came came to the fleet, ſo ſoone as Canalis deſcried him, hee deſcended into a long boat, and went to meete him, where after mutuall embracements, hee acquainted him what his purpoſe had beene, and why he had aſſembled that great fleete, for the recouerie of Nigrepont, which hee hoped to haue effected if hee had any longer tarried in commiſſion. But his hope was, that what himſelfe could not execute by reaſon of the loſſe of his place, the new Generall by his valour and conduct would fortunately bring to paſſe, all things being in a readineſſe for that purpoſe. Mocenigo ſaid vnto him; Purſue what thou haſt begunne, and if thou haſt anie hope to recouer the Citie, goe on a Gods name: as for my ſelfe, I am ſo farre off in this my new authority from hindering the publique good, as on the contrarie I freely offer to aide and aſſiſt thee in this important buſineſſe, as a friend or ordinarie Captaine: but he refuſing to enter vpon an other mans charge, Mocenigo diſmiſſed the Gallies that had beene ſent for, and determined not to continue, to the weale publiques loſſe, and his owne diſhonour, an enterprize which had beene ſo vnfortunately begunne. Then he departed (for winter was at hand) with the reſt of the fleete into Morea, determining at the Spring to remoue from thence, and to attempt ſome notable exploit which ſhould recompence the loſſe of Nigrepont. Canalis ſo ſoone as hee came to Venice was condemned to perpetuall baniſhment. Hee was confined to the Port of Gruare, a town of the Forlani, where to leſſen the griefe for the loſſe of his country, he ſpent the time in hunting and ſtudie.

Mocenigo commeth to the armie.

Canalis ſpeech to Mocenigo.

Mocenigo his anſwere to Canalis.

Canalis is condemned to perpetuall baniſhment.

Mocenigo during that winter was not idle, for hee repaired his Gallies, and ſent to the Iſlands on the Ægean Sea to comfort and aſſure the Inhabitants, who were yet daunted with the loſſe of Nigrepont. Thus was he buſied when Marino Maripietro and Lodouico Bembo, did about the beginning of the Spring come as Prouidators to the Armie, who were ſent thither, that Mocenigo together with them might manage the affaires of the Republique. Ricaoſa came thither likewiſe from Apulia with tenne Gallies, being ſent by King Ferdinand to make warre on the Turkes, in the company and by the aduiſe of the Venetian Generall.

The loſſe of Nigrepont had troubled all the Princes of Italie, and eſpecially king Ferdinand, who, the more he perceiued the frontires of Apulia and Calabria to lie open to the Turkes inuaſions, the more did he feare their proſperitie and aduancement. Ottoman fearing that by his taking of Nigrepont from the venetians all Chriſtian princes would arme againſt him, was willing to trie if hee could make peace with the Venetians, or at leaſt, if that could not be done, to draw the buſineſſe out in length, to the end that time might ſweeten the ſharpeneſſe of that loſſe. But becauſe hee would not haue them thinke that hee did it for feare, hee was content to vſe the mediation of his mother in lawe, who was a Chriſtian, and Daughter to George, who in former times had beene Prince of the Tribulles.

A new policie of Ottoman.

She hauing beene made acquainted with her ſonne in lawes meaning, ſent one of her houſhold ſeruants to Venice, from her to aduertize the Venetians that they ſhould doe well to ſend their Commiſſioners to the Turke, and that if they were deſirous of peace, it ſhould be graunted them, and peraduenture vpon better conditions than they hoped for. Hereupon Nicolao Coco and Franciſco Capello were ſent to her by Sea, who found her in a village of Macedonia where ſhee remained, and from thence they went by land to Ottoman. But peace being treated of, and the Conditions propounded not pleaſing, and the Commiſſioners beeing by Letters called home to Venice, Capello being troubled with a feauer, died at Conſtantinople: Coco in a fiſher boat went to Lemnos, and from thence in a Gallie that he found there by chaunce, ſailed to Candie: And thus by the going to and fro of Ambaſſadors by treaties of peace at Conſtantinople, and by tranſporting of Letters from both ſides, all that Summer was ſpent to no purpoſe.

The Commiſſioners returne without any concluſion.

Winter drawing neare, the Kings nauie returned to Naples, and the Prouidators being called home by the Senate, went backe to Venice. Within a while after, Prince Moro died, hauing gouerned the Common-wealth nine yeeres and ſix moneths:

neths: Hee was buried in Saint Iobs Church, which, together with the Monasterie neere adioyning, hee had erected at his owne proper costs. During his gouernement, the Citie was not onely beautified with that building, but the inner side of the entrie into the Pallace, which was begunne before then vnder Maripietro, was in his time wholly finished, where his Marble Statue is to be seene, with two others vnderneath him, representing our two first parents, wrought by Antonio Crisse the skilfullest Caruer of his time. Saint Peters Steeple of the Castle made of a white square stone, which is an excellent peece of worke, was then builded.

¶Nicolao Trono, the 68. Duke of Venice.

Nicolao Trono succeeded Moro, whose short gouernment was verie fortunate, because the Venetians in his time made a league with the king of Persia, and vnited the famous Isle of Cyprus to their dominions.

The Senate sent Messengers to the Pope, and to King Ferdinand, to intreat the, that they would the summer folowing arme against their common enemie the Turk, and to tell them that the matter was not to be delayed, but that it was time alreadie to be at Sea. The Ambassadours were curteously entertained by either of them, who promised all assistance according to their power. Mocenigo likewise, did by Letters intreate the King of Cyprus, and the great Maister of Rhodes, that they would arme against the Turkes: Himselfe in the meane time visited all the Islands of the Ægean seas, and confirmed them by his presence. There is a small towne in Ionia opposite to the Isle of Chios, which is called Passage, whither from Asia all goodes were brought, at such time as the Italian Marchants did frequent the Isle of Chios, as into a common store-house. Mocenigo hauing intelligence that the same place was without garrison, came with his fleet before day neere to the shore, and sent his Mariners and some of the Rowers to fetch this rich booty. The Inhabitants of this Towne being affrighted at this sodain incursion escaped into the neighbour-mountaines: the Shoppes full of Asian marchandise were rifled; and the whole bootie beeing brought to the Gallies, the towne was burnt. Mocenigo returning to Modon (for Winter was not yet spent) made some stay there. Then beeing prouoked by the common report, how that the enemies fleete of fortie Gallies were ready to inuade Lemnos, he with his fleet speedily sailed into the Island. But finding this rumour to be false, and beeing vnwilling to haue his comming thither to be to no purpose, hee caused the towne of Coccina in the Isle of Lemnos to be repaired, which before had beene ouerthrowne by Mocenigo his first exploit.

Coccina in the Isle of Lemnos is reedified.

by an Earth-quake, and hauing reedified it, hee manned it with a ſtrong Gar rison.

Hauing prouided for the affaires of the Iſland, he returned to Modon where hee found two new Prouidators ſent from Venice, who were Stephano Maripietro, and Vittori Soranza, two of the chiefe Senators. At their arriuall, they concluded betwixt themſelues, that in euerie Gallie, beſides the Souldiers and Marriners, tenne horſe-men whom the Greekes call Stradiots, ſhould be placed: Theſe men are more apt to take booties than to fight. They vſe a buckler, ſword and lance, few of them waere curaſes, but they quilt their doubtles and caſocks with cotton to beare off the enemies ſtroakes. They haue very ſwift horſe and wel breathed. The Venetians did vſe theſe kinde of men in the wars in Albania and Morea. But thoſe of Morea neere to Naples wee reaccounted moſt valiant: The choiceſt of theſe, were put into the Gallies. The Fleete beeing furniſhed with ſuch ſupplies, put to Sea, to waſte and ſpoile the Prouinces of Aſia. It ſpared the Cities and Iſlands of Greece, for reſpect it did beare to the Chriſtian name, notwithſtanding that they were ſubiect to Ottoman. From Morea hee went to Leſbos, where neere to the Promontorie on the Eaſt-ſide, where the Iſland is leaſt habitable, the Fleete caſt Ankor in a ſafe Hauen. Right ouer againſt it on the Sea ſhoare ſtands the Citie of Pergamus, a towne in olde time very famous in the leſſer Aſia, it was well knowne to the Romans for the Tapeſtrie that was made there, but much more becauſe it was the inheritance of king Attalus. There is nothing to bee ſeene at this day but the ruines of olde buildings. The Territorie by reaſon of the fertilitie thereof is ſtored with villages. The Venetian departing about midnight from Leſbos, landed his troups on the oppoſite ſhoare in the leſſer Aſia, and commanded Giacomo Pariſotto the Admirall of the Fleete, to place part of his troupes in Ambuſh, and with the reſt to ſpoile and waſt the enemies Countrie, putting all to fire and ſword. According to this commaundement, all places were ſpoiled to the great terror of the Countrie-people, and great ſtore of cattaile with many priſoners were carried thence: But the Turkiſh horſe-men of the neighbour Garriſons, hearing the lamentations of the poore people that fledde, did fiercely charge the Venetians, who retired to their ſhippes, and by that vnlooked for aſſault did greatly moleſt the Souldiers that were loden with bootie: Then the light horſe of Morea comming ſpeedily to their reskew, did eaſily chace and purſue them with great ſlaughter. The enemies heads together with the bootie were brought to the veſſells, and for euery head the Souldier receiued a Ducat, the which recompence the Generall promiſed to all thoſe that ſerued him in that iournie againſt the Turkes, and was exactly performed during that warre. The Fleet departing from the enemies Countrie, went and caſt Ankour in a deſert Iſland betwixt Chios and the firme Land: There was the bootie laied abroade, and ſold to them that offered moſt. The Treaſourers appointed for that purpoſe diſtributed the monie to the horſe-men, Souldiers, and Marriners. The ſame night the Venetian ſailed to the Iſlands neere to Caria which in times paſt had belonged to the inhabitants of Gnidos, to ſpoile and waſt them. Gnidos in times paſt among the Cities of Caria was very famous, in regard of her Arſenall and two Hauens, and at this day ſundrie ruines of olde buildings are to bee ſeene there. The Territorie neere adioining, is not tilled, but frequented by ſheepheardes. The Fleete being come to this place, both horſe and foot were landed to waſte the Countrie: many of all ſex and ages were taken and brought to the Gallies, but of Cattaile no more than ſerued for their preſent vſe. They found nothing elſe there but certaine tapeſtrie and fuſtians to make tents, ſuch as the Numidians vſed when they were wont to goe wandring vp and downe.

The citie of Pergamus.

The Turkes are put to rout.

What Gnidos was in former times.

The Venetian putting to Sea went to Delos an Iſland of the Cielades, famous in former times for Apollos Temple, and the great concourſe of people that reſorted thither; it is now deſolate and inhabitable; there is nothing now to be ſeene

The Iſle of Delos

but the ruines of the temple with those of an amphitheater of white marble, columnes and other statues, with a Colossus of fifteene cubites high. From Lesos, Mocenigo directed his course to Morea because victualls grew scant. By the way neere to the Cape of Mailles he met with Rachatensis the Generall of King Ferainando his fleete with seuenteene Gallies, and after reciprocall salutations with great acclamations and other signes of ioy after the manner at Sea, they went together to Modon. There the Venetian had intelligence that the Popes Fleet would soone arriue there. But because he would make no long abode there, hauing victualled his Fleet, he and the Kings Generall departed from Modon, and with a faire winde sailed to the Ilands of the Rhodian Sea next to Asia.

The Venetians ioine with King Ferdinands fleet

Those of Rhodes possessed the Cittie (which was exceeding strong by arte and manned with a strong Carrison) called the Castle of S. Peter, seated in that part of Caria opposite to the Isle of Coos, the only refuge of the Christians that fled forth of Asia. The Turkes were Masters of all places neere to the Rampiers, so as the inhabitants durst not come forth of their fortifications by reason of the enemies daily incursions,

There the Venetians were tolde a wonder of the skilfull sent of their dogs, how that the inhabitants kept fiftie dogges which in the night time they did put forth of the Rampiers for the guard of the Citie, and that their manner was, if any Christian did by chance come thither in the night they would gently fawne vpon him and lead him to the citie, but if they met with any Turke, they did first by their loud barking as it were by a trumpet giue warning of their comming, and would then fall vpon them and teare them in peeces. Now the better to procure means for the inhabitants to come forth and to seeke for their commodities abroade, the Venetian resolued wholly to ruine all the Townes and villages neere adioining: And for the effecting thereof hauing sailed all night, hee came before day neere to the enemies shoare, where finding that all his Gallies were not come vp, hee determined to stay for the rest of his Fleete which the error of the night had caused to stray about the Promontorie: And early in the morning when the inhabitants perceiued the enemies on their shoare they sent their vnexperienced troups vp to the Mountaines determining on the assurance of the steepinesse of the places there to fight with them.

The defeat of the Barbarians.

The Venetian perceiuing the boldnesse of those people, did put his Souldiers in battaile, and gaue them a fierce charge. They did not refuse the fight, but answered them as brauely, the bickering was for a time doubtfull, and the horse-men could doe no great matter by reason of the stony and steep waies: the Souldiers and Marriners did with darts and arrowes charge the enemies from farre, and at last came to handie stroakes with swordes, pikes, and iron maces, but many of them beeing sore wounded by the Turkes fell downe dead. In the end the Venetian beeing stronger both in valour and number, enforced the enemie to quit the place, and with great slaughter brake and defeated him, diuers threw away their weapons & were taken prisoners, but the greatest number being skilfull in the craggie waies escaped by the Mountaines. Then the Venetians fell to spoile, and hauing wasted all that Countrie they retired to their vessells loden with tapestrie.

In that part of Asia the women are cunning in weauing of tapestrie, and do not only deale in household businesse, but in trade of Marchandize. The heads of those that were slaine being numberlesse were carried to the Generall; many were taken in the fight, but very few in the fieldes and villages.

Tabia a Citie of Caria.

Foure daies after the fight, the Fleete departed thence, and in a morning before daie drew neere to Tabia a Citie of Caria. In that place, two Seas comming to ioine together, make part of Caria in a manner like an Island: The Territorie in time past belonged to those of Halicarnassus, with their roiall Citie, famous for the magnificent tombe of King Mausolus: there is yet to this day (as Cariolan writeth) among the ruines of the citie certaine markes of that admirable worke to be seene: The inhabitants of those places, detesting husbandrie giue themselues to feeding of Cattaile:

taile: from thence great ſtore of Cattaile and many priſoners were brought to the Gallies. Then Mocenigo ſailed to the deſert Iſland, called Capraria, where whileſt the bootie was diuided; newes was brought that the Popes Legat was at hand with his Fleete: The Venetian to do him honour prepared certaine Gallies and went to meete him, and after that he had welcommed him with the generall applauſe of all men with ſound of trumpets and reciprocall embracements, Mocenigo ſaid vnto him.

Mocenigo his Oration to the Popes Legat.

I Am ſure (moſt reuerend and excellent Father) that you are not ignorant how valiantly hither to the Venetians haue borne them ſelues for the Chriſtian faith. This is the ninth yeare we haue fought by Sea and Land againſt this cruell enemie, without the aſſiſtance of any Chriſtian Princes, but of King Ferdinand onely: It is needeleſſe to rehearſe the loſſes, trauailes, and dangers which we haue ſuſtained; for there is no place in all Morea, no ſhoare in Greece, nor Iſland in all the Ionian and Ægaan Seas which is not watered with our bloud, or with that of our enemies: we haue not ſpared our labour, nor expences, and we hartily wiſh that whatſoeuer wee now doe, or ſhall hereafter execute, may be for the wealth of Chriſtendome. We haue lately with fier and ſword waſted Æolia and Caria two rich Prouinces of the enemies; and now we hope by thine happy arriuall to bring to paſſe ſome nobler enterprize: It reſts therefore on your part to teach vs what you know to be profitable for Chriſtendome, and to preſcribe vnto vs what to execute; and on our partes forthwith to obay thy commandements.

The Legat anſwered. It is ſufficiently known with what zeale & affection the Venetians haue till this preſent defended Chriſtian Religion; and how by their valour and induſtrie they haue preſerued, Cities, Commonwealths and Iſlands: But for thy own particular, I may wel ſay, That although other Generalls haue done valiantly, yet thou haſt not only carried thy ſelfe valiantly, but moſt fortunately, and (if I may ſo ſay) almoſt diuinely. This being thus, I entreate thee to continue as thou haſt begun, and let not our conduct or that of any elſe, interrupt the courſe of thy happy fortune: For my ſelfe (as it becommeth a Church-man) I will pray vnto God and his Saints, that all thy entreprizes may ſucceed fortunatly, & thoſe troups which I haue brought with me, ſhall follow thy commandement.

The Legats anſwer to Mocenigo.

After this they ſailed into the Iſle of Samos, intending there to conſult whether they ſhould ſhape their next courſe. This Samos is at this day deſolate: for wee ſpeake not of that which is neere to Thrace, but rather of that which is right ouer againſt it. This that we now ſpeake of is vpon the coaſt of Ionia, and is (according to Iſidorus) an hundred thouſand paces in circuite, called in olde time Parthenia, afterwards Adriſia, and Anthemuſa, Melamphila, and Cipariſſa, and laſtly Samos. At this day it aboundeth in wilde Beaſtes, in regard of many deſert places thereof. In this Iſland the Fleete made ſome abode, till ſuch time as the horſe that were tired with their long beeing at Sea had refreſhed themſelues in the pleaſant meadowes. The Souldiers and Marriners in the meane time going on ſhoare, ſpent the time in banquets and hunting. The Generall and Captaines of the Armie concluded to aſſaile Satalia on the ſodaine, a Citie of Pamphilia builded by King Attalus. This Citie is at this day the greateſt of all the Sea-townes of Aſia. It hath an Hauen fortified on both ſides, and is embarred with a mightie iron chaine. The Syrian and Ægyptian marchants do vſually come thither as to the ordinary Mart of the whole Prouince. Mocenigo commanded the Captaines of the Gallies ſpeedily to prepare ladders the which being made readie, he departed from Samos with a gentle gale of winde, and ſailed to the aſſault of Satalia: Being come to the Iſlands of Calidonia, he receiued ſupplies of two Gallies ſent to him by thoſe of Rhodes. The whole Fleete conſiſted of foure ſcore and fiue Gallies, namely twenty which the Pope ſent, ſeuenteene from King Ferdinand, two from Rhodes, and ſix and fortie of the Venetians: The Fleet departing at Sun-ſet from the Calidonian Iſlands, did the next day by

Of which Samos he ſpeaketh.

The number of the Venetians nauall Armie.

by three of the clock in the morning arriue vpon the enemies shoare. Mocenigo presently commanded Victor Soranza one of the Prouidators to go with ten Gallies to seize vpon the Hauen, and Maripietro the other Prouidator, to Land his Souldiers, and with them to giue an assault to the Citie on the other side, and he commanded the horse-men speedily to make good a little Hill neere to the Citie, from thence to send supplies where need should be: He did moreouer exhort them to remember their accustomed valour, and to consider that they were to deale with an vnexperienced enemie, and such an one as was to be taken vnprouided; and that they did assaile a Citie, which being taken would for euer enrich them. Thus beeing full of hope and valour they marched towards the Citie: Himselfe with the Captains of the associates tarried in his Gallie to behold the assault. The horse-men without delay ranne to take that Hill. Souranza with force of oares beeing come to the Hauen, after that he had in the middest of a terrible shower of darts and arrowes broaken the chaine, was himselfe the foremost that entred into the Hauen. The other Gallies that followed him seized on the Fortes on both sides the Hauen & slew all those that were within them; then they brake in to the houses in the Suburbes and into them that were neere the walls, where the Marchants for the most part dwelt in regard of their trafficke, who at the first approach of the Fleete had abandoned their wares and retired them selues into the Citie: All the store-houses were full of pepper, cinamom, ginger, perfumes, and other costly marchandize. All which being taken and brought to the Gallies, they set fier on the houses the more to terrifie the inhabitants: Then because their ladders were vnprofitable by reason of the great heighth of the Walls, the Souldiers fell to the spade and mattock.

The vsuall Armie giueth an assault to Sattalia.

The Generall of the Rhodes, whilest inconsiderately with his Souldiers he was busied in breaking open one of the Citie Gates, was slaine outright with the fall of a great stone which fell vpon his head. His Souldiers carried his body to the Gallies. The death of this valliant man did greatly afflict the Souldiers, but their fierworkes most of all, which being throwne into the aire were by the winde carried into their faces, and falling thicke amongst the assailants did grieuously scalde them, whereby they weare enforced to giue ouer the assault and to retire to their Gallies. Maripietro likewise with his Souldiers fought valiantly on the other side of the Citie, which being encompassed with a double wall, the first was presently entred by scaling ladders with no meane slaughter of the Turkes; but comming to the second, and the ladders prouing to short, the courageous Souldiers fell instantly to vndermining. Our men did many gallant exploits there, and it was certainely thought that the Citie would haue beene taken that day, had not the darkenesse of the night preuented them, which enforced them to retire.

A Generous act of a Dalmatian woman.

It is reported that a Dalmatian woman who had a long time beene a slaue to the Turks, was so valiant as with cries and exhortations from the walls she encouraged the Christians, whereupon, some that were not farre off threatning her with punishment, she clapt her gowne round about her and leaped downe from the walls, where being wounded with the fall, she died among her Countriemen. The Prouidators hauing left a strong guard in all places neer to the Citie, that none might come forth or enter in, they retired in the night with the rest of their forces to the Gallies: where after that they had well considered among themselues, that the Citie being strongly encompassed with high walls, and well-manned with Souldiers, could not bee taken without great ordnance, and that it would bee too long a time to send for any from Morea, and very dangerous to bring it thither in regard of the continuall tempests which are vsuall along the coast of Pamphilia, exposed to the South-east wind which doth fiercely tosse those Seas, they determined to depart the next day, hauing first burnt the Suburbs, and wasted the Countrie which was the richest of all Pamphilia.

The Venetians resolution.

The Fleete beeing gone from Sathalia, did within a few daies after come to Rhoades, Rhoades, where, whileſt it remained, the Ambaſſadour of Vſſan-caſſan King of Perſia came thither. He told them, that at the intreatie and purſuite of Catharin Zeno a Venetian Gentleman and their Ambaſſadour in Perſia, his King had determined to ioyne his forces with thoſe of the Venetians to ouerthrow the power of Ottoman, and that his troupes were already entred into the greater Armenia which was ſubiect to Ottoman, and had taken the Citty of Toccata the wealthieſt of all the Prouince, and ſome other townes of great worth. Hee told them beſides, that he had great numbers of men and horſe: That the Perſians in their warres did skilfully handle the launce, ſword, and bowe, but that they were not accuſtomed to other armes: That he was ſent to the Venetians, Pope, and other Chriſtian Princes, to intreate them from the King to furniſh the Perſian Army with Artillery againſt their common aduerſarie.

The Ambaſſador of Vſſancaſſan king of Perſia.

Mocenigo and the reſt gaue a willing eare to the Ambaſſadours diſcourſe, and did put him in good hope that he ſhould eaſily obtaine all his demaunds: They ſhewed him their mighty fleete well furniſhed with men and armour, and told him that it was ready to ſaile whither his King ſhould commaund it, if his pleaſure were to imploy it. The Perſian being in this ſort diſmiſſed, went towardes Italie, and they made themſelues readie for ſome other enterprize, wherein to ſpend the remainder of that Autumne. But whileſt theſe things were done at ſea, Ottoman did inuade the Venetians in ſundrie places: For the Turkes made incurſions into Albania and Dalmatia, and entred into Italie. They did at the beginning of the warre at a certaine time prefixed make incurſions twice a yeare into Albania, namely in the time of harueſt, and grape-gathering, neere to Scutarie, Leſia, Croya, and other places with the Venetians held in the Prouince. For before the Venetians were open enemies to Ottoman, Amurath his father had a long time before made warre in Albania, and eſpecially then, when hee came to inuade Scanderbeg, who in his time was a famous and valiant Captaine, and ſuch an one, as next to Pyrrhus, who warred on the Romans in Italie, Albania neuer bred the like. Thoſe which haue ſeene him in Apulia when hee came thither to the aide of king Ferdinand with ſix hundred horſe, ſay, that he fought with his armes bare, ſometimes with an yron Mace, and ſometimes with a Sword, and executed there ſo many braue exploits, as himſelfe alone was more feared than all the reſt of his cauallerie. He, after that he had by his owne induſtrie recouered the principalitie of Albania, did ſo long as he liued, with few forces defend it againſt the whole power of the Turks. He had ſix hundred choice horſe, with whom he did ordinarily vſe to ouerthrow farre greater numbers of his Turkiſh enemies. For which his glorious exploits it is reported, that the people after his death, in admiration of him, as if they had obſerued in him ſomewhat that exceeded humane performance, did by Hymnes and Songs ſolemnize the memoriall of ſo worthie a Prince. Some credible Authors affirme, That in the hotteſt time of the warre when the Turkes filled all places with armes and terrour, great multitudes of Virgins would aſſemble themſelues together in thoſe citties where he had commaunded, and euery eight dayes would ſing the praiſes of that dead Prince, therein imitating thoſe of olde time, who in theyr high feaſts did publiſh the acts of notable men that were dead. But this (as I haue ſaid) was done in former time. The Turkes likewiſe made ſundry incurſions into Dalmatia. But becauſe it was done rather to forrage than to fight, it is not worthy of memory. It had beene good for the Venetians, if the Prouinces onely, and not Italie, had felt their cruell armes, who whileſt Mocenigo executed his fortunate exploits in Aſia, did enter the Confines of Italie, and came as farre as Vdina.

Scanderbeg a famous captaine

About the middeſt of Autumne, a company of Turkiſh horſe in an euening at Sun-ſet, came with great rumour and incamped on the Riuer of Sconcino, and many of them had alreadie foorded the ſtreame, when on a ſodaine they incountered the Venetian troupes. For diuers troupes of horſe lying in the Villages heere and there vpon the riuer, aſſembled themſelues vpon the enemies arriuall to ſtoppe their their paſſage; and although the Venetians vſed great ſpeed, the Turkes neuertheleſſe by their ſwiftneſſe were gotten before them, and ſome of their cauallerie had alreadie croſſed the Riuer, when as the Venetians vpon their firſt charge did beate them into the water, and enforced them to returne to the other ſide to their fellowes. The Italian cauallery remained on the riuer bankes moſt part of the night, but through feare of the enemies great number, before day they retired into the Iſle of Ceruia. This place is neare to Aquileia, and is made an Iſland by the circumfluence of the Riuers Ronedula, Amoſore, and Alſa. But ſo ſoone as it was day, and that the enemie had loſt ſight of the Venetians, he ſpeedily croſſed the Riuer, and with great out-cries made incurſions into the Countrey of the Forlani.

The Turkes incurſions into Italie.

The Turks come into the countrie of the Forlani.

All thoſe in the villages betooke themſelues to flight, and they in the Townes thought themſelues not ſecure. The ſmoke of the Villages and Countrey-houſes which were ſeene to burne a farre off, had greatly terrified the Inhabitants of the cities, but much more the ſight of the poore Countrie people, who dragged their wiues, children, and cattell to their very gates. The Inhabitants of Vdina, which at this day in wealth and populouſneſſe is one of the moſt renowned of the whole Prouince, was greatly affrighted with the approach of the Turks, who were come within three miles of the citie, no leſſe than if the enemie had beene at their gates. In which amazement, mothers with their children ſtoode weeping before the Altars, and others ranne vp and downe to the Market-place, and to the Caſtle. And it was certainely thought, That if the Cittie had beene aſſailed by the Turkes in that generall confuſion, it might haue beene endangered without any notable danger. But ſo it was, That the Turkes fearing ſome Ambuſcado, becauſe they knew not whither the Venetian cauallerie was retired, went backe the ſame way they came with great numbers of priſoners and cattell. Now the Venetians at the ſame time were not onely moleſted in that place, but neere to the Po likewiſe, by reaſon of the troubles of Ferrara. After the death of Borſia d'Æſte the Venetians aſſiſted Hercules his brother with men, money, and ſhipping, for the obtaining of the principalitie of Ferrara againſt his Nephew Nicolao ſonne to his brother Lionello, who claimed it, and being therein eſtabliſhed, they maintained him in it by force (notwithſtanding that in other places, they were preſſed with the burthen of a greater warre) when by the conſpiracie of certaine particular perſons, hee had like to haue loſt it. In the citie of Venice, they called in all ſiluer coyne, which (for the moſt part) was counterfet, and coyned other bigger peeces of a new ſtampe, which were called Troni, by reaſon of the Princes effigies vpon it. After the Perſian Ambaſſadours departure foorth of Aſia, Mocenigo, and the Aſſociates, being deſirous to ſpend the ſmall remainder of Autumne in ſome honourable exploits, directed their courſe towards that part of Aſia which is oppoſite to Chios neere to Thermena a Promontorie of thoſe of Mindos. The horſemen and mariners beeing landed in that place, and ſent vp and downe that Territorie which aboundeth with vines, oliue trees, and rich villages, they made a great ſpoile, and carried away infinite numbers of priſoners. The ſouldiers brought an hundred ſeauen and thirtie heades of the enemies to the Gallies. The priſoners were ſolde by the ſound of Drumme, and the mony was equally diuided among the troupes. From thence being come to Naſſo, the Generall of the Kings Gallies (for winter approached) took leaue of Mocenigo, and with his fleet went home into his Countrey.

The citie of Vdina is mightily affrighted at the comming of the Turkes.

The venetians inſtall Hercules d Eſte in the principalitie of Ferrara.

Mocenigo his incurſions into Aſia.

The Venetian and the Popes Legate being deſirous to attempt ſome memorable action before winter, leauing Naſſo, ſailed directly to beſiege Smirna, in times paſt a famous Cittie of Ionia. They had intelligence, that becauſe it was ſeated in a Gulph farre off, it had not of a long time taſted any miſery of warre; and that therefore, the Inhabitants of the place did liue in all ſecuritie, which had bred in them a careleſſe neglect of fortifying their Cittie, which in many places was much ruinated. They firſt arriued at Pſira a deſart Iſland: From thence ſayling by night, they they came the third day after in the morning to the ſtrond of Smirna. A great part of the Citie ſtandeth vpon the hill, but the better halfe of it is in the plaine, and yet the hill is moſt inhabited. The troupes being preſently landed, gaue a furious aſſault to the walles of the Citie where they found ſmall reſiſtance: but ſo great was the terrour of the diſtreſſed Citizens, as all their attempts could not long hold out the Chriſtians: for whileſt they ran vp and downe confuſedly, the Citie was ſpoyled by the ſouldiers and marriners. Great was the lamentation of the flying townſmen, whileſt women with their children, ranne into their Temples or Meſquets, embracing the Altars, and imploring the aide of Mahomet. At length the inhabitants being reduced to all extremitie, did from the tops of the houſes throw tyles and ſtones downe vpon their enemies. The victorious Venetians in the meane time ran vp and downe the Citie, and violently drew women, children, & maids forth of the temples: the men that were vnarmed they tooke priſoners, and ſuch as made defence were ſlaine: They tooke away their goods, gold, ſiluer, and all their curious plate, and ſpoiled all places of what condition ſoeuer.

The Chriſtians beſiege Smirna.

Smirna is taken.

It is reported that a young woman being perforce led towards the Gallies, did by the way fall downe vpon her husbands graue, and embracing it with warme teares, did often repeat his name, and ſpake in this manner. O my deare and welbeloued husband, the misfortune and fate of my countrey compels me, whom neither loue nor force could euer change from being thine, to be at this preſent carried away by a cruell enemie into perpetuall bondage: I poore wretch am hurried from thy ſight, and ſhall neuer more behold my louing country nor this deare monument. I powre theſe laſt teares of mine on thine aſhes, and with ſighes I inuoke thy Ghoſt: But why ſhould I doe ſo? I will rather die than be drawne from hence. And in this manner lying cloſe to the graue, ſhe could not be remoued thence, neither by threatenings nor force, whereupon a raſh young ſouldier thruſt his ſword through her bodie: happie onely in this to be entombed there where ſhee deſired.

The lamentation & great courage of a woman.

Balaban Gouernour of the Prouince, vpon report that the Citie was taken, came from the neighbour Garriſons where he lay, with great troupes leuied in haſt. The light horſe of Morea incountred him, and they had ſcarce begun the fight, when as all the other troupes from the Gallies arriued: the fight for a time was equall, but on a ſodaine the enemie was broken and put to rout with great loſſe. The victorious ſouldiers returned to the Citie, from whence carrying all the bootie to the Gallies, and the Citie being fired in ſundrie places, it was in a moment burnt to aſhes. Ceſio ſaith, that he ſaw there among other old monuments, that of the excellent Poet Homer with his picture, and ouer his head his name written in Greeke. The towne being ſacked and burnt, the whole territorie was waſted. Two hundred and fifteene of the enemies heads were carried to the Gallies. The fleet departed thence, and ſailed to the deſart Iſlands of Ionia, where the bootie was ſold to them that gaue moſt, and the money according to the cuſtome was diſtributed among the ſoldiers and marriners.

The fourth day after, the troupes landed on the ſhoare of Clazomene. This towne is ſeated in the fartheſt part of the Gulph of Smirna, and was in old time verie famous in Ionia: From thence they carried away no great bootie. For the newes of the taking of Smirna had cauſed the people of the counttey to retire with their goods, wiues, and children into the mountaines: verie few tarried in their houſes, who were carried away priſoners, and with them many Camels and much cattell. From thence, becauſe winter approached, the two fleets left Ionia, and with a faire wind ſailed directly into Morea.

The Citie of Clazomene.

VVhen they came to Modon, it is reported, That the Popes Legate after he had embraced Mocenigo, ſpake thus vnto him. I will take my leaue of thee O thou valiant man, and will be the publike witneſſe and trumpet of thy heroicke deeds. And if it ſhall pleaſe God to ſend me ſafe into Italie, not onely the Pope and our moſt Reuerend

The Popes Legate his ſpeech to Mocenigo when he tooke his leaue of him.

„ uerend Colledge of Cardinalls, but all Italie, together with the Princes and re-„ moteſt nations of Chriſtendome, ſhall vnderſtand what the Venetians vnder thy „ conduct, skill, and counſell, haue done againſt our common enemies the Turkes, in „ Aſia, Licia, and Pamphilia. Goe forward braue Captaine as thou haſt begunne to „ inlarge the Venetian glorie, to defend Chriſtian Religion: and therby to immor„ talize thine owne name. I beſeech Almightie God to fauour thine enterprizes, and „ I hope it will come to paſſe, that all the loſſes which Chriſtendome hath ſuſtained
„ by this barbarous enemie, ſhall ere long by thine onely valour, and to their ruine, „ be fully recompenced.

Mocenigo in his owne behalfe anſwered him briefly; but for the Venetians he promiſed much, prouided that the Princes of Chriſtendome would aſſiſt them in that warre. Thereupon, the Legate ſailed towards Italie, and the Venetian went to Naples in Morea, where, whileſt the Generall fortified the towne, a young man of Sicilie came vnto him, (who was taken priſoner at the loſſe of Nigrepont) and told him that he had diligently viewed Ottomans Nauie at Gallipolis and his Arſenall there, and that it was an eaſie matter to burne them both, in regard they kept no nightly watch, and if that he would furniſh him with ſome truſtie marriners, he ſhould ſhortly finde that he had told him nothing but the truth. The Venetian embraced the young man, and promiſed him great matters. The Sicilian hauing receiued ſailers and a ſhip, counterfeited the Marchant, and with his veſſell loden with Apples ſailed to Gallipolis, and all day long made ſale of his traſh: (though his head were buſied with greater deſignes) the ſame night hee did ſet fire on an hundred Gallies which were rigged, but he could not burne all the reſt that lay at Anker by reaſon of the great concourſe of people that came running thither at ſight of the fire.

A braue deed of a young man.

This being done, he ſought to eſcape forth of the ſtreight, but his owne ſhip by miſhap being likewiſe ſet on fire, he with his fellowes were enforced to hide themſelues in the next wood. But when the Turkes ſaw the Apples float vp and downe the water, and the Barke ſunke not farre from thence, they preſently imagined that the Marchant of Apples had done the deed. The next day the Sicilian and his fellowes were taken and ſent to Ottoman, who demaunding of this young man what had moued him to doe it, he brauely and feareleſly anſwered, That hee had done it to hinder the common enemie of Chriſtendome, and that his attempt would be much more glorious, if he might as eaſily runne his ſword through his bodie, as he had ſet fire on his Gallies. Mahomet wondering at the young mans courage, did not like King Porſenna, but according to his barbarous crueltie he commaunded the bodies of him and his fellowes to be ſawen a ſunder in the middeſt. The Venetian Senate in regard it could not recompence him according to his deſert, gaue his ſiſter a dowrie forth of the publike treaſurie, and to a brother of his, a yearely penſion during his life.

The Senate recompenceth the young mans brother & ſiſter.

The Fleet wintered at Naples, and the Generall was buſied in prouiding all neceſſaries for the Citie and fleete, when as letters came thither from the king of Perſia and Catharin Zeno directed to the Prince, and Senate, containing the ſelfe ſame demaunds which the Ambaſſador had craued certaine moneths before: Mocenigo in an expreſſe Galley ſent them to Venice. The Senate being moued by theſe letters, did preſently from all parts cauſe great quantitie of Ordnance to be prouided, and gold plate curiouſly wrought, with many peeces of Scarlet cloth of Verona, and a certaine ſumme of Duccates likewiſe for a preſent to the Perſian king, with an hundred young men skilfull in Gunners art to attend vpon the Ordnance, whoſe Captaine was Tomaſo Himolao. Ioſepho Barbaro an old Senator, a man skilfull in the Perſian tongue, was appointed Ambaſſador for to carrie theſe preſents to the king which loded three ſhips. All things being in readineſſe, Barbaro imbarked himſelfe, and with a faire wind ſailed to Cyprus, from thence along the coaſt of Cilicia and Syria, he arriued in the countrey of the king their friend.

The Venetians preſent ſent to the Perſian king.

Moreo-

Moreouer, the Senate commaunded Mocenigo to make his fleete readie to ſaile with it whitherſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe Vſſan-Caſſan to command it.

Mahomet in the meane time hauing left a ſtrong Garriſon in Conſtantinople, marched with great forces into Aſia, to oppoſe himſelfe againſt that warre. The Venetian likewiſe (becauſe the common rumour was, that the Caramani, brethren, aſſociates to the King of Perſia, whom Mahomet had bereft of their fathers Kingdome, did inuade the Sea-townes of Cilicia) did at the Spring time in the behalfe of the king of Perſia, ſaile with his fleete to Cyprus, from thence to goe to the aide of the Caramans. He had as many horſe and foote troupes, and the ſame prouiſion for warre, as the yeare before. The Rhodians ſent him two well-armed Gallies, and the king of Cyprus their friend and allie, gaue him foure.

The Venetian fleet in Cilicia

The Venetian fleete being thus augmented, ſailed into Cilicia, neere to Seleucia, at the ſiege whereof Caraman was then encamped. There is an hauen called Theodora, which the Venetian fleete made good. There in old time ſtood a Temple of Venus, and the place by reaſon of the commodiouſneſſe thereof was much frequented by Pirates; without the ruines of the Citie on the ſhoare there is at this day a verie ancient Temple to be ſeene, builded of ſquare ſtone. Caſſambet the younger of the Caraman brethren (for the eldeſt whoſe name was Piramet, and king of Cilicia remained in the king of Perſias Amie) ſent Ambaſſadors to the Venetian, who after they had congratulated his ſafe arriuall, told him that the Caraman brethren, had euer grounded their hope and truſt on the Venetians, in regard of the friendſhip and alliance betwixt their dead father and them; that Caſſambet had for foure monethes beſieged three Cities of Cilicia; Sichin, Seleucia, and Coric: which if he might take, he did aſſure himſelfe in ſhort ſpace to recouer his whole Kingdome; that he wanted nothing but Ordnance and other warlike engines to batter townes: That he did entreate him to aide the king a friend and allie to the Venetians, till ſuch time as he had recouered his fathers kingdome, which Ottoman their common enemie did wrongfully poſſeſſe.

Ambaſſadors come to Mocenigo.

The Ambaſſadors requeſt.

The Venetian after that he had put the Ambaſſadours in good hope, diſpatcht Victor Souranza to Caſſambet to conſult with him concerning the forme of the warre. He learned of him that of thoſe three Cities which were beſieged, it behooued him firſt to take Sichin, for that being taken, the reſt would preſently yeeld. Muſtapha the Cilician was Gouernour therof, a treacherous man, and one that with his fortune had changed Religion, and had in times paſt beene a friend to Caſſambet and his brother, who ſo ſoone as he ſaw their Kingdome to be taken from them, did follow Ottomans Armie, and did wrongfully ſeize on that Citie. Cariolan Cepio of Trahu, being ſent to view the towne, reported that the Citie was ſeated on an high place, but that the wall was weake and vnfortified, the people vnskilfull and diſarmed, with other matters which did promiſe victorie. The Venetian reſoluing to beſiege that Citie, ſent Lodouico Lombardo the Venetian with ten Gallies to Coric by Sea, to keepe all victuals from comming to the inhabitants. By land Caraman with his troupes did neerely preſſe the enemie: the reſt of the Armie drew neere to Sichin, and gaue an aſſault, but by reaſon of the difficultie of the place the town could not be taken. The inhabitants waxing proud for that good ſucceſſe, did from the walles mocke the Venetians, ſaying: Get yee home O Venetians, and command the Sea and fiſhes, but leaue the Empire of the land to Ottoman. The Venetian by an Herald of Armes ſought to draw Muſtapha to a voluntarie yeelding, wiſhing him rather to make proofe of the Venetians loyalty and gentleneſſe than of their Arms: but perceiuing that the Turke contemned peace, he gaue a more furious aſſault to the Citie, and planting his Ordnance on the North ſide, and hauing made a reaſonable breach, the enemie being daunted, preſently yeelded.

The Venetians beſiege Sichin.

The Venetians take Sichin.

The Venetians ſuffering Muſtapha with his ſouldiers to goe whither he would, deliuered the Citie to Hiſafa Caramans Lieutenant. From thence going to Coric, he did by the way meet with Zanchio General of the royall Armie, with ten Gallies.

The Sea enuironeth two parts of Coric, the reſt on the land ſide hath a verie depe ditch fortified with a double wall: The hauen lieth towards the Eaſt, whoſe entrance is likewiſe fortified. On the South ſide is the Iſle of Eleuſia three hundred paces from thence, fortified with a wall of white ſquare ſtone. The Venetian from the poope of the Galley hauing curiouſly viewed the ſituation of the place, made a ſigne to his Gallies to enter: Thereupon the Gallies with diſcharging their Ordnance, and in a ſhower of arrowes did winne the Hauen, Mocenigo hauing landed his troupes, ſent to the Gouernour of the Citie to know of him whether he would yeeld and goe from thence: He made a proud anſwer, ſaying: Tell him from me, that the weake coward Muſtapha is not heere, but another, who by his deſerts commandeth the royall troupes which are heere in garriſon.

The ſituation of Coric.

The Gouernor of Coric his anſwer to Mocenigos Herald.

The Turkiſh Princes doe vſe to appropriate to themſelues the fifth part of all captiues. They make choice of male children from ten yeares old to ſixteene. If there be no captiues, they doe by their officers carrie away children of that age in deſpite of their parents, forth of ſuch Prouinces as they haue wonne from the Chriſtians. Theſe by conſtraint hauing renounced Chriſtianitie, are inſtructed in the Mahometan ſuperſtition, and then are deliuered ouer into the hands of tutors, who teach them martiall diſcipline, and when they come to be men, they follow the Prince to the warres. The vulgar call them Ianizaries: ſuch among them as are wiſe and valiant, attaine to great honours: of theſe, the Baſchas, Gouernours of Prouinces, Townes, and Caſtles are made: Some of them lie in Garriſon in the Cities, and ſome of them remaine at the great Lords port, to be neere him with their Armes when he rides abroad. Out of theſe, he chooſeth a Regiment for the Guard of his owne perſon when he goeth to warre. Ottoman had left many of theſe men for the Guard of Coric. Iſmael the Cities gouernour preſuming vpon them, would not endure to heare tell of yeelding. But when the Venetian perceiued it to be time to vſe force and no threatning, he planted his Ordnance on the South and Weſt ſides of the Citie, and hauing made a great breach in the wall, Iſmael yeelded on conditions to haue his owne life, and thoſe of his ſouldiers ſaued. The Venetian ſurrendred the Citie to Caraman: From thence he went to beſiege Seleucia.

After what ſort the Ianizaries are made.

Coric yeeldeth.

Seleucus one of Alexander of Macedons ſucceſſors builded it fiue miles from Sea. This Citie is now ruinate. Neſſembeg lay in Garriſon in the Caſtle which was ſtrong by ſituation and art, who although at firſt he made ſhew not to yeeld, yet ſo ſoone as he perceiued the ordnance & other engins to be planted againſt him, he forthwith yeelded the fort & the garriſon to the Venetians, who by Souranza did preſently deliuer it to the king his friend. Caraman hauing won his kingdom, preſented the Venetian general with a horſe, bridled, ſadled, & barded with ſiluer, & with a tame Leopard giuing him infinite thanks, for that by his meanes he had recouered his fathers kingdome, aſſuring him that whatſoeuer his brother and himſelfe ſhould poſſeſſe, they would euer confeſſe to hold it of the Venetians. Warre being in this manner ended in Cilicia, & Mocenigo hearing no newes of the king of Perſias Armie determined to inuade Licia, which had not as yet taſted the miſeries of war. But newes being brought vnto him that Iames king of Cyprus lay grieuouſly ſicke of a Diſſenteria or flix, he ſailed to Cyprus to viſit him. The Venetian being come into the Iſland, hauing after reciprocall ſalutations enquired of his diſeaſe, & of the remedies applied thereunto, entreated the king to be of good cheere, and with patience to beare the force of his maladie, who made him this anſwere. I know verie well moſt excellent Captaine, and feele how that by the violent torment of my diſeaſe. I am in great danger of life, and not to flatter my ſelfe, I haue no hope to eſcape, I make my deereſt wife with the childe which ſhe beares in her body mine heires, and ſhe is (as thou knoweſt) daughter to Marco Cornari, and being adopted by the Venetian Senat, was by it giuen to me in mariage. If I die, (which I make no queſtion of) I recommend my wife, iſſue, and kingdome to the Venetians. And I heartily entreat thee, in regard of our friendſhip, and for the greatnes of the Venetian ſtate (if it come to that) that thou wouldeſt defend and keepe, both her ſelfe, iſſue and kingdome from all wrong and oppreſſion.

Seleucia yeeldeth to the venetians

Caraman his preſent to the Venetian.

The king of Cyprus ſpeech to Mocenigo.

Thy

Thy body (quoth Mocenigo) moſt Royall King, is yet in good eſtate, and thou in the prime of thine age, which may put thee in good hope of ſpeedy recouery, but if it ſhould fall out otherwiſe (which God forbid) I beſeech thee be confident, that neither my ſelfe, nor the Venetians forces will euer be wanting to thee or thine. And then taking leaue of him, he ſpeedily ſailed with all his fleete to the Iſlands neare to Licia, from thence going to the firme land, and carrying away a great bootie from that coaſt, he reſolued to beſiege Micra a towne neare to the ſea; and becauſe hee had ſmall hope that it would otherwiſe yeelde, hee planted his ordnance on both ſides. The wall was in ſome places very much ſhaken, when Aiaſabet Gouernour of Lycia ſhewed himſelfe with great troupes of ſouldiers. The light horſe of Morea went againſt him, and there was a cruell fight on both ſides. Aiaſabet being ſlaine, the Turkes were with great ſlaughter broken and put to rout. An hundred and fiftie of the enemies heads were brought to the Campe, and being fixed vpon launces with that of Aiaſabet, were ſet vp neere to the walles, to the end the belieged might behold them. Charago the Tribull, who commaunded in the Citty, being daunted with the diſaſter of his Countrymen, and perceiuing a great part of the wall to be beaten downe, he capitulated for himſelfe and the Inhabitants, that they might haue their liues ſaued and depart whither they pleaſed. This being graunted, the Venetians ſacked and burnt the citie.

Mocenigoes anſwer to the king.

The Venetians beſiege Micra.

Micra is taken by compoſition.

From thence the fleet ſailed to Fliſca, which in times paſt was oppoſite to Rhodes, but at this day there is nothing to be ſeene but the ruines, the territorie round about it is filled with Villages. The horſe of Morea and the Mariners being landed, waſted all that Countrey. The Generall had determined to paſſe the ſtreight, and had already commaunded the Captaines of the Gallies, to bee ready to that end, when the Meſſengers of Charlotta ſiſter to the King of Cyprus, (whom her brother had driuen foorth of the kingdome, and like a baniſhed woman had liued a long time at Rhodes) arriued, who certified the Generall of the King of Cyprus death, by whom his ſiſter Charlotta (being borne in lawfull matrimonie) had been wrongfully expelled from her fathers kingdome. They craued his aide, and entreated him to aſſiſt the King of Cyprus daughter, and kinſwoman to the Duke of Sauoy, and to reſtore her to her fathers kingdome, from which her brother, ſonne to a concubine, had driuen her. Mocenigo, after that he had acquainted them with the auncient league and alliance which had beene betwixt the Venetians and King Iames, anſwered; That in the Common-wealths name, he would doe the Ladie Charlotta all right: yet hee did greatly wonder that ſhee did not remember how that the right of Kingdomes is rather debated by the Sword, than by Law. And that the Realme of Cyprus had not beene onely taken from her, and from the Genoueſes, who then held a part thereof: That for his part, hee knew how that the wife of the late King, the adoptiue daughter of the Venetian Senate being left with child, had beene, together with the fruit of her wombe, made heires by the deceaſed King before his death; and therefore hee tolde them plainely, That hee would in that iuſt quarrell take vpon him the defence of the Queene wife to the late King, who did hope ere long to be mother to a King. Hee willed them then to depart, and to ſeeke aide elſewhere againſt her, for hee was reſolued, in honour of the Republique to defend her from all wrongs and oppreſſion. The Ambaſſadors being diſmiſſed with this anſwere, he determined to paſſe the ſtreight, but in the meane time hee receiued Letters from Catharine Zeno which did aduertize him, that the Armies of the Perſian king and the Turke were not farre off from one an other, and that their meaning was to fight with diſplayed enſignes for the finall deciding of their controuerſie; that he ſhould doe well, ſpeedily to bring his fleete to the ſea coaſt of Cilicia, whither the Perſian king promiſed to bring his troupes, there to treate with him after what maner the warre ſhould be managed.

Ambaſſadours come to Mocenigo from the king of Cyprus ſiſter.

Mocenigo his anſwer to the Ambaſſaders.

Mocenigo his determination is broken off.

Theſe Letters made the Venetian to giue ouer his iourney into the ſtreight, and to ſhape his courſe towards Cilicia, and after that he had ſodainely waſted the territories of the Mireneans in Lycia, hee failed to Cyprus, where after that hee had comforted the mournefull Queene for her husbands death, he intreated her to bee of good cheere, and to feare no warrelike menaces; for he was readie to defend her and her kingdome from all assaults and attempts whatsoeuer. Then he made haste towards Cilicia. So soone as the fleet came to Coric. Lodouico Lauretano Captaine of one of the Popes Gallies came thither to him, and told him that hee came from the Archbishop of Spalatra the Popes Legate who was arriued with tenne Gallies at Rhodes, to know of him what hee meant to doe, and whether he intended to preferre some notable seruice against the Turkes; for if his intention were such, he would meet him with his fleete, by which speech he gaue him to vnderstand, That the Popes Legate had no meaning to come forward, but vpon hope of some great enterprize, thereby going about to inferre, that till then hee had done no memorable matter: Mocenigo taking his speech in bad part, could not so much master himselfe, but that he tolde him, That peraduenture the new Legate thought, that what hee till then had done against the enemie, was but a trifle, yet those who had felt his forces, did thinke that no greater mischiefe could light vpon them, and that it was at his owne choice, whether he would ioyne with the Venetians fleete, or not: but for his owne part he promised for the Popes sake, to haue the gallies, souldiers, and Legates selfe in singular estimation, and that he would haue no lesse care of them in all places than of the Venetians.

Lodouico Lauretano commeth from the Popes Legate.

Mocenigo his answer to Lauretano.

The Venetian fleete had already remained certaine dayes on the confines of Cilicia, when the Generall had intelligence by Letters from Catharine Zeno, that the Persian had fought twice with the Turkes. Ottoman had two of his chiefest Officers in his company, the one was the Gouernour of Natolia, and the other of Romagnia; The first commaunded the Prouinces of Asia, and the second, those of Europe. Moderne Cosmographers haue termed Romagnia, all the coast of the Ponticke sea from Tauris of Chersonessus, to the furthest part of Morea. This name (as some do thinke) was giuen it, at such time as the seate of the Empire was transported from Rome to Constantinople. Natolia, which in time past was called Ponticke containeth (with whatsoeuer belongeth to the streight,) all Caria, Lycia, and Pamphilia. The great Lord vseth the aduise and councell of these men in any weighty and important businesse, and specially in martiall matters: in the Barbarian tongue they are called Baschas.

The Gouernour of Romagnia then, comming to fight with Vssancassans sonne, was vanquished and slaine in fight. Some thinke that the Persians are superiour to the Turks in number of men and horse, as the euent of that battell did testifie: For Ottomans army being broken and put to rout, they were in a manner all slaine, together with their Generall. The king being puffed vp with pride for this victory, did the next day encompasse the enemies Campe. Ottoman in the meane time had fortified himselfe in the middest of his Campe where hee remained as in a strong fort; hee had inclosed it with a trench of foure thousand paces in compasse with rampires, neere to which he caused waggons made fast together with yron chains to be placed, vpon euery of which two field peeces were laid, then there was great store of ordnance planted in euery place, to defend the fortifications. Round about it fifteene thousand shot were appoynted, continually to play vpon the enemie: within the rampires were fiue and twentie thousand choice horse, all Thracians and Tribulls, and twenty thousand Ianissaries reputed inuincible, and like to the Macedonian Phalange.

A battell betwixt the Turkes and Persians. Vssancassans his sonne is victorious.

The order of Ottomans campe.

At the enemies first approach, infinite cannon shot were at one time bestowed vpon his troupes which made a great slaughter of men and horse. In that place Vssancassans sonne a braue young Prince being emboldened by the precedent victorie, fighting in the former rankes was slaine with a cannon shot. The Persians beeing amazed with the great slaughter of their men and horse, and being affrighted with the vnusuall report of the ordnance, turned their backes. The Turkes comming furiously foorth of their Campe, did pursue the vanquished, and made a great execution.

The Persians are vanquished by the Turkes.

cution. All the Perſian Armie conſiſted of horſe, who by their ſwiftneſſe did in a moment eſcape farre from thence. The victorious Turkes durſt purſue them no further. The King retyred into the mountaines of Armenia, where his wife and children were. Otomin accounting himſelfe the Conquerour, for that he had wonne the enemies Campe, diſmiſſed his Armie, and returned to Conſtantinople.

The Perſians were reckoned to be three hundred and fiftie thouſand fighting men, and the Turkes three hundred and twentie thouſand: of the Turkes fortie thouſand were ſlaine, and ten thouſand of the Perſians. The Generall hauing intelligence hereof by Zenos letters, went from Cilicia into Cyprus. For Zeno ſent him word that the king in regard of the loſſe of the battell would not come to the Sea-coaſt that yeare. The number of both Armies.

Mocenigo held the Queenes ſonne which ſhe lay in off, at the Font, and was his Godfather. Andrea Cornari the Queenes vncle was at the ſame time in the Iſland. The Queene and her Councell gouerned the affaires of the Kingdome. Mocenigo enquiring of Cornari concerning the ſtate of the Kingdome found that all thinges were quiet there: Neuertheleſſe, being vnwilling to leaue ſuch a Realme altogether naked of forces, hee added two Gallies to thoſe that were come thither at the beginning of Summer, and commaunded them to remaine at Famagoſta vnder the commaund of Cornari. The Popes Legate likewiſe came thither with two Gallies, for the Treaſurer had carried the reſt to Sio. Both of them within a while after departing thence went to Rhodes, from thence to Sio. And after that they had coaſted the Iſlandes Ciclades, they ſayled into Morea. The Legate taking his leaue, returned towards Italie, and Mocenigo went to Modon. This is all that was done abroad during that Summer. In the middeſt of Autumne Prince Trono died, hauing gouerned one yeare and eight monethes. He was buried in the Church of the Friers Minors, where his ſonne Philip did afterwardes build him a verie ſumptuous Tombe of white and blacke marble curiouſly guilt, neere to the high Altar.

¶ NICOLAO MARCELLO, the 69. Duke of Venice.

Nicolao Marcello a man of ſingular vertue ſucceeded him. In his time they begaune orderly to paint in the great Councell-chamber that which the Venetians had done in times paſt for Pope Alexander againſt the Emperor Fredericke. The vndertaker of this worke was Gentile Bellino, the excellenteſt painter of his time, who after the peace being ſent to Conſtantinople to the Emperour Mahomet ſhewed ſo many excellent proues of his skill, as he receiued of him the honour of Knighthood, and was ſent home into his countrey with rich preſents. During this Princes gouernment a new kinde of money was coyned in the Citie, which was called Marcello by the Authors name.

The end of the ninth booke of the third Decad.

THE TENTH BOOKE OF THE THIRD DECAD

Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the tenth Booke of the third Decad.

THE description of the Isle of Cyprus. The Islanders sedition, and CORNARI his death are mentioned in the beginning. The conspirators leaue the Island vpon the arriuall of the Venetian fleet. MOCENIGO by his presence assureth the state of the Island. The description of Albania and Scutarie. SOLIMAN the Eunuch with great forces besiegeth Scutarie. The Venetians vse all meanes by land and water, to raise the siege. The Venetians Gallies fight fortunately with the Turkes, at the mouth of the Boiano. The Turkes are with great losse repulsed from the walles of Scutarie. TRIADAN GRITTI being infected with the bad ayre of the Boyano dieth at Catharra. The king of Hungarie at the same time fighteth often with good successe against the Turkes. The siege of Scutatie is raised. ANTONIO LAVRETANO, who had defended Scutarie, being made Generall of the Gallies, doth by his opportune arriuall, first, keepe Lepanto, and afterwards Lemnos. The Venetians are vanquished, and receiue a great ouerthrow in Albania before Croya, and within a while after, another in Italie neere to the Riuer Lizonza, where they loose their Cauallerie. The Turkes put all the countrey of Friull to fire and sword. Scutarie is againe besieged by the Turkes more fiercely than it had beene foure yeares before. The Turkes make incursions into Italie. Peace is made with OTTOMAN during the siege of Scutarie; Yet scarce obserued in the Islands, about controuersie for the Garrison of Xant. Peace being made with the Turke, warre is continued for a time in Tuscanie in the behalfe of the Florentines.

THE Isle of Cyprus being afterward entangled in new broyles, did in the middest of winter call the Venetian to her aide. The familie of the Gothalans was verie powerfull in that Island, for king Iames hauing in a manner thrust all the nobility forth the country together with his sister Charlotta, had mightily enriched these men, and seated them in the chiefest places of his kingdome. In former times they had giuen themselues to piracie, and liued onely by theft. But the king being dead, and they by his bountie possessing goodly inheritances were neuertheless desirous to embroyle the state of the Prouince. Of their faction there was a Cypriot Bishop, a man esteemed by his countrimen no lesse ingenious than fortunate. At the kings death, he was his Ambassador with King Ferdinand. This Bishop determined to inuade inuade the Realme by tyrannie, and the better to effect his purpoſe, he perſwaded King Ferdinand to purſue by his meanes the marriage betwixt his baſtard ſonne, and the baſtard daughter of the late King Iames gotten on a concubine. And for ſpeedie concluſion of the buſineſſe, the Biſhop with two Gallies returned to Cyprus, with one of King Ferdinands truſtieſt Councellers.

Mocenigo who lay at Modon hauing intelligence of the arriuall of the kings Gallies, began to ſuſpect that they were not ſent thither but vpon ſome great occaſion, whereupon he preſently diſpatched Coriolan Cepio, and Pietro Tolmiere the Dalmatian with two Gallies into Cyprus, and commanded them to enquire of the Queene, whether thoſe of the Iſland practized any innouation, and if ſhe feared any treacherie, boldly to ſend him word what ſhe would haue him to doe, who would be readie to come to her with the whole fleete vpon any occaſion. After their departure Mocenigo had intelligence by letters from the Gouernour of Candie, that the Cypriots had an intent to rebell, and that it was to be feared, that vnleſſe their deſignes were broken by the ſodaine arriuall of the Venetian fleet in Cyprus, that the ſtate of the Iſland would be greatly endangered. The Generall being moued by theſe letters, did ſpeedily ſend Victor Souranza with eight Gallies into Cyprus, who comming to Candie before that the two Gallies which were firſt ſent, were gone from thence, Souranza commanded Coriolan to purſue his iourney, and told him, that he with the reſt of the Gallies would follow after.

Mocenigo is aduertized of the enemies purpoſe.

Whileſt the Venetians were on their way, the Cypriots hauing commplotted with their Biſhop, did in the night come forth of their houſes armed, and ſlue Polizappa of Cyprus, and the Queenes Phiſitian, who being affrighted with that ſodaine rumour ranne to his chamber. Andrea Cornari at the firſt noiſe fled to the Caſtle, where the Captaine refuſing to giue him entrance, he hid himſelfe betwixt the two walles, but being diſcouered, and comming forth vpon the conſpirators words, that he ſhould haue no harme, he was preſently by them murdered together with Marco Bembo his Nephew, ſonne to his ſiſter. They left their bodies naked in the place. Theſe murthers being committed, they ranne with the ſelfeſame furie to the Venetian Magiſtrates houſe, who remained in the Iſland to doe iuſtice, to his conntreymen. Nicolao Paſcali was then Magiſtrate: they told him that the ſouldiers had ſlaine Cornari, becauſe he would not giue them their pay, and that they would not haue that nights murther committed through the couetouſneſſe of one man to be by the Venetians imputed to them, who proteſted ſtill to continue loyall to the Queene and the Venetians, intreating him to write to the Venetian Generall, that Cornari had beene ſlaine by his owne fault for defrauding the ſouldiers of their pay: they told him beſides, that they would ſend meſſengers to the Prince and Senate to aſſure them of the Iſlanders loyaltie towards the Queeene and her ſonne, and of their friendſhip towards the Venetians.

Andrea Cornari murthered.

Although Paſcali knew all this to be falſe, he made ſhew neuertheleſſe to beleeue them, and promiſed them to write to Mocenigo. They in the meane time entring into the Pallace, betrothed the kings baſtard daughter of ſixe yeares old to king Ferdinands baſtard. They intituled him Prince of Galilee (wherewith the ſucceſſors in the Kingdome were wont to be honoured,) and aſſigned him diuers lands and ſignories for her dowrie. Theſe things being done, they preſently in a Galley ſent away King Ferdinands counſeller, who came thither with the Biſhop, to acquaint the King his maſter what had paſt. They ſent meſſengers likewiſe to Venice to ſatisfie the Senators with words, and to ſweeten the bitterneſſe of Cornares death, or if they could not appeaſe them, yet at leaſt in ſome ſort to defer the warre which the Venetians might make vpon them, before their forces could be vnited. They compelled the Queene to write to Mocenigo that Cornari her vncle had beene ſlaine by the ſouldiers for his couetouſneſſe; that with her ſonne ſhe freely gouerned the kingdome: that all the Cypriots were dutifull and loyall: all which the poore Princeſſe being enuironed with traitors durſt not refuſe to write.

That

That done, they beganne to ſtrengthen their faction, and manned the Caſtles and ſtrong places with men at their owne deuotion, and ſharers in the conſpiracie.

In the meane time Cariolan arriued, who ſeeming to be ignorant of matters paſt, told the Queene that the Venetians had receiued aduertizement, that the king of Egypt had promiſed the Realme of Cyprus to Charlotta, and therefore the Generall had ſent him thither to confirme her and the Cypriots likewiſe: That Souzanza the Prouidator would ſhortly be there with eight Gallies, and that the Generall would follow him with the reſt of the Fleete: That the Venetians determined to defend her ſelfe, her ſonne, and kingdome againſt all forraine attempts. Theſe news did comfort the Queene and her followers; and on the contrary, the Conſpirators beganne to feare. Foure dayes after, the Prouidator arriued. At his landing two of the Conſpiratours came to him vpon his word; they entering into diſcourſe of what had happened, imputing the cauſe of Cornares death to his only couetouſneſſe, promiſed to continue loyall and obedient, and to account nothing ſo deere to them as the Venetians friendſhip. Souranza although he knew the Iſlanders actions not to be anſwerable to their words, did neuertheleſſe labour to quiet all matters, and promiſed them, that by ſurrendring to the Queene the forts and reuenew of the kingdome, they ſhould not only be accounted friends, but inward friends to the Venetians. As for Cornares death, it concerned one priuate man alone, and not the common-wealth: He told them that they might depart and ſhew by thoſe meanes which he had propounded to them, what loue they did beare towards the Venetians. They promiſed to accompliſh the Prouidators demaund. But procraſtinating the performance, all their promiſes were found deceipts.

The Prouidator commeth to the Iſland.

Souranza his propoſition to the conſpirators.

Then did Souranza write both to the Generall and Senate, that the Queene and her ſonne were by the conſpiracie of ſome traitors ſtraitly kept, and that vnleſſe ſome ſpeedie remedie were vſed, it was to be feared that ſhee would ſhortly looſe both the kingdome and the name royall.

In the meane time the Conſpirators meſſengers being come to Mocenigo were roughly entreated, and ſent backe without any hope of peace: Then being prouoked by the preſent daunger, although hee knew that Triadin Gritti was appointed his ſucceſſor, and foreſeeing how daungerous it was to temporize in a buſineſſe of ſo great importaunce, hee made a ſtay of ſeauen Gallies that were going in trade of marchandize to Alexandria, and ſent thoſe of Alexandria to Candie, and them of Syria to Naples, that they might returne to him loaden with horſemen of Morea, and the other with Candiots. He commaunded the Magiſtrates of the Iſland to loade as many ſhips as they could find with victualls, and to ſend them to Cyprus. And himſelfe on the other ſide hauing aſſembled all the ſouldiers of the neighbour garriſons, and embarking them in the veſſells, which hee had made readie in the Iſland, and in other places of Greece, hee ſailed towards Rhodes. By the way he receiued Letters from Souranza the Prouidator which aduertized him of the manifeſt rebellion and conſpiracie of the Iſlanders. Theſe newes cauſed him to make haſte. Beeing come to Rhodes, and expecting the troupes which hee had ſent for, hee had intelligence by later Letters, how that the Conſpirators hauing notice of his great warrelike preparations, together with his mightie fleete, were gone foorth of the Realme, and thereby all matters quieted: yet, the Queenes letters, though they imported the ſame, intreated him, if his iourney might not preiudice the Common-wealth, to come into the Iſland, becauſe that diuers partakers in the conſpiracie were there, and did diſquiet the peace of the Countrey, and that ſhee was well aſſured vnleſſe the authoritie of ſome of them were abated, the Realme would ere long be greatly endaungered. Mocenigo being moued by theſe Letters, left Rhodes, and within a while after arriued in Cyprus.

Mocenigos diligence to relieue Cyprus.

The conſpirators flie from Cyprus.

This Iſland is ſeated vpon ſundry ſeas: on the Weſt ſide it is watered with the ſea of Pamphilia, towards the South with that of Egypt, towards the Eaſt with the Syrian, and on the North with that of Cilicia. It was in old time called Achamante.

The deſcription of the Iſle of Cyprus.

Philonides

Philonides ſaith, That it was tearmed Ceraſa: Xenagoras, Aſpelia, Amathuſa, and Machare: Aſtimones, Chritona and Colinnia. There were in it in former times fifteene goodly Cities, but at this day there are very few. Tymoſtenes writes, That it is in circuit foure hundred and nine and twentie thouſand paces, and Iſidorus mentioneth but three hundred ſeuentie fiue thouſand: and in length from the Eaſt to the Weſt, betwixt the Promontories of Dinareta and Achamante, Artemidorus ſaith, an hundred ſixtie two thouſand, and Timoſtenes two hundred thouſand. Damaſtus was deceiued to take the length thereof from the North to the South. Cyprus is inferior to none other Iſland whatſoeuer: it aboundeth in wine and oyle, it hath corne ſufficient, it produceth mettals, and diuers other neceſſaries; in which reſpect it is no leſſe frequented by marchants, than for thoſe other commodities which they tranſport to Syria.

The Venetian after his arriuall landed all his troops at Famagoſta, and embattailed them, as if he intended to haue muſtered them in S. Nicholas market-place, beneath the Royall Palace, in the ſight of the Queene and the Cypriots, who were greatly terrified therewith. His muſters being ended, he did on a ſuddaine diſmiſſe the Gallies which went for traffique, and all the reſt likewiſe which he had brought from the neighbour Iſlands, together with all the Cauallerie: he onely retained with him the Candiot Archers, and the old Armie. Then he mand the forts with naturall Venetians. He did afterwards make a diligent enquirie of Cornares death, and thoſe that were attainted and conuicted of the crime, he puniſhed with death, and baniſhed ſuch as were ſuſpected of it. Thoſe who in that commotion had continued loyall, were recompenced with the conſpirators goods. The affaires of Cyprus being thus quieted, he receiued letters from Prince Marcello, and a Decree from the Senate, whereby he was made Gouernour of Cyprus: where although he had carefully prouided for whatſoeuer was neceſſarie for the peace of the Iſland, and that all matters there were quiet, the publike Decree did neuertheleſſe enforce him to remaine there for the defence of the Iſland.

Mocenigo at his arriuall in Cyprus puniſheth thoſe that were guiltie of Cornares death.

Mocenigo is choſen Gouernour of Cyprus.

In the meane time Giacomo Marcello, Prouidator to the new Generall, arriued in the Prouince, vnto whom at his comming into Cyprus Mocenigo ſurrendred tenne Gallies, that with them he might defend the Iſlands of the Egean ſea, till Triadans arriuall: but being certified by letters, that Triadan was come into Greece, and perceiuing the Realme of Cyprus to be quiet, leauing Souranza the Prouidator (who likewiſe by the Senates Decree was appointed to commaund the foot forces in the Iſland) with tenne Gallies for the defence of the Kingdome, he tooke leaue of the Queene, and entreated her to feare nothing, telling her, that the Venetian forces ſhould be euer readie for the preſeruation of her State. She gaue him a Targuet curiouſly wrought, and a purple banner in conſideration of his braue exploits; then departing from the Iſland with the reſt of the Fleet, he went firſt to Rhodes, from thence to Candie, and laſtly to Modon. Thither newes was brought him, how that the enemie with great forces lay before the Citie of Scutari.

The Turkes beſiege Scutari.

This Citie ſtandeth in that part of Dalmatia, which being poſſeſſed by the Epirots, was by the modernes tearmed Albania by a particular name: it is ſeated on an hanging hill, and in ſome places the acceſſe to it is very difficult. On the Weſt ſide is a lake, in circuit foureſcore thouſand paces, though Authors make no mention of it. The inhabitants call it the lake of Scutari, out of which iſſueth a nauigable Riuer called Boyano. Plinie ſaith, That in former time the Riuer Drina did runne on the Eaſt ſide thereof, very neere to the Citie walls, where at this day the ruines of the bridge are to be ſeene: now the Riuer changing her courſe, it runnes neere to the Iſland, and deliuers it ſelfe by two channels to the ſea, ten myles from Boyano. The champaine countrey, which lieth betwixt theſe two Riuers, and the fields neere adioyning, are ſo fruitfull, as ſeed being caſt vpon the ground without any tillage, giue a wonderfull encreaſe; and they are enforced to driue their cattell forth of the paſtures, for feare they ſhould ouerfeed themſelues. Alongſt the ſea coaſt are goodly goodly woods, wherewith they build ſhippes.

The ſituation of Scutari.

Ottoman, who aſpired to the Empire of Italie, being allured by theſe commodities, reſolued to attempt Scutari, the chiefe Citie of that Prouince, hoping by taking thereof, with eaſe to become maſter of the reſt: hee committed the charge of the ſiege to Soliman the Eunuch, whom he made Gouernor of the Prouinces of Europe in his ſtead, who the yeare before was ſlaine in the Perſian warre. And beſides his other forces, he gaue him eight thouſand Ianizaries of his owne guard, with an hundred Canoniers. He, hauing aſſembled great forces forth of all Prouinces ſubiect to Mahomet, had fourefcore thouſand men in his armie. The Citie being beſieged, he made a bridge ouer the riuer Boyano, the guard wherof he committed to Alibeg, with his fierce troopes of Tribulls. Then he cauſed foure peeces of ordnance of a wonderfull bigneſſe to be planted neere the walls, to make a breach: the munition belonging to thoſe peeces did load foure hundred Camels. Hee did beſides cauſe twelue other ſmaller peeces to be planted to batter the houſes of the towne. So ſoone as Mocenigo had intelligence of the ſiege of Scutary, he went to Corfu, where he receiued letters from the Prince, and a commandement from the Senate, to be carefull of the defence of Scutari, and of the ſea-coaſt of Albania. Therefore he preſently paſſed ouer into the firm land, where at the mouth of the Boyano he met with Triadin Gritti his ſucceſſor, and Lodouico Bembo the Prouidator. Then, although he might haue commaunded alone, yet being in no ſort ambitious, he reſolued to doe nothing without their common conſent. Firſt of all then they ſent Leonardo Bolda with foure Gallies to Catharra, and commaunded him to goe to Iohn Cernouich, who commaunded the Sclauonians, neighbours to the Lake, and to entreat him from them, that he would (as became a faithfull aſſociate) leuie forces from all parts, in ſome ſort to relieue Scutari, if it were poſſible: That Leonardos ſelfe, with his veſſels appointed for that purpoſe, ſhould together with Cernouich vſe meanes to put ſome ſupplies into the towne by water. They did afterwards ſend fiue Gallies by the Riuer Drinon for the guard of the Iſland. The Citie is ſeated on a plaine, and is in no ſort ſtrong by Art or Nature. The riuer Drinon falling by two channells into the ſea makes an Iſland, whither all the Country people of that Prouince which dwelt in the Villages were retired with their wiues and children vpon the enemies comming.

Soliman the Eunuch Generall of the Turks armie before Scutari.

The number of the Turkſh armie.

The venetian Captaines care for the relieſe of Scutari.

Now for the defence of this Iſland, the Venetian Generalls ſent diuers armed veſſells beſide the Gallies. They did moreouer aſſure Durazzo, with foure gallies, and certaine troupes of Albanian horſe.

This cittie was in former time called Epidamnum, by the Founders name: his Nephew ſonne to his daughter, added the Hauen to the Cittie, and would haue it to be called Dirrachium after his owne name. He loſt his ſonne Ionius in the war againſt his bretheren vnder the conduct of Hercules, who ſlew him by misfortune, and threw him into the neighbour Sea, of whom it afterward took the name. This is the opinion of the Greeke Authors. The Latines do not reckon the place to be of ſuch antiquity, and affirme that the Romains named it Dyrrachium, in ſted of Epidamnum, becauſe that name ſeemed to preſage ſome misfortune to ſuch as went thither. It was in old time a very famous cittie, and much renowmed during the ciuill warres of the Romans. For Pompey in that place made all his warrelike preparations againſt Cæſar; but it is now deſolate and vninhabited. The Venetians kept it for the commodiouſneſſe of the hauen. They did afterwards place garriſons in Buda, Antiuari, and Olchina, which in former times, according to Plinie, was called Colchina, founded by the Colchians, who purſuing Medea, entred into the Adriatticke ſea and Ionian ſeas. Some Authors woorthie of credit affirme, That the Inhabitants of that place doe yet retaine the barbarous crueltie of their Anceſtours, and that among all the Inhabitants of that coaſt, they are moſt vnciuill to ſtrangers.

From whence Dirrachium took the name.

The Venetian Generalls went and encamped with the reſt of the armie at Saint

Sergius

Sergius Church in view of the Inhabitants. This place is fiue miles from Scutari, and foureteene from the Sea. The Gallies could not saile vp the Riuer beyond the Church, by reason of the shallownesse of the water. From thence the fleete gaue signes of encouragement morning and euening to the Cittie, by making fires. The riuer Boyano diuides it selfe into two very narrow channels beneath the Temple Eschella eight miles from the Armie. The Turkes went about to embarre those streights with yron chaines and piles, to shut in the Venetian Gallies; which would haue mightily endaungered the Venetians, had not a fugitiue giuen them notice thereof in time; whereat they being somewhat troubled, did sodainely saile in order of battell to seize vpon the mouth of the Riuer. The enemie vpon the gallies arriuall being landed was encamped vpon the shoare in a close battallion. The fight being begunne, the Turkes did extreamely afflict the Venetians with their arrows, and they them with their ordnance; howbeit in the end the enemy was enforced to quit the place with the losse of fiue hundred of his men.

The Turkes designe.

The venetians preuaile against the Turkes.

The victorious Venetians hauing left foure gallies for the defence of the place, returned to their campe neere the Temple. Many that were present at this exploit affirme that this fight against the Turkes at the entry of the riuer Boyano hapned vnder the conduct of Triadin before Mocenigo his arriuall. But whilst this was done vpon the Riuer, the Turkes did continually with the cannon batter the city walls, and ouerthrew the houses. Antonio Lauretano, a valiant gentleman commaunded in the city, and was Prouidator in the Prouince, who, as one well aduised, was carefull of all matters, and so soone as hee saw the walls to be beaten downe, he did repaire them with a countermure.

The siege which beganne in the end of Maie, had continued many daies, when Lauretano sent a boy through the enemies campe to let the Venetian Generalls vnderstand, That though himselfe and fellowes were bold and resolute to endure a long siege, yet because the euents of warre are still vncertaine, they requested them to thinke vpon some meanes to relieue the Citty. Triadin and Mocenigo did their best to effect that which Lauretano craued, by the meanes of Leonardo Bolda, and John Cernouich: who hauing leuied foot companies and prepared a strong fleet vpon the Lake (for the enemie had Garrisons in all places) comming to stroakes with the enemies, returned without performance. And by reason that the Countrey was couered with enemies, and the Riuer bankes by which they were to passe to Scutari, were manned with Turkes, they had neede of greater forces, and especially of horse, if they intended, maugre the enemies, to come to the cittie; whereupon the Generalls hoping that the situation of the place would defend the cittie, together with the Prouidators valour, and the townesmens constancie, they gaue ouer all further attempts for that time.

Triadin in the meane time, with Bembo the Prouidator, by reason of the fennish aire fell sicke; and not they alone, but the whole fleete in a maner languished. They went to Catharra to recouer their health. Mocenigo (although hee were crazie) resolued, with Maripietro the Prouidator, to tarrie till the end of the siege.

The Turke on the other side, the cittie walls being beaten downe, attempted sometimes by menaces, and afterwards by intreaties, to induce Lauretano to yeelde. But his answere not sorting to the Turkes expectation, he caused certaine engines to be brought neere to the walls, with which his souldiers being protected, might with more safetie approach the rampires. Afterwards hee commaunded his Ianissaries, who were armed with swords and targets to second them. Moreouer, he caused great numbers of Archers to gall those that were on the wals. His battallions being thus ordered, he did by day-breake march to the assault.

The manner of the Turkes assault.

Those of Scutarie likewise prepared for defence, They had great store of wildfier, which at the assault they abundantly bestowed vpon the enemies. They had besides laide store of great stones vpon the Rampiers, and did much hurt with their Murtherers. The Turks with great cries according to their manner, enuironed the

The Scutarians prepare for defence:

Cittie,

Citie, and attempted to enter at the breach. The beſieged without any feare at all, did brauely repulſe them with ſhot and wild-fier, which they could not eſcape, and the huge ſtones being throwne downe vpon them, made a great ſlaughter. But the Turks like brute beaſts marching vpon the dead bodies, did feareleſſely aſſaile the Rampiers. Thoſe of Scutarie on the contrarie, did beat them thence with pikes and ſhot. Lauretano in the meane time went vp and downe incouraging his ſoldiors, furniſhing them with neceſſaries, and planting freſh men in their ſteeds that were hurt and wearied. Soliman on the other ſide was not idle, but with an yron mace did driue his ſlow ſouldiors forward to the aſſault. At the laſt, the Turks being tyred and maſtered by the defendants valour, retyred. Thoſe of Scutarie being accompanied with the ſoldiors of the garriſon, made a furious ſalley vpon them in their retreat, and ſlew them on heaps vpon the dead bodies of their fellowes, and then being loden with the enemies ſpoiles, and militarie enſeigns, they returned triumphant to the Cittie.

The Turks retyre from the aſſault.

Cepio, who hath curiouſly written the occurrents of this warre, ſaith, That three thouſand Turks were ſlaine at this aſſault, and the number of thoſe that were hurt, did far exceed it: the greateſt part of whom died ſoone after. Thoſe of Scutarie ſay, That, at the aſſaults, and other incounters during the ſiege, ſixteene thouſand Turks were ſlaine and periſhed.

All things ſucceeding proſperouſly at Scutarie, Mocenigo thought good to prouide for his owne health. For it was reported, that Lodouico Bembo died at Catharra, and that Triadan drew towards his end. And fearing that the like might befall himſelfe, he went to Raguſa to take phyſicke. Raguſa is a Cittie in Dalmatia, builded in times paſt by the Epidaures, in a more happie ſeat, hauing their owne Countrie by the Goaths formerly ruined. It is a free Cittie, and adorned with good lawes and cuſtomes. Whileſt Mocenigo remained at Raguza, Soliman ſtill held Scutarie ſtraitly beſieged, and was fully reſolued not to haue riſen from before it, till he ſhould conſtraine them to yeeld either by force or famine, had not the warlike preparations of Mathias king of Hungarie enforced his diſlodgement.

Raguſa a free Citie.

The Venetians from the firſt time of their warre with Ottoman, had made a league with that martiall king, and had promiſed to giue him a yearely penſion. Franciſco Venieri was ſent thither Ambaſſadour at the beginning, to procure him to make warre with the Turks: Giouanni Hemo followed him. During the time of his ambaſſage, he fought fortunately twice with Ali Bey vpon the frontiers of Hungaria: Franciſco died, & Franciſco Iuſtiniano ſucceeded Hemo. At the laſt the Senate, hauing intelligence of the ſiege of Scutarie, ſent Sebaſtian Badoario to the king with a great ſumme of gold. At his arriuall, he obtained ſuch intereſt in the King, not ſo much for his gold he brought with him, as for his good carriage and diſcretion, as procuring him preſently to take Armes, he did in ſuch ſort afright Ottoman, as he preſently wrote to the Eunuch to raiſe his ſiege from before Scutarie, and to returne home. Badoario by the Senats appointment tarried with the king, and continued with him more than two yeares. During which time the Hungarian performed many notable exploits vpon the Turks: For beſides ſixe battails wherein he ouerthrew them, he tooke Subaſſa, a verie ſtrong towne, from Ottoman, together with a thouſand of his Ianiſaries.

Mathias king of Hungarie a great ſoldior.

Beſides, at that time when warre was denounced to Stephen the Vaiuode, and that the Turks had beſieged Zuzan, a verie famous Cittie, ſo ſoone as he vnderſtood that the Hungarian was comming thither, he left his ordnance and bagage behind him, and baſely fled from them: whereby it came to paſſe, that the Commonwealth being ſupported by the protection of ſo great a Prince, did for a time receiue no loſſe by the enemie. In regard whereof, certaine Princes and Commonwealths of Italie, did at the Venetians purſute, ſend an hundred thouſand Crownes to him into Hungarie, by the Biſhop of Arieta and Antonio Vitturi, who ſucceeded Badoario.

The Italian Princes ſend a preſent to Mathias king of Hungarie.

Soliman being called home by Ottoman, did foorthwith mount his Artillerie, and raiſed his Campe, hauing beſieged the Cittie almoſt three moneths, and marched into Macedonia. This report is more credible than that which ſaith, That he diſcamped for feare of the great preparations which were made againſt him in Italie. Thoſe of Scutarie (of whom two thouſand died in the ſiege) were reduced to ſuch ſcarcitie of water, as the want thereof would haue enforced them to haue yeelded, if he had maintained his ſiege but a while longer. Whereupon ſo ſoone as the enemy was diſlodged, they ran with ſuch earneſtneſſe to the riuer, and dranke ſo exceſſiuely of the water, which had a long time been kept from them, as many of them ſurfeted, and died ſodainly. Mocenigo being aduertiſed of the enemies departure, and being not able to recouer his health at Raguſa, went to Venice. Within a while after, Triadin the Generall of the Armie, a man of foure ſcore yeares, died at Catharra. Stefano Maripietro whom Mocenigo had left with the Fleet at S^t Sergius Church, hauing after the ſiege commanded all the Captains of Galleis, ſoldiors, and marriners, who in a manner were all ſicke, by reaſon of the fenny aire of the Boyano, to remoue to a wholſomer aire, himſelfe being verie ſicke alſo, retyred to Venice.

The ſiege raiſed from before Scutarie.

The report of the enemies diſcamping being brought to Venice before Maripietro his arriuall, they did highly reioice the whole Cittie, which whileſt the ſiege laſted, had been greatly afflicted with care. All men extolled Lauretano, and a decree was made, that the Commonwealth ſhould ſend him preſents. The Captains of the garriſons likewiſe were much eſteemed, but eſpecially the loyaltie of the Inhabitants, and their conſtancie in defending their Cittie, and rewards were appointed for either of them: Then they went to Church to giue thanks to God, for that the Commonwealth had been freed from ſo dangerous a warre. Great Rewards were likewiſe giuen to Mocenigo, who after the death of Prince Marcello, which deceaſed about the beginning of Winter, was by the generall conſent of the whole Senat declared Prince. Marcello gouerned one yeare and three moneths, and was honorably buried in the Chartreux.

¶Pietro Mocenigo, the 70. Duke of Venice.

ANtonio Lauretano, who for that he had brauelie defended Scutarie, was made Generall of the Gallies, did about the Spring time of the ſame yeare, tooke a Geneuois Argozie betwixt Cyprus and Sicilia, loden with rich Turkiſh marchandize, and ſunke it: ſixteene Gallies had fought with her, and could not take it, till Georgio Dragone arriued ded with a Venetian Argozie, and then it yeelded, her maſt being ſtruck ouerboord with a Cannon ſhot.

Not long after, Soiyman who the yeere before had beſieged Scutari, did with thirtie thouſand Turkes beſiege the cittie of Naupactum, called at this day Lepanto, ſeated on the Corinthian Gulph, and in times paſt amongeſt the citties of Ætolia, next to Calidonia, verie famous, but at this day it is not much inhabited, and her walls are in a manner ruined. Towards the North on the toppe of an hill it hath a caſtle: This fort was valiantly defended, as well by reaſon of the trenches and rampires, as by the magnanimitie of thoſe within it: For Lauretano came thither with a mighty fleet before the Turkes arriued. The enemies on all ſides made a great batterie. The ſouldiers of the Armie and fiue hundred horſe that were in the Tower, did not onely defend the Rampires, but did make daily incurſions vpon the enemies as occaſion was offered: this ſiege continued foure moneths. But the enemie being out of hope to take it, (for beſides the ſtrong garriſon within it, the Venetian fleete lay in the Hauen, which did aboundantly furniſh the beſieged with victualls men, and munition) and tyred with that warre, raiſed his campe. Soiyman beſiegeth Lepanto.

This is all which the enemie attempted by land that Summer. But at Sea Ottomans fleete after it departed from Lepanto, went to the Iſle of Lemnos, where, hauing beſieged the cittie of Coccina, and with their ordnance beaten downe a great part of the walls, the enemie vndoubtedly would haue taken it, had not Lauretano come in time to the reliefe of the beſieged, who ſo ſoone as he had intelligence that the enemie had beſieged Lemnos, left the Prouidator with foure Gallies at Lepanto, and ſailed with the reſt of the fleete to Pſara a deſart Iſland very neere to Lemnos. He durſt not on a ſodaine aſſaile the enemie, by reaſon that his ſouldiers were in a manner all ſicke. But the enemie interpreting his delay in an other ſence, as though the Venetian tarried there, but till all things were in readines for the battel, did put to Sea, and ſailed thence. Then did Lauretano go to the Iſland. The Inhabitants and ſouldiers of the garriſon were highly commended. The Turke beſiegeth the iſle of Lemnos. The Turkes leaue Lemnos.

It is reported, that a young Maide of the Iſland was preſented to him that had fought valiantly, and by whoſe meanes (as it was reported) the citty had beene chiefly defended. This Maid whoſe name was Muralla, her father being ſlaine fighting valiantly at the Coccine Gate, ranne to him and tooke vp his ſword and target, where alone ſhe withſtoode for a time the Turkes aſſault, who had almoſt made themſelues Maſters of the Gate, and then being aſſiſted by her Countrymen, they repulſed the enemie with great ſlaughter to their ſhippes: in regard whereof the Generall gaue her double pay, and the Prouidators with all the Captaines of the Gallies gaue her crownes apeece: The Generall bid her make choice among all thoſe braue Captaines which ſhee would haue to be her husband, and promiſed her that the common-wealth ſhould giue her a dowry. She gaue him many thanks, and anſwered, That for her part ſhe did not altogether reſpect the valour of a man but his wiſedome and diſcretion, and that ſhe would neuer marrie before ſhee had exactly knowne the diſpoſition of him that ſhould be her husband. By this Maidens diſcretion and vertue (if it be lawfull to iudge of the reſt) I do affirme that the women of Lemnos do not at this day degenerate either in fortitude or valour from that excellent Hipſiphile of old times, and from the reſt, who with her did commaund that Iſland, and that the common Prouerb is moſt true, How that the fortune of places is very often changed, but not the manners and behauiour of the Inhabitants. The great valor of a yong maid.

This is all that was done by land and ſea during that Summer; after which the Armies went to Garriſon. About the Spring time of the yeere following, vpon a rumour that was ſpred, how that King Ferdinand determined to inuade the Iſle of Cyprus · Iohn, of the illuſtrious familie of the Georges was ſent thither with fiue gallies, and many ſhippes of burthen, but this report being found to be idle, vaniſhed. Lauretano in the meane time tooke ſpeciall care for the defence of the ſea-coaſts of Morea with the Iſles neere adiacent. We do not find that the ſame Summer or the next that inſued it, till peace was made with the Turke, which hapned foure yeres after, any memorable matter was done in the Iſlands. Prince Mocenigo, the ſecond moneth of his gouernement died, and was buried in the Church of the Twinnes, where at this day his ſumptuous monument is to be ſeene, enriched with the ſpoils of Aſia. Andrea Vendramino was choſen in his place.

¶ ANDREA VENDRAMINO, the 71. Duke of Venice.

THE Summer following, which was the third after the ſiege of Scutari, Croia in Albania was beſieged by the Turke. Eight thouſand of them beſieged it at the Spring time, and continued there all that yeere and more: this city is ſeated on an high mountaine which the inhabitants call Croiana, and there are deeper Precipices round about it, wherby for a time all the enemies attempts were in vaine, and longer would haue beene vnprofitable, had not famine afflicted them.

The Turke beſiegeth Croia.

The firſt Summer of the ſiege was already ſpent, and a great part of the Autumne, when two thouſand Venetians came into the Iſland, to relieue the afflicted Croians: Among theſe were fiue hundred light-horſe commaunded by Nicolas Ducan the Albaneſe, a man famous among his Countrymen. The Captaines of the Italian Cauallery were Antonioatio Docia, and Lodouico Tiſernato: Leon of Dalmatia, and Carlino commaunded the chiefe troups of foote. Theſe men on the ſixt of December marched in a ſquare battallion againſt the Turkes, who were encamped in a plaine which the Inhabitants call Tyranna foure miles from Croya. Being come to ſtrokes, the enemie preſuming on the ſwiftneſſe of his horſe, made an attempt to diſorder the Venetian Armie. The Venetian footemen on the contrary fighting at times vpon occaſion forth of their ranckes, after that they had repulſed the enemie with loſſe, retired into the cloſe battallion of their horſemen, fearing to be cut off from their troupes. The fight had continued from the ſixt houre of the day till Euening when on a ſodaine the Turkes turned their backes, and betooke themſelues as vanquiſhed to open flight. The victorious Venetians purſued them to their very campe, the which being taken, and full of riches, the Venetian fell to pillage, verie few purſuing the victory. Thoſe of the city preſently ſallied forth and tooke two forts which the enimies had built not far from the city, which they preſently razed.

The Turkes are put to warre before Croia.

But

But the ioy for this victorie continued not long: For whileſt that Contareni the Prouidator, and the other Captaines were conſulting, whether it were beſt to remaine that night in the enemies campe, or to returne backe to their quarter, the enemies returned with great cries vpon the Venetians, & preſently enuironed thoſe of the formoſt rankes. Then a cruell fight began. The Albaneſe cauallerie, ſo ſoone as it perceiued the foot troups to be encloſed, fled. The Italian cauallerie did the like. The Turks by reaſon it was Moonlight, chaced & ſlew them vp and down the plain, and followed the execution as far as the riuer Lamiſſa. The enemie that day and the night following made a great ſlaughter, but the trechery of the Albaneſes did them more hurt, who to the number of eight thouſand horſe ſtood all day long in order of battaile and ſtirred not, as ſpectators of the fight: And when they perceiued the Venetians to haue the worſt, they likewiſe fell vpon them in the wood, and along the riuers ſide, in as vile manner as the Turkes. Mare then a thouſand Venetians were ſlaine in that flight, & among them Franciſco Contareni the Prouidator with diuerſe Captaines. The bickering was no leſſe bloudie to the enemies: for ſo long as the Venetians battallion ſtood firme and vnbroken, they ſlew great numbers of them.

The venetians are defeated.

The newes of this loſſe was grieuous to the Citie, but that which they within a while after receiued in Italie, did much more afflict them. The Venetians after the firſt incurſions of the Turkes into Italie had ſtopt vp with ſtrong Rampires and Cauſies all places that were foordable betwixt the bridge Gorician and the marſhes of Aquileia (the riuer Lizonza excepted) and builded a Fort vpon the ancient banke of the riuer not farre from the new channell. They had imployed thouſands of Pioners in this worke, who were commanded by Citadino Fratrinas a famous Ingenere. And they did not onely make Rampiers, but likewiſe neere to the marſhes, where the woods were verie thicke, they cut downe diuers great trees, binding them ſo faſt together as they could not be ſeparated, and there left them, and on the champaine they laid earthen turfes of ſeuen foot broad all along, and in them they did ſet branches of willow, and other ſmall trees apt to take root, then vpon them they laid other rankes of turfes, ſo as thereby the fortification was drawne forth to the verie end towards thoſe places, by which the enemies were wont to paſſe: this fortification being made with ſmall towers and battlements, did a farre off ſhew like a towne. And where the riuer might eaſily be forded, they built two Fortes enuironed with ſtrong Rampiers and deepe Trenches, the one named Gradiſcan, and the other Foglian, by the names of the two townes that are on either ſide of them. This laſt after the ouerthrow giuen vpon the Riuer bankes was abandoned as a deſert place, but the other is till this day kept by a ſtrong Garriſon, and for the moſt part is encloſed with walles, and by meanes of Franciſco Trono ſent thither to that end is reduced into the forme of a ſtrong towne. This worke was in length more than an hundred furlongs. But theſe fortifications are almoſt ruined, and eſpecially where the matter was but ſand, which the continuall raines haue eaſily waſhed away. There was beſides, a little mount in forme of a Caſtle, neere to the bridge ouer the riuer hard by Goricia, & at firſt certaine foote companies were ſent thither to guard it. Then they built two Caſtles within a mile of each other fortified with ſtrong Rampiers, and in it three thouſand horſe, with certaine foot companies, but the infanterie was not proportionable to the horſe. By theſe meanes the foords and paſſages which before lay open to the enemie, were now ſtopt vp, by Rampiers which could not be forced, which being ſtrongly garriſoned, kept out the enemie that way from entring into Italie, ſo as the Commonwealth thereby was freed from all danger and feare.

The venetians fortifications against the enemies incurſions.

But by how much their ſecuritie ſeemed great, by ſo much more was the Prouince afflicted with a terrible ouerthrow. For at ſuch time as they leaſt doubted of the enemies arriuall, they perceiued them on a ſodaine to lie encamped with great forces vpon the farther ſide of the riuer Lizonza. Thoſe which were in the Armie, doe not conſent about their number, for ſome affirme them to be tenne thouſand,

The Turks come to the banks of the riuer Lizonza.

others make the number greater, and other-some leſſe. There was a great clamour in the two Forts when they firſt deſcried them, and preſently the alarme was giuen, and had not night preuented them, the fight would haue begun on both ſides. The Venetian troupes that were in the two Forts kept watch all night long, the horſemen were commanded to let their horſe ſtand bridled, and themſelues to be readie armed. Ieronimo Nouello was their Captaine, a man from his youth bred vp in the warres, and had beene employed with great command. There were likewiſe diuers noble perſons, as Giouanni Antonio Gaudoliſca, with his ſonne Anaſtaſio of Romagnia, Hercole Maluecia, Giacomo Picinino ſonne to that great Captaine Picinino, Giacomo Badoario, Philippo Neſalone, Georgio Galeſſa, Giouanni Clericato of Vincenza, with diuers others that held an honourable ranke in the Armie. They conſulted together that night, whether it were beſt to fight with the enemie, or onely to defend their owne Forts. For it was likely that thoſe Forts being defended the enemie durſt not go farre forward, for feare leaſt all meanes of returne ſhould be taken from him: yet at laſt they made a more valiant than a diſcreet reſolution, which was to oppoſe themſelues againſt the enemies which way ſoeuer they ſhould paſſe. They diuided their Cauallerie into three troupes, and ouer euerie troupe appointed a Captaine.

The venetian Captaines reſolution more valiant than diſcreet.

But the Turke in the meane time intending to vſe policie as well as force, comming to the oppoſite ſhoare did about ſun-ſet rome vp and downe with his horſemen, and at laſt without any difficultie ſeized on the Fort neere to the bridge, ſome of the ſouldiers retired to the bridge, reſoluing to breake both the ends, and to defend themſelues in the middeſt; but being on a ſodaine ouerwhelmed with great ſhowers of darts and arrowes, they were beaten into the riuer. This place was foure miles from the campe, ſo that they had no newes of the taking of the Fort till it was late in the night, and then they hardly beleeued it. Marbeg (for ſo was the Turkiſh Generall named) hauing taken the bridge, did ſend vp and downe to diſcouer ſome fit place for an ambuſcado, and finding one not farre from thence, he commanded a thouſand choice horſe, to paſſe ouer the riuer about midnight at a Ford, and to lie in ambuſh till a ſignal were giuen them to breake out, then to fall on a ſodaine vpon the enemies.

The Turks take the Fort neere to the bridge.

So ſoone as it was day, the Turke cauſed a troupe of horſe to croſſe the riuer, and commanded them to goe as farre as the enemies campe, and to gallop euen to their gates to draw them forth to fight, and then to retire by little and little to the place of ambuſcado. But by the way they encountred Ieronimo, and the reſt of the Cauallerie which followed him in order of battaile. At firſt they fought valiantly on both ſides, but the Turkes at laſt did of ſet purpoſe giue backe, the Chriſtians purſuing them. Ieronimo his ſonne a couragious young man made a fiercer purſuit than any of the reſt, and was ſeconded by a troupe of young gallants who were as forward as himſelfe. The politicke old man was diſpleaſed with their raſhneſſe, ſaying that he was certaine that the Turkes would not ſo eaſily flie, but vpon ſome ſpeciall aduantage. And becauſe they were almoſt come betwixt two ſtreightes, which were much to be ſuſpected, Nouello ſounded the retreat. Then the Turks returning to charge, renewed a fierce fight. Ieronimo ſent for the firſt ſquadron to come to his reskew. For from the other ſide of the riuer a companie of men at Armes were alreadie comming to the aide of their fellowes.

In the meane time a great ſquadron of Turks had gotten vp on the neereſt banks of the riuer, where the fight being renewed, the Turks were repulſed as far as Graman (a little ſtreame running a thwart the vallies Pergotanes.) But whileſt the Venetians were wholly buſied in the victorie the ſignal being giuen to the Ambuſcado from the top of the mount Licinicia which was on their left hand, the Turkiſh troupes brake forth, and with fearefull cries fell vpon the Venetians, who were ſo terrified with the enemies ſodaine eruption, as one would not haue taken them for thoſe Venetians that euen now fought ſo valiantly: Neuertheleſſe, perceiuing that the the hope of their liues conſiſted onely in their Armes, they were inforced ſomewhat to giue backe, that they might fight more at large. But vpon a ſodaine, the Turkes gaue them ſo furious a charge, as being beaten backe into a ſtreight place, they could not haue roome. In the meane time the cruell enemy aſſailed them in front and in flanke, and made an horrible ſlaughter of them, ſo that the firſt band was in a moment cut in peeces by the enemies great numbers, and were all ſlaine, ſauing a few men of note, who yeelded to the enemie.

The Venetians are defeated by the Turkes.

The Captaines of the ſecond ſquadron perceiuing their fellowes to be incloſed by the enemies, gaue backe by little and little towards the Plaine, but in ſuch amazement, as thoſe in the rereward ſuppoſed it rather a flight than retreite. Within a while, they all beganne in diſorder and without Enſignes or Captaines to flie as vanquiſhed into the thickets of the neighbour-forreſts, the Turkes ſtill purſuing them. Some leauing their horſe and armour behind them, eſcaped into the Mountaines. In this battell died Icronimo Generall of the Cauallerie his ſonne, Giacomo Badoario, Anaſtaſio of Romagnia, and many other noble perſons: moſt of the reſt were taken.

The Turkes likewiſe bought this victorie at a deere rate: Marbeg their Generall was grieuouſly wounded, and great numbers of ſouldiers ſlaine, who being heaped vp all together, were by his commaundement burnt.

The news of this ouerthrow did much terrifie the whole Country, for the people thought themſelues ſcarce ſafe euen in their walled cities. The next day about noone a great ſmoake was ſeene in the aire in many places neere to Vdina, whereby they knew that the enemie was not farre off, and in an inſtant, all the farme houſes betwixt the Riuers Lizonza and Taillement were ſeene to burne. It was a lamentable ſight to behold ſo goodly a Countrey filled with cloudes of ſmoake; but moſt of all, when the night following the whole territorie neere adioyning was on fire. The Turkes ſpoiled and waſted all places the ſame night, and by day-breake, vniting themſelues, returned merrily home to their campe beyond the riuer Lizonza loden with bootie, and ſtore of priſoners.

The Turkes burn the country of Friul.

The next day they marched with their Enſignes into the field, a dayes iourney from the Riuer, making ſhew to depart, but with greater furie than before, they came and incamped on the banckes of Taillement, and croſſing the Riuer, they ſet fire on all places, carrying away more priſoners, and doing more hurt to the poore inhabitants than at the former time: And vpon report that the Venetian forces were comming againſt them by land and Sea. Marbeg raiſed his campe, and left Italie. This ouerthrow at Lizonza terrified all men, and affrighted the famous Cittie of Verona. At Venice the fire of the Countrie houſes which burnt by night, being ſeene from the higheſt Turrets of the Citty, did much amaze the inhabitants. Many ſaid; That it was a great diſhonor to the Seigniory to ſee the pleaſanteſt countrey of the Venetian Territorie, burnt and waſted before their faces by a barbarous enemie.

This cauſed them preſently to diſpatch certaine armed veſſells along the Sea-coaſt, and certaine troupes of horſe and foote through the firme land. But they arriued in Friull, when the ennemie was gone. The two Fortes were for a time without Garriſon, and ſome were of opinion to haue them razed. The Senate ſent certaine Gentlemen thither to view the ſtate of the Prouince: Dominico Georgio, who in that iourny died at Vdina, was ſent thither with Zacharia Barbaro, Giouanni Hemo, and Candian Bellano to take order for that which ſhould be expedient for the Common-wealth, and either to raze them both, or elſe repaire and fortifie them. And for ſafe withſtanding the enemies incurſions it was concluded, at the leaſt to place a ſtrong garriſon of horſemen in one of them. Carolo Montone who the yeare before had beene caſſed, was called from Tuſcanie, and ſent into the Prouince: he placed a ſtrong Garriſon in the Fort of Gradiſcan, and fortified it with dikes and Rampires. But whileſt hee continewed his workes, Prince Venieramino died, the ſecond yeare of his Principalitie beeing ſcarce expired. Hee was honourably buried in the Church of the Seruians.

The Venetian armie comes too late into Friul.

¶ GIOVANNI MOCENIGO, the 72. Duke of Venice.

Croia yeelded to the Turkes.

Iouanni Mocenigo brother to Prince Pietro, a man of ſingular wiſedome and iudgement, was by generall conſent declared Prince. Such ſucceſſe had the Venetian affaires in Italie, whileſt in Dalmatia the ſiege of Croia without any intermiſſion laſted one whole yeere.

Ottoman not ſatisfied heerewith did on the fifth day of Iune with greater forces than foure yeares before come and beſiege Scutari. At his arriuall thoſe of Croia oppreſſed with famine, and terrified with the fearefull report of the Turkes arriuall yeelded. Alibeg a little before his comming had with 15000. men beguirt Scutari: Foure daies after Solyman came thither, and incamped on the eaſt ſide of it with threeſcore and tenne thouſand men: The Gouernour of Aſia followed him with a power not much inferiour, and lodged on the ſouth ſide. Laſt of all, the great Turke himſelfe came thither in perſon on the fifteenth day of Iune. Thoſe which were preſent at this ſiege, ſay, That the enemies multitude was ſuch, as on the Mountaines, Plaines, and on all ſides of the City as farre as mans ſight could diſcerne, there was nothing to be ſeene but Tents and Pauillions: The ordnance was forthwith planted to batter the walls. In the Citie there were ſixeteene hundred inhabitants, and two hundred and fiftie women. They had before the enemies arriuall rid the towne of all vnprofitable eaters. Moreouer, there were ſixe hundred mercenarie ſouldiers in it vnder the commaund of Carlino, Antonio Cortone, Franciſco Sanſerobar, Micaele Spalatino, and other braue Captaines; Antonio Legiero was Gouernour and Prouidator of the citie.

They beſiege Scutari.

Antonio Legiero Gouernour of Scutari.

This ſmall handfull of men was in Scutari when it was the ſecond time beſieged by ſo great a multitude. The Defendants did cheerefully receiue the enemies, for they were now better prouided of all neceſſaries for a ſiege than at firſt. A breach being made, the Turkes gaue two aſſaults. Both Chriſtians and Turkes vſed the ſelfe ſame Armes and Engines as at the former time. But by how much the preparation for warre was greater than at the firſt ſiege, by ſo much more great was the ſlaughter on both ſides: And the aſſaults were much more furious by reaſon of the Emperours preſence, than at the beginning vnder the conduct of Solyman. Thoſe of Scutari were twice aſſaulted in a ſhort ſpace, and in both, the retreit was made with great great ſlaughter. The enemies ſhot ſuch ſtore of arrowes, as ſome worthie of credit report, That a dogge being frighted with the great noiſe, ranne home to his maſters houſe with eleuen arrowes ſticking in his hinder parts.

And becauſe the Reader ſhall not thinke this to be a ridiculous report, all writers affirme, that for many monethes whileſt the ſiege laſted after the great Turkes departure, the inhabitants vſed no other wood to heat their Ouens, nor to dreſſe them meat, but fagots made of Turkiſh arrowes. They write beſide, that in the hotteſt aſſaults at ſuch time as nothing was heard, but terrible reports of the Canon imitating thunder, and that a thouſand ſundrie kinds of death were preſented to mens view, the inhabitants and ſouldiers of Scutari fought with ſuch animoſitie and reſolution, as nothing did leſſe terrifie them than the hazard of their liues: ſo ſoone as one troupe of enemies were ouerthrowne, others preſently marched to the aſſalt on the dead bodies, and others after them. The dikes were filled with dead carkaſſes ſo were the hollow places of the mountaines, and though multitudes were ſlaine, others ſtept in their ſteed. Thoſe in the Citie likewiſe, contemning death & wounds though they ſaw their fellowes torne in peeces by the Ordnance, did not for all that ceaſe valiantly to repell and beat backe the enemies from the Rampiers.

In the end Mahomets wilfulneſſe being ouercome, and diuers telling him that it was in vaine to hazard ſo many thouſand braue men to ſuch manifeſt dangers, & tha he had to do with enemies who rather reſolued to die that yeeld, he al inraged ſounded the retreat, & afterwards gaue no more aſſaults, yet ſtill continued his batterie.

But whileſt he ſtreightly beſieged the Scutarians, he forgat not Italy. For he ſent forces to thoſe places, whither, hee thought the Venetians would ſend leaſt aid, who arriued in Italie the ſame day as the firſt aſſault was giuen to Scutari. They encamped with great noiſe not farre from the Forts of Lizonza, where embattialing themſelues, they ſought to draw forth Carolo Montane to fight. But he, remembring the late ouerthrow, durſt attempt nothing raſhly, but containing his ſouldiers within the encloſure of his Fort, he kept the Turkes in expectation more than halfe a day. But they perceiuing that they could not draw the Venetians to fight, went from thence, and encamped within foure miles of the Fort Gradiſcan, betwixt the mount Medea and Cremona. But the next day he left Maſan, and marched through the deepe bottome directly to the foote of the mountaines. They were in number 30000. who went into Germanie through the precipices of thoſe ſteepie hils which are in a manner in-acceſſible to the inhabitants of the countrey. In paſſing thoſe mountaines, they performed matters ſcarce credible, and among others I thought good to ſet downe this one. Being come to the top of thoſe craggie hilles which were impoſſible to be deſcended by horſe, they tied them with cords, and by engins and deuiſes which they made, did let them downe into the next bottomes, and from thence into the reſt, till they were come downe into the loweſt of all. What did they not to get ouer the top of the Alpes: downe to the foote of the mountaine Cargna: where hauing intelligence that the mount Lanca, ouer which they were to paſſe into Germanie, was guarded by the inhabitants of the Alpes, being come thither, neither that danger, nor difficultie to aſcend to it, could in any ſort amaze them: who leaning on their targets crept vp thoſe ſteepis rockes ind deſpite of their enemies; wherewith they that guarded the paſſages being afrighted, betooke themſelues to flight, and thereby goue occaſion to the Turkes to commit great ſlaughter.

The Turks great labour and danger, to paſſe the ſteepy mountaine.

This was the laſt iourney which the Turks made into Italy againſt the Venetians. But in the meane time Mahomet ſtill continued the ſiege of Scutari, battering it continually with his Ordnance: whereupon it laſted till the fifth of September, at which time the Gouernour of Aſia tooke Driuaſte by force, from whence he carried away fiue hundred of the inhabitants, and bringing them in view of the Scutarians did cut them all in peeces.

Foure daies after, Ottoman being wearied with ſo long a ſiege, went from thence with with the greateſt part of his forces: The ſame day he departed from Scutarie he tooke Liſſa on the banks of the riuer Drimon, with two Venetian Gallies, wherein finding two hundred rowers and marriners, he ſent them to Marbeg, (who with eight thouſand Turks continued the ſiege) to be maſſacred before Scutarie. This ſiege laſted eight moneths after, and two forts were built at the mouth of the Boyano with ſtrong Garriſons in them, to keepe all reliefe from the Citie.

In the meane time the Venetian Secretarie began to treat with the enemie concerning peace, which was graunted and concluded about the latter end of Winter, on theſe conditions: That the Venetian ſhould giue ouer Scutarie to Ottoman, (with libertie to the Garriſon and inhabitants to depart whether they pleaſed) together with Tenarus a Promontorie in Laconia, with the Iſle of Lemnos; and ſhould pay him yearely 8000. crownes; and that the Venetian Marchants might freely trafficke on the Pontick ſeas. Peace being entertained on theſe conditions, the ſoldiors, and all the inhabitants came foorth of Scutarie, and in regard of their ancient affection to the Venetians, they rather choſe to be baniſhed from their Countrie, than to vndergoe the yoake of a barbarous enemie.

Peace concluded betwixt Ottoman and the Venetians.

The conditions of peace.

The Cittie was yeelded according to the agreement vpon the fourth day of Aprill. Of 1600. men which guarded the Citie, there ſuruiued onely foure hundred and fiftie: and of women there remained but one hundred, who followed their husbands through the enemies Campe, and accompanied them in their iourney.

As many of the Scutarians as came to Venice, ſome of them receiued yearely penſions from the publike Treaſurie, others were rewarded with gouernments of Townes and Caſtles, according to euery mans former eſtate and condition, ſo as the Commonwealth ſuffered none of them to be vnſatisfied; ſome write that the like was done to thoſe which eſcaped from Nigrepont.

The Venetians recompence thoſe of Scutarie.

Peace being publiſhed, did not ſo much reioice the Venetians tyred with long warre, as it did feare and terrifie other people and Princes of Italie; and not without cauſe: For it was likely, that the Venetians being at reſt, the Turke would make ſome attempts on other parts of Italie, whereto he was alreadie become too neere a neighbour, ſo as from the Hauen which he had newly gotten, he might eaſily ſee it: and indeed it ſo fell out afterwards. But of this we will ſpeake after the ſiege of Ottranto.

In the meane time, the Venetians were like to haue incurred new troubles. For the Summer after the peace, a mightie Turkiſh fleete ſailed into the Ionian ſeas againſt the Lords of Cephalonia. This Iſland is oppoſite to Natolia: from whence the Lords being expulſed, Ottoman became maſter thereof. Pietro Buaillio was at Xant with fiue hundred braue horſe of Morea, who not long before had taken it from the Lords of Cephalonia, and till then held it. So ſoone as the Turkiſh fleete came thither, as to an Iſland which belonged to the Cephalonian Princes, Loretano, who was ſtill Generall of the Venetian nauall Armie, did preſently follow them; ſaying, That he would neuer ſuffer that Iſland to be beſieged, ſo long as the horſemen of Morea remained there. He did afterwards tell the Generall, that he ought not, contrarie to the treatie of peace, aſſaile the horſemen being Venetians. Both of them wrote to Conſtantinople; the Turke to his Lord and maſter; and Loretano to Benedetto Treuiſano Ambaſſador at the ſame time at the great Lords Port. He hauing informed the great Turke of the buſineſſe, did freely obtaine from him, That it ſhould be lawfull for the Venetians, not onely to draw all their horſemen foorth of the Iſland, but as many other as would willingly depart thence. By this meanes the Venetians conueied many thouſands foorth of the Iſland, who otherwiſe would haue been made ſlaues; and being conducted into Morea, went freely whither they pleaſed to inhabite. The Turke after the taking of Xant, retired to Conſtantinople. Theſe were the exploits done at Sea.

Variance betwixt the Venetian Generall, and the Turke.

In Italie the Venetians, before the warre with Ottoman was ended, had taken armes armes (as at other times) to defend the Florentines libertie. It fell out that the yeare before, Iuliano de Medicis was by a conſpiracie ſlaine at diuine ſeruice in S^t Liberatos Church, and his brother Lorenzo like to haue been murthered with him, but that by his owne valour and aide of his friends, he eſcaped. The Florentines being affrighted with the death of ſo eminent a perſon, tooke armes, and ſlew many that had an hand in this murther; impriſoned Pope Sixtus nephew, who then was at Florence, and did publikely hang Saluiato Archbiſhop of Piſa, authour of the conſpiracie, with diuers others, who came to Florence to accompanie either of them. The death of Julian de Medicis.

The Pope, incenſed with the Florentines rigorous proceedings, hauing firſt interdicted and excommunicated them, raiſed an Armie: himſelfe being firſt combined with King Ferdinand and the Sienois. The yeare before this murther committed, a mightie Armie was ſent into Tuſcanie. Frederick of Vrbin was made Generall, but the whole honor was attributed to Alphonſo Duke of Calabria, ſonne to Ferdinand, a ſworne enemie to the Florentines, one, who from his great grandfather did mortally hate them. He was accompanied by Viſo el Conte, Roberto Vrſino, and Virginio his nephew, ſonne to his brother Neapolio, Mathew of Champaine, and Roberto d'Arimini; but this laſt being afterwards entertained by the Florentines, was created Generall of their Armie. The confederate Armie againſt the Florentines.

The Florentines relying on their owne forces, and thoſe of their aſſociates, (for the Venetians, the Milanois, Hercules d'Eſte, and Frederick Gonzaga, were leagued with them) did brauely entertaine the warre. But the Venetians being ſtill buſied with Ottoman, both by land and ſea, euen in the verie confines of Italie; being likewiſe daunted with the troubles of Milan ariſing by Duke Galeas death (who the yeare before was ſlaine in S^t Stephens Church by Giouanni Lamponiano and his complices at the time of diuine ſeruice) could not ſo ſoone ſend aide to the Florentines. But as well the one as other, ſtriuing to doe their vtmoſt, ſent forces to them, though vnequall to the greatneſſe of both Commonwealths, yet at leaſt ſuch as the qualitie of thoſe times permitted. The Venetians ſent Franciſco Micaeli to the armie as Prouidator during that warre. Galeas Duke of Milan ſlaine in a Church.

Not long before they had ſent Bernardo Bembo to Florence, who for the ſpace of two yeares that the warre continued in Tuſcanie, did good ſeruice to the aſſociates: The Enemie in the meane time being back't by a mightie Armie, tooke Renze, Caſtelina, Rada, Broia, Cachiane, and mount Sabina in the Imbrian valley from the Florentines. And then, becauſe Winter approached, they went to garriſon in the Sienois territories. But the Venetians perceiuing ſome likelihood, that the enemies would the next Spring inuade the Florentines with greater furie, and hauing intelligence that Ottoman by letters and great promiſes from ſome Chriſtian Princes was ſolicited to doe the like to them, they were moued by this common danger; and therefore firſt laboured about the end of Winter (as hath been alreadie ſaid) to free themſelues from that warre.

The Spring following they ſent Carolo Montone into Tuſcanie with a braue Cauallerie: who falling ſicke preſently after his arriuall died at Cortona. He had fiue and thirtie Cornets of horſe, and with them he croſſed the lake Pergia, making furious incurſions vpon the frontiers of the Peruſins, where he took certaine Townes of ſmall importance. Thoſe of Perugia, who at the arriuall of the Venetian were thought to haue an intent to raiſe ſome inſurrection in the Citie, in regard of the ancient controuerſies betwixt themſelues, being aduertiſed of his death, durſt not riſe againſt the Pope, notwithſtanding that his ſonne Bernardino el Conte reuiued his fathers practiſes. By this time halfe ſummer was ſpent, when as Robert with equall number of horſe fought with Matthco Campana Gouernour of Rome, and Nephew to Pope Sixtus, on mount Sperella, in a ſmall village: where, for two houres ſpace was a fierce fight. But the enemies firſt ſquadron being broken which came forth of the trenches, the reſt terrified with the rout of their fellowes betooke themſelues to flight, and left a notable victorie to Robert, who became Roberto Malateſte Generall of the Venetian Cauallerie.

came Maſter of their horſe and baggage. After this expedition he retired in ſafetie, fearing leaſt Alphonſo vpon newes of this defeat ſhould with greater forces come and aſſaile him. Certaine lakes runne from Arezzo betwixt the Sienois and Peruſin territories falling into the riuer Pales, and afterwards emptie themſelues altogether into Tyber: the Tuſcanes call them Chane. Two bridges croſſe theſe waters, the one at Cluſina, which the enemies made good; and the other did Malateſte fortifie: theſe riuers ranne betwixt the two Armies. Whileſt the Aragonian was comming to the bridge of Cluſina, Robert and his ſouldiers made a ſafe returne, and from their quarter waſted the Sienois territories: And if the Duke came to reſcue the Sienois, Malateſte made incurſions into the Peruſins countrey: And in theſe idle and vnprofitable iournies was the greateſt part of Summer ſpent without any other memorable action.

In the end about mid-harueſt, Fredericke of Vrbin, and Alphonſo had intelligence that the Florentine troups at Podia Imperiale were much diminiſhed, by meanes of a controuerſie betwixt the ſouldiers of Æſte and Gongaza. For Hercules d' Æſte not long before in a mutinie betweene the Regiments was like to haue beene ſlaine, whereupon he left the Armie and returned home; the Mantuan went to Milan, from whence Roberto Sanſeuerino was at the ſame time expulſed, becauſe that he with his complicies had attempted ſomewhat againſt the ſtate: And that this mutinie might grow to no further inconuenience: Gonzaga came from Tuſcanie into Lombardie to appeaſe it. The enemies then full of hope marched againſt the Armie that wanted a Generall: By day-breake they ſent a troupe of Archers vp the hill, who afterwards went downe brauely vpon the enemies: Andrea Burgenſis, whoſe quarter was in the mid-way vpon the hill being put to rout, the light horſe ſeconding their foot, encouraged their owne men, and terrified the enemies: whereupon the Tuſcan troupes thus diſordered and put to flight, the Dukes of Calabria and Vrbin did with eaſe aſcend the mountaine, and by gaining the Florentines campe, recompenced the loſſe of the Peruſins. Then drawing neere to Colla, after a long and a tedious ſiege they tooke it. The Florentines terrified with this loſſe ſued for peace: for the obtaining whereof Lorenzo de Medicis the nobleſt Citizen, who was both enuied and eſteemed by the Pope and king, went to Naples to free his countrey from ſo dangerous a warre: whereupon, peace ſoone enſuing, the Venetians ſent Ieronimo Marcello to call backe their forces into Lombardie, which were then commanded in Tuſcanie by Antonio Donato.

The Arragonois defeat the Florentines.

Peace betwixt the Florentines and the aſſociates.

The end of the tenth Booke of the third Decad.

THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE FOVRTH DECAD

Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the first Booke of the fourth Decad.

A Comparison betwixt the Romanes and Venetians. The Isle of Rhodes is in vaine besieged by the Turkes. They take Otranto in Italy; and the Venetians the Isle Coritia. The originall of the Ferrarese warre. A Councell is called, concerning warre against Hercvles D'Æste. Great preparation for the warre resolued. The description of Lombardie and the Riuer Po. The waies through the marshes neere to the enemie are fortified. Ficarolles is besieged. The nauall Armie saileth on the Po. The Venetians take Hadria, and the townes neere adioyning. The enemies are defeated at Policella. Ficarolles is taken in the night by Scalado. Many die in the Armie by contagion of the ayre. The whole Island of Roiga is reduced vnder the Venetians command. Alphonso of Arragon wasteth all places neere to Rome. Roberto of Arimini is sent to aide the Pope, and by defeating the Arragonois getteth a gallant victorie vpon the Veliternian territorie. Robert of Arimini dieth within a few daies after his victorie. Fredericke of Vrbin likewise dies not long after at Ferrara. Victor Sovranza vanquisheth Sigismond D'Æste, and Hvgo Sanseverino at Argento. Sanseverino hauing crossed the Po at the obscure lake, encampeth in the view of Ferrara, and doth afterwards make an inexpugnable Fort vpon the Riuer bankes: wherein he placed a strong Garrison.

THis Historie which in diuers things resembleth that of the Romans, deserues in this place some comparison betwixt them concerning their actions by sea and land; sauing in this: That the Romanes ouerthrew themselues by one onely warre, which the Venetians haue not done. For such as at first the Hernici, Equi, and Volscians were to the Romanes, such haue the Dalmatians, Liburnians, & Histrians beene to the Venetians. The French was a dangerous enemy to them and left them nothing but the Capitoll; the same nation molested the Venetians, and tooke all from them but Rialto. The Cimbrians, Teutonians, and Ambrons were terrible to the Romanes and to all Italy: the like were the Gothes, Hunnes, and Lombards to the Venetians and their neighbours. Carthage was an enemie to the Latine name, the like was Genoa to the Venetians: But Carthage shewed her greatest furie against the Romanes when she was confederate with king Philip and the Siracusans against them:

Comparison betwixt the Romans and Venetians.

them: Genoa was neuer more terrible to the Venetians, than at that time when in the warre of Chioggia ſhe was backt by Lewis king of Hungarie, and the Paduans. Pyrrhus was an enemie to the Romans, but more milde than the Carthagenians. Pipus was ſo to the Venetians, but much more tractable than the Genoueſe. The Romans had tedious warre with Mithridates, the Venetians with Philippo Viſconte. Antiochus was great, but Ottoman greater. The Romanes maintained the confederate warre, the moſt dangerous that euer was in Italy: and the Venetians to reſemble them in all things, did not onely in Lombardie withſtand the forces of all the Princes of Italy, enuying their greatneſſe, but brake and defeated them.

We will then firſt ſpeake of the cauſe and progreſſion of the Ferrareſe warre, from whence afterwards ſprang that of the confederates, that we may the better vnderſtand what enſued. But before we enter into this diſcourſe, we muſt ſet downe ſomewhat which preceeded that warre, among others, two iournies of Ottoman againſt the Chriſtians: which, though they may ſeeme impertinent to our Hiſtorie, I neuertheleſſe thought good to inſert, becauſe we account all Chriſtendome for matters of religion to be but one intire bodie.

The deſcription of the Iſle of Rhodes.

A yeare and more after peace was concluded, Ottoman beſieged Rhodes with as warlike preparation, as he had certaine yeares before iuuaded Nigrepont. Rhodes is the goodlieſt Iſland of the Ægean and Ionian Seas, wherin in old time were three beautifull Cities, Camia, Linda, and Laliſſa: at this day there is no more but Rhodes. It is in compaſſe one hundred fiue and twentie thouſand paces, though Iſidorus ſay it is not ſo much. The Turke at this ſiege attempted many notable enterpriſes, and by frequent aſſaults went about to vanquiſh the Chriſtians, and at times the walles being beaten downe, entred the Citie, but by the valour of the beſieged, moſt of whom were knights of Ieruſalem (for thoſe of that order had the abſolute command of the Iſland) they were with great ſlaughter driuen from the walles, and the Citie by diuine and humane aide was preſerued.

Ottoman beſieged Rhodes.

The Turkes themſelues did afterwards report, that two men of diuine countenance ſo long as the ſiege laſted, with torches in their hands, did euerie night walke the round vpon the walles with their ſwords, threatning the enemies, ſo as they being terrified with this viſion, retired. The common people ſaid that they were Saint Peter and Paul. If this be true, we may then iuſtly affirme, that Rhodes at that time was not onely preſerued by humane, but by diuine aſſiſtance. It was alſo accounted for a miracle, That the verie day that Ottoman a cruell enemie to Chriſtians died, the Hauen of Rhodes ſtood drie. (and yet it is exceeding deepe) This happened a yeare after the ſiege.

Ottoman takes Otranto.

The Spring following, the great Turke reſoluing of ſome important enterprize, did by ſodaine incurſion take Ottranto. This Citie is in Calabria, diuided from Valona by a ſmall Arme of Sea. Valona is an ancient Hauen. The ſmal ſpace of ſea which ſeparates this place from Italy, containing 50000 paces in length, king Pirrhus firſt of all attempted to paſſe ouer his Armie on foote, and to that end builded bridges there. After him Marcus Varro Admirall of Pompeis nauall Armie againſt Pirates, was deſirous to doe the like: but both of them were diuerted from their enterpriſes by ſundrie accidents. Ottranto being taken, it was to be feared that Ottoman with all his force would come and inuade Italy, which would mightily haue endangered Chriſtendome, had not Gods prouidence preſerued it from that miſchiefe by the Tyrants ſodaine death: for this plague to mankind was cut off euen in the middeſt of his warlike preparations: whereupon king Ferdinand beſieging Ottranto by land and ſea recouered it, aud tooke all the Turkes that were in it.

The death of Ottoman.

The Venetians in the meane time annexed the Iſle of Coritia in Dalmatia to their dominions, which the modernes call Veglia. It was their owne in former time when they were Lords of Dalmatia, and the Iſlanders for a time had beene gouerned by Venetian Magiſtrates. But in the daies of Prince Rainiero Zeno it being giuen in perpetuitie to the Schinels in thoſe daies one of the nobleſt families of the Iſland, they and their ſucceſſors for two hundred yeeres ſpace continued loyall to the Venetians. But in ſucceſſion of time, the affection of theſe petty kings beganne to alter in the troubles of Dalmatia, now following the Venetians party, and then on a ſodaine that of Bela, Ladiſlaus, Lewis, and other Hungarian kings, euen till the time of Iohn ſonne to Bano the laſt Prince of the Coritans: Hee hauing raſhly and forcibly entred certaine ſmall townes on the firme land belonging to Prince Martin his brother, by whoſe will and teſtament after his death they were bequeathed to Mathias king of Hungarie, he did in ſuch ſort prouoke the Hungarian againſt him, as he was enforced to haue recourſe to the Venetians.

They

Maerblaiſius, who to that end was ſent from Hungarie into Dalmatia, not ſatisfied with the recouerie of thoſe townes on the firme land, paſſed ouer into the Iſland, and had already beſieged the cittie of Muſella, when Giacomo Veniero ſent by Antonio Lauretano Generall of the nauall Armie from Corfu, arriued there, followed afterwards by Antonio Vinciguerra one of the Secretaries ſent from the Prince and Senate; who in the Common-wealths name willed the Hungarian to deſiſt from inuading the Coritans, who were vnder the Venetians protection: But the Hungarian was ſo farre off from giuing ouer his attempt, as on the contrarie, hauing taken Muſella by force, hee brought his Armie to the chiefe Cittie of the Iſland: The Iſlanders ſtanding ill affected to their Prince in regard of the grieuous ſubſidies hee exacted from them at the beginning of the warre, were in a manner all reuolted from him vpon the enemies arriuall. Then the Coritan Prince hauing loſt all hope, did by the perſwaſion of friends, quit all the claime which himſelfe and predeceſſors had in the Iſland, to the Venetians, into whoſe hands hee reſigned the Caſtle, and himſelfe went to Venice whither already he had ſent his wife and children. Not long after, foure Gallies arriued in the Iſland, wherewith the Hungarian being terrified, and fearing to be intercepted in his returne home, hauing firſt taken aſſurance of the Venetians, did peaceably ſurrender the Iſland vnto them.

Victor Souranza who ſucceeded Lauretano in the Admiralty, comming thither by chaunce, fortified it. The Senate aſſigned a perpetuall penſion of a thouſand crownes to the Coritan Prince, and foure thouſand ducats for his daughters downe: But he accuſtomed to tyranny, and not being able to liue vnder Lawes in a free State, departed ſecretly with his houſhold into Germany. The Coritan Prince flies into Germanie.

It is now time to returne to the propounded warre of Ferrara. The Princes of Ferrara had of a long time beene friends to the Venetians, ſo that Borſia Predeceſſor to Hercules, if at any time ſtrife aroſe concerning their bounds, came with a ſmall traine as a priuate perſon to conferre with the Prince and Senate, ſuppoſing that he could doe them no greater honour, nor better expreſſe his loue, than to come himſelfe vnlooked for to giue them ſatisfaction. This Prince to his dying day had nothing in greater admiration than the Venetian Seigniory, nor accounted any thing comparable to the peace and friendſhip thereof. This mans deſerts, and the hope which the Senate had conceiued, that no man would more reſemble Borſia in his behauiour and affection towards them than his brother Hercules, the Venetians did earneſtly embrace his cauſe, and aſſiſting him by land and water, ſeated him in the Dukedome, for which hee lately ſtroue with Nicolao, ſonne to Lionello, fauored by his vncle the prince of Mantua, and Galeas Viſconte.

But not long after, Hercules maried Leonora daughter to king Ferdinand, by means of which new alliance growing more inſolent, his loue to the Venetians waxed cold, and he did not greatly care to infringe his league with them. For contrary to their agreement hee had permitted his ſubiects to make ſalt at Comachia: Neuertheleſſe to cleere himſelfe thereof, hee was content at the Venetians intreatie by Benedicto Treuiſano ſent to him to Ferrara to that end, that a great quantity of ſalt made there, ſhould be caſt into the Sea. Hee did beſides, lay taxes and impoſitions on the Venetians, notwithſtanding their ancient freedome and exemption. But this was nothing: for he builded a Fort neere to Cap-Darger, as if himſelfe had beene to haue The cauſe of the warre of Ferrara.

bounded his owne confines. Lastly, the Venetian Magistrate, which by couenant remained in Ferrara, being outraged, expulsed and excommunicated by the Cities Archbishop, the Duke declared himselfe an open enemy to the Venetians.

The Duke of Ferara declares himselfe an enemie to the Venetians.

The Senate in the meane time knowing whereunto his designes intended, did sometime by Letters, then by Ambassadors, intreate him not to enforce the Venetians to become his enemies, but rather, imitating his brother Borsia and other his Predecessours to persuer in their ancient friendship, which would both bee profitable and honourable for him. This proude man, who by reason of his new alliance promised great matters to himselfe, contemned this counsell. Neuertheless, the Senate made Pope Sixtus a means to containe him in their ancient friendship. But his mediation doing no good, they being prouoked, as well by new as old iniuries (which they had dissembled during the warre with Ottoman) resolued to inuade him, and by Armes to reuenge that which till then for quietnesse sake they had more kindly than honourably endured.

This determination did for certaine dayes busie the Councell. Some of the auncient Senators were of opinion not to make warre on Hercules vpon any occasion whatsoeuer; not that it was vnlawfull, but because the time permitted it not, and did often aduise those that craued warre to take heed, that by desire of reuenge, they did not precipitate the Common-wealth into danger, saying, That the City and Tributary Townes were tired with long warre: That it behooued them sometimes to lay downe armes, lest by heaping one warre vpon an other, the world should say that the Venetians loued nothing lesse than peace. Moreouer, though there were nothing else in it, they ought to consider that Hercules besides his owne experience in Martiall matters, was allied to two potent Kings, and that vndoubtedly he would neuer of his owne priuate motion haue so mightily prouoked them: Besides, it was certaine that diuers Italian Princes were leagued with him, which being so, they desired those that wished for warre to aduise themselues, if they had not more need of a Target than of a Sword.

The opinion of those dissuading warre.

At this speech most of the Senatours, (as euery man was inclined) cried out to the contrary, saying; That the allegations of cowards ought not to diuert their former resolution, and much lesse cause them to beleeue them, that by the example of one man, other Princes their neighbours would rise against them, who would be twice aduised ere they inuaded the Venetians. That the Citie was able to vndergo the whole burthen of the warre, and being of a long time accustomed to warre, would not liue ydlely. That the State by Gods goodnesse was so wealthie, that notwithstanding the great masse of gold spent in the warre against Ottoman, her treasure was in a manner infinite, whereby warre might be managed to the honour of the Common-wealth: That all passages to sea lay open to the Venetian Marchants, whose traffick did daily augment their impost s and customes: That diuerse Senators present in Councell offered to aide the Common-wealth with great summes of gold, whereby they might perceiue that nothing could be wanting for the entertainement of the armie: That the King of Hungarie was in no sort to be feared: for besides his perpetuall warre with the Emperour Frederick, the Turkes were still on his confines and wasted his Countrey, so that hee had enough to doe, to defend his kingdome from two such potent enemies: That King Ferdinand was not to be regarded, who had not yet recouered his losses at the siege of Ottranto: That the Venetian fleete scoured the Sea coast of Apulia and Calabria, which if hee were desirous to defend, it behooued him whether he would, or no, to haue no hand in the Ferrarese warre. But admit (said hee which spake) that his forces be so great, as they may fitly be diuided into sundry places, by what way shall he come to bring aide to his sonne in lawe? His souldiers haue no wings to flie through the aire from Calabria into Lombardie. Rome belongeth to Pope Sixtus, so doth Sabinia, the Dutchy of Spoleta, la Marca, and all Italie besides, from Tibers mouth, as farre as Ancona. His Holinesse so soone as hee perceiued that hee could not preuaile with Hercules, hath not onely aduised vs to make warre vpon him, but together with the Venetians hath an hand therein. The Florentines and Milanois will not take our parts; But the Genouese and Prince of Montferrat will assist vs: The Rubrians of Parma will doe the like, who as we vnderstand are ready to reuolt. And seeing

Their answere that craued war

wee

wee want neither Armes, money, nor aide, what ſhall hinder vs from inuading Hercules? When did euer any of your neighbours (moſt noble Senatours) more prouoke you? Ouer all his Territories hee hath cancelled your freedome and immunities. He hath of a long time vſurped vpon the confines of your dominions; Hee hath ſuffered your Magiſtrate to be outraged, expulſed, and excommunicated: If this wrong cannot moue you, what then is able to incite you? Will you tarry till hee inuade you firſt? Queſtionleſſe hee will aſſaile you, and it may be ſooner than you imagine. On then, follow the ſteppes of your Auncеſtours, and with fire and ſword purſue this open enimy. Let your Armes quench this flame which our long ſufferance hath ſo kindled, as but by this meanes will hardly be extinguiſhed. Let all men ſee, that when neede is, the Venetians know how to draw peace from warre, and warre from peace.

Heereupon, the Senate with generall conſent preſently reſolued to take Armes: And that all requiſite ſolemnities might be obſerued therein, it was decreed, that ſo ſoone as the people were made acquainted therewith, it ſhould be denounced to the enemy. When it was publiſhed, the people were ſo ioyfull, as men might eaſily perceiue, that neuer any warre was more pleaſing to them than that. Whereupon the Senate reſolued to prepare two fleetes, the one to inuade Apulia and Calabria, if Ferdinand ſhould ſtirre; And the other to paſſe vp againſt the ſtreame of the Riuer Po into the enemies Territories. That by ſea was committed to Victor Souranza, who had beene Admirall of the Gallies; and the other to Damiano Moro, both of them valiant Captaines: But when the Senate conſidered, that he was not onely to be inuaded by water, but by land, it diuided the forces into ſundry places. Roberto Sanſeuerino (who not long before ſerued them for large entertainement) was appoynted to make warre vpon him on the hither ſide of Po, and Robert of Arimini Generall of all the troups, on the other ſide towards Flaminia. Many did voluntarily follow the Venetian enſignes both by land and water, not ſo much for hope of bootie, as for particular hatred to the Duke, whoſe pride they could not endure.

Warre is reſolued againſt the Duke of Ferrara.

Two Venetian fleets.

Diuers Veſſells were already gone from Venice when Roberto Sanſeuerino and Antonio Lauretano the Prouidator, marched towards Legnaga. Theſe, hauing viewed all places, reſolued with their troupes to paſſe into the enemies Countrie, ouer the Lakes of the Riuer Tartar, which are betwixt the Po and the Adice. But here it is requiſite (ſeeing all Lombardie from Hoſtilia a Citie of the Mantuan on this ſide, and beyond the Po, as farre as the Sea, is watered by diuers ſtreames) to diſcourſe ſomewhat of the ſituation of the Prouince, and winding of the Riuers.

Now this Prouince is incloſed by part of Flaminia, and La Marca, on euery ſide by Mountaines, ſauing on the South and Eaſt, where it is watered by the Adriatick Sea, ſo, as if it extended no farther to Sea-ward than towards the Appenine Hills, and Genoa, it would retaine the true forme of a Theater. And if it might be called a Theater, it might truly be ſaid to be that of Mars, and none other, as the Greekes termed Beotia, becauſe there is no Countrie of Italie where Warre hath oftener begunne or laſted longer, than in Lombardie. It hath on the Weſt the Appenine Hills, ſtretching themſelues towards Genoa, and after that they haue coaſted and left Tuſcanie on the right hand, haue their extent towards Ancona. The Alpes in a manner doe the like towards the North and Weſt. The Tuſcans in times paſt poſſeſt the whole Countrie. The French drawne thither by the beautie and fertilitie of the Prouince, chaced them thence, and did a long time after enioy the whole Countrie on this ſide and beyond the Po. Some thinke that the Gaules, Lebetians, Inſubres, and Cenomans, haue inhabited betwixt that Riuer and the Alpes: Some likewiſe affirme that the Venetians are deſcended from the Gaules, and others ſay it is not ſo, becauſe they differ from them in ſpeech, though reſembling them in habit and manners. The Boyans, Egans, and Senonois dwelt beyond the Po, whereupon it was afterwards rightly termed Gaule. But they were extinct by the Romans. Laſtly, by the arriuall of the Lombards (who did a long time inhabit the Prouince, where the greateſt part of their power remained, with Pauia their Royall Seate) it was called Lombardie, one ſillable being taken from their name.

The deſcription of Lombardie.

The goodlieſt and greateſt Riuers of this Prouince, are the Po, Theſin, Oglio, Abdue, Mincia, and Adice. The Po which as ſome ſay the Greekes termed Eridanus, receiues her Spring in the middeſt of the Mount Veſula, on the confines of Liguria, from thence falling downe into the plaine, it runnes firſt towards the South, then turning towards the Eaſt, it entreth by ſixe Channells into the Adriatick Sea, and being augmented by thirtie Riuers falling into it, it growes ſo great, as ſome thinke it nothing inferiour to the Danubium or Nilus. The Riuers which fall into it are very famous, and with great abundance of water, iſſue from very excellent Lakes. From the Lake Larica vulgarly called Coma, it takes the Abdue. From Verbana or the great Lake Theſin. From Benac, or la Garda, Mincia. From Sabina, or Iſea, the Oglio. From the Lakes Epilles, whereof the one is called Pucian, and the other Ceruian, Lambroma. Beſides theſe Riuers, ſnow melted in the Mountaines, doe much increaſe it, eſpecially in the Dogge daies, and being once ſwelled, it is as dangerous to ſhips as to the Neighbour Territories, which cauſeth the Inhabitants to make great Bankes and Rampiers to reſtraine it, neuertheleſſe in this it deales well with them, for it eaſily giues them againe whatſoeuer it hath taken from them.

The originall and ſpring of the Riuer Po, with her courſe.

Being thus augmented (as hath beene ſaid) it runnes with a direct courſe to Ficarolles (this Citie is a little beneath Hoſtilia) where being ouer-preſſed and glutted by ſuperfluitie of waters, it begins to enlarge it ſelfe ſomwhat beneath the Citie, and diuiding into two, makes the firſt Iſland which the Inhabitants call Poleſina, placing (as I thinke) one ſillable before an other, pronouncing Poleſina for Polineſſa, which is as much to ſay, as a long and broade Iſland. And becauſe that Ferrara is not farre beneath the place where the Riuer diuideth it ſelfe, they commonly call it the Polleſin of Ferrara. The branch which runneth on the right hand, before it comes to the Citie recouereth her ſtrength by ſuccour of diuers Riuers, which in a little ſpace fall into it, whereupon being ouer-loden with this new burthen, the Citizens looking on, as if it were troubled with ſome faction, it diuideth it ſelfe into two, and differently purſueth her courſe: by that ſecond diuiſion making an other Iſland, wherein are the Cities of Argentia and Comachia, enuironed with Lakes. The right Arme of this Riuer comming to the Argentine Territorie, on the other ſide neare to Faniola, receiueth the Riuer Vaterna, which the Inhabitants by corrupted ſpeech call Sauterna, comming from Forecornelia. And there, as though it were not able to endure all her encreaſe, comming neare to Comachia, at a Towne called S. Alberts; it prodigallie diſgorgeth as much water as it tooke in at Vaterna, the which gliding through the Lakes of Rauenna, entreth like a nauigable Riuer into the Sea: And in this manner the Hauen of Rauenna may bee termed one of the mouthes of the Po. The other part which is farre greater, from S. Alberts runnes directly into the Sea, and the Inhabitants call her entrance Primaria, in old time named Vaterna of the Riuer which falls into it.

That branch on the left hand beneath Ferrara, runnes into the Sea with the ſelfe ſame force, as it commeth from the Citie, and the entrance thereof is called Volana. Betwixt this and Primaria, which wee lately mentioned, the Lakes of Comachia haue their mouth, or rather Hauen, which is called Magneuaca. But to ſpeake truly theſe are armes of the Sea, as may eaſily bee perceiued by reaſon of ſalt which is made there.

Now I returne to the firſt diuiſion of the Riuer, which we ſaid was a litle beneath Ficarolles: This is eſteemed to be new, not ſo much by the Map of Italie, which Robert King of Naples, and Franciſco Petrarca haue made, where Blondus of Forli affirmes no mention at all to be made of this diuiſion, as by the authoritie of Polibius a learned Author, who ſaith that the Po entreth by two channels into the Adriatick Sea, by Paduſa and Volana, which are properly parts of that Riuer, whereof wee e-

uen

uen now diſcourſed. But to returne to the other part, it runs on the left hand without any diminution at all, as farre as the Confines of Hadria, and diuiding it ſelfe againe into two mouthes, entreth by two ſeuerall waies into the Sea: That which is next to Volana is called Abba, and the other Goria. The Inhabitants of the Countrie call the other bigger Channell which runnes on the left hand into the Sea, the Fornaces.

This in briefe is all wee can ſay of the originall of the Po, of her courſe and entrances into the Sea. Some thinke that it was called Paua, becauſe that round about her ſpring there grow many trees called in the French tongue Pines. Plinie ſaith that the Ligurians called it Bondimaca, by the name of the Village, and for proofe of his ſaying alleageth the Towne of Bondicomaca neare to the Riuer. From whence the Po tooke her name.

The Adice likewiſe which diuided in ſundrie ſorts makes diuers Polleſins, comming downe from the Mountaines of Trant runnes a thwart through the Citie of Verona, from thence being parted in two at Caſtagnare, beneath Legnaga, that part which enuironeth the Village, falls into the Tartar, iſſuing from her Lakes, and ioyned together are not long ere with a greater courſe they meet with the other part of the Adice at Malopra, and ſo all theſe Riuers meeting in one, doe behinde encloſe the Polleſin of Rouiga. At laſt falling into the Lakes they looſe the name of Riuers. But the Adice being diuided into two aboue the Tower Marchiana, That part which runnes directly towards Sendouare and Rouiga, before it comes to Capdarger, gently reenters into her owne ſtreames, and thus mingled, runnes through the Lakes and Marſhes vnto a place called the new Tower, where againe ſeparating it ſelfe into two parts, falleth by two mouthes into the Sea, that on the right hand being called Foſſiones, and the other Brandules. The Adice being there diuided (as hath beene ſaid) makes two Poleſins, the one beyond Rouiga called the old, and the other on the hether ſide, termed the new.

Now theſe diuiſions of Lakes and Riuers made the Venetians iourney much more difficult, for in ſome places they were too deepe to bee foorded, and in others too ſhallow to be paſſed by Boat. Firſt, Sanſeuerino and the Prouidator Lauretano, were of opinion to cauſe diuers ſmall Boates to bee brought through the Lakes of the Riuer Tartar to Boaria, not farre from Legnaga, and in them to tranſport three companies of Foote, vnder the command of Andrea de Parma, and Thomaſo Himulano, firſt to Crocelta, and from thence to the Mellaritan Confines. By this meanes the Venetian Souldiers came on the laſt of Aprill before day into the Enemies Countrie. Some of the Garriſon of Mellaria with Franciſco Sica comming from Hoſtilio with troupes of Horſe, ſought to repell them at their firſt arriuall, but after ſome light skirmiſh they were glad to retire. The next night Antonio Marciano a very famous Captaine, beganne with three hundred Peaſants to cut a way for the Armie through the Lakes neare to Caſalon, They wrought there all that night, and the labourers ſtood in water and mud vp to the girdles: but ſo ſoone as it was day and the worke not finiſhed, Sanſeuerino and Lauretano comming thither, and conſidering the danger which thoſe troupes were expoſed vnto, that were already in the enemies Countrie, they preſently ſent for all the Countrie people there abouts of euery ſexe and age, to helpe to finiſh the worke: more then one thouſand perſons laboured there, who the next day after finiſhed it, and by three of the clocke after noone of the ſame day the troupes came to the bankes of the Riuer Tartar: ſo ſoon as their fellowes which guarded the oppoſite ſhore ſaw them, they preſently made a Bridge ouer the Riuer, ouer which euery man paſſed at his pleaſure into the enemies Countrie.

This way (foure and twentie furlongs in length) cut through the Lakes, was by reaſon of the great quantitie of Fagots wherewith it was made, called Faſcinada. A Fort was builded on the hither ſide the Tartar neare to the Bridge, and ſtrongly fortified that men might freely paſſe vp and downe. The ſame day the forces marched into the Mellarians Territories: ſome that were there agree not about their Faſcinada.

number,

number; saying, that they were 20000. Others mention not so many. But Sanseuerino marching to besiege Mellaria on the Po, did at the first assault winne the enemies Rampier neare to the Castle: whereuppon those within it presently yeelded.

Mellaria being taken, the enemie shewed himselfe about Sunne-set on the other side of the Riuer: this gaue a sodaine alarme to the Venetian, who in armes presently ranne to the Riuer bankes: but perceiuing their small number their feare ceased. They had intelligence afterwards that it was Frederick of Vrbin, who came to crosse the Po at Hostilia, from thence to march to Milan. King Ferdinand and Hercules confederates, had made him Generall of their Armie, and sent for him to come away speedily to Ferrara to oppose himselfe to the Venetians first attempts. The Venetian returned to the Camp, and two daies after leauing Mellaria, went and encamped at the Village Brigantino, which they had taken not long before. Then Sanseuerino had intelligence that the enemie had abandoned Trecenta, and some other lesser Townes of no great moment. Hee thought it fit there to make a bridge, by which supplies and victualls might be brought to them from Verona. Though this was not so neare a way as that of Croselta or Fascinada, yet was it more sure than any of them, whereupon he left a strong Garrison to guard the bridge.

The Ferrarois abandon Trecenta.

Within a while after, the camp marched from Brigantino towards Castelnouo, where filling a great trench which the enemie had drawne from the Po to the lakes, to stop the Venetians approch, the Armie came neare the Citie, where for three daies space the Ordnance playing vpon the walls, in the end after some assaults, the Citie yeelded. In the meane time they made incursions into the enemies Countrie, and euery day brought great store of Cattaile and prisoners to the Camp.

Castelnouo yeeldeth to the Venetians.

The report of these incursions being bruted in the neighbour Villages, prouoked many to come to the Venetians campe vpon hope of bootie, so as in a short space the Armie consisted of 30000. able Men. From Castelnouo they went to Ficarolles, where an other great trench being likewise made by the enemie, did for a time restraine the course of their victorie; but this impediment taken away, they planted the Cannon against the walls, when speedie newes was brought from Mellaria, that Frederick of Vrbin with great forces lay at Hostilia. The Venetian Generall, fearing if the enemie should at his backe shut vp all passages, he should not be able when he would to returne, did presently raise his camp and returned to Castelnouo: There he vnderstood by spies that the forces which were at Hostilia were not sufficient to make any attempt on this side the Po: Then Sanseuerino sent word to Count Marcian presently to breake downe the cawsies and bankes of the Riuer betwixt Mellaria and Hostilia; for that once done, they needed no more to feare the enemies incursions: and himselfe returned againe to Ficarolles. But in his absence, the townesmen had fortified the trench, planted their Ordnance on the opposite shore, broken downe the camps Rampiers, and burnt the Souldiers Cabins. Vrbin comming thither afterwards from Hostilia had strengthened the Towne with a stronger Garrison, and from thence retired to Stellata on the opposite shore, and there remained to releeue his people when neede were, with supplies, armor, and victualls: all his troupes came thither to him.

The Venetians besiege Ficarolles.

Robert in the meane time being somewhat tyred, did againe fill the trench, and encamped on either side thereof. But whilest these things were done there, Christofero Muletto a valiant Captaine, who commanded the small vessells (for Damiano Moro Generall of the fleete vpon the Po had passed on beyond the enemie) besieged and took Hadria a very ancient Citie: The souldiers of the garrison and townsmen did at first brauely defend it. The situation of the place did greatly auaile them, which is for the most part enuironed with water, not nauigable but by certaine Channels, through which very hardly vessells come neere the Cittie. Dominico Herizeo a couragious souldier was slaine at the first assault. The Venetians incensed by his death, did with greater furie assault the Citie, and without feare of danger Hadria is taken.

ger mounted the rampires, and neuer gaue ouer till the ſouldiers and mariners entred it. Then the inhabitants caſting downe their Armes, cried for mercie. The Conquerors at their firſt entrance ſlew diuers, and the houſes in many places were burnt and ſpoiled, and Hadria had that day beene wholy ruined, had not the Venetian preſently commaunded the ſouldiers to abſtaine from ſpoile and murther. We haue elſewhere ſpoken of the ſituation and antiquitie of this cittie.

Comachia yeeldeth to the Venetians.

Hadria taken, the whole Countrey round about was waſted. Comachia likewiſe at the ſame time yeelded to the Venetians. Theſe Citties with others neere adioyning, ſome by force, and others voluntarily, beeing taken by them, and Moro ſailing with the fleete vp the Riuer, all men fled on both ſides the Po: for the Inhabitants of the Countrey terrified with the loſſe of Hadria, ranne with their wiues and children to Ferrara and other Townes of ſafetie.

Hercules had fortified a place vpon the Po called Piloſella, by which the fleete was to paſſe, and had there builded three Caſtles of wood, one in the middeſt of the Riuer; and the other on both ſides; which hee furniſhed with ordnaunce and other neceſſaries, and ſtrong garriſons. Sigiſmond d'Eſte Hercules brother and Gioüan Bentiuole of Bolognia lay there with ſix hundred horſe, and as many foot. Moro had great numbers of veſſells, to wit, gallcots, ſmall boates, Ganzarioles, with many other of ſundry ſorts to the number of two hundred well armed and readie to fight. Himſelfe in his owne Gallie, ſailed againſt the enemie, the like did the forces by land. The Venetian beganne the fight with ſuch animoſitie, as putting the Caualerie and the reſt which were on each ſhoare to flight, after a long and dangerous bickering hee tooke the Fortes vpon the water. The victory was verie bloudy. But the ioy to haue vanquiſhed made them forget their preſent loſſe. They ſent the Caſtle which was builded in the middeſt of the water vpon a great veſſel, to Venice, the others were burnt.

Moro victorious, cauſed his ſouldiers and mariners to ſpoile and waſte all places neere to the Riuer; they being as well prouoked by reuenge, as deſire of bootie, pillaged all villages, and countrie houſes vpon the Riuer, and then burnt them, and ſo ſatisfied, carried away with them great numbers of priſoners and cattell, and thus loaden with bootie, arriued at the campe before Ficarolles. Theſe men by theyr ſpeed, comming thither before the fleet, and being taken for enemies, did put the Campe in alarme; but when they were knowne to be friends, they did cheerefully embrace one another, and continued the ſiege both by land and water: then they made ſo fierce a battery as they ouerthrew the Citties, walles, and rampires. Fredericke of Vrbin, who was on the oppoſite ſhore, beholding the danger of his friends, was not idle, but annoyed the Venetians with his ordnance from the farther ſide, and ſupplied the beſieged with armour, victuall, and what ſoeuer elſe he knew to be neceſſarie for a ſiege. But nothing did ſo much hurt to the Venetian as certaine peeces called Baſes, then not vſuall. For neither armour, rampire, or fortification could withſtand their fury and yron bullets, which carried away with them whatſoeuer they met with. And becauſe that contrarie to the diſcipline of thoſe times they played aſwell by night as day, Sanſeuerino ſent him word by a Trumpet, that if hee did not ceaſe his new kinde of warre, hee would turne his Cannons from the walles of Ficarolles vpon his Campe, whereupon they agreed together, that when Sanſeuerino ſhould aſſault the Citie, or batter the walls with his ordnance, the enemie might vſe thoſe peeces.

Caſt peeces called Baſes.

Moreouer, Sanſeuerino reſoluing wholy to ſhut vp the Riuer from the enemie, commanded certaine veſſells of the fleet to bee drawne by Land vp the Riuer, beyond the enemies camp. Vrbin ſent for nine Galeots from Hoſtilia (of thoſe fiue and twentie which he had brought with him from Milan) to ouer-runne thoſe veſſells. Fiue of them being come to an Iſland neare to the Venetians fleet, foure hundred of the Souldiers landed there to refreſh themſelues by reaſon of the great heat, and lay downe here and there in the ſhade vpon the graſſe. The Venetians, aduertiſed tiſed of their landing, and vnwilling to omit ſo faire an occaſion, landing on the farther ſide of the Iſland to the number of 150. did ſodainly aſſaile the enemie halfe aſleepe, who being amazed with ſuch an vnlookt for aſſault, inſted of defending themſelues fled towards the veſſells: moſt of them were ſlaine or taken; threeſcore and ten being taken aliue were brought to Sanſeuerino, who vnderſtanding that they were Milaneſes and Artificers, not comming thither of their owne accord to fight, but ſent by their Princes commandement, did vſe them gently, and furniſhing them with clothes and money, gaue them leaue to depart.

Some of the enemies are defeated in an Iſland.

It was not long ere the enemie had his reuenge, with greater loſſe to the Venetians. The Po diuides it ſelfe into two branches (as hath been ſaid) fiue hundred paces beneath Ficarolles. The Venetian Captaines determined to build a Fort at the point of the Iſland where this ſeparation begins, that the right ſide thereof on the way from Stellata to Ferrara, might be ſhut vp from the enemie. Antonio Marciano was the firſt that propounded it, wherefore the charge thereof was committed to him. He being accompanied by Bartilmeo Falceria, Tomaſo of Immola, and two Companies of foot, did on a ſodaine ſeize on the place, and then with great numbers of peaſants brought thither with him to that end, began the worke. The ſoldiors and marriners in the meane time deſirous of bootie, ſtraying far from the worke, made incurſions as far as Ferrara, from whence returning with great bootie, they went without leaue to the Campe on the oppoſite ſhoare, leauing Marcian and his workmen with few or no forces at all. By reaſon hereof the worke could not be finiſhed in one day. Hercules, by meſſengers from the Duke of Feltre aduertiſed of the enemies deſeigne, came ſpeedilie thither to defeat them: For he was not ignorant how diſcommodious that Fort would be to Ferrara. At his arriuall he charged them, but Marcian in the end being oppreſſed by the multitude, was taken, and Falceria with him: Many of his ſoldiors were ſlaine, Thomaſo of Imola in a little boat eſcaped with ſome few ſoldiors, and went ouer the Riuer. Hercules preſently finiſhed the fortification which the other had begun, and placing a ſtrong Garriſon in it, did greatly relieue Ferrara.

The Venetians are put to rout, and their enterpriſe made fruſtrate.

Sanſeuerino in the meane time lying longer before Ficarolles than he expected; the better to annoy the enemie, ſent Fracaſſe, Giouan Maria, and Pietro Marcello the Prouidator, with part of the troops to take the Townes of the Rhouigian Polleſin: For the enemies Countrie neer to the Adice had not yet taſted the calamities of warre. At their firſt arriual there they tooke Caſtle-Guillielmo, the tower Sandona enuironed with lakes, Rouiga, Lendenara, the Abbey, and other places of the Polleſin, but not without fight, where Ieronimo, ſonne to Count Marcian a braue young man was ſlaine.

For the aſſurance of the Townes yeelded to the Venetians, Auguſtino Barbadico at that time Gouernour of Padua, a man of great wiſedome and authoritie, did by the Senates commaund go to Rouiga, with whom they ioined Pietro Treuiſano.

The Prouince being ſetled, Barbadico by the ſame commaundement returned to Padua: Treuiſano falling grieuouſly ſicke, died ſoone after. Roberto Venieri ſonne to Franciſco, ſucceeded Treuiſano in the Prouince. This man did not alone faſhion the peoples minds to obedience, but by his meekneſſe confirmed them in their duties towards the Venetians.

Whileſt theſe things were done neere to the Adice, Frederick of Vrbin falling ſicke, was carried from the Campe at Stellata to Ferrara. Sanſeuerino, though his ſonnes had part of the forces, did not ceaſe continually to annoy the enemie, whoſe wals being beaten downe by the Canon, himſelfe impatient of any longer delay, reſolued to giue an aſſault, wherein the Venetian tooke the Paraper of the Tower, and made it good; many after the retreat was founded, remayning in it. Hercules ſoldiors, terrified with the enemies boldneſſe, did ſet fire on the piles that ſupported the Tower, and ouerthrew it. Sanſeuerino thereby perceiued the inhabitants ſmall hope, whereupon he aſſauled the Citie more fiercely. Vpon the 29. day of Iune at midnight the ſoldiors went to the aſſault, and fauored by the night, made many bridges ouer the dikes and hollow places. The beſieged, notwithſtanding the darkneſſe of the night, did brauely defend it, ſo as this aſſault both in ſhew & effect was more furious than that by day. It continued till day-light: but the enemie being then vanquiſhed, the Venetian in ſundrie places entred the Citie, which taken the ſoldiers threw downe their Armes: ſome of them were caſt into the riuer, others murthered, verie few taken priſoners. This being done, and the Venetian maſter of the Citie, he did forthwith begin to repaire it.

A fearefull aſſault by night.

The Venetians take Ficarolles.

Within a while after, Sanſeuerin and Lauretano fell ſicke, by reaſon of the vnholeſome aire of the marſhes: both of them were carried to Padua, but with ſeuerall deſtinies, for the Venetian died there, and the Generall recouered. Moro likewiſe, Generall of the nauall Armie, called home by the Senate, died ſoone after his arriuall at Venice. This Summer was vnfortunate, but the Autumne after it much more: Some that haue written the Ferrareſſe warre, and were preſent there, affirme that more then 20000. men of thoſe that were at the ſiege of Ficarolles by land and water, by ſome one accident or other died there, but moſt of all by reaſon of feauers occaſioned by the infectious ayre of the marſhes. This is all that happened in Lombardie during that Summer.

Great mortality in the Venetians campe.

In Flaminia, Robert of Arimini did not ceaſe to annoy the enemie by ordinarie incurſions with thoſe forces which he had receiued at the beginning of the war: he was abundantly furniſhed with victuals & other warlike neceſſaries from Rauenna, gouerned at that time by Bernardin Bembo. Roberto in the heat of Summer was commanded by the Senate to go to Rome to reliene Pope Sixtus which was beſieged.

Alphonſo Duke of Calabria at the beginning of the Venetians warre ſought to bring 4000. men to aide his brother Hercules. But becauſe his way lay through the Popes territories, he marched by aſſiſtance of the Coloneſſi, and Sauelli who were open enemies to the Pope, directly towards Rome, which Citie hath diuers noble families in it, among whom the Vrſini, Coloneſi, and Sauelli, hold the chiefe ranke, as well for wealth as antiquitie of deſcent. Theſe men of a long time being ill affected to each other, haue often by meanes of their mortall hatred banded together, ſometimes in the Citie, but oftner in the field, as in a freer place: moſt of the townes and villages neere to Rome are theirs. But beſide theſe, there be diuers other noble families in the Citie, yet the Vrſini haue for many yeares excelled them all both in wealth and knowledge in martiall diſcipline. Foure of this houſe, ſonnes to Carolo, haue in our time beene verie famous, Latino, Giouanni, Neapuleo, and Roberto. The two firſt followed Pope Eugenius to Florence, where they did winne his loue and fauour, as Latino the eldeſt brother was made Cardinal, and Giouanni elected Biſhop of Trani, and being inriched with diuers other beneſices, did much augment the greatneſſe & dignitie of his houſe: Theſe two did greatly illuſtrate their familie, but not ſo much as Neapuleo and Roberto, who by their experience in martiall diſcipline, purchaſed ſuch honour, as at one time the firſt was made Generall of the kings Armie, and the other of the Popes. They did not onely by their valour keepe their paternall principalitie, but did wonderfully encreaſe it, ſo as they became Lords of all the whole countrey, from the Tyrhene ſea as farre as the lake Piſcino, extends it ſelfe.

The nobleſt houſes of Rome.

The greatneſſe of the Vrſini.

This proſperitie procured them hatred and enuie. For at one time the Coloneſſi, Sauelli, and Anguilares were their enemies: and becauſe they were all too weake to withſtand the power of this one familie, they cauſed Pope Calixtus likewiſe to Arme againſt them, whoſe attempts they did not onely fruſtrate, but brake and defeated them, and chiefly at that time when Borſia Nephew to Calixtus, with forces farre ſuperiour to Vrſinos, was by him vanquiſhed at Varro his village.

But if Vrſinus greatneſſe was enuied before, it was moſt of all in the daies of Pope Sixtus, when their enemies deſirous wholly to ruine them, had (in their owne opinion,) found out a fitt occaſion. For theſe foure noble men being lately dead, they ioyntly ioyntly bent all their malice vpon Virginio sonne to Neapuleo, sole heire to Vrsinis principalitie. But he being young and powerfull, after the Precedent of his Ancestors, did together with Ieronimo Viscounte follow the Popes partie, by whose councell he was wholly directed. In hatred to him rather than the Pope, the Colonesi and Sauelli did vpon Alphonsos arriuall practize innouation as well in the Citie as abroad, whereupon two Cardinals of both those families, men of great authoritie, were by the Popes commandement, as guiltie of treason, imprisoned for a time in Castle Angelo. Their kinsmen incensed thereat, did by their factions trouble all Rome, aided Alphonso with victuals, and the more to annoy the Citie, gaue him free entrance into their Townes and Castles. And although the Pope at that time was strong, many noble Gentlemen seruing him, his Armie neuertheless stirred not forth of the walles of Rome, fearing if they should leaue the Citie, those of the contrarie partie would make some commotion.

Alphonso aided by the Colonitti and Sanelli beseigeth the Pope

Alphonso laying hold on this occasion, tooke diuers townes from the Pope, spoiling and wasting the whole countrey neere to Rome. The Pope wrote to the Venetians to send Roberto Malateste to raise the siege. Though the Senate at that time was busied in the Ferrarese warre, it neuertheless commanded Victor Souranza to wast the Sea coasts of Apulia and Calabria with a mightie fleete: They wrote to Francisco Diede their Ambassador with the Pope at their charge to raise forces in Rome: And willed Robert of Arimini to march speedily thither with the greatest power he could to raise the siege. They sent Pietro Diede to be his Prouidator, to raise forces from all parts: this they did, because they would not onely aide his Holinesse with a Generall, but with souldiers. Robert being commanded to goe to Rome, departed from Flaminia with many troupes of horse: but hauing intelligence by the way that Nicolao Vitelli aided by the Florentines had taken the towne of Typherna, he went thither, where ruining certaine places belonging to the Typhernians, the danger of Rome calling him thither, by great iournies he arriued there: At his comming the state of the warre was changed, and they marched against the enemie.

Alphonso hauing intelligence of the Venetians approach, encamped on the Veliternian territorie in a place called the Dead field. So soone as the Venetian Generall discouered him, he encouraged his souldiers, and full of hope marched against him: being more confident through the number of his men, whereby he enforced the Arragonois to fight on all parts at once. Alphonso was likewise strong both in horse and foote, but chiefly in horse: he had besides foure hundred Turkes which he had brought from Ottranto: with these forces he brauely receiued Malatestes charge. The fight was hot for sixe houres: The Venetian Generall did greatly annoy him. The Arragonois on the contrarie presuming on the valour of his men, resolued eyther to die or conquer: many fell on both sides, in all places the battaile was bloudie, especially where the Turkes fought. At last the Pope and Venetians multitude, with the Generals encouragement preuailing, the enemie by little and little retired. Alphonso sought to reenforce them, but perceiuing he could not, withdrew himselfe to a place of safetie, accompanied with some few horse: other braue Commanders preferring any hazard before flight were taken, in greater number than euer before in any battaile.

A cruell fight betwixt Alphonso Duke of Calabria and Roberto of Arimini Generall to the Venetians.

The conquerour within a while after entred Rome with his prisoners, representing the Romanes the forme of their ancient triumphes, and hauing by this victorie purchased immortall glorie, he died not long after. Some say that he was poisoned, but it is most likely that he died of a surfet taken by his great trauell in the heat of the battaile. He was honourably buried in Rome, where this Epitaph was written on his monument. Veni, vidi, vici, Lauream Pontifici retuli, Mors secundis rebus inuidit. In English thus, I came, saw, ouercame, brought victorie to the Pope, which death tooke from me. Some write that on one day two the greatest Captaines of Italy died: he of whom we now spake; and Fredericke of Vrbin; that was carried away sicke to Ferrara from the campe at Stellata.

The death of Roberto of Arimini.

But

But whileſt theſe things were done neere to Rome, Pietro Maria de Roſsis following the Venetians partie in Lombardie, ceaſed not to annoy Sforza's troupes on the Parmeſan confines: But the Venetians intention was not ſo much to hurt the Milanois, as by entangling him in a domeſticke warre, to keepe him from aiding Hercules. Sforza's forces ſodainely marched towards Parma, where Roſsis being ſharpely aſsailed, was not onely enforced to retire into his owne territories, but loſt Nucetta, and the Caſtle Candida.

But Pietro Roſsis a braue and valiant Gentleman falling ſicke, died within a while after. Guidone whom he had made his heire, went with his bretheren to beſiege a certaine Towne, but being abandoned by the Venetian ſuccours, who could not follow them by reaſon of the Po, though for a time they did brauely withſtand all Sforzas attempts, and ſometime defeated his forces, yet beeing tired with ſo long a warre, they were enforced to retire.

Autumne was already more than halfe ſpent, when Sanſeuerin hauing recouerd his health returned to his deſolate camp, where nothing was to be ſeene but weake and ſicke ſouldiers. Luca Piſani whom the Senate had ſent from Verona after Lauretanoes death, commaunded the Armie as Prouidator, till Giouan Heme called from the confines of Breſſia arriued at Ficarolles. He being come, Piſani who was already infected with the bad aire returned to Venice. The new Prouidator repayred the walles of Ficarolles, when Frederico Cornari, and Franciſco Sanuto came to the Campe as Prouidators. At their arriuall, the Armie made ſome abode there, together with the fleete, not daring to enterprize any memorable matters; for though their numbers were great, yet moſt of them were ſo weake, as they could hardly walke vp and downe. But towards the end of Harueſt, the aire being purified, they beganne by litle and litle to recouer their healths: Then Sanſeuerine loath to looſe any longer time, ſent Fraccaſſo his ſonne with many troupes of horſe, to aſſault the Fort which Hercules had made vpon the Riuer banckes at the obſcure Lake, for it did greatly annoy the Venetian veſſells going to and fro: He planted his ordnance on the oppoſite ſhoare, from whence in ſhort ſpace by continuall ſhooting hee had ſo beaten downe the Rampires as hee was in good hope before long to driue them thence.

But whileſt Fracaſſo was there buſied, Victor Souranza Generall by water, comming vp the Riuer Po as farre as the Argentine territorie with one and twentie gallies, foureteene foiſts, and other leſſer veſſells, determined to aſſault the Towne of Ianiola, ſeated at the mouth of Vaterna: For if it were not taken, it was certayne that the fleete could not goe vp farther but with greater daunger. To this end Souranza landed foure hundred horſe, and ſixe hundred foote at a place oppoſite to the Citie. Theſe hauing begunne to fortifie the Riuer banckes to defend themſelues from the enemies incurſions, that they might afterwards without any let batter the towne walls, Sigiſmundo d'Eſte on a ſodaine with Nicolao Corregio, Hugo Sanſeuerino, and other noble men comming foorth of Argento with three thouſand men, aſſailed them, and gaue their firſt charge vpon Andrea Burgenſis quarter, where at firſt the Venetians had the worſt, but ſo ſoone as the alarme was giuen in the camp, euery man armed ranne fiercely to the fight. Sigiſmond oppoſed to the Venetians front foure waggons, on each of which lay foure falconets. There the battaile was very doubtfull, till three hundred Venetian light horſe wheeling about to giue in vpon the enemies backe, did ſo terrifie Hercules ſouldiers, as Sigiſmond and the other Captaines betooke themſelues to flight, then the Gallie called Valereſa comming with great rumor vp the water vpon their backes, the enemies changed their fight to flight. Sigiſmond mounting a ſwift horſe, eſcaped himſelfe alone to Argento. Many were drowned in the Riuer, more were ſlaine in the battell, but the number of priſoners was greateſt of all. Souranza that day obtained a great and notable victorie. For beſides Hugo Sanſeuerine, he tooke three ſcore and tenne other Captaines whom he ſent priſoners to Venice.

The deſeate of the Ferrarois.

The venetian armie crosseth the Po.

Roberto Sanseuerino being likewise desirous to execute some memorable enterprize, resolued to passe ouer into the Ferrarese Territory, and for effecting it hee commaunded a bridge to be made on galliots, and committed the worke to Bassan of Verona, which being soone finished, he left Barbadico at Ficarolles, and himselfe with Heme and Sanuto the Prouidators, went a mile beneath the enemies Fort, where hee beganne to passe ouer his troupes, and so soone as one boate had passed, it cast anker, and so the rest serued for a bridge. By this time eighteene hundred horse and foote were already gone ouer into the enemies Countrey, when they perceiued that there wanted vessells to finish the bridge, which happened by their errour who had not taken the iust breadth of the Riuer: by the meanes whereof, a troupe of valiant souldiers remayned on the other shoare destitute of their fellowes aide: whereat Sanseuerine was moued, in great choller protesting, that if they did not before day prouide boats to finish the bridge, his braueſt troupes through the carelesnesse & indiscretion of some, would vndoubtedly be cut in peeces before his face. But by the Prouidators diligence, it was preuented, and the bridge beeing wholy finished, the rest of the Armie crossed the riuer ere the enemie had anie notice thereof.

Hercules souldiers hauing discouered them, and not trusting to their Fort, threw their ordnance into the Riuer, and setting fire on their fortification, retired speedily to Ferrara. By their example others that held certaine fortified places vpon the Riuer, did for feare abandon them: whereupon the Venetian in an instant became Master of the Riuer (one Fort excepted, standing at the head of the Polesine which the enemies had fortified.) So soone as the Venetians perceiued that neither the riuer nor any forts could resist their furie, they wasted the whole territorie, burning farmes and country houses downe to the ground.

A parke neare to Ferrara.

There is a Parke within a mile of Ferrara: Borsia was the first that inclosed it with walls, but Hercules inlarging it, did much beautifie it with lakes, ponds, groues, and other places fit for chace. The Venetian first encamped neere to the walls which are close to the riuer; and in the meane time made a new bridge ouer the Po, stronger than the former. They first placed a ranke of shippes of burthen, one close to another, from one side to the other, fastened to their ankors, by strong yron chains which could not bee cut in sunder, then they laid euen planckes vpon them so cunningly ioyned together, as it resembled a well-framed bridge of stone: This beeing done, they builded shoppes vpon it on both sides, wherein all sortes of wares were sold, which hindered Passengers from looking on the water: They made moreouer draw-bridges at both ends, which when they were drawne vp, those shoppes seemed an Island in the middest of the Riuer. And to keep the enemie from firing it by night, some two hundred paces before it they hung vp aboue water great wodden plankes fastned to ankors with yron hookes to keepe out the fire-works, which might be throwne vpon it, till they were either quenched or burnt out.

The Venetians build a bridge vpon the Po, neere to Ferrara.

The bridge finished, Sanseuerine brake downe the Parke walles, and through it marched with his armie in battell within a mile of Ferrara, where he remained for a time in the Cities view, but when he saw that the enemie did not sallie, he brought backe his troupes to the Campe: then he beganne to repaire the Fort vpon the riuer which the enemie had abandoned; hee did first enlarge it, then enuironed it with trenches of twenty foote deepe, with strong bastions, Towers, and Rauelins: This worke vndoubtedly was in a manner impregnable, and would perpetually haue terrified the Citie of Ferrara, had it not by peace beene razed. The Venetian hauing in this manner assured his Campe, galloped with his Cauallerie to the very gates of Ferrara, filling all places with feare.

Sanseuerino in battell before Ferrara.

The Citizens viewing the bridge so neere them, and the Fort much neerer beganne to lament their owne and Common-wealths estate, saying, That Hercules Principalitie was ouerthrowne, themselues in great daunger, and that the stroakes of warre had pierced their very heart, that they were out of hope euer to haue peace

The Ferrarois complaints.

peace with the Venetians, who had diſplayed their victorious Enſignes at their gates: That the Marſhes, Lakes, and Riuers had not beene of force to reſtraine the courſe of their Victorie, of whom they were to receiue verie vniuſt conditions of peace, or ſubmit themſelues to their mercie. The Venetian in the meane time omitted nothing that might further his Victorie, he did ſhut vp the riuers and lakes; placing corps du guard and garriſons in all paſſages. In a word, he held thoſe of Ferrara at ſuch a bay, as Conquerours are wont to do the vanquiſhed, when they are deſirous ſpeedily to end the Warre.

The end of the firſt Booke of the fourth Decad.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE FOVRTH DECAD

Of The Historie Of Venice.

The Contents of the ſecond Booke of the fourth Decad.

THe Pope maketh a new league, and abandoneth the Venetians. The Duke of Calabria comes to Ferrara. All Princes and Commonwealths of Italy band themſelues againſt the Venetians. The Senate ſends for the Duke of Lorraine into Italy, and giues him large pay. SANSEVERINO with great forces croſſeth the Adda by a bridge, and encampeth at Frezzia. LODOVICO SFORZA doth eaſily ouerthrow the ROSSIANS. ALPHONSO taketh diuers townes from the Venetians on the Breſſian and Verona territories: then croſſing the Mincia, he ſcoures the countrey as farre as the Riuer Adice, and not long after takes Azzola. The Venetian Infanterie vpon HERCVLES arriuall at Stellata leapes into the Riuer. ALPHONSO leauing Azzola with an intent wholy to ouerthrow the Venetian forces vpon Po, being ſtopt by SANSEVERINO returnes without effecting it. GIACOMO MARCELLO Generall of the Venetian fleet, dies at the ſiege of Gallipolis, which being taken, the Venetians make farther incurſions into Calabria. The enemies Armie comes to Baignols where peace in vaine before motioned at Ceſenna, is determined and concluded. And laſtly the triumphes, turnaments, and barriers made at Venice for ioy of this peace.

Pope Sixtus withdrawes himſelfe from the Venetians friendſhip.

THE Venetians had alreadie mightily preuailed, and the warre with Hercules would ſoone haue beene ended, had not Pope Sixtus by his ſodaine alteration not onely ſnatched the victorie forth of their hands, but that which worſe is, thrown them headlong into a dangerous war. For the Pope and Ieronimo Viſconte by whoſe councell and aduiſe all matters were directed, falling by little and little from the Venetians after Malateſtes death, did at laſt openly declare themſelues friends to the Ferrarois. Franciſco Diede, who at that time was Ambaſſador with the Pope, had of a long time foreſeene it, and a little before had by letters aduertized the Prince and Senate thereof, who to containe them ſtill in league, omitted no kinde offices of good friends and confederates. It is not certainly knowne vpon what cauſe they did it.

The Pope hauing made a league with the enemie, did by letters goe about to cauſe the Venetians to lay downe Armes, to induce them no more to warre vpon the Ferrarois, and to reſtore vnto him whatſoeuer till then they had taken from him. The Senate moued by theſe letters, were vnwilling to let goe the victorie whereof whereof they had ſo ſure hold, and yet deſirous to anſwere the Pope; and to let him and all the Princes of Italy and Europe vnderſtand that they were not Authors of that warre: for they would neuer haue taken armes againſt Hercules, had not Pope Sixtus prouoked them thereunto. They decreed that Bernardo Iuſtiniano a verie eloquent perſon ſhould, in the Common-wealths name, anſwere the Pope.

The Venetians anſwere to the Pope.

The effect of thoſe letters which he compoſed, and after the Senates approbation were ſent to Rome, is this. That the Senate were ſo farre from entertaining this warre without his Holineſſe conſent, as they did it by his inſtigation: That as at firſt ſo now they did not onely preferre peace before warre, but before victorie, ſo it were ſought for in time, and not on ſuch conditions as might make their lenitie interpreted in-diſcretion: That they were confident his Holineſſe actions had no priuate end, but ſuch as imported the common good of Chriſtendome: onely in this it was notorious to the whole world, that he dealt more ſubtilly than ſincerely: That for twentie yeares wherein both by land and ſea they had beene ſingled out by dreadfull Ottoman, none of the Princes of Italy afforded one drop of bloud towards the quenching of this neighbour flame, but ſeemed deafe to all ſolicitations, lame in aſſiſtance: But in this priuate cauſe of Ferrara thoſe which ſhranke backe from the publike quarrel could all bandie together, not as if they would arbitrate, but enforce peace: That they humbly deſired his Holineſſe to deliberate this buſineſſe temperately which others did paſſionately, & let his owne vnderſtanding aduiſe him whether it more concerned him to fauour the Venetians or the Ferrarois. As for them they were reſolued to proſecute that warre, which by his aduiſe they had vndertaken, hoping the ſucceſſe ſhould be as happie, as the cauſe iuſt and honorable.

He excommunicateth the Venetians.

This is in ſumme the import of the Venetian letters: But the Pope not reſpecting his ancient league, and perceiuing the Venetians to continue their reſolution, excommunicated them. He had alreadie leagued himſelfe with Ferdinand and others. And whileſt this buſineſſe was purſued by letters to and fro, Alphonſo Duke of Calabria came to Ferrara with two thouſand men, among whom were foure hundred Turkes which he brought from Otranto, but they within a while after ranne ouer to the Venetian. Vpon his arriuall certaine skirmiſhes were made neere the Citie, himſelfe ſtayed not long there, but leauing his troups with his brother in law, went firſt to Mantua, and then to Milan. But at a councell held at the ſame time at Caſal-Maior vpon the Cremoneſe where the commiſſioners of all the confederate Princes and ſtates met, warre was concluded againſt the Venetians by general conſent. Fredericke Gonzaga Prince of Mantua had the title of Generall of the Armie, but Alphonſo Duke of Calabria the honour. The Senate hauing intelligence of what had beene concluded in that aſſembly, and conſidering the dangerous warre they were to oppoſe the next Spring, (For the Genoueſes excepted whom Giouanni Paſcalis ſent to that end had exempted, all other Princes and States of Italy had coniured their deſtruction) and for the ſtrengthening of their partie, they ſent into France for Renatus Duke of Lorraine, vnto whom they gaue honourable entertainment. Antonio Vinciguerra one of the Secretaries had long before ſolicited him from the Pope and Venetians to come into Italy againſt the Ferrarois, who now the Pope relinquiſhing the cauſe remained firme to the Venetians, and brought two hundred horſe, and one thouſand foote to their aide. Vinciguerra conducted him through the Alpes: Bartilmeo Victurini, and Nicolao Foſcarini Venetian gentlemen, went as farre as Trent on the confines of Italy to meete him.

The Duke of Auſtria and the other Potentates of Germanie in fauour of the Pope denied paſſage to the Sauoyards, and other French whom Lorraine had enrolled. The Spring was alreadie come, when Pietro de Priuli, and Marco Antonio Moroſini came to the Armie as Prouidators. The enemies comminations were great: but the Senate hauing intelligence that their fauorites in Milan which yet ſtirred not, would if Sanſeuerin croſſed the Adda, raiſe ſome commotion vpon difference betwixt the widow of Galeas and Lodouico Sforza, after mature deliberation, commanded one part of the Armie to paſſe into Lombardie, and the other to remaine before Ferrara. Deifebo Anguillare went before with a braue troope of horſe, and expected Sanſeuerino at Azzola vpon the Breſſan Confines. Roberto ſoone followed him, leauing the Prince of Mirandola, Bernardino Montone, Antoniace Dulcino, Gaſparo Peruſsini, Aleſſandro ſurnamed the Turke, and diuers other Captaines at the ſiege before Ferrara. The French Generall went thither likewiſe with his forces: But their arriuall was more terrible to their enemie than profitable to the Venetian, the French euerie day mutining.

Sanſeuerino with Marc-Antonio Moroſini the Prouidator being come to the Breſſan territorie, remained for a time at the new Orges, then making a bridge ouer the Adda aboue Trezzia, and fortifying it at each end, himſelfe encamped on the further ſide, where he contained his ſouldiers without executing any hoſtilitie vpon the Countrey, rather like a gueſt then enemie, which was ſo farre from diminiſhing the malice of the Confederates, as on the contrarie it increaſed it, haſtening not deferring this intended warre. Lodouico Sforza, with a mightie Armie was in field againſt the Roſſians of Parma, who till then had brauely defended their patrimonie, but now ſeeing ſo vnequall a power bent againſt them, fortified their townes, and yet not thinking themſelues ſecure, retired with their children into the Genoueſes territories. Their Tenants following not their Lords but their fortune, preſently vpon their departure yeelded to Sforza. Lodouico vpon this victorie marched vnto the territorie of Cremona where Alphonſo expected him, (as ſome ſay) called in by the Milaneſes vpon Sanſeuerins arriuall to guard the frontiers in the abſence of Lodouico. Others affirme that he came voluntarily offering his aſſiſtance againſt Sanſeuerino.

The ſtate of the Roſſians of Parma yeeldeth to Lodowick.

Such was the ſtate of the Venetian affaires, when the Commonwealth was ſhaken with a new feare by a tranſcurſion of two of Sanſeuerins ſonnes to the enemie. Hee had foure ſonnes which ſerued in this Armie, all valiant and braue young Gentlemen, of whom Franciſco and Galeas vnknowen to their father, diſhonorably fled to the enemie, allured (as it ſeemes) by faire promiſes: yet their error was ſo much the leſſe, as it extended no further then to themſelues. This, at firſt did greatly perplex the father, who in great paſſion called God and men to witneſſe of his ſonnes treacherie, practizing not onely againſt their fathers honour, but life: yet herein comforting himſelfe, that his fidelitie was ſufficiently knowen to the Venetians, and ſhould euery day be more and more manifeſted: whereupon, hee ſent meſſengers to Venice to make his owne Apologie, and excuſe the temeritie of his children, which he hoped ere long to redeeme with his owne ſeruice and loyalty, and let the world know that he eſteemed nothing ſo deere, as the ſafetie and honour of the Venetian Eſtate. But the Senate was ſo farre from imputing the errour of his ſonnes to himſelfe, as they did by letters comfort him.

Two of Sanſeuerins ſonnes flie to the enemie.

Sanſeuerino's Apologie to the Senate, with their gracious acceptation.

Alphonſo in the meane time hauing made a bridge ouer the riuer beyond Caſſian, paſſed ouer his Armie with great rumor into the Gyradade, and thence marching into the Bergamaſco, tooke Colloigna and Vnguiana. Sanſeuerino hauing intelligence of his comming, kept ſtrong guard on the bridge on that ſide, and ſtrengthened his Rampiers, and then retired with his forces towards Bergamo: Thence, croſſing the Oglio at Palaznoles, he encamped at the new Orges. The enemie hauing taken Trecian, and reenforced the Popes and Florentines troupes, paſſed ouer the Oglio betwixt the new Orges and Quintiano. The Senate conſidering how dangerous the enemies Armie would bee to their territories (for it was reported that he had an hundred companies of men at Armes) did ſpeedily ſend the reſt of the Cauallerie which lay vpon the Po, to Sanſeuerino, that hee might be better able to reſiſt him.

Alphonſo in the meane time, had taken all that part of the Breſſan territory which lieth betwixt the Riuer Mella and the new Orges, a very fruitfull ſoyle abounding bounding in townes and villages, which vpon terrour of his arriuall preſently yeelded vnto him. The Venetian being inferiour to the enemie in ſtrength, reſolued not to confront but follow him, and preuent his attempts: And leauing Antonio Scriotto with 300. horſe in garriſon in the new Orges, himſelfe went through by-waies firſt to Maclou, then to Saint Zene three miles from Breſſia. Auguſtine Barbadico and Zacharia Barbaro men of great authoritie, came from Venice to the Campe. But Moroſini and Barbadico remaining with Sanſeuerino in the Armie, Barbaro went to fortifie Breſſia. He was ſonne to that Franciſco who in former time had for three yeeres ſpace defended that Citie againſt all the attempts of Duke Philip, worthie indeede of ſuch a father whoſe wiſdome and vertue he inherited, but more famous in being father to Hermolao, the learnedeſt of his time in Greeke and Latine. Alphonſo croſſed the Riuer Mella and ſeized on Baignols.

Alphonſos great progreſſion.

The Prince of Mantua (who till then had caried himſelfe as a friend not enemie to the Venetians) did openly ſhew himſelfe their enemie, ioyning with Alphonſo, whoſe Armie by this addition amounted to one hundred and thirtie companies of horſe, which being diuided ouer the Breſſan territorie tooke all the townes on this ſide the Riuer Mella (Azzola excepted) from the Venetians. The Mantuan goes to the Confederates Armie.

Sanſeuerino vpon the enemies comming to Baignols, retired to Regiana fiue miles from Breſſia, but Alphonſo taking all the other townes, brought his Armie to Calcina. This is all which that ſummer, till the beginning of Autumne was done, vpon the Breſſan and Bergamaſch territories.

Neer to the Po, moſt of the French being dead by ſickneſſe, their Generall hauing intelligence of King Lewis death, who by his Teſtament had made him Gouernor and Protector of his Realme, returned into France. The Senate being aduertized about the Spring, that King Ferdinand, aſſiſted by the Pope and Confederates, had rigged a mightie Fleet, the better to reſiſt the enemie at Sea, wrote to Iacomo Marcello who ſucceded Souranza in the Admiraltie, to haue a care that the State were not preiudiced about the Iſlands, nor in the gulfe neere to Hiſtria and Dalmatia; and if he might ſafely doe it, to inuade the frontier of Apulia and Calabria as Souranza had done. The Duke of Lorrain returns into France.

Marcello had not long beene Admirall, when fortie of the enemies Gallies, vnder the commaund of Frederick of Arragon, ſonne to Ferdinand, a braue young Prince, came into the Hauen of Ancona. Their arriuall did trouble the Senate, for it was likelie that the enemie, by tarrying in that place, would cut off the Venetians paſſage on the Sea. All Venice had their hope fixed on Marcello and his Fleet, deſpairing of their Dominion at Sea, vnleſſe the enemie could be ſpeedily repelled; expecting when Marcello ſhould either aſſaile or fire them.

But whileſt he intended the ſupplying of the Gallies, not yet compleat with ſoldiers and marriners, which he could hardly effect without promiſe of pardon and impunitie to the Bandetti of Albania, Dalmatia, and Hiſtria, the enemie thinking himſelfe not ſafe departed from Ancona three dayes before his arriuall. This omiſſion was hardly interpreted, eſpecially by the vulgar, meaſuring things by the euent: But better vnderſtandings made more fauourable conſtruction of it, ſaying; He did better to abſent himſelfe from fight, than vnaduiſedly hazard his naked Fleet, and that victorie was more eaſie in diſcourſe then action. Thus was hee variouſly cenſured. The enemie retires from Ancona.

The enemie in the meane time being out at Sea vnwilling to ſeeme idle, made ſodaine incurſion vpon Liſſa an Iſland in Dalmatia, putting all to fire and ſword. From thence he ſailed to Corfou, Georgio Viare a wiſe & valiant Gentleman gouerned the Iſland. He deſcrying the Arragonian Nauie, encouraged the inhabitants, preparing all things requiſite for defence: The enemies firſt aſſaults were very violent: for being many, they at one time ſcaled all parts: but through the valour of the defendants, they were not onely kept from entrance, but precipitated from the wals with great ſlaughter. The enemies take the Iſle of Liſſa.

Notwithſtanding this braue repulſe, the aſſault continuing till night without intermiſſion, and the Gouernour fearing, that the Defendants wearied, though not conquered, would giue way to the enemie, inuented this ſtratagem. Hee diuulged that the Venetian fleete would in few houres arriue there, whereupon hee commaunded all the bells to be rung, acclamations of ioy to be made by the ſouldiers on the walles, as though ſupplies were already arriued. The enemie terrified with this ſodaine clamour, hauing loſt 500. men in this aſſault, put to Sea. Shortly after the Venetian fleete, arriued and wintered there.

A ſubtill ſtratageme of Viare.

The enemie retires from Corſu

Alphonſo was (as hath beene ſaid) encamped at Calcina, and it was probable, that from thence hee would goe and beſiege Lonata. Moroſini the Prouidator departed from the Campe at Rezza, and went thither to fortifie the Cittie, whither hee ſent for Country people, who with the inhabitants and ſouldiers of the Garriſon, made a trench and rampires. Giacomo Media was likewiſe there, who not long before had beene ſent thither with three hundred men to guard the Citie. Theſe, together with the light horſe of the Towne, did by their frequent incurſions, foreſtall all things from the enemies forragers ſo long as they remained there. Moreouer, the Venetian had diuerted the ordinary current of the Riuer Seriola, that if the enemy came to encampe there, hee might want water. Neuertheleſſe hee attempted to take Vidaciolla, which Sanſeuerino hauing ſtrongly fortifyed, and the enemie twice aſſaulting it, could not be taken. Then Alphonſo being loath to looſe any longer time, determined to march directly to Verona.

The Mantuan diſcontented leaueth the armie.

Some ſay, that the Prince of Mantua, from thence returned home, diſcontented with Alphonſo, for refuſing to beſiege Lonata and Piſcara, which two townes hee ſpecially deſired to take from the Venetians. The Senate had beene aduertized of the enemies deſſeigne, and therefore ſent diuers boats, and a ſtrong Garriſon to Piſcara to guard the Towne and Lake of La Garda: they had beſide commaunded the Gallie which lay at Laliſa to bee armed, and brought into the Lake. The charge thereof was committed to Andrea Marcello, who had commaund of thoſe veſſells, till Pietro Diede was ſent thither by the Senate.

The Venetians come to Stellata

The enemie lying ſtill at Calcina, Thomaſo of Imola, who commaunded the foot forces vpon the Po, croſſing the Riuer before day, gaue a ſodaine aſſault to the ſuburbs of Stellata, and to the rampires next the Caſtle: the Sailers were mingled with the Souldiers. The ſuburbs were eaſily taken and burnt. The ordnance and other engines being taken from the enemies rampires were carried to the veſſels: this being done, they gaue a fierce aſſault to the Fort: The Souldiers and Mariners vrged with ſuch furie, as in a moment they became maſters of part thereof: Then they which were in the higheſt places craued parley, firſt of Immola, then of Andrea Zancane, who commaunded the veſſells, and of ſet purpoſe prolonged their parley, expecting ſome ſpeedie aid from Ferrara, wherein they were not deceiued. So ſoone as newes came to the Citie, that the enemie had taken the baſtions, and part of the Fort at Stellata, and that without ſpeedie helpe, they within it would be enforced to yeeld; Hercules on a ſodaine taking the light horſe with him, and commaunding the reſt of his forces to follow in order of battell, ſhewed himſelfe vnlooked for to the Venetians, whom hee charged: the Sailers running to the veſſells, left the ſouldiers to the ſlaughter, who for a while made head, but vpon the arriuall of the reſt of the troups, they threw themſelues into the water, truſting to their skill in ſwimming, hoping thereby to get into the veſſells, but moſt of them being carried away by the violent ſwiftnes of the torrent, periſhed, thoſe that eſcaped drowning were taken priſoners, among whom was Immola, who being but ſlightly wounded, and dying the night following, was ſuppoſed to haue beene poyſoned.

Hercules d'Eſte comes to the reliefe of Stellata.

Thoſe that lay at the obſcure Lake, made incurſions as farre as Ferrara, where among other places they ſpoiled the rich and beautifull Monaſterie of the Chartreux, burning part thereof. Giouan Heme Prouidator in that Campe hauing intelligence that the Fort of Stellata was taken, and making himſelfe readie to march to

The death of Giouan Heme.

the

the reliefe of his ſoldiers, and in ioy of that good news curuetting his horſe not well managed, it threw him, of which fall hee died not long after. Giacomo ſurnamed Media came to the Camp as Prouidator in his ſted, who by reaſon of the infectious aire falling ſicke was carried backe to Venice, where not long after hee died. Laſtly, they ſent Franciſco Troni thither, a diſcreet and braue yong man, who had no better ſucceſſe than his fellowes.

Alphonſo taketh Carpinetta.

Whilſtthe is was done on the Po, Alphonſo departing from Calcina tooke Carpinetta, thence marching to Calauria, hee croſsed the Mincia with part of his forces beneath Valegia, where hauing well viewed the whole Countrie, hee repaſsed the Riuer and came to Godia, where againe croſſing the Mincia at a bridge, by the Mantuans confines came into the Veronois. Vallegia ſtands vpon an high hill, and vnderneath it runnes the Mincia; the walles fortifyed with towers extend themſelues as farre as the Marſhes of Tartar. In this ſpace ſtands Villafranca in the middeſt of a Plaine, ſtrong rather by Art than Nature. The Arragonois breaking down the walls in that place, approached with his armie neere to the Citie, and battering the Caſtle, tooke it the third day after his arriuall.

The ſituation of Valegia.

Alphonſo vpon the Veronois.

From thence ſeattering his forces throughout the Veronois, he filled all places with terrour, euen to the Cittie walles: Hee likewiſe ſent ſome of his Captaines to view the ſtrong townes of the Countrey, and without difficulty became Maſter of Vigatia, the Iſle of Eſcalla and Sanguineta. Then comming to the Riuer Adice, and being diſcouered by the Inhabitants of the farther ſhoare, they terrified, fled, which terrour ranne as farre as Padua and Vincenza, the Country people flying to the cities and ſtrong townes. In this alarme the Magiſtrates of both places aſsembled forces to oppoſe the enemies paſsage ouer the Adice. Alphonſo ſtayed not long at Villafranca, ere Sanſeuerino comming vp the Lake of Benac encamped neere Valegia, where Marc-Antonio Moroſini met him with part of the forces which were at Lonata; at his arriuall Auguſtino Barbadico his Colleague fell ſicke, and was carried to Venice.

Sanſeuerino commeth to Valegia.

Alphonſo perceiuing the Venetian to be encamped before him, and not able to draw him to the fight, nor yet ſafely to aſsaile him, on a ſodaine roſe and marched into the Breſsan, where he beſieged Azzola. Some thought that the enemie did not without cauſe remoue and giue ouer his other deſsigns for that ſiege, but that he had correſpondence with ſome of the Garriſon and Citizens for ſurrender of the towne. It is certaine, that the towne being afterwards deliuered backe to the Venetians by agreement, ſome by decree of Senate, who feeling themſelues guiltie had remoued their habitation, were abſolutely baniſhed, whereby wee may perceiue that it was not a publike but priuate ſurrender. But howſoeuer, the City reputed impregnable yeelded at the firſt aſsault, the Caſtle following their example: Sanſeuerino after Alphonſoes departure recouered all the Townes which hee had taken vpon the Veronois, and leauing Antonio Souranza for the guard of Valegia, hee went into the Breſſan, and encamped at Calcina.

Alphonſo takes Azzola.

While theſe things were done abroad, the State receiued an ill preſage at home. For the Dukes pallace was in part burnt downe by night. It is thought one of the Chappell negligently leauing a candle lighted, the ſnuffe thereof falling downe kindled the fire, which about the ſecond watch of the night brake forth into a flame: the miſchiefe would haue extended farther, as in former time, had it not bin ſpeedily preuented. Sanſeuerino ſtrengthned at Calcina with new ſupplies, was deſirous to purſue the enemie, when contrary to all expectation hee vnderſtood the loſſe of Azzola and the Caſtle. This newes bred generall amazement, many expoſtulating why the Azolans euer fauoured by the Venetians ſhould ſo betray them? why the Caſtle ſhould ſo diſtruſt it owne ſtrength? That this yeelding proceeded not from feare but treacherie: and that the enemie not vninuited had ſo confidently entred the Breſsan. Theſe rumors paſsed in the Venetians Campe. But Alphonſo deliuering the Towne to the Mantuan, reſolued by all meanes to free his brother

Part of the dukes pallace burnt.

Diuers expoſtulations vpon the yeelding of Azzola.

Hercules

Hercules from the ſiege, from whom he daily receiued letters full of complaint, how thath e gained not by the Venetians loſse; that his Victories benefited others, not ſecured his ſubiects ſtill beſieged: That the Venetian Enſignes ſtill braued Ferrara, and poſſeſſed the bankes of Po: Therefore he intreated him in ſuch extremitie not to relinquiſh his ſiſter Leonora and her children parts of himſelfe, and deſired him to conſider how that he ſhould be able to hold out a winter ſiege; if the enemy ſhould perſeuer and his aſſociates fall from him, (the onely thought whereof was terrible) were not he and his whole eſtate ruined? Therefore he importuned him whileſt he had time and meanes, that he would doe his vtmoſt to remoue the enemie from the Po, and raiſe the ſiege ere Winter.

Hercules plaintiue Letters to Alphonſo his brother.

Theſe Letters did not moue but ſpurre this forward Prince, who ſending his infanterie before by the Po to Hoſtilia, himſelfe about midnight followed with the horſe by land. Sanſeuerino hauing intelligence of the enemies departure, and aſsured that his haſte tended to the ſurpriſall of the Venetians on the Po, remoued likewiſe before day, and by great iournies came to Verona with two companies of men at armes, and ſent order to the magiſtrates to prepare all the veſſels vpon the Adice, that nothing might retard his deſſeigne. Franciſco Diede was then Gouernor of the Citie, the yeare before Ambaſsador with Pope Sixtus (as hath beene ſaid) and Franciſco Marcello Prouoſt. Theſe ſpending moſt part of the day in gathering the boates, and the buſines not yet ended, were faine to labour all night, ſo that vpon Sanſeuerines arriuall, the ſouldiers imbarqued and ſailed directly towardes the enemie.

The Venetian troupes following after the Generall being come to Piſcara, they diuided themſelues and tooke ſundry waies. Moroſini the Prouidator, and Fracaſſo comming to Verona with certaine companies of horſe, followed Sanſeurino to aide him if neede required. Antonio Victorini who had beene Prouidator at Verona returned to the Campe at Calcina with Deifebo Anguilare, and the other part of the armie. The Venetians had the good fortune that thoſe whom Alphonſo had ſent to Hoſtilia by the Po, were detained by a ſouth winde. They being wind-bound, Sanſeuerino with a more fauourable gale arriued at Caſtel-Nouo as ſoone as Alphonſo. The enemie amazed with the ſodaine noiſe heard from the Caſtle, and wondering at ſo many confuſed voices, what, and whence thoſe numbers were, at laſt vnderſtanding Sanſeuerino to be come, Alphonſo brake into theſe words; O immortall God! doth this olde fellow flie now he can not goe? muſt the vigour of my youth bee out-ſtripped by his decrepitude? and, his iourney being greater than mine, muſt his ſpeede be ſo too? Then turning to his Captaines and Pilots, hee exclaimed againſt the windes and waters, as confederate againſt him; and ſo grinding his teeth, and bewraying much paſſion, returned fruſtrate to Hoſtilia.

Sanſeuerins ſpeed.

Alphonſoes exclamations.

Victorini in the meane time, Deifebo, and Rodolpho Gonzaga departing from Calcina, went to Caſtagnolles. There they vnderſtood that Lodouico Sforza did with great force batter Romagnia vpon the Bergamaſch. The Venetian croſſing the Oglio went to Pallaſuoles, from whence Thomaſo Primania was ſent to Bergamo, and Pietro of Carthage to Martinenga to ſecure thoſe Townes: But Sforza remaining before Romagnia after long ſiege tooke it. The Venetian Armie comming afterwards to Pontoglio, and from thence, neere to the Oglio, did in ſhort ſpace recouer diuers townes loſt that Summer.

In the meane time, Sanſeuerino and Moroſini the Prouidator returning from the Po, ioyned with the Armie. All things ſucceeding proſperouſly, Pietro Marcello as Prouidator was left to winter at Valegia, and the Albanian horſemen at Villafranca vnder the commaund of Nicolao Enonio and his brother, two braue young men, and the reſt in other places of the Veronois neere to the Mantuan confines, who by their frequent incurſions, did all that winter diſturbe Mantua and the Territories adiacent. Sanſeuerino vnited with Victorini and Rodolpho Gonzaga, tooke Manerbia and the ſtrong garriſon in it: From thence Moroſini by the Senates licence returned to Venice, leauing Victorini in the Campe. Manerbia taken, the Venetian Generall recouered Valeriota, Scorſariola, and to conclude, all townes loſt that Summer, but Azola, Quinciana, and Senica: Then, ſending the troopes to Garriſon, himſelfe in mid winter honourably accompanied, went to Venice. Prince Mocenigo attended by the nobleſt Senators in the Bucentauro richly hung, went to meet him, and becauſe he had honorably borne himſelfe in his place, the State gaue him many rich gifts: they afterwards beſtowed vpon him Catadella a towne on the Paduan territorie, and Montorio on the Veronois, with a delicate and pleaſant place neere to the citie, with a goodly pallace in it: and that his wife might bee a ſharer of his good fortune the Senate inriched her with many coſtly iewels. The like acknowledgement did the Roſſians of Parma receiue, who being by Sforza expulſed their Countrie, were at the ſame time in Venice, where they were bountifully entertained by the Prince and Senate, promiſing neuer to forget their good ſeruice, and for the time preſent gaue them certaine ſummes of gold forth of the publicke treaſury for the entertainement of their great familie: afterwards aſſigning a perpetuall annuitie of 32000. crownes to the two brethren Guido and Giacomo, and to the third, who had taken holy Orders, a very rich benefice vpon the Veronois.

to

Sanſeuerino's magnificent entertainment at Venice.

The Senate recompenceth the Roſſians of Parma.

Whileſt theſe magnificent rewards were giuen at Venice, it fell out after Sanſeuerines departure forth of Lombardie, Giouanni Antonio Scariotta leading fiue hundred horſe to their Garriſon at Cremona, by the treacherie of his guides fell into an Ambuſcado, in which he loſt moſt of his horſe, but himſelfe, ſonne, and one ſeruant, made way through the enemies and eſcaped. Sanſeuerino toward the latter end of winter together with Nicolao Piſaura the Prouidator came to the new Orges where Fracaſſo lay in gariſon; vpon their arriuall, Antonio Vittorini by the Senates permiſſion returned to Venice, ſo that Piſaura was ſole Prouidator in the Armie, till the comming of Luca Piſani, who after Zacharia Barbaro had for a while commaunded Breſſia. They remained ſtill in the Armie till the end of the warre, and in the meane time wearie of Idleneſſe, made a bridge ouer Oglio, and a Fort at it, which croſſing, they tooke the Tower Triſtania on the farther ſide the Riuer, and finding ſtore of corne, victuall and hay, it was a great helpe to them that winter: And becauſe the place ſeemed of ſome importance, they ſodainly fortified it, placing a ſtrong Garriſon there.

Sanſeuerino comes to the new Orges.

The tower Triſtania taken.

The ſpring already approched when a rumour was ſpread that the Conſultation of the confederate Princes which Alfonſo held at Cremona had no proſperous iſſue, and that they diſſented concerning the renouation of the warre. This did put the Venetians in ſome hope that peace propounded in Flaminia by the Popes Ambaſſadors, might vpon reaſonable termes take effect, and to theſe ends being ſolicited, the Senate ſent Zacharia Barboſa and Frederico Cornari to Leſenna; where after long conſultation, they perceiued by the vniuſt conditions propounded, that this treatie of peace was motioned onely to amuſe the Venetians, and to keepe them from purſuing that which they had begunne the yeere before in France and Germanie.

The Venetians the precedent ſummer, carefull of the iſſue of that warre, and incenſed againſt Pope Sixtus had ſent Ambaſſadors to the French Armie and Germaine Princes to incite them to ſummon the Pope and all Chriſtendome to a generall Councell, wherein it might be lawfull to complaine of the Pope, and to implore the aide of all Chriſtians againſt him; and to this end they ſent Sebaſtiano Badoario to the Emperour Frederick, Antonio Lauretano to the French king, Paulo Piſani to the Duke of Auſtria, and Nicolao Foſcarini into Flaunders to Maximillian, the Emperour Fredericks ſonne.

The Venetians craue a generall Councell.

The Pope fearing this matter, was deſirous to hearken vnto peace. The Venetians in the meane time, though they intended peace, did not omit their warlike preparations againſt the Spring: for beſides the Italian forces which by new ſupplies were mightily encreaſed by ſea and land, they drew from Morea and the Iſlands

The Venetians receiue newſupplies.

Iſlands next adiacent to Corfou, from Albania, and Dalmatia, twelue hundred horſe, one part of theſe were quartered in the villages neere to the enemie, from whence they daily made roads into his Countrey, and the reſt vpon the Breſſan.

The Spring was alreadie paſt when Sanſeuerino ſent commaundement to all the Garriſons, to meet him on the 27. of May, betwixt Variola and Cortiana. But whileſt this was done on the Breſſan, the ſailers of Diede his Galley, and foure other Gallies of Marcello's Fleet mutined. The Authours of the mutinie were ſecretly puniſhed by the commaundement of Tomaſo Zeno Generall of the Fleet on the Po: which the other Marriners hauing notice of, went with their Gallie to the enemies ſide, who lay neere to Philocina, but they were by him baſely ſtript, ſpoyled and ſent away. The Senate vpon theſe newes proclaimed them traitors; and that they might ſerue as an example to others, baniſhed them from their territories, with this addition, That if any of them were euer afterwards taken in the Venetian iuriſdiction, they ſhould be put to death as Capitall offenders.

At the ſame time that this Galley was loſt, Captaine Porco, a great enemy to the Venetians, made daily incurſions from Hoſtilio euen to the trenches of Mellaria, and among other brauadoes againſt the Venetians, hee did by oath proteſt vnto Giouanni Canalis (at that time Gouernour of the Caſtle) that within few dayes he would come knocke a naile into the gates of Mellaria. This bragge coſt him deere; for being taken and brought before Canalis, the Venetian ſaid to him; Thou arrogant and vaine-glorious fellow, performe thy inſolent promiſe: and ſeeing as victorious thou canſt not performe this bragge, at leaſt as a captiue; And becauſe thou ſhalt not be forſworne, take this naile and hammer: (which he deliuered to him.) This being done, he preſently ſent him to Venice to be executed.

The arrogant brag of Porco.

Marcello, Generall of the Venetian Fleet, toward the latter end of the Spring left Corfou, and went to beſiege Gallipolis. This citie is like an Iſland, and ſeated in that part of Calabria aduauncing toward the Ionian ſea, confining vpon it and the Adriatick. Plinie ſaith, That in time paſt it did belong to the Gaules, which is not vnlikelie to be true in regard of the name. The Nauall Armie conſiſted of 56. veſſels, among which were 16. Gallies, and fiue ſhippes of burthen. The Venetian before he would aſſault the Citie, ſummoned it to know if they would voluntarily yeeld, but ſeeing that labour was vaine, he drew his veſſels neere the ſhoare, and landed part of his ſouldiers to aſſault it by land, and on the water from his Fleet annoyed the enemie ſo, as on both ſides a cruell fight beganne. Marcello from his Admiral Galley incouraged his ſoldiers, willing them brauely to mount the Rampiers; the ſoldiers obeyed and deſperately ranne through the midſt of the enemies ſhot. Dominico Delfino, Lodouico Garzone, Conſtantino Lauretano, Tomaſo Diede, and many other Captaines of Gallies, did brauely acquite themſelues at the aſſault: And the Venetians had alreadie, not without great ſlaughter, reared ladders againſt the wals, on which ſome were mounted, when Marcello from the poope of his Admirall Galley, encouraging by name the ſoldiers and Captaines, approuing the valliant, and condemning cowards, executing all offices of a skilfull Captaine and Generall, being ſhot with a bullet, preſently fell downe dead. Sagidino the Secretarie ſaw him fall, and couered him with a cloake, and after that he had conueyed the bodie into his Cabin, encouraged his Countrimen to purſue the victorie, telling them that the Generall was ſlightly hurt, and gone to be dreſt, willing them, in the meane time, to let the enemie ſee that they could fight valliantly without a Commander, and in recompence of their valour, the Cities ſacke was theirs, it being once taken.

The Venetians beſiege Gallipolis

The death of Generall Marcello.

Dominico Maripietro Captaine of the ſhippes of burthen, ſo encouraged his ſoldiers, as in deſpite of the enemie they mounted the walles. At laſt the victorious Venetian entred the Citie, not yet knowing their Generall was dead. Euery ſtreet was filled with ſlaughter and ſpoile. Commaundement was giuen not to rauiſh women or ſpoile Churches. The Citizens threw downe their armes and cryed for mercie: all places ecchoed the cries and lamentations of women and children. The noble Gallipolis taken.

nobie Venetian preſently grew paſſionate, and pitied their diſtreſſe, by ſound of Trumpet commanding his Souldiers and Marriners to abſtaine from ſpoile and ſlaughter. Gallipolis taken, the command of the fleet was by a Generall conſent committed to Maripietro, till ſuch time as the Senate ſhould prouide a new Generall. The victorious Venetians did forthwith fortifie the Citie, and made it a ſafe retreat for their forces.

In the meane time Nerita a Citie of the Salentines Radiſca and many other neighbour townes daunted with the diſaſter of the Gallipolitans, voluntarily yeelded. Marcellos death reported at Venice, did ſomewhat ſower the ſweetneſſe of the victorie. The Citie neuertheleſſe reioyced, becauſe that by the taking of Gallipolis, a means was offered them at their pleaſures to anoy king Ferdinand their enemie, whoſe pride was no whit daunted, notwithſtanding that he ſaw the Venetians make incurſions into the verie bowels of his Kingdome; yet that turbulent ſpirit of his when it perceiued his countrey entangled in a difficult and tedious warre inclined to peace.

His ſonne Alphonſo who lay on the Cremoneſe, hauing intelligence by ſpies that the Venetians comming from their Garriſons, were with a mightie Armie encamped at Varioles, did with his troupes (which were farre inferiour to the Venetians) march to Quintiana, where fortifying himſelfe, his Armie by ſupplies from the confederates, did daily encreaſe. Alphonſos Armie at Quintiana. Sanſeuerino in the meane time, becauſe he would not be idle, thought it fit, that Nicolao Piſauro the Prouidator, and his ſonne Franciſco ſhould with certaine troupes of horſe make incurſions into the enemies countrey: The Venetians take Calice. Theſe hauing at a bridge croſſed the Oglio, did on a ſodaine ſurprize Calce, and other townes of ſmall importance, ſome of which they fortified, and razed the reſt.

